DRY GOODS TRADE BRISK.

Better Than a Year Ago—Retail Collections Satisfactory.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, Nov. 28.—Marshall Field & Co., in their weekly review of the dry goods trade, will say:

"There has been a seasonable activity in dry goods distribution during the week, even with unseasonable weather for retail selling. Cash receipts have shown an increase over those of the same period a year ago, which seems to indicate that with the marketing of crops retailers are making satisfactory collections, enabling them to liquidate their own obligations.

"Shipments for the month are ahead of last November. The annual preinventory clearance sale announced for the first three days of December promises to be one of unusual interest, as retailers are carrying low stocks, and are in position to take advantage of special offerings. Reports from our traveling representatives are to the effect that a large attendance of buyers is anticipated."

IN THE BUSINESS WORLD

Fancy Ribbons Lead Demand.

Current buying of ribbons is centred almost entirely on holiday goods. Effective satins, Dresdens, and novelty ribbons are receiving the most attention. In Paris, according to reports received here, ribbons continue in great demand. Extremely wide hip girdle and sash effects, in novel arrangements, are frequently seen on fashionable suits and costumes. Just now Paris is favoring stripes in a wide variety of effects in gorgeous color combinations. Of the solid colors, old gold and silver, Nattier blue, canary green and Turco red are the most wanted.

New Fibre Barrel on Market.

A new packing barrel, made of fibrous board, is now being put on the market by a Pittsburgh maufacturing firm. It is made by automatic machines, is cylindrical in shape, and is said to possess many advantages over the ordinary wooden barrel. The shell of the fibre barrel is made by winding on a collapsible drum, and as each ply is wrapped on the drum it is automatically cemented together. Around the head of the barrel, which is in one piece, a grooved steel band is placed. The new barrel is said to be very sound when completed, and especially adaptable to shipping crockery and glass. It has no hoops.

Japanese Silk Prices Weaker.

The downward trend of raw silk prices is still in evidence at Yokohama, but buying has been more active there of late. Sales for the last week have amounted to 3,800 bales. The Canton market is withstanding the effect of the decline in Japanese silks, principally because of the small amount of Canton silks available. Russian silks are slightly higher at Shanghai, but otherwise that market is unchanged as to price. Cables received by H. L. Gwalter & Co. reported the Milan market quiet, with some concessions obtainable on ready silk. Strike talk in Paterson and the fluctuations of Japanese silk prices have kept recent business small at New York.

Taffeta Waists for Spring.

In the last few weeks the interest shown in chiffon taffetas has increased to such an extent that waist manufacturers have made up a large showing of new samples for Spring in plain colors, in changeables, and in printed taffetas, says The Dry Goods Economist. Extra smart, semi-tailored models show short extensions below the waist in the form of pepiums or coat-tails. A soft crush girdle or tailored belt finishes the waistline. Other important features of these waists are Medici collars or sofe neck-pleatings which end in a V outline in the front. When soft vests of net or lace are used, these pleatings are often made of the same matrial.

Spring Dress Goods Unsettled.

Business in Spring dress goods has not been entirely satisfactory to the domestic mills, and some of them are now running only part time. A prominent local selling agent said yesterday that a larger amount of the imported cotton goods were being sold this season than ever before, and that these goods were seriously affecting the sale of domestic wool and worsted products. He said also that a number of imported lines of allwool crêpes and other lightweight goods, in which there is little besides labor to be reckoned in the cost, had sold well in this locality. Uncertainty as to selling prices, however, caused by not knowing what the foreigners would be able to do, has hampered domestic business more than anything else.

Insurance on "Royalty" Products.

An interesting question has been raised apropos the licensing scheme of a prominent talking machine company to maintain legally the retail selling price of its products. In business opposition it contends that under such plan, unless the producer issued a perpetual fire insurance policy to go with his product as a permanent protection, no fire insurance company would be held liable for the loss of such property after distribution occurred. It is assumed, of course, that the distributor does not part with his merchandise unless the customer pays an amount equal to its value, plus a profit. While the consumer has thus parted with his money, he really does not become the owner of the property, and, consequently, is not insured. It must then remain for the producer, it is contended, to protect his product against the risk of fire.

Don't Want to Aid Safety Museum.

Much adverse comment was made here yesterday by officials of large fire insurance companies on a letter sent out by Commissioner of Labor Bryant of New Jersey, in which he asked these companies to contribute toward a museum of safety in Newark. This exhibit, it was said, would include many devices for protecting factories against fire losses. An official of one of the largest companies said that he doubted the usefulness of such an exhibit. He also said that he could see no good reason why the insurance companies should help pay for the proposed museum, as they already paid excessive taxes for doing business in New Jersey. It was said, too, that State appropriations for maintaining the museum in the future could not be relied on, and that eventually the insurance companies might be obliged to bear the entire cost of maintenance.

LATEST CUSTOMS RULINGS.

Material Used by a Machine Not a Part of Apparatus.

The Board of United States General Appraisers decided yesterday that a substance or material used in the operation of a machine is not to be regarded under the terms of the Tariff act of 1909, as a part of the machine. The case before the board was a protest by Thomas Meadows & Co., who claimed free entry for caustic soda used in operating breathing apparatus constructed by Meyer & Co. of Germany. It was asserted by the importers that the powder constituted a "miners' rescue appliance" within the meaning of the law. The Collector at New York assessed duty on the powder at the rate of ½ of 1 cent a pound under paragraph 73. Judge Brown, in his decision for the board, held that as caustic powder had other and more general uses, it was not an "appliance" as that word is used in the law. The Collector's assessment was affirmed.

The board sustained a protest by T. W. Saunders and M. Dillingham, and held that sweepings from leather factories were entitled under the old tariff to enter free of duty under the provision for fertilizers.

The F. William Gertzen Company, New York, was sustained in a contention regarding the classification of sterilized cream put up in tins. Duty was taken under paragraph 248, as sterilized milk, at the rate of 2 cents a pound. It was claimed dutiable at 5 cents a gallon under paragraph 247, as cream.

G. W. Sheldon & Co. complained of the collector's action in assessing Brussels sprouts at 10 cents a pound under the act of 1909, as seeds not specially provided for. The sprouts were claimed properly dutiable at 8 cents a pound as cabbage seed. The board held that the sprouts were not in the same category with cabbage seeds, and overruled the protest.

Refrees' Notices

SUPREME COURT, COUNTY OF NEW YORK.—BANK OF WASHINGTON HEIGHTS, plaintiff, against MAX A. SCHIMPF and others, defendants.

In pursuance of a judgment of foreclosure and sale, duly made and entered in the above-entitled action and bearing date the 10th day of November, 1913, I, the undersigned, the referee in said judgment named, will sell at public auction, at the Exchange Salesroom, Nos. 14-16 Vesey Street, in the Borough of Manhattan, City of New York, on the 4th day of December, 1913, at 12 o'clock noon on that day, by Joseph P. Day, auctioneer, the premises directed by said judgment to be sold, and therein described as follows:

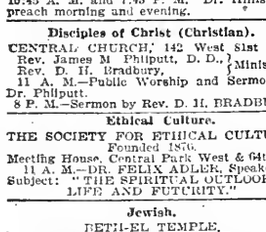
All that certain piece or parcel of land, with the buildings and improvements thereon erected, situate, lying, and being in the Borough of Manhattan, City of New York, in the County and State of New York, bounded and described as follows: Beginning at a point on the westerly side of Amsterdam Avenue distant seventy-five (75) feet southerly from the southwesterly corner of 157th Street and Amsterdam Avenue; running thence westerly parallel with 157th Street one hundred (100) feet; thence southerly parallel with Amsterdam Avenue twenty-five (25) feet; thence easterly parallel with 157th Street one hundred (100) feet to the westerly side of Amsterdam Avenue; thence northerly along the westerly side of Amsterdam Avenue twenty-five (25) feet to the point or place of beginning. Also all that lot of land in the City of New York, Borough of Manhattan, beginning at a point on the northerly side of 156th Street opposite the middle of a party wall and distant one hundred and eighty (180) feet easterly from the corner formed by the intersection of the northerly side of 156th Street and the easterly side of the Boulevard or Eleventh Avenue as widened, and running thence northerly part of the way along the middle line of a party wall and parallel with 10th Avenue ninety-nine (99) feet eleven inches more or less to the middle line of the block between 156th and 157th Streets; thence running easterly along the middle line of the block twenty (20) feet; thence running southerly parallel with 10th Avenue ninety-nine (99) feet eleven inches more or less to the northerly side of 156th Street, and thence running westerly along the northerly side of 156th Street twenty (20) feet to the point or place of beginning.

Dated New York, November 12th, 1913.

A. LIVINGSTON NORMAN, Referee.

JOHN WHALEN, Attorney for Plaintiff, 296 Broadway, Borough of Manhattan, New York City

The following is a diagram of the property to be sold. Its street Nos. are 1,948 Amsterdam Avenue and 549 West 156th Street, respectively:



The approximate amount of the lien or charge, to satisfy which the above-described property is to be sold, is Seven thousand fifty-three and 51-100 ($7,053.51) dollars, with interest thereon from the 3rd day of November, 1913, together with costs and allowance amounting to three hundred thirty-five and 89-100 dollars, with interest from November 10th 1913, together with the expenses of the sale. The approximate amount of the taxes, assessments and water rates, or other liens, which are to be allowed to the purchaser out of the purchase money, or paid by the referee, is six hundred eighty-five 48-100 dollars and interest.

The above premises so to be sold in one parcel are subject to a prior mortgage for $22,000, and interest at 5 per cent. from August 16th, 1913.

Dated New York, November 12th, 1913.

A. LIVINGSTON NORMAN, Referee.

THE REAL ESTATE FIELD

Courtwood Apartment On Heights Held at $325,000

Figures in Important Trade—Frederick Crowninshield Sells West End Avenue Home—Old Tichnor - Grand Building Leased for Theatrical Enterprise.

The realty market, despite the misfortunes of the New York Real Estate & Security Company, showed considerable activity yesterday. The Washington Heights section furnished an important deal in which a trade was involved. It included the sale of the six-story apartment house known as the Courtwood, on the southwest corner of Broadway and 169th Street, by the Pembrooke Realty Company to the Central Building and Investment Company, of which Hyman Sonn is President. The apartment house, which covers a plot 90 by 150, has been held at $325,000.

In part payment Mr. Sonn's company gave a plot of ten lots, being the block front on the west side of Northern Avenue between 179th and 180th Streets, held at $125,000. The new owners, it was announced, have effected a resale of this property to the Munden Construction Company, of which Charles Flaum is President, and they are preparing to erect on the site four five-story apartment houses.

The deal, including the resale, was negotiated by William S. Baker in conjunction with Henry J. Kantrowitz, and they also have secured a building and permanent loan of $270,000 for the apartment house operation by the Munden Construction Company.

Artist Sells West End Ave. Home.

Frederick Crowninshield, the artist, has sold his residence at 314 West End Avenue. It covers a lot 19.11 by 47 and irregular, on the east side of the avenue, a few feet south of Seventy-fifth Street. Pease & Elliman were the brokers, and the buyer is a client of the firm, which has purchased for occupancy.

Big Theatre Lease Above Columbus Circle.

A transaction of more than ordinary interest, in that it means a big theatrical improvement for the Columbus Circle section, has been closed in the leasing by a syndicate headed by Sol Bloom of the old Tichnor-Grand Building at 3 to 7 West Sixty-first Street, between Central Park West and Broadway. The building, an eight-story structure, was lately occupied by the United States Motor Company. It runs through the block, and in Sixty-second Street is opposite the Century Theatre. The frontage on both streets is 75 feet.

Mr. Bloom and his associates have leased the property for twenty-one years, beginning next May, at an aggregate rental of about $750,000. The lease carries two renewal privileges. Definite announcement of the nature of the theatrical enterprise proposed for the site has not been made, but it is understood that it will be of a large and important character.

The brokers in the deal were Fish & Marvin and Frederick Fox & Co

Elbridge T. Gerry Disposes of Lot.

The old three-story building at 133 Seventh Avenue, 21 by 75 feet, one of the first properties that came into possession of Commodore Elbridge T. Gerry, was sold yesterday for him by the Cruikshank Company to Moses G. Byers.

The buyer owns the adjoining four-story stable property on the Seventh Avenue side, and now controls a plot 81 by 75 feet.

Harlem Apartments Sold.

An investor has purchased from the Edward Waters Construction Company 629 West 138th Street, a five-story flat on a plot 50 by 99.11.

John J. Clancy & Co. have sold for F. R. Peixotti to Harry Green and Samuel H. Hunter 551 West 125th Street, a five-story tenement, on lot 25 by 99.11, between Broadway and Amsterdam Avenue.

Bronx Borough.

Michael Scanlon has purchased for investment from Henry H. Grote the five-story flat house on the southeast corner of Arthur Avenue and 180th Street. The parcel is known as 600 East 182d Street and has a frontage of 129 feet on the curve at that point. M. H. Meyers negotiated the sale.

Peter J. McCoy has purchased from a client of Arnold, Byrne & Baumann the southwest corner of Third Avenue and 180th Street, a one-story building, containing six stores and a theatre, on plot fronting 88 feet on the street and 95 feet on the avenue. The property was held at $110,000 and was sold by the same brokers about six weeks ago for the J. F. M. Company.

In part payment the buyer gave the vacant block front on the west side of Grand Avenue, from 188th to 190th Street, containing over eleven lots.

Brooklyn.

In the Hill section Louis Arnold has sold 304 Carlton Avenue, a three-story and basement brownstone dwelling, 22 by 100, for Katharina D. Gravenhorst to a buyer for occupancy; also 509 Vanderbilt Avenue, a two-story and basement brick dwelling on a lot 20 by 80 for Matilda Lovett of Ridgewood, N. J., to a buyer for investment.

Frank A. Schweer & Co. report the sale of the two-family brick house, 918 Seventy-fifth Street, for William Searing to an investor.

Visco Brothers have sold, in conjunction with William H. Bourne, 402 Fourth Place, a three-story and basement, four-family brick building for Joseph F. Ryan and Frederick R. Stoll to Raffaele Tramontano, for investment.

Long Island.

The Windsor Land and Improvement Company sold at East Rockaway to W. E. Engelbrechs a plot, 40 by 110, on Baisley Avenue; to Overland Investment Company a plot, 120 by 110, on Fulton Street East; to V. Von der Lin, a plot, 60 by 120, on Lawrence Street, and a plot, 40 by 100, on Rhame Avenue; to T. Swain a plot, 40 by 100, on Franklin Street. The same company sold at Floral Park to D. Dwane a plot, 40 by 100, on Geranium Avenue. The same company sold at Valley Stream to J. Fichel a plot, 40 by 100, on Albemarle Avenue.

Big Factory for Mospeth, L. I.

The C. B. French Cabinet Company manufacturer of telephone booths, purchased from Mary A. Proscher for a consideration of about $75,000 three acres at Maspeth. The property is adjacent to the Bushwick branch of the Long Island Railroad, and has almost equal terminal facilities by water from its close proximity to Newtown Creek.

The company will erect a one-story factory having about 100,000 square feet of floor space and will employ about two hundred hands.

$500,000 For Queens Buildings.

The anticipated building revival in Queens was manifested this week, when the total of the applications for building permits shows that the operations totaled nearly half a million dollars. Superintendent Moore of the Building Bureau expected a large increase as a result of conferences he had previously held with builders in the borough regarding building instructions.

The total estimated cost of operations for the week was $464,699, of which there were 107 applications for new buildings at an estimated cost of $386,812; 51 applications for alterations of an estimated cost of $42,259, and 62 applications for plumbing permits of an estimated cost of $35,628.

New Jersey.

Kurz & Uren sold for Siegfried Loewenthal a block of land, comprising seventy-two lots at Egg Harbor City to an investor.

The Hillsdale Estate sold to Margaret A. Hughes a seven-room bungalow of English architecture on plot 75 by 125 at Hillsdale, Bergen County. Also to John Fortune Galloway, a six-room house, on plot 50 by 106, on Large Avenue.

Recent Buyers.

S. Morrill Banner is the purchaser of the nine-story apartment house, on plot 52 by 100, at 178 East Seventieth Street, reported sold recently by Everett & J. Randolph Jacobs. L. A. Berwin & Co. were the brokers.

The estate of the late Dr. Charles McBurney is the buyer of 26 East Thirty-first Street, sold Wednesday by Dr. Alexander Lambert. The McBurney estate owns the adjoining dwelling, No. 38.

Mortgage Loans Placed.

Brooks & Momand have placed the following first mortgage loans: $45,000 at 5 per cent. on property belonging to the Wynne Construction Company, located at 522 East 157th Street; $22,000 at 5 per cent. on property of Dora Levy, at 157 West 119th Street; $16,000 at 5½ per cent. on property 1,437, 1,439, 1,441, and 1,443 St. Nicholas Avenue, Brooklyn, belonging to the South-Western Realty Company; $10,000 at 5½ per cent. on residential property of C. F. Boell, located at Katonah, N. Y.; $12,000 at 5½ per cent. on residential properties at Mountain Lakes, N. J.; $8,000 at 5 per cent. on property 239 East Ninth Street, and $18,000 at 5 per cent. on property 421 West Seventeenth Street.

New Building on Blackwell's Island

The only plan for new structures in Manhattan filed in the Building Bureau yesterday was for a three-story building on Blackwell's Island, to be used by the Commissioner of Public Charities. It will be erected in the central part of the island, opposite Eighteenth Street, and will be 122.8 by 103.6 feet in size. Charles M. A. Meyers is the architect, and he has placed the cost at $200,000.

Lease Near New Piers.

Charles E. Heydt has negotiated a lease for twenty-one years for the estate of Bradish Johnson of three lots, 75 by 125, south side of Forty-ninth Street, 275 feet west of Eleventh Avenue. The tenant, Daniel Darrow, dealer in building materials, will erect brick and cement buildings for his own occupancy.

Commercial Leases.

The Berlin Renting Agency has leased to a client for a term of years the elevator apartment house known as the San Samone, occupying the entire block on Amsterdam Avenue, from 141st Street to 142d Street.

The Guarantor Realty Corporation leased for Walter J. Salomon a store in the Bristol Building, 500 Fifth Avenue, to S. Ash, jeweler, for a term of years; also a store in the same building to I. Miller for a term of years.

WASHINGTON PL, 1,475, w s,

THE WEATHER

WASHINGTON, Nov. 28.—Abnormally high pressure continues over the East but the low pressure over the South in connection with the high area has caused the persistence of the unsettled rainy weather over the middle and north districts east of the Mississippi River except in the South Atlantic and East Gulf States, with some snow in New York and New England. Moderate temperatures prevail in the Atlantic States.

There is no prospect of any immediate relief from the present unsettled weather east of the Rocky Mountains except in the Northwest. Rains will continue quite general on Saturday in New England and the Middle Atlantic States. On Sunday rains will be quite general over the east half of the country, while over the west half the weather will be generally fair.

Winds for Saturday and Sunday: North and Middle Atlantic, moderate east to southeast; South Atlantic, moderate east; East Gulf, moderate east and southeast.

FORECASTS FOR TO-DAY AND SUNDAY.

North New England—Rain or snow and warmer Saturday. Sunday, unsettled; probably local rains; moderate, variable winds, mostly east and southeast.

Eastern Pennsylvania and New Jersey—Continued unsettled weather Saturday and probably Sunday, with occasional rains; slightly warmer Saturday; moderate east to southeast winds.

Eastern New York—Rain in south, rain or snow in north portion, Saturday. Sunday, rain; moderate east to southeast winds.

South New England—Rain or snow in the interior; rains on the coast Saturday. Sunday, unsettled; probably rain; moderate east to southeast winds.

The temperature record for the twenty-four hours ended at midnight, taken from the thermometer at the local office of the United States Weather Bureau, is as follows:

3 A. M.	36	38	4 P. M.	33	46
6 A. M.	38	38	6 P. M.	33	46
9 A. M.	33	40	9 P. M.	31	47
12 M.	39	43	11 P. M.	30	47

This thermometer is 414 feet above the street level.

The temperature at 8 A. M. yesterday was 40; at 8 P. M. it was 47. Maximum temperature, 47 degrees at 8 P. M., minimum 36 degrees at 12:01 A. M. Humidity, 75 per cent. at 8 A. M.; 75 per cent. at 8 P. M.

The barometer at 8 A. M. yesterday registered 30.60 inches; at 8 P. M. it stood at 30.50 inches.

COLLISION AND FIRE ON THE ELEVATED

Five Hurt as Two Trains Smash at Chatham Square Station.

PLATFORM ROOF TORN OFF

City Hall Motorman Passed Signal, Officials Say, and Rammed South Ferry Train.

Two north-bound trains on the Third Avenue elevated line, one coming up from South Ferry and the other from City Hall, tried to make the Chatham Square Station, where the tracks converge, at the same instant yesterday afternoon. The result was a rear-end collision in which five persons were badly shaken up, the two trains were set on fire, and Chatham Square Station was jolted and crumpled up so that repairs estimated to cost $2,000 will be necessary.

The motor car of the rear train, from City Hall, on smashing into the South Ferry train ahead, rose from its trucks, lunged itself on to the station platform, and butted out a section of the platform roof. Had the car lunged to the right, instead of to the left, it would have toppled over the elevated structure and dropped down on the traffic in the street below.

The busy intersection of the Bowery with Mott, Doyers, Oliver, and Worth Streets, East Broadway, and Park Row saw an electric display, with an accompaniment of flying splinters, followed by fire, that started several runaways and scared pedestrians.

Women passengers in both trains screamed, while men fought their way to the platform of the Chatham Square station and to the street. In the confusion of the wreck it appeared that several passengers were seriously hurt and calls were sent to Gouverneur and Bellevue Hospitals for all available ambulances.

Dr. Gibson of Gouverneur, who was the first to arrive, found only one passenger hurt seriously enough to need medical attendance. This was Israel Herman of 511 East 148th Street, who had been cut over the eye by a flying splinter. He refused to go to a hospital. Herman was the only passenger in the forward car of the City Hall train. The others hurt were in the rear car of the South Ferry train. They were Morris Greenberg, 15 Elizabeth Street; Samuel Klein, 1,221 Third Avenue; Morris Schachner, 210 East 102d Street, and Peter Brady, conductor. All went to their homes.

When other ambulances arrived along with the fire apparatus they were sent back by the police, so as not to hinder the firemen. The rapidly spreading flames were first started by electric flashes from the third rail. Men from Engine Company No. 9, in East Broadway, found flames licking up both sides of the wrecked trains and the elevated station platform. Before they would risk throwing a stream of water they made sure that the current had been turned off at Ninth Street. After that it took only a few minutes to bring the flames under control, and within fifteen minutes the fire was out.

John Bratten of 2,114 Third Avenue, the 250-pound motorman of the City Hall train, told officials that after he clamped on his brakes his train skidded over wet rails and smashed into the South Ferry train ahead. A light rain was falling, and it had been misty and foggy all the morning.

After the first shock of the collision Bratten heard timbers crunch overhead. He saw the front vestibule of his car being crumbled up and the roof being stove in as the car tried to make room for itself on the platform. A platform post, directly in front of him, gave way just before his body came in contact with it. Sections of the platform roof protruded through holes rent in the top of his own car. He scrambled from his perilous position only after his car protruded for half a length across the station platform. Most of the passengers of the forward train had fought their way to the platform by that time, while those in his own train were piling out at the rear of his car. The cars further back were not near enough to the platform to permit escape.

The South Ferry train was in charge of Motorman Walter Smith. Peter Brady was guard on the rear car, which was struck. With John Bratten and Harry Steitz, in charge of the City Hall train, they were summoned as witnesses at a hearing which the Public Service Commission has called for to-day to determine officially the cause of the collision. To obtain data for this hearing, C. W. Welder, an electrical engineer attached to the commission, began an investigation yesterday.

It was announced at the offices of the commission that there is no record of any previous wreck at the converging point of the South Ferry and City Hall branches of the Third Avenue elevated line, and that the Commissioners were much surprised to learn that one had occurred. It was supposed that the converging lines were completely protected by a signal system which was thought to have made the spot wreck-proof.

A wrecking crew of 100 men in charge of Foreman C. D. Carpenter of the Maintenance Department of the Interborough worked from 1:30 o'clock, when the wreck occurred, until after 6 P. M. clearing up the tracks. During most of this time the uptown tracks of both the Third and Second Avenue lines were blocked, and no trains could be moved. The downtown track was blocked for over an hour, but after 3 o'clock part of the trains carried northbound traffic by switching over to the upbound track above the point of the collision.

General Manager Frank Hedley of the Interborough arrived at Chatham Square shortly after the wreck with a staff of lawyers and claim agents. He questioned Motorman Bratten and afterward said that a target signal was set against Bratten's train, and that the train ran past this signal. In his statement to Mr. Hedley Bratten blamed the accident wholly on the wet rails, which caused his train to skid, and made no mention of the target signal.

FOUR HURT IN BRIDGE CRASH.

Steel Surface Car Rams a Wooden One, Partly Demolishing It.

Four persons were slightly injured by a collision between two surface cars on the Manhattan end of the Brooklyn Bridge at 4 o'clock yesterday afternoon. All of the surface lines were tied up for twenty minutes. A Flatbush Avenue car, one of the new type of side-door steel cars, rammed the rear of a wooden car of the Myrtle Avenue line, demolishing the rear vestibule, smashing the end of the car and most of the windows. The wooden car was thrown from the tracks but remained upright. Both cars were coming from Brooklyn and were about to turn on the loops at the Manhattan end when the accident happened.

From the demolished car Police Capt. O'Toole of the Bridge Precinct, and Patrolman Frank Sullivan assisted these injured passengers: Margaret Tehan, 18, 73 Steuben Street, Brooklyn, cut by glass and suffering from shock; Edward Jardin, a broker, 282 Van Sicklen Avenue, Brooklyn, cut and bruised; Daniel Boyle, a laborer, of 1,371 Atlantic Avenue, Brooklyn, cut and bruised, and George Bauer, 203 Irving Avenue, Brooklyn, conductor of the Myrtle Avenue car, who was caught in the vestibule, but saved himself from serious injury by jumping inside the car. He and Boyle were sent to the Hudson Street Hospital, and later both were able to go to their homes. Jardin and Margaret Tehan went home after their injuries were dressed by Dr. Crane at the Bridge.

The damage to the heavy steel car consisted only of broken glass in the forward vestibule. The motormen, William Gibbons of the Flatbush car, and Christopher Bellew of the Myrtle Avenue line, were taken to the Washington Street Police Station, but were discharged. The Brooklyn Rapid Transit Company ordered their inspector on the bridge, Thomas Ryan, to make an investigation and report to-day.

According to the police, the accident was caused in part by too much speed on the bridge incline, and slippery rails, due to the rain, which caused the Flatbush car to pass Loop 5 and hit the wooden car as it was entering Loop 4.

AN INNESS BRINGS $1,250.

"Olives" Sold at Clarke's—Low Prices for Kneeland Pictures.

There was a good-sized audience and spirited bidding at the sale of modern paintings at Clarke's Art Rooms last evening. The pictures included the collection of the late A. A. Anderson and of the late John A. Aspinwall. The collections were catalogued separately. The total returns for the sale, eighty-nine numbers, were $6,300. There was a George Inness in each collection. That in the Aspinwall collection, however, "A Landscape with Sheep," 15 by 26, signed and dated 1858, was withdrawn before the sale.

The Inness of the Anderson collection, "Olives, Albano, Italy," 18 by 26, from the Inness sale of 1894, brought the highest price of the evening, $1,250, going to a buyer whose name was not given. A Sanchez Perrier, "The River Farni," 23 by 34, went to A. H. Ripley for $910. "A Woodland Vista," Wyant, 12 by 15, bought through an agent, brought $420; "Improving His Opportunities," by Jules Worms, 20 by 24, went to Prinz Brothers for $290; another Sanchez Perrier, "Near Rouen," 10½ by 14, went to H. L. Maxwell for $215, and R. Wilson paid $250 for a third picture by the same artist, "Banks of the Loire," 10½ by 14.

Low prices were the rule at the sale of the pictures of Gen. Stillman F. Kneeland and others at the Fifth Avenue Art Galleries last evening, and Silo, the auctioneer, asked if he might present a few pictures as souvenirs. One picture without a frame, ("A Back Yard,") by E. P. Sullivan, went for 25 cents. A few pictures brought as low as $1 and others $2 and $3. Other pictures went up into the hundreds and the total for the 135 numbers sold was $4,263.

W. C. Filter paid $430, one of the highest prices of the evening, for an attractive painting, "Les Amours de Don Juan," by Fragonard, and $115 for a "Marine," by A. Musin. He also paid $73 for G. Calderon's "On the Grand Canal." An "Interior," by Caballero, went to William Everett for $185, and Lackman paid $50 for a landscape by Lommen. A 9 by 14 landscape by Sontag brought $104 and Charles Price paid $180 for a marine by Theodore Weber. A "Portrait of Mme. de Graffigny," by Louis Toeque, brought $297, and Louis XV., by the same artist, $600. A large "Portrait of the Duchess of Gloucester," by Gainsborough, was passed.

An attractive landscape by Arthur Parton went to E. Howard for $165, and a portrait of a black-haired lady wearing a big gown, by an unknown artist, went to Morton W. Smith, who made a number of purchases, for $5. "An Incident of the Franco-Prussian War" went to Prinz Brothers, Brooklyn, for $160, and a large picture, 40 by 32, "A Soldier of the Pretender," by Robert Lefevre, to F. K. Seagrist, for $75. Mrs. J. Dood paid $95 for "Mary Queen of Scots," by P. Rubin.

The sale will be concluded this evening.

RAYMOND BELMONT ABSENT.

Trial of Chorus Girl Wife's Separation Suit Adjourned.

The suit of Mrs. Ethel Lorraine Belmont, former chorus girl, against Raymond Belmont, second son of August Belmont, for a separation, came up for trial yesterday, but was adjourned for two weeks. The adjournment was made to permit the defendant's counsel, Nicoll, Anable, Lindsay & Fuller, to get in touch with their client.

Edwin L. Mooney, counsel for Mrs. Belmont, asked Justice Giegerich to issue an order compelling the attendance of young Mr. Belmont in order that some inquiries might be made about his income. If this information could not be obtained from the defendant, Mr. Mooney said, it might be furnished by the deefndant's father, or by somebody else.

Mr. Mooney said that young Belmont was now the guest of Sir Bache Cunard at Market Borough, England, and he asked that if the order be not issued some definite information be furnished concerning the time of the defendant's return to this country.

One order has already been served upon the defendant for his appearance in court. Within two weeks it will be learned, it was intimated, whether or not young Mr. Belmont will come back and fight the suit or will allow it to go by default.

JAMES HAVEMEYER ESTATE.

Son of Former Mayor Left Property Worth $11,456.

James Havemeyer, the son of William F. Havemeyer, three times Mayor of New York, and a brother of William F. Havemeyer, Jr., the banker, left an estate of $11,456, according to an appraisal filed yesterday in the Surrogates' Court. Mr. Havemeyer, who was at one time engaged in the sugar refining business, died on Aug. 18, 1912, at his home, 401 West End Avenue.

Mr. Havemeyer left bank accounts of $12,255.99. His personal effects were appraised at $843, his interest in the estate of Sarah C. Havemeyer at $470, and his seat on the Consolidated Stock Exchange at $85. An open account with W. A. MacDonald & Co. was valued at $358.14.

TOLMAN MUST GO TO JAIL.

Appellate Division Blocks Effort of Usurer to Avoid Penalty.

The Appellate Division unanimously dismissed yesterday Daniel M. Tolman's appeal from a conviction and sentence to serve six months in the Blackwell's Island Penitentiary, the result of a trial for usury before Justices Zeller, Collins, and Perker of Special Sessions. The action of the court being without dissent, Tolman will have to serve his sentence.

Tolman was one of the most widely known salary loan brokers in the world. He had offices in sixty-three American and Canadian cities and formerly had operated abroad.

THREE SHOT IN WAR OF GANGS AT STRIKE

Jobs as Guards for Strikebreakers the Prizes for Which They Fought.

ONE OF THEM MAY DIE

A Guard and a Bystander the Other Victims—Girl Strikebreaker Injured by a Stone.

The disorder and the promise of violence which have marked the end of every working day since the sixty operatives of Feldman's hat-frame factory quit their machines on the third floor of 166 Greene Street broke out in gun play just after 5 o'clock yesterday afternoon, and policemen pushing their way through the crowd of factory workers packing the streets at that hour came upon three men lying wounded on the sidewalk.

One was a man out of work and suspected of "Dopey Benny" gang affiliations, one was a guard hired by the Feldman people to protect their strikebreakers, and one was a chance passerby. None of the three was a striker and none of the three a strikebreaker, for the bitterness that has attended the Feldman strike appears to be between the gang that was hired to guard the workers and the gangs that wanted the appointment and did not get it.

When 5 o'clock came yesterday trouble was in the air, and the strikebreakers prepared nervously for their going departure from the factory. Schlansky, retained by Feldman to furnish guards for his workers, had automobiles ready to move them from the factory through the danger zone to the Subway and elevated lines.

With a guard on the running board an automobile pushed off crowded. It had turned into Bleecker Street when from every quarter through the gathering darkness came a shower of missiles, both hard and soft. A stone struck Sarah Blattman, one of the operatives, on the forehead and she collapsed, bleeding from the slight wound and hysterical from fear. The chauffeur put on speed and whizzed around the block to reach the factory again and gather more guards before making another attempt to leave.

Patrolman Scherer of the Macdougal Street station helped Schlansky carry the terrified girl upstairs to the Feldman loft and returned to be on hand for any trouble. He had hardly reached the sidewalk when there was a blast from a police whistle that came from the Bleecker Street corner a half block away, the scene of the recent pelting. Scherer ran in that direction and found a lot of idlers staring at him, but no fellow officers. Then he guessed that the whistle had been just a decoy to draw him away from the factory front, and the next instant he knew his guess was right, for back in Greene Street came the noise of a dozen pistol shots fired in the rapid succession that means a street fight with several revolvers in action.

Scherer pushed his way back as fast as he could through the crowd that seemed to spring up out of the pavement, and as he broke into the widening circle in front of the factory Patrolman Dwyer of the Mercer Street Station emerged from the crowd on the opposite side of the circle. There were the three wounded men.

"Little Red," a guard with a bullet in his left shoulder, lay groaning but keeping a watchful eye on another man who had been shot in the stomach, and over whom a youth named Harry Gordon was bending. Dwyer collared Gordon, who stoutly insisted that he was nothing but a disinterested passerby. But from the sidewalk "Little Red" put in his word.

"Hang on to him," he advised. "He was in on the shooting. He threw his gun away, but he was in on it. He's a Dopey Benny man and so's his friend there."

"Little Red" grinned despite his pain as Dwyer pushed Gordon into the hallway. Then the ambulances from St. Vincent's Hospital came to take the wounded from the field. Gordon's friend, who gave two names and two addresses, but finally settled upon Max Green of 68 Avenue A, was found so seriously hurt that the predictions were against his living. "Little Red," who is really Charles Piazza of 207 Grand Street, will soon be able to tell about the fight in court. The luckless passerby who had been shot twice in the right leg is Herman Emanuel, an 18-year-old operative out of work. His home is at 81 Houston Street.

The street was gradually cleared by the reserves of two precincts and the police, when the excitement was over, found they had only one prisoner, the man penned in the hallway, Harry Gordon. He said he lived at 102 Eldridge Street and he was locked up charged with assault.

According to "Little Red," both Gordon and Green are members of the "Dopey Benny" band, and both had come up to Feldman's to make trouble for the guards retained by Schlansky, because they had failed to get the job of protecting the Feldman strikebreakers.

PASSED JEWEL ON THE PIER.

Tailor's Wife Searched After She Gave Bracelet to a Friend.

Mrs. Birdie Harris, the wife of a London tailor, who arrived from Liverpool yesterday on the Lusitania, was seen to pass a gold bracelet to a friend on the pier. She was asked to go on board the ship again, where she was searched, and a gold mesh bag, a chain with a jewel pendant, and an olive wood box filled with jewelry were found. The appraisers said the jewelry was worth $400, and Mrs. Harris said that it had been purchased in this country.

Later at the Custom House she admitted to Gen. Henry, the Surveyor of the Port, that several of the articles were intended for presents, but the gold mesh bag, she said, was her own property. The Surveyor reserved decision.

FIREMEN WITH CORK LEGS.

Chief Kenlon Raps Civil Service Physical Examinations.

John Kenlon, Chief of the Fire Department, issued a statement yesterday sharply criticising what he called "weak spots" in the civil service examinations. He said:

"If the civil service is what it ought to be, if the examinations are fair and on the level, there can be no fairer way of selecting men in the world. It is good for the department and it is good for the men themselves. A man feels that his promotion depends upon himself absolutely. He feels that he has got to keep his record clean; he feels that he has got to go into a mental and physical test with his fellows and come out supreme.

"Just now, at this moment, it occurs to me that while great strides have been made in the civil service, there are some weak spots. I claim that the physical examination in the civil service is not perfect. I claim that they have passed men without legs or arms, and that they have rejected men who are doing hard work; men that work with me night after night. Capable and able lieutenants have been rejected for a slight defect, and men with cork legs and without arms have been passed, and that has got to be corrected.

"It may be perhaps a little off for me to speak that way, but I know the work that these men are doing, and I know that it is not fair for the doctors of the civil service to reject our medical record—a record of every man from the time he enters the service; any injury he receives, whether he was on the sick list or not, it is all recorded there; they do not want to allow the Fire Department medical officers to have anything to say in the matter, and they reject all that mass of competent testimony as to what a man is.

"With a little improvement in physical examinations, I believe that there is not a fairer agency on earth. I have analyzed the questions after they came out, and I must say that they were the fairest and most practical questions that I have ever read, and they were questions that would test the knowledge and practicability of any condidate for promotion.

"I believe that the young men coming into the department to-day are a little better than the old men. I see them working down there in the yard and Chief Larkin has told me more than once that they are far ahead of the men of twenty years ago."

ADAMSON DINNER GROWS.

Acceptances Pouring In on Committee—Well-Known Men to Attend.

So many acceptances have been received for the dinner to be given to Robert Adamson, the Mayor's secretary, at the Waldorf on Dec. 15 by a number of well-known citizens that the affair promises to outgrow the original plans. Those who have the dinner in charge said yesterday that many more applications than there are seats had been received, and that those who have received invitations should apply for reservations at once.

Among those who will be present, it was learned yesterday, will be Mayor Kline, Controller Prendergast, Vincent Astor, Cornelius Vanderbilt, James Speyer, R. Fulton Cutting, Cleveland H. Dodge, George W. Perkins, William Loeb, Jr., Alfred Stockler, District Attorney Whitman, Caesar Conti, R. Ross Appleton, and R. A. C. Smith. Job Hedges will be toastmaster, and among the speakers will be Mayor-elect Mitchel, Gov. Slaton of Georgia, Mr. Adamson's home State, and Secretary of the Treasury William McAdoo. There will be many novel and interesting features in the way of entertainment.

Appraiser for Altman Estate Named

As appraiser of the estate of Benjamin Altman, John V. Coggey was appointed yesterday by Surrogate Fowler. He will make the appraisal for the purposes of the transfer tax.

POLICE TOOK GRAFT OF FORTUNE TELLERS

Wolf, Mortally Ill, Asserts That One Man Paid $625 a Month.

GIVES BLACKMAIL TRAIL

New Informer Implicates in Formal Statement a Police Captain Never Before Under Suspicion.

Disclosures of a system of graft entangling police officials with stock swindlers and clairvoyants were made yesterday by Frank Henry Wolf, who was arrested on Thursday on a charge of swindling Mrs. Francesca Groehnert of Astoria out of $10,000. Wolf's statement was obtained by Assistant District Attorney Frederick J. Groehl while Wolf was lying on a bed in Fordham Hospital, where he was taken as a prisoner after his arrest.

Wolf is suffering from cancer of the stomach, and after his arrest begged his captors to take him to a hospital, saying that any other course would mean his death. A Magistrate went to the hospital yesterday to hold a preliminary hearing.

That the authorities considered Wolf's arrest of importance was known on Thursday, but it did not appear until yesterday that his confession might supply the necessary evidence to show that graft had reached Police Headquarters. The pending investigation has had chiefly to do with wire-tappers, but the clairvoyants and disorderly house keepers also have been under investigation.

Wolf, it is alleged, co-operated with swindlers who maintained fortune-telling offices in this and other cities. In the horoscope of every visitor the fortune tellers saw wealth and happiness if certain stocks were bought, and there was another office in Philadelphia which would supply the stocks in question. Mrs. Isabella Goodwin, a woman detective, who has been investigating the clairvoyants, fourteen months ago brought Mrs. Groehnert to Magistrate McAdoo, to whom the victim told a story of giving Wolf $3,500 in cash and stocks worth $6,500 for securities which, according to Mr. McAdoo, are of little or no value.

For fourteen months the warrant for Wolf's arrest was in the hands of the police, but no report of Wolf's whereabouts was received. According to Wolf, he was living all this time in the Bronx, and frequently met members of the Police Department who knew him and knew, or should have known, that he was wanted by the District Attorney's office.

Some clairvoyants paid for protection, Wolf, it is said, told Mr. Groehl, and the money paid went the same way as the money paid by the wiretappers. There was one member of the gang who acted as a go-between, handing the money over to a policeman, then to a Captain, who gave the swindlers the impression that it was to go still higher up. One man, Wolf said, paid $625 a month for the privilege of operating three fortune-telling places. In another instance, he said, the police raided two places on Forty-sixth Street, which were then taken over by another who was paying for protection.

Wolf's disclosures, it is said, implicate a man whose name never before was brought into the police graft story. This man, it is understood, is a Police Captain, whose dealings with the swindlers have been carried on with great carefulness, so that only one or two knew of his participation in the graft.

Always Leading!

$5.00 Hatters can do worse than follow Truly Warner styles.

They certainly believe they can't go wrong in doing so, since drooped brim Derbies which were shown for the first time several months ago by Truly Warner are now being featured by the $5.00 hatters.

If you paid us $5.00 for the University Club we could not give you any smarter style than we have put into this new derby of ours at $5.00.

The safe rule to follow when you want the newest Hat style each season is to follow the crowds to Truly Warner stores.

Go to the one nearest you and see the University Club Derby. Stores everywhere. Address mail orders to Wholesale Dept., 811 Broadway.

ARTISTS WHO HAVE SELECTED THE GIRL OF TO-DAY.

Twenty-nine of the Photographs They Chose Will Appear in The New York Times Christmas Number Next Sunday.

The Times Asked Its Readers to Submit Photographs of the Young Women Whom They Regarded as Most Typical of The Girl of To-day. When the Contest Closed on November 1st Hundreds of Pictures Had Been Received. The Judges Found Their Task Far from Easy, but Selections Were Finally Made After a Critical Inspection of All the Photographs. Twenty-nine of the Selections Will Be Reproduced in a Special Section of The Times's Christmas Number Next Sunday, December 7th, by the Wonderful Rotogravure Process, and the Photograph Chosen as Best Representing The Girl of To-day Will Cover the Front Page. Each of the Pictures Will Be Remarkable Both for Attractiveness of Subject and Excellence of Reproduction. Rotogravure, Which Is the Newest Method of Illustration, Yields Results Hardly Distinguishable from the Slow Photogravure Process. The Girl of To-day Will Introduce the First Eight-Page Times Pictorial Section Illustrated by This Latest Process in the Art of Picture-Printing.

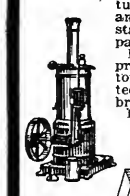
Bing Toys

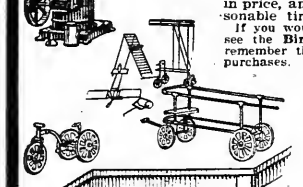
Mechanical Toys That Are Built by Engineers

To the smallest detail, every Bing Mechanical Toy is the product of an expert engineer. They are designed from real railroad trains, ocean steamships, and actual machinery—marvels of accuracy and fidelity to life.

The Bing Miniature Railway Systems, complete with stations and signals electrically operated, afford no end of instruction to the youth of an inquiring turn of mind. Bing motion picture Machines are practical, and while away many dull hours, because they use the standard educational reels produced by the big film companies.



For the boy with creative genius there are many happy, profitable hours in Bing's Constructor, the new educational toy that permits him to construct engineering and architectural works from life—anything from a chair to a drawbridge.



Bing Toys are all of the highest grade workmanship and materials—durable, practical, yet moderate in price, and are kept in repair free for a reasonable time.

If you would make some boy happy take him to see the Bing display at a store near you—and remember the name Bing in making your Xmas purchases. You can instantly recognize Bing Toys by the famous trademark always affixed somewhere to the piece.

Bing toys are sold at all good Toy and Department Stores. Ask for a Bing Catalogue.

Woodland Country Club, Chatsworth, N. J.

Winter Country Club
Camp and Bungalow Colony

A party of congenial business and professional men recently acquired the beautiful property now known as the Woodland Country Club, located on the Jersey Central Railroad, midway between Lakewood and Atlantic City, in the heart of the pine forest area of Southern New Jersey, with a dry tempered pine atmosphere, far superior to Lakewood.

This property comprises over 5,000 acres of land, about nine miles of picturesque river and Lake Shamong. It was improved by its former owners at a cost of over $200,000.00, with commodious and modern club buildings, woodland walks and drives, golf links, tennis courts, etc.

This entire property was "found" and acquired for an amount less than the actual cost of the improvements thereon; the Woodland Country Club was organized in April, 1911, and the clubhouse opened and the property put in first-class condition at an additional expenditure of about $50,000.

The Club is conducted like an old-fashioned Virginia Plantation. Accommodations and all supplies furnished at cost without further charges of any kind to members, their families and guests.

Each member may personally select an acre Bungalow site, which is deeded to him, free and clear, without cost or other obligations. No dues for five years, no assessments of any kind at any time.

Upon the opening of the third season the Governing Committee invites to membership a limited number of socially agreeable business and professional men on the original and favorable basis on which this beautiful property was acquired. Total cost $300. Limited Membership $100.

A letter addressed to the Secretary, 430 Marbridge Building, corner Broadway and 34th St., New York City, will bring photographic views, list of members from many States, and full particulars.

Nicholls's Splendid Work for the Middies—10,000 Autos at Grounds —Ticket Prices Slump.

In the misty rain of a gathering dusk the jubilant corps of West Point Cadets swarmed on the gridiron at the Polo Grounds yesterday, waving pennants of gold, gray, and black, until the football battlefield looked like a field of yellow grain swaying in the wind. They were celebrating a crushing defeat which the Army team administered to the Navy by a score of 22 to 9. They were thrilled with the joy of victory and danced wildly around the field, where the fighting squad of soldiers dazzled the big, powerful team of middies and offset their massive power and strength with a bewildering attack of forward passes and nerve-tingling rushes through the open field. To Army men this will forever more be hallowed ground, for it was here that the Navy's guns were spiked and West Point for the first time in four years triumphed over its bitter rival in the most spectacular game the two service branches of Uncle Sam have ever played.

The most distinguished and picturesque assemblage that ever witnessed an athletic event in this country saw the game. More than 42,000 spectators were there, including President Wilson, all his Cabinet officers, Senators, Congressmen from every State in the Union, foreign diplomats, captains of industry, men of letters, and leaders in society. With these were mingled thousands who had only known the Polo Grounds as a baseball arena and to whom the Army-Navy game was a new and absorbing spectacle.

So many people never crowded into the Brush Stadium before. The stands were jammed on all sides. Surrounding the gridiron was a row of boxes, which were occupied by the beauty, the brains, the oratory, and the courage of this Democratic Administration. The upper tier boxes held guests distinguished in the world of statesmanship. No less prominent than all these was the great gathering of the men of the army and navy. Army officers were there whose faces were browned by the burning sun of the Philippine jungles, and grizzled old veterans who bore the scars of our conquest of the redman. On the navy side were sea-fighters, aged by the life on the bridge. All these old boys were at West Point and Annapolis once upon a time and it made them all young again to see these players of brawn and youth fighting it out on the gridiron.

First Game Ever Played Here.

New York has never seen such a fuss made about anything as was made about these two football teams. The picturesqueness of the game was a delightful surprise to those who had never seen an Army and Navy game before. It was the first time in the eighteen years the Academies have been playing that the battle was ever played here. When the straight gray lines of Army Cadets paraded about the field and then marched erect and in perfect order over the gridiron a shout of appreciation went up which lasted several minutes. It was even louder when the midshipmen, with their long, dark blue coats and gold sashes, appeared behind their band. Both the Cadets and Middies drew up at attention before President Wilson's box, and in front of the boxes of War Secretary Garrison and Secretary Daniels of the Navy. These youths marched along with machine-like perfection. Sighs of admiration went up from the thousands of fair spectators. These spectators were very fair. They were in furs and feathers and wore great bunches of orchids, violets, and chrysanthemums. Here was the beauty of the land, pretty débutantes accompanied by good-looking matrons.

Aside from its attractiveness as a social event, it was one of the best football games of the year. The Army won because it used more strategy than the Navy. Lieut. Daly, the Army coach, knew that if the dangers of the open

EX-COLUMBIA TEACHER LOST

Cecil Lavelle Last Seen in Rowboat at Hamilton, Ont.

A search is being made in this city and Yonkers for Prof. Cecil Lavelle, formerly of Columbia University, who disappeared several days ago after hiring a rowboat at Hamilton, Ontario, and going out alone on Lake Ontario. Later the boat was found, containing his hat and coat. A note was pinned on the seat of the rowboat asking that if he should be found unconscious the nearest Catholic priest be summoned. Letters to Prof. Lavelle were found in the coat.

The body, however, has not been found and those interested in Prof. Lavelle believe that he may be alive. It is said that he was suffering from a nervous breakdown and took a vacation on the shores of the lake to recuperate.

Since the evidences pointing to suicide were discovered, Mrs. Lavelle has written to friends in this city asking their aid in a search for him. The Yonkers police were asked last night to see if they could find the missing man. So far, however, the search in this city and Yonkers has disclosed nothing to indicate that Prof. Lavelle is still alive.

Prof. Lavelle was born and educated in Canada. He was at one time Professor of History at Bates College, Lewiston, Me. He was connected with Columbia University for three years as Assistant Professor of the History of Education. He resigned on Nov. 1 to accept a full professorship at Ohio State University at Columbus, Ohio. Prof. and Mrs. Lavelle were both very popular at Columbia, and his friends there could not imagine the reason for his disappearance or suicide.

His work at Columbia had been very satisfactory, and the position he had accepted at Ohio State University was regarded as a decided promotion. Prof. Lavelle, according to his associates at Teachers' College, was in good health when he left for Columbus and was enthusiastic about his prospects.

Prof. Lavelle was about 38 years old. He was of dark complexion, about 5 feet 9 inches in height, and weighed not more than 135 pounds.

AUTO INVADES RESTAURANT.

Two Men Trampled in Stampede of Diners to Get Out.

A heavy, sand-laden auto truck on its way down Broadway into Times Square last evening, just as the theatre crowds were gathering, became unmanageable. It ran up on the sidewalk and tried to enter the Automat Restaurant. It stuck at the inner door, half in and half out.

But while the 300 diners in the restaurant were still under the impression that the truck was coming in, there was a stampede for the rear of the room, and in this scramble two men, Albert James and James Foss, were trampled underfoot. When the crowd had passed out the rear exit and they were picked up they were found to be painfully though not seriously bruised.

It took a wrecking automobile forty-five minutes to dislodge the tightly wedged truck, and in the process the awning pole of the Globe Theatre was knocked out, so that the overhead covering descended abruptly and did havoc to the coiffures of the women filing into the theatre.

BENEDICT PLANS HOSPITAL.

Will Be Commodore's First Public Gift to Home Town, Greenwich.

Special to The New York Times.

GREENWICH, Conn., Nov. 29.—Commodore E. C. Benedict, seeking to cement the rival factions which control the Bruce Memorial General Hospital and the Greenwich Hospital, has made to the Greenwich Medical Society a proposal favoring the erection of a new hospital large enough to accommodate the town's needs for the next quarter of a century, promising to donate liberally. The hospital is now in the hands of a committee consisting of Drs. Klein, Griswold, Brooks, and Hyde. This committee will help Mr. Benedict perfect his plans, which later will be submitted to the town for approval.

The new hospital would do away with the Bruce Hospital, which is three miles from the village, opposite Putnam Cemetery, and close to three contagious disease buildings and a tubercular building, and which is conducted at town expense. The Greenwich Hospital is in the village. It was built by subscription, and is supported by its patients, the State, and donations. Commodore Benedict proposed to use the Greenwich Hospital for emergency uses under the new plan, which would involve his first public gift to his home town.

BOY SCIENTIST BLOWN UP.

Louis J. Pooler, Jr., Injured and His Laboratory Wrecked by Explosion.

Special to The New York Times.

TUXEDO PARK, N. Y., Nov. 29.—Louis J. Pooler, Jr., the sixteen-year-old son of Mr. and Mrs. Louis J. Pooler of Tuxedo Park, was seriously injured today by an explosion that occurred in his laboratory. The force of the explosion hurled the boy from the building, wrecked it, and set it on fire. He was unconscious when he was picked up, and is now in the Tuxedo Hospital in a critical condition. One of his legs was mangled and he was injured internally.

Young Pooler is a student in the Browning School, in New York City, and his father had a laboratory with all kinds of machinery and electric apparatus erected near his garage. In this the lad was constantly carrying on chemical experiments. This boy was alone at the time of the explosion, and the cause of it is not known.

DITTENHOEFER STILL HALE.

Ex-Judge, 77 Years Old, Denies He Means to Quit Practice.

Ex-Judge A. J. Dittenhoefer, who appeared on Friday before Justice Marcus in the Supreme Court as counsel for Maxwell Edgar and Ossian Cameron, two Chicago lawyers, who sued Stuyvesant Fish for $30,000 for services in connection with Mr. Fish's fight against E. H. Harriman for the Presidency of the Illinois Central Railroad, said yesterday that his remarks to the court had been misinterpreted.

The noted lawyer, who is 77 years old, told the court that it was probably the last time that he would argue before a jury. This was taken by the newspaper reporters to mean that he would retire from practice.

Mr. Dittenhoefer said last night:

"I have no intention of retiring from active practice, but it is true that I may never address a jury again. It was said in some of the newspapers that I seemed in feeble health when I left the courtroom. I am far from being decrepit, and with the exception of being a trifle hoarse I felt none the worse for my hour and a half of argument."

SCHEPPS MAY AID IN BECKER APPEAL

Gangster on Whose Testimony He Was Convicted Holds Out Hope to Mrs. Becker.

CABLES TO HER FROM PARIS

Condemned Man's Case to be Argued To-morrow Before the Court of Appeals.

Joseph A. Shay and Arthur W. Palmer, who will appear before the Court of Appeals to-morrow in behalf of Charles Becker, condemned to death for the murder of Herman Rosenthal, believe that they hav important news which will turn the tide in favor of the convicted ex-Lieutenant of Police in the following cablegram, which Mrs. Becker received two weeks ago from Paris:

Important revelations may save Charles. Wire immediate. SAM SCHEPPS.

Mrs. Becker told THE TIMES last night that she sent the following reply:

What have you to say?

Schepp's answer to this, Mrs. Becker said, was:

Impossible to come by letter or by cable. Come yourself.

The lawyers for Becker asserted when their appeal was filed at the second trial they would have Scheppa on their side. Scheppa's testimony was of extreme importance in the conviction of Becker because it corroborated the stories of Rose, Vallon, and Webber. Scheppa's testimony was essential because the prosecution was able to show that he stood outside of the murder plot and was technically not an accomplice.

Becker's lawyers also believe that at a second trial they would have the testimony of "Bridgey" Webber on their side. On his return from a trip to Cuba shortly after the Becker trial Webber told the ship news reporters that he had not told the truth on the witness stand. Later, however, he made an affidavit denying that he had cast doubt on his own testimony.

In the brief from which the lawyers for Becker will argue to-morrow twenty-five reasons why Becker should have a new trial are set forth¼ z z z z

The brief criticises sharply the methods of Justice Goff, who presided at the trial, and District Attorney Whitman, who prosecuted the case. The brief asserts that the way Justice Goff conducted the trial was "almost a mockery," and it charges him with unfairness and prejudice. But Mr. Whitman is accused flatly of "framing up" the case against Becker. The District Attorney, according to the lawyers for Becker, forced Jack Rose and his companions into a conspiracy to convict Becker by threatening to fasten the crime on them.

Becker, according to the brief of his lawyers, is innocent of the crime, and is the victim of a sense of duty that caused him to wage a relentless and fearless battle against gamblers and crooks. Jack Rose, Sam Schepps, Harry Vallon, and Bridgey Webber, the witnesses who testified against Becker, will be assailed ruthlessly in the arguments on behalf of the condemned man. In the brief, counsel for Becker say:

> It is clear from reading the record of the trial that Becker was not given a chance for his life, and the effect of the ruling of the court made the trial almost a mockery. Not only was the Justice's conduct throughout the trial open to criticism, but his attitude toward counsel representing the defendant was such that the jury must have arrived at one of two conclusions—either that the defendant's counsel were wholly incompetent or their actions in the presence of the jury were so reprehensible and unprofessional as to call for judicial criticism.
> When the news of the murder of Herman Rosenthal became public, condemnation immediately fell on Becker, and no other theory was sought or considered, and his guilt was fixed in the minds of all. He stood convicted before any evidence whatever was adduced and his life was demanded.

Then the brief calls attention to the newspaper stories of the crime, and sets forth that charges of a most serious nature were preferred against Becker and published widely, and that these charges prejudiced the public mind against him. The brief then says:

> Not the charges, however, but the publication of these charges, created such a glaring presumption that the murder, under the circumstances, could be traced but to one man. Soon after the murder, with the public mind fixed on the guilt of Becker, unmistakable evidence was found, through the commendable efforts of the District Attorney, fastening the crime with deadly certainty on Rose and his fellows beyond the possibility of escape. The electric chair was their inevitable fate unless they could invent a theory to shift the crime on the man believed by the public to have directed them in the perpetration of this murder, and of whose guilt there was no doubt in the public mind. Does any sane man believe that Rose and his companions would fail to save themselves, and, though Becker be not guilty, does any man believe that they would have gone to the chair rather than to shift the blame to innocent shoulders? The motive was compelling and the opportunity was perfect.
> The testimony given on the trial was certain to be forthcoming under the tremendous bribe to the witnesses of their lives and liberty.

Commenting on the ruling of Justice Goff that Scheppa was not an accomplice, the brief says:

> "It is so antagonistic to reason that the mind rebels at the very suggestion. It is so repugnant to belief that to permit it to stand would be unconscionable."

Counsel for Becker will maintain that the testimony of Scheppa that he interviewed Becker in Becker's home on the Wednesday night after the murder was untrue. The lawyers will contend also that the testimony of Scheppa did not corroborate that given by Rose, Webber, and Vallon as corroboration is interpreted under the law. They will maintain that Scheppa, being an accomplice, was an accessory after the fact.

Exceptions are taken in the brief to Justice Goff's refusal to permit Police Commissioner Waldo to testify that Becker had asked to be relieved of the command of his special raiding squad and to the ruling against the testimony of William T. Jerome for the defense.

The remarks of Justice Goff to John F. McIntyre, who defended Becker on his trial, are set forth in full in an endeavor to prove that Justice Goff was prejudiced. Mr. Whitman's opening address to the jury is said to be improper and calculated to prejudice the jurors.

Assistant District Attorney Taylor in his answer to the points made by Becker's lawyers will defend Justice Goff's rulings and he will argue that the affidavits upon which a new trial is asked are full of hearsay matters and are merely cumulative. As to the charges of unfairness at the trial, Mr. Taylor will say:

> These are easy to make and difficult to meet. Defendant's counsel need only pick out isolated passages. The District Attorney must repose upon the entire record. He trusts that he has made it clear that the defense, ab initio, did everything that he could to block the trial, and that Justice Goff, as was his duty, did everything that he could to expedite it. Naturally enough, clashes resulted.
> When the Court comes to read the defense's brief, it will discover that the number of alleged errors of strict law which the brief discusses amounts to nothing. Most of these alleged errors are referred to for the purpose of sustaining the underlying contention that the trial was unfair. It goes without saying that the learned trial judge had had too much experience to commit errors right and left as counsel would have court believe.

The jury, Mr. Taylor points out, decided that Schepps was not an accomplice.

POLICEMAN KILLS GUNMAN IN A DUEL

They Exchange Shots at a Distance of Thirty Paces at the End of a Chase.

The swift succession of pistol shots that rose above the usual hubbub at Jefferson and Madison Streets at 6 o'clock last evening could be heard by the men on duty at the Madison Street Station half a block away, and any one of them would have given it as his first guess that the O'Rourke brothers' gang from down Cherry Street way had invaded the territory of the Galary brothers' followers and that a battle was on.

That was what young Patrolman Schmitzler thought as he ran down the station steps, and, reaching to his hip pocket for his revolver, made straight for the battlefield. He ran just as fast as he could cover the ground, but the crossfire of the gunmen had been the signal for a double retreat. Every one concerned and every bystander had taken to his heels save two—one a push-cart peddler, who lay limp on the sidewalk with a bullet in his chest, and the other a gunman, who stood his ground with his revolver clenched in his hand.

At sight of Schmitzler, who looked as though he meant business, the man with the gun turned and fled. He was too late, and he knew it. The young patrolman was fairly on top of him and just as a hint to the fugitive he fired twice into the air. The man with the gun whirled around and fired back, a wild shot, aimed on the run and aimed too low. The bullet struck the sidewalk, glanced, tore a neat furrow along the hip of the policeman's trousers and went on its way.

But, in the rush of things, that was enough for Schmitzler. He had not been long on the force, but he knew that when a fugitive fired pointblank at a pursuing policeman the time had come for the policeman to stop firing into the air. So Schmitzler fired pointblank also—two shots at a distance of ten yards.

One entered the gunman's forehead and the other hit him in the chest, and he crumpled up dead on the sidewalk. When the other policemen from the Madison Street station came on the run they found Schmitzler bending over the man he had killed, and he and all of them knew him at once. It was young Max Cohen of 159 Delancey Street, a sharp-shooting member of the Galary fraternity, the same Max Cohen they had picked up just before election for taking a shot at one of the O'Rourkes. When they finally landed him in the station house on that occasion he was protesting his innocence. Although the police strongly suspected he had managed to slip his gun to some one in the crowd, there was nothing they could prove, so he was turned out in court the next day. And here he was dead.

The wounded man, who lay not far from him, was David Levine of 229 Broome Street. His pushcart was so laden with fine things that when the gunmen chose his corner for a battle he had stayed to protect his wares from the passing thief. And a stray bullet had caught him in the chest, leaving a wound so serious that the surgeons at the Gouverneur Hospital said his condition was precarious.

The shooting took place in front of the Anshe Lida Synagogue. The bitterness of the two gangs that broke out in gunplay is part of the present-day history of that section. The O'Rourke brothers are the titular leaders of one group that may be said to have headquarters where Rutgers Street crosses Cherry. The Galary brothers' adherents are quartered at Jefferson and Madison, so an O'Rourke visit there last night was an intrusion.

The story finally pieced together from the fire escape witnesses was to the effect that four of the O'Rourke tribe had come in close formation, and that with one of these Cohen was particularly at odds. So the guns had to be used. The hostility between these two bands is due not alone to the competition in peddling privileges, but to the fact that they were once one gang, and parted in a great schism some years ago.

Schmitzler returned with his brother patrolmen to the Madison Street Station and sat around all evening waiting for Coroner Holtzhauser to survey the evidence and come to a decision with regard to the way Schmitzler should spend the time between the shooting and the inquest.

GERMANY TO EXHIBIT AT WORLD'S FAIR

All Parties in the Reichstag Decide to Vote Appropriation for Building.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, Nov. 29.—Germany will be represented officially at the San Francisco Exposition.

Various parties of the Reichstag at special sittings of their parliamentary groups late this afternoon decided to bring in and support on Monday an appropriation of $500,000 for a German building to be known as the "Deutsches Haus." This action of the party groups insures the passage of the bill by a large majority. There is no reason to suppose that the Government will attempt to oppose it.

Opposition under the circumstances would be vain anyhow, as the Social Democrats, National Liberals, and Progressives will support the Exposition bill unanimously, and they alone constitute within a few votes a majority of the House. Support was, however, assured to-day by the Roman Catholic Centre and the Imperial parties.

The "Deutsches Haus" is to be a splendid example of modern German architecture, and the exhibit it will contain will be composed of the principal German arts and crafts and a rather elaborate display of many products of German industry.

MUNICH, Nov. 29.—The Panama-Pacific Exposition at San Francisco has found an influential advocate in the Bavarian Government. Premier Hertling stated in the Bavarian Diet to-day that the Ministry, finding a strong movement in favor of German participation, had made representations lately to the Imperial Government in favor of revising its former decision not to participate.

EARLE'S DIVORCE ANSWER.

Denies Wife's Charges Through Newburg Attorney Retained by Cable.

Special to The New York Times.

NEWBURG, N. Y., Nov. 29.—Although Elwood C. Smith has received no word from Ferdinand Pinney Earle since the cablegram sent from Paris asking him to accept service and to act as attorney in the divorce suit brought against Earle by his present wife, Smith has made answer to the complaint served on him by Attorney Russell H. Porter of New York. Up to the time of service Smith was not inclined to take up the case, but he could not get word to Earle to retain other counsel. Smith had acted for Earle on other occasions.

In the first paragraph of the complaint, which Earle admits, the declaration is made that Earle and Helena Theodora Sidford Earle were married in Oxford, England, on June 16, 1911. Paragraph 2 is also admitted—that they were residents of New York State at the time. Paragraphs 3 and 4 are on "information and belief," charging misconduct at various places in 1912 "with women whose names are unknown," and these are denied. Paragraphs 5 and 6 are those declaring no decree of divorce exists, which Earle says he is not able to answer affirmatively or otherwise. Paragraph 7 he admits—that two children have been born to the marriage.

A Commissioner may be asked for by the plaintiff to take testimony in England.

ROOSEVELT IN ARGENTINA.

Returns from Chile and Will Visit Lake Nahuel-Huapi.

BUENOS AIRES, Nov. 29.—Argentine officials to-day met Col. Theodore Roosevelt at the frontier on his return from Chile. Col. Roosevelt is now going to Lake Nahuel-Huapi, the source of the Limay River in Western Argentina.

Lake Nahuel-Huapi is at an elevation of about 2,000 feet and is thirty miles long.

GERMAN BAYONETS STOP ALSATIAN RIOT

French Sympathizers in Zabern in Fierce Fights with Garrison.

REGIMENT HELD READY

Jeering of Officers by Boys Starts Trouble in Which Wholesale Shooting Is Narrowly Averted.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, Nov. 29.—Martial law reigns in Southern Alsace as a result of a renewed outbreak of the anti-German and anti-military sentiment among the Francophile population of Zabern.

Troops with fixed bayonets and ball cartridges took possession of the streets and public squares last night and arrested all and sundry, without distinction, including two Judges and the State's Attorney, who were on their way to their homes after leaving the Courthouse.

Sensational reports have it that the troops during one savage uproar were on the verge of firing into the mob, having been drawn up for that purpose in truly warlike formation, one platoon kneeling and another aiming over their shoulders. These details are missing from the official report, which says that the battalion only threatened to open fire unless the crowds dispersed.

In the meantime a state of the utmost tension prevails in Zabern. Sentries with fixed bayonets and loaded rifles are posted at intervals throughout the town, and the entire Ninety-ninth Infantry, around which the recent turmoil has raged, is held in barracks under marching orders.

The Government at Berlin has ordered a thorough inquiry. The impression prevails in Reichstag quarters that the military authorities in consequence of their overwrought nerves, are not handling the situation with tact and cool-headedness.

The present rioting is the culmination of disturbances which have taken place at Zabern intermittently since the twenty-year-old Lieut. von Forstner stirred the passions of the people by a disrespectful allusion to the Alsatians early in November.

Last evening von Forstner and three comrades were standing near his lodgings when a troop of schoolboys began jeering the officers. As there were no policemen in sight the officers summoned the guard from a near-by barracks. The guard appeared on the scene with rattle drums and the officer in command ordered the crowd of fifty or sixty civilians who had gathered to disperse under penalty of being attacked by the troops.

Many refused to move, whereupon twenty-five or thirty of them were arrested. Patrols of infantrymen then were dispatched to guard the various streets in which officers live, so that they might go home without fear of molestation or insult.

By 9 o'clock quiet had been restored, but sentries were posted at "strategic" points, where they have since remained.

Unofficial versions accuse the military of resorting to violent excesses of zeal, even to the point of invading the houses of peaceful residents and arresting men and women guilty of nothing more heinous than the enjoyment of their evening meal.

Strassburg dispatches express the fear that feeling is running so high that Alsatian recruits may be subjected to grave indignities at the hands of their Prussian comrades.

ZABERN, Alsace, Nov. 29.—The population of Zabern is in a high state of excitement over the arrest last evening of thirty men, who were detained in the cellars of the barracks until noon to-day, when they were turned over to the civil courts, which immediately ordered their discharge.

The City Council sent an energetic protest to Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg and Major Gen. Erich von Falkennayn, Minister of War. The Chancellor replied that the matter had been referred to the Stateholder for a rigid investigation, and promised redress if illegal arrests had been made. Gen. von Falkenhayn in his answer said he had referred the matter to the General commanding at Strassburg, whose duty it was to prevent infractions of the law.

The Council has sent a deputation to Strassburg to make representations to the Alsatian Government. The Ministry has sent a Commissioner here to investigate the situation, and also a number of gendarmes to assist the police in keeping order and to eliminate the military from the controversy.

A number of young Lieutenants of the Ninety-ninth Infantry were seen to-day pursuing with drawn swords a youth who had shouted an insult to a man who was singing the German national anthem.

Lieut. Baron von Forstner, the originator of the trouble between the army and the citizens, went shopping in the town, accompanied by four soldiers, who guarded the entrances of the stores while the Lieutenant was inside.

Disorders continued in various parts of the town throughout the morning, but the rest of the day was quiet.

BUELOW WARNS GERMANY.

Restoration of Alsace-Lorraine Only Basis of Entente with France.

BERLIN, Nov. 29.—Prince Bernhard von Buelow, formerly German Imperial Chancellor, to-day abandoned the silence which he once declared he would maintain even after death. He does this in order to warn his countrymen, as he says, that inveterate hostility to Germany is the soul of French policy. This,

FINDS HEIRESS TO $200,000.

Mrs. Griffin Never Saw Father or Knew of His Wealth.

PITTSBURGH, Nov. 29.—After a long search George A. Gamble, an attorney of Logansport, Ind., announced here to-day that in Mrs. Eugenia Griffin of Pittsburgh he had found the rightful successor to the $200,000 fortune of the late Isaac N. Crawford.

Crawford, who was Mrs. Griffin's father, left here more than thirty years ago and never saw the daughter to whom in his will he left the principal part of the fortune he accumulated after going to Logansport. Mrs. Griffin was found by the attorney living at the home of an aunt. She had never heard of her father's business success.

AVIATOR CHEVILLARD HURT.

Motor Stops While Looping the Loop and Aeroplane Crashes to Earth.

ANTWERP, Nov. 29.—Chevillard, the aviator, was seriously injured while looping the loop to-day.

When he was at a considerable height the motor stopped and his aeroplane crashed to the ground.

22 DEER HUNTERS KILLED.

This Year's Death Roll in Wisconsin a Record—23 Injured.

MILWAUKEE, Wis., Nov. 29.—This year's death roll among the deer hunters in Wisconsin is the largest ever recorded. Accidents reported up to to-day resulted in the death of twenty-two hunters and the injury of twenty-three.

The season will close to-morrow.

ST. PAUL, Minn., Nov. 29.—About 7,500 deer have fallen to hunters in Minnesota in the season which ends to-morrow, according to the State Game and Fish Commission. It has been the best season for hunting deer in a decade, despite the absence of snow in the northern woods.

BANS TANGO RESTAURANTS.

If You Want to Dance Go to a Dance Hall, Mayor Harrison's Edict.

CHICAGO, Nov. 29.—Public dancing in Chicago's restaurants and cafés must stop, Mayor Carter H. Harrison announced to-day. He will issue no more dance hall licenses to eating houses and will not renew the existing licenses.

"If you go to a restaurant," said the Mayor, "it is supposed you go there to eat. If you want to dance, go to a dance hall. They are two different and distinct institutions and they must be kept separate."

HER STEERAGE TOO SMALL.

Adriatic Cannot Accommodate Christmas Rush to Italy.

The White Star liner Adriatic sailed yesterday for Naples with 285 first, 300 second, and 1,900 third-class passengers, while fully 800 Italians had to be turned away as there was no further room in the steerage. This was the beginning of the rush of Italians to spend their holidays at home on the land they have purchased with the money they have saved in America.

Before the Adriatic left her pier she was searched and forty-two stowaways were discovered hiding on the fidley gratings, where it was nice and warm. According to a White Star official these were young Italians who had paid from $10 to $15 to some agent in the city to stow them away instead of paying $40, the regular fare.

Three weeks ago the company prosecuted three of these agents for taking money from their guileless countrymen for illicit passages, but the Special Sessions Judges, it was said, dismissed the cases, as they considered that the Italians who paid the money were parties to the offense.

Among the cabin passengers on the Adriatic was George Whelan, President of the United Cigar Stores, who said that he will be away for four months.

GOOD-BYE TO THE CLASSICS

Teachers' Council Turns from Chaucer to the "Best Sellers."

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, Nov. 29.—The National Council of Teachers of English, which finished a three days' annual meeting here, put its official seal upon a proposition to teach modern authors in the public schools and universities. The teachers expressed the conviction that the classics were not of much value for educational purposes.

The curriculum, according to Prof. W. H. Wilcox of the Maryland State Normal School, will consist of equal parts of Alexandre Dumas, Jack London, Richard Harding Davis, and Booth Tarkington, with selections from De Maupassant for older pupils, and plenty of Kipling for all.

"It is time that the art of teaching received some consideration," said James F. Hosic of the Chicago Teachers' College. "The trouble is that we have too many young teachers who have received their degrees for writing treatises upon the comparative philology of the intransitive verb."

STEFANSSON IS NOT BEATEN

Loss of the Mary Sachs Will Not Baffle the Explorer.

SEATTLE, Nov. 29.—The loss of the power schooner Mary Sachs, an auxiliary vessel of the Stefansson exploring expedition, in the arctic ice off the coast of Alaska, will not prevent the expedition from carrying out its plans if the other three vessels escape. Stefansson discussed this possibility before his departure, and was prepared for such an emergency.

Capt. John Backland, who returned from the arctic several weeks ago, expressed fear that the power boat Alaska, the southernmost boat of Stefansson's fleet, would meet the fate that has befallen the Mary Sachs, for the Alaska was in a perilous position, he said. However, the crew could easily reach shore.

The men from the Mary Sachs can either go on board the Alaska and proceed along the coast to Herschel Island, at the mouth of the Mackenzie River, or reach Fairbanks via Circle City by dog team.

Stefansson said last Summer that if his ships were lost in the ice the party would explore the Canadian mainland and islands east of the Mackenzie River.

News from Stefansson may be received when the mail from Herschel Island arrives at Dawson soon after Christmas, carried by the mounted police.

MORE REBEL SUCCESSES

Fears Entertained That They May Cause Carranza to Reject Any Compromise.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MEXICO CITY, Nov. 29.—The possibility of an agreement between President Huerta and the Washington Government depends upon the question whether the United States will swallow the affront of Huerta's rejection of John Lind's proposals and will accede to Huerta's counter suggestions. These are stated on authority to include the guaranteeing of himself and his family against legal liability for his actions, and also the safety of himself and his property in this country.

Men close to the President said to-day that they believed that he was willing to resign his office in accordance with the demand from Washington, but that he did not see how he could accomplish this unless Washington would recognize the present Congress and support it in approving Huerta's acts and in accepting his resignation.

Gen. Blanquet will also be seriously involved unless Washington recognizes the legalization of his acts by the present Congress.

Prominent politicians said to-day that they believed Carranza was winning to such an extent that he would be unwilling to make any compromise with Huerta, even if the latter were supported by Washington.

The reopening of negotiations between Huerta and Lind would be regarded here as meaning that Washington was willing to yield a little in order to get rid of Huerta.

Neither Nelson O'Shaughnessy, the American Chargé, nor the Government officials are willing to admit that negotiations have been resumed, but it is believed that this was the cause of Foreign Minister Moheno's trip to Vera Cruz, on which he started this morning.

The Japanese Minister called on Mr. O'Shaughnessy, the American Chargé, on Thursday, to ask if the United States would protect the Japanese on the west coast of Mexico. The matter was taken up with Washington, which answered to-day that it would give the same protection to Japanese subjects on the west coast of Mexico as to other foreigners. This was communicated to the Japanese Minister in a letter to-day.

The conference between the Minister and Mr. O'Shaughnessy, followed by the departure of Señor Moheno, gave rise here to a report that the Japanese Minister had acted as an intermediary to obtain a reopening of negotiations. This, however, was denied.

Loan of 7,000,000 Pesos Reported.

It is stated on official authority that the Government has obtained a loan of 7,000,000 pesos, presumably from the Bank of London and Mexico. President Huerta is quoted as having assured Gen. Blanquet that the obligations of the War Department will be met by the Government within the next thirty days. These obligations, for which Blanquet is liable, amount to about 22,000,000 pesos. It is not stated how President Huerta expects to meet them.

The Government pay rolls, due to-morrow, amount to several millions pesos, which are expected to exhaust the advance obtained to-day.

The National Railways Company, to-day paid its employes in checks, which may be cashed on Monday. This is arousing considerable doubt as to the ability of the lines to meet their coming obligations in the form of interest on bonds.

Failure to make these payments would result in the Government's loss of control of the line. It now controls a majority of the common stock, which would be eliminated in case the road was thrown into a receivership. Fear of this contingency has caused considerable anxiety among officials, who fear that they will be unable to obtain sufficient funds.

A report was current in financial circles to-day that British bankers had offered an advance of $25,000,000 to Huerta on conditions which he refused. It is understood that the bankers demanded National Railways stock as collateral.

Rumor of Cabinet Changes.

It is persistently rumored that a complete change will take place in President Huerta's Cabient, except that Gen. Blanquet will be retained. Señor Urrutia will probably be asked to form the new Cabinet, he himself reassuming the portfolio of the Interior. Emilio Rabasa, once named as Ambassador to Washington, or Enrique Gorozteta, former Minister of Finance, now a justice of the Supreme Court, will probably be Minister of Foreign Relations.

Urrutia is still said to be doubtful as to his acceptance. It is known that Urrutia's policy, if he does accept, will be reformatory and conciliatory, and that he will attempt to reach an agreement with the Constitutionalists.

The Government to-night gave out a report to the effect that the capture of Mazatlan by the rebels was unbelievable, although this is confirmed by consular dispatches.

San Luis Potosi Threatened.

MEXICO CITY, Nov. 29.—San Luis Potosi, the largest town between the capital and Monterey and the most important railway centre in Central Mexico, appears to be the objective point of those rebels who recently began concentrating south of Saltillo. Reports from the State of Tamaulipas indicate that the concentration of the rebels at Victoria has brought together more than 6,000 men, and that Gen. Rubio Navarrete, the Federal Commander, who intended to recapture Victoria, is in a difficult situation north of that town.

There is an unconfirmed rumor that Navarrete's force has been cut to pieces, although, according to War Department advices, he has retaken Victoria, notwithstanding the disparity between his forces and those of the enemy.

West of San Luis Potosi in the State of Guanajuato on the Penjamo branch of the National Railways, Constitutionalists to-day burned the new station building.

So great has become the domination of the rebels in the Gulf Coast oil regions that it is said that on their demand the Mexican Railway, a British corporation of Vera Cruz and Mexico City, has agreed not to haul any more fuel oil intended for the National Railways. If the rebels succeed in enforcing their demand it will seriously cripple Federal military operations.

Another troop train was blown up a short distance north of San Luis Potosi yesterday. Private advices indicate the presence of 1,000 rebels within striking distance of this city. A man who arrived here to-day from San Luis Potosi told a story of the wiping out of a military escort of fifty men on a train bound from Tampico to San Luis Potosi four days ago. This man says that the railway line since then has been cut and traffic suspended.

Adherents of the rebel leader Zapata, fired upon a passenger train to-day near Ajusco, a town a few miles south of Mexico City. The casualties were insignificant. The rebel band was one of the small scouting parties which have again begun to appear in the Federal District.

Reports received here are to the effect that Tampico has been taken, but in the best informed circles they are discredited, although it is known that the rebel lines are slowly tightening around that port.

Saltillo and Monterey continue to be isolated, and reports from other parts of the country indicate successful rebel activity.

In the capital there is an absence of any news indicating an increase in Government strength, either financial or military.

FEDERALS UNABLE TO MOVE.

Lack of Money Hampers Operations Against the Rebels.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

VERA CRUZ, Nov. 29.—Admiral Craddock, acompanied by his secretary and Flag Lieutenant, will leave tomorrow morning for Mexico City. The British Consul here said with a smile that they would go to pay their respects to President Huerta. John Lind will not arrive here until Monday, according to a message to Consul Canada.

The forces of Gen. Joaquin Maass are still concentrating here, but will probably sail Monday. They number nearly 2,000 men.

The latest reports show the rebels are becoming dangerous in the oil fields around Tampico and Tuxpam, but apparently the lack of money causes the Government trouble in moving the troops quickly, as they demand their pay daily and transportation is costly.

VERA CRUZ, Nov. 29.—Major Garcia de la Cadena and Lieut. de la Pena, the Governor and the Commander of the Guard of Santiago Military Prison in Mexico City, arrived here to-day in charge of a strong detail of soldiers of the Presidential Guard and were taken on board the gunboat Vera Cruz, bound for the penal colony of Quintana Roo, Yucatan.

The arrest of the two officers is said to be the result of the discovery in the prison of a serious anti-Huerta conspiracy, the intention being to arm and release all the prisoners and then co-operate with bodies of disaffected troops in an attack upon the National Palace.

The arrests were effected yesterday afternoon immediately after the discovery of the plot.

Extraordinary precautions were taken to prevent any communication with the prisoners after the arrival of the train and pending the preparation of the gunboat for their reception.

The United States Consul at Tampico reports that the railway line from Tampico to San Luis Potosi has been cut thirty-six miles west of Las Palmas.

Efforts are beng made to strengthen the Federal garrison at Tampico, which numbers 600. Reinforcements of 1,000 men are expected there in a few days. Gen. Zaragoza has been ordered to go out and attack Gen. Candido Aguilar, who is operating in the oil fields near Tuxpam.

The regular troops in Vera Cruz now number upward of 1,200, which is the strongest force that has been here for several months. In addition there are several hundred military prisoners here, who are available for service in the ranks.

It is understood that the bulk of this force will be sent to Tuxpam as soon as their transport by sea can be provided for. There are now only two small gunboats in Vera Cruz waters.

HUERTA IN MONEY STRAITS.

Washington Thinks His Situation More Critical Than Ever.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 29.—Under pressure of Constitutionalist armies in the north advancing on Chihuahua, the most important military defense that now stands between the Mexican capital and the border, and the menacing activities of the Zapatistas to the south, the situation of the Huerta Government in Mexico City was believed by officials here to-night to be more critical than before.

Efforts of Gen. Huerta to obtain funds for the payment of accrued interest on National Railway bonds were regarded as serving to demonstrate the deterrent effect upon foreign capital of the attitude of the American Government toward speculators who would risk their money to gain exorbitant profits at this stage in the struggle.

Mexico City, according to advices here, is almost isolated from the northern half of Mexico. State Department reports show that, while rail communication is still open between Laredo, on the Rio Grande, and Monterey, mail and telegraph matter cannot get southward beyond the latter point, except to Saltillo. Fearing the speedy close of this last avenue of escape, Americans and other foreigners in Monterey are reported to be crowding the trains starting for the American border.

A report that Señor Moheno, Huerta's Minister of Foreign Affairs, had gone to Vera Cruz to confer with John Lind on the arrival at that port of President Wilson's personal representative, aroused interest at the State Department. It was believed here that Señor Moheno might be charged with fresh propositions to lay before the American Government through Mr. Lind.

News of the approaching dispatch from Cadiz to Vera Cruz of a Spanish warship, and of the vigorous demand on the part of influential French newspapers for a cessation of the internecine conflict in Mexico also interested officials here, mainly because of its probable moral effect in reinforcing President Wilson's demand for a change in the provisional Government. There is still, however, no disposition to regard the subject as one beyond the ability of the United States Government to handle without anything more than the moral support of other foreign nations.

A long telegraphic report was received during the day from Admiral Fletcher on his flagship Rhode Island. The Admiral's report dealt with conditions in the oil fields, which are quiet, but still threatening.

With the arrival in Mexican waters of the fourth division of the Atlantic fleet, which is expected in the course of a fortnight, three-fourths of that naval aggregation will be engaged in the protection of American and foreign interests in Mexico.

Although Rear Admiral Cradock, commanding the British ships in Mexican waters, ranks Rear Admiral Fletcher by virtue of seniority, the British commander has notified the American Admiral that he wishes to subordinate himself in co-operating with the United States forces. This fresh evidence of friendly feeling and hearty co-operation between the two Governments was received here to-day with manifest gratification.

Rear Admiral Cradock has been advised by Rear Admiral Fletcher of the extent of the plans adopted by the American commander to safeguard British as well as American interests at Tampico and at Tuxpam. The action of the British Admiral in sailing away from Tampico is taken as evidence that he is satisfied with the adequacy of those plans.

The return of the battleship New Hampshire to Vera Cruz from the northern oil fields is interpreted as indicating an abatement of the tension in that quarter for the present. The principal effort of the naval commanders acting with the American consular officers on the oil coast is now being directed to securing such an understanding with the Constitutionalist leaders as will insure the safety of foreign life and property.

VILLA'S MEN ADVANCING.

Vanguard Within 35 Miles of the Enemy—Orozco to Attack.

EL PASO, Texas, Nov. 29.—The vanguard of Gen. Francisco Villa's rebel forces, which left Juarez on Friday night, is reported to-night at Los Medanos, about thirty-five miles north of a column of Federals which has been at Villa Ahumada since the battle of Tierra Blanca. The vanguard will remain at Los Medanos until it is joined by 3,000 troops under Gen. Maclovio Herrera, which left Juarez to-day. Herrera's forces are expected to reach Los Medanos on Monday. A delay in the journey southward from that point is expected, as a Federal train was found in the ditch at Rancheria, where the Federals abandoned it.

Gen. Villa will leave for the south in a day or two with the remainder of the rebel forces now in Juarez. His train will be followed by an artillery train.

Federal officials at El Paso report that Gen. Pascual Orozco, with 5,000 troops, is moving northward from Chihuahua to attack Villa's vanguard.

Hermosillo Gets Confirmation of Suicide After Victoria's Fall.

HERMOSILLO, Sonora, Nov. 29.—Confirmation of the report from Mexico City that Gen. Antonio Rabago, Military Governor of the State of Tamaulipas, had committed suicide after losing Victoria, the capital, was received here to-day.

It was said that Rabago killed himself while his forces were being pursued by the insurgents under Gen. Pablo Gonzalez.

COWDRAY WISE TO DROP DEAL

London Economist Applauds Abandoning of Colombian Concession.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Nov. 29.—In commenting on Lord Cowdray's renunciation of the Colombian oil concession, The Economist says:

"Lord Cowdray and Lord Murray acted prudently in abandoning the contract in view of the present critical situation in regard to Mexico. No doubt can now be entertained in the United States that the British Government is in complete accord with President Wilson's policy.

"As for the oil resources of Colombia, they can only be utilized, as Lord Cowdray pointed out, with the aid of foreign capital, and it remains to be seen where it is to be obtained—hardly, we imagine, from the United States, while the Spanish-American politicians retain their suspicions of dollar diplomacy.

"Moreover, the control of American harbors by any European Continental company whatever would probably cause still greater apprehension in the United States for the safety of the Monroe Doctrine, which finds less respect on the Continent."

FRENCH GAIN MEXICAN TRADE.

It Has Grown in Past Three Years Despite Disturbances.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

PARIS, Nov. 29.—L'Economiste Moderne notes, apropos of the situation in Mexico, that, far from being adversely affected by the political troubles of that country for the last three years, French commerce with it has actually increased considerably, but it adds:

"France has not benefited, inasmuch as this increase is accompanied by constantly increased customs. Rich Mexican families, however, have a habit of leaving Mexico to reside in Paris, thus compensating us in some degree."

BELGIAN INVESTORS SHY.

Not Likely to Subscribe to a Loan to Huerta's Government.

BRUSSELS, Nov. 29.—Mexican agents have sought and are still seeking loans here, and it is understood that Luis de la Barra, the financial agent in London of the Mexican Government, has entered into negotiations for advaces, but has not hitherto been very successful.

The Philippson Bank, which is behind the Secondary Railroads Company, whose concession for 3,200 miles of railroads is pending before the Mexican Congress, is considered the concern most likely to make a loan to President Huerta's Administration. F. M. Philippson, however, said to-day that a Mexican loan could not now be floated in Belgium, as the situation was too uncertain.

MEXICAN ROADS TO PAY.

Interest Due To-morrow Assured—Hope to Maintain Solvency.

The New York office of the National Railways of Mexico announced yesterday afternoon that the coupons due tomorrow on the two-year 6 per cent. secured gold notes of the railways would be paid on presentation, thus insuring the solvency of the road for at least another month. It was reported that the $500,000 needed to pay this interest had been cabled from Mexico City, but nothing could be learned from authentic sources as to the means which had been taken by the company to meet the payments.

The company sold the $26,730,000 of two-year 6 per cent. notes only last June, and it has been understood that the purchasers received strong assurances that they would not be allowed to go into default. On Jan. 1 the National Railways will have interest payments more than three times as large as those to be met to-morrow; but if the political skies clear, it is probable that the Government will add its resources to those of the Railways to care for the security holders.

KEYSTONE GUARD IS READY.

Officers Receive Orders to be Prepared for Military Service.

Special to The New York Times.

PITTSBURGH, Nov. 29.—Orders to be ready for service have been received from the office of Adj. Gen. Thomas K. Stewart by the officers of the National Guard of the Pittsburgh and Western Pennsylvania Districts, and as a result every guardsman here has his equipment in trim and his affairs rounding into condition to warrant his temporary desertion of them. The orders, it is believed, are merely precautionary.

Official circular letters have been sent out to all the department and regimental commanders of Pennsylvania troops, telling them to make all headway toward state of preparedness for actual service at short notice.

Gen. A. J. Logan, commanding the Second Brigade, to-day acknowledged the receipt of these communications.

FEAR FOR EX-GOLF CHAMPION.

Friends of Willie Smith Think He May Be Isolated in Mexico.

CHICAGO, Nov. 29.—Friends of Willie Smith, the former national open golf champion, admitted to-day that they feared some mishap had befallen him in Mexico.

Smith, who is the professional at the Mexican Country Club on the outskirts of the City of Mexico, dropped out of sight after the open event at Brookline this Fall. Letters to the Mexican Country Club and to Smith's former home in Scotland have failed to locate him, and while his friends cherish the thought that he may be isolated somewhere in Mexico, or resting in some secluded spot in the United States, they will be much relieved if they can learn that he is all right in any part of the world.

20th Infantry Off for El Paso.

SALT LAKE CITY, Nov. 29.—The Twentieth United States Infantry marched through the city from Fort Douglas to-day and entrained for El Paso. Three special trains, half an hour apart, transported the troops. Connections will be made with the Southern Pacific Railway at Colton, Cal. Although it is expected the regiment will be assigned to garrison duty, it is completely equipped for field service.

SEIZE $10,000 LOOT IN RAID ON FLAT

Three Men and Two Women Arrested in Upper West Side Apartment.

MANY ROBBERIES NEARBY

Jewels, Furs, and Clothing Stolen from Apartments in the Neighborhood, Police Hold.

Lieut. Detective Humann of the West 100th Street Station, with several of his detectives, raided an apartment at 211 West 109th Street late last night and arrested two young women and three men, the former charged with receiving stolen property and the latter with burglary. Several suitcases filled with furs, jewelry, silks, silverware, and clothing, valued by the police at $10,000, as well as a number of pawn tickets, were found in the apartment and taken to the station.

The young women described themselves as Anna Pierce, 23 years old, of 211 West 109th Street, and Dorothy Walker, an actress, of the same address. The men said they are Edward Harrison, 19 years old, of 214 Graham Avenue, Brooklyn, whom the police know as Charles Harris; Henry Burtnick, 23 years old, of 161 Manhattan Avenue, known as "Lord Baltimore," and William Pierce, 20 years old, of 211 West 109th Street.

Both young women admited to the Lieutenant that the names given were fictitious, but they refused to give their correct name. On the woman who gave her name as Pierce was found jewelry with the initials "A. L.," which the young woman tearfully said was her personal property, and she admitted the initials "A. L." were her own. The woman who gave her name as Walker said that she came from a good family, and would go to jail rather than betray her identity.

According to the police, for three weeks complaints have been pouring into the station from residents of the upper west side that during the absence of the occupants in the evenings their apartments have been robbed. In some instances the complainants have noticed suspicious looking men loitering in the hallways and the descriptions given fitted the three men.

The entire staff of detectives of the West 100th Street Station went to work, and soon found that one of the descriptions in every instance fitted Harrison, or "Harris." They learned that he recently had been freed from the reformatory on parole, and earlier in the week found him, but did not arrest him, as they wanted to get those who were working with him.

Last night the police located Burtnick in front of his home and placed him under arrest. The Lieutenant, with Detectives Donnelly and Quinn, made the arrests and notified the other detectives who were watching the apartment that they were on the way there and to allow no one to leave the apartment.

As they entered, the detectives say, they saw Miss Pierce tear a pearl necklace from her neck and throw it under a chair. It was recovered. While the detectives questioned the two young women Burtnick and Pierce came in from an adjoining room only to be placed under arrest. Harrison entered whistling. On seeing the detectives he stopped short and turned to flee, but was caught by Quinn and brought back.

Lieut. Trumann and the detectives made a tour of the flat. Four of the six rooms were furnished, and in each of the rooms were found suitcases stuffed with stolen property. These were taken to the station, where they were opened. In the kitchen of the apartment, hidden under the sink, the police say they found several jimmies, two revolvers, and several boxes of cartridges.

A number of the complainants were notified and asked if they could identify any of the stuff recovered as their property. The first of these to arrive was James Barker of 12 West 109th Street, who identified several pieces of jewelry valued at $1,000 as the property of his wife and self. He told the police that his apartment was entered on Friday night.

He said he returned about 11 o'clock that night and say two men in the hallway. He asked them what they were doing there and they grappled with him. In the struggle he said he got a good look at one of the men before they threw him to the floor and ran to the street and disappeared.

The three prisoners were lined up with some of the detectives and several patrolmen in civilian clothes in another room in the station, and Parker was led in, to see if he could identify the two men he had seen in the hallway. Without hesitaton, the police say, he picked out Harrison as the man he had got a good look at, and said he thought Burtnick was the other man, but he would not say for sure.

Another complainant who identified two fur coats and some jewelry as her property and that of her two sisters was Miss Nina Howard of 16 West 109th Street, an actress, who, with her two sisters, are known on the stage as "The Three Madcaps." Miss Howard said their apartment was entered on Thanksgiving evening and several hundred dollars' worth of jewelry and three fur coats were stolen.

Among the loot recovered by the detectives was found a large silver cup with the following inscription:

"First prize, M. C. C. I. B. Three-mile sprint. Sept. 6, 1913."

Six small cups bearing the initials "A. B." were also found.

The two young women insisted that they knew nothing of the loot found in the apartment.

he declares, will continue as long as Frenchmen have the slightest hope of regaining Alsace-Lorraine by their own efforts or with outside assistance.

Prince von Buelow expresses this conviction in a review of German politics published this morning and written for his forthcoming book on the Emperor William's reign. He points out the folly of ignoring this inbred hostility of the French, and of trying to arrange German relations with France on any other basis, and that it is idle to hope for a reconciliation with France without restoring the Provinces of Alsace and Lorraine.

The French determination to attack Germany whenever there is a prospect of success must continue, he says, to be a factor in the calculations of statesmen. Germany should try to maintain courteous and correct relations with France, with whom she can co-operate in minor questions, but she should not chase fantasies nor aspire to overcome France's ingrained rancor by compliments.

Prince von Buelow does not criticise the French, declaring that he fully comprehends their attitude. On the other band, he criticises indirectly the Emperor's occasional holding out of the olive branch.

Other extracts from the review deal with the Moroccan policy of Germany, the Bosnian crisis, Prince von Buelow's resignation of the Imperial Chancellorship, and with other important internal and foreign questions.

CAUSE SENSATION IN BERLIN.

Alsace Troubles Likely to Lead to Reichstag Debate.

BERLIN, Nov. 29.—The impression here is that there is considerable friction between the civil and military authorities at Strasburg as a result of the Zabern incident. In some quarters it is hinted that it is probable that Count Charles Von Wedel, Governor General of Alsace, or Gen. Von Dehmling, may retire. In other quarters, however, it is thought that the matter can be settled by the transfer of Col. Von Reuter, commanding the Zabern regiment.

The situation at Zabern created a big sensation here. In the Reichstag a number of Alsatian and Clerical and Polish members announced that they would interpellate the Government as to what measures it was taking to prevent military aggressions.

It is denied here that the first Zabern incident was the subject of diplomatic action by France, but it is admitted that it was touched upon incidentally in a conversation between Foreign Minister Von Jagow and Jules Cambon, the French Ambassador.

NEW GERMAN CRUISER.

The Luetzow Launched Successfully at Danzig Ship Yards.

DANZIG, Nov. 29.—The new German battle cruiser which is to take the place of the old Kaiserin Augusta was launched here to-day and named the Luetzow.

It is understood that she will carry ten 12-inch guns as her main armament and a secondary battery of twelve 5.9-inch guns. Her length is 718 feet, her beam 98 feet, and her draft 27 feet. She displaces about 28,000 tons and her turbine engines are expected to develop a speed of thirty knots.

BAVARIA TIRES OF BURDEN.

Premier von Hertling Says There Must Be a Pause in Armaments.

MUNICH, Bavaria, Nov. 29.—"There must be a pause in armaments in the future because the German people is no longer in a position to bear further burdens of this nature," declared Baron Georg F. von Hertling, the Premier of Bavaria, the second largest State of the German Empire, in discussing the Armaments bill to-day.

The Imperial Government, in proposing the latest increase in the army last Spring, had informed the Federated States that it could not assume responsibility for the safety of the empire unless the augmentation of the forces was agreed to. Bavaria was bound under such conditions to give her assent, but she did so without any particular enthusiasm.

SUFFRAGIST FORCES GATHER IN CAPITAL

Hundreds Meet for Convention and to Win Congress and Wilson Over to Cause.

MASS MEETING FOR TO-DAY

Plan to Found Publishing Company and to Place Association on New Financial Basis.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 29. — Determined to impress upon Congress the need of an amendment to the Federal Constitution enfranchising women, hundreds of suffragists arrived here to-day to attend the forty-fifth convention of the National American Woman Suffrage Association, beginning Monday. They assert that they will also attempt to obtain an expression of views from President Wilson, which might be regarded as the Democratic Party's policy on the woman suffrage question. The convention will last a week.

Meetings of the officials and a luncheon by the National College Equal Suffrage League, at which Dr. Anna Howard Shaw, President of the National Association; Miss Jane Addams and other prominent leaders spoke, took place. Enthusiasm will be kept alive over Sunday by a mass meeting to-morrow at which Dr. Shaw, Miss Addams and Senator Helen Ring Robinson of Colorado will be speakers.

Two important matters which will come before the convention are the proposal to adopt a new constitution for the association and to found a business corporation, capitalized at $50,000, to be known as the National Suffrage Publishing Company, for printing suffrage literature.

The purpose of the proposed new constitution is to place the organization on afixed financial basis, with a budget to be presented each year to the convention making an assessment on affiliated organizations.

Already there have been expressed a variety of opinions on the advisability of adopting the amendment, especially among the larger State organizations and the great independent bodies which only the last year or two became affiliated with the national associatioon.

The independent bodies contend that as they are large and collect large sums for the advancement of the suffrage cause, their tax for the support of the national body will be out of proportion. On the other hand the national officers contend that the new financial scheme is necessary if the national body is to push forward the campaign for universal suffrage in this country. They say that the present tax of 10 cents a member is not commensurate with the dignity of the national body nor the cause that it represents.

The independent bodies are powerful, but, according to the national officers, their activities heretofore have been directed toward advancing the cause in their respective localities. One of these is the Congressional Union of Washington, organized for the advancement of the Federal constitutional amendment through Congress.

Another is the Woman's Political Union of New York. Both have large budgets and under the proposed new fiscal plan they would be taxed heavily to support the national organization.

Another subject to be discussed will be the removal of the national headquarters from New York to Washington.

At the college women's meeting to-day Miss Addams said that the recently acquired franchise in Illinois had already given the women of that State great influence in needed reforms.

Miss Lucy Burns of this city said that one-fifth of the Senate, one-seventh of the House of Representatives, and one-sixth of the electors now come from States where women vote on national questions.

A "Men's League for Woman Suffrage," whose main object is to work for the suffrage amendment, has been organized here, with Dr. Harvey W. Wiley as its President.

Fatally Hurt Under Train.

Morris Block, an upholsterer, 27 years old, of 8,607 Eighteenth Avenue, Bath Beach, died in the Coney Island Hospital late yesterday afternoon as a result of injuries sustained when he fell underneath a West End line train at the Eighty-fourth street station. Block, according to witnesses, was trying to board the train when he lost his hold and fell under the wheels of the fourth car. One leg was broken and he sustained internal injuries. Dr. Jacob Sarnoff, of 1,819 Eighty-fifth street, was summoned hastily and he rushed Block to the hospital but he died soon after his arrival. There were no arrests.

MEN AND MONEY COST OF THE MEXICAN WAR

Major Johnson, U. S. A., Analyzes the Results of the Conflict Sixty-five Years Ago.

SHORT-TERMERS HARD HIT

Percentage of Fighting Force Small Compared with the Total Number in the Field—The Losses.

In the Mexican War of sixty-five years ago one in every ten regulars and one in every forty of the volunteers who fought in that struggle were killed, while more than 10,000 men died of disease or were retired from service with their health shattered as a result of disease.

These figures are contained in a paper by Major Evan M. Johnson, Jr., U. S. A., of the General Staff of the army, in which, under the caption, "The Military Policy of the United States," Major Johnson tells what each of the great wars in which the United States has engaged has cost the nation in men and money. Owing to the critical situation now prevailing in Mexico Major Johnson's reference to the Mexican War of more than half a century ago is of interest at this time.

"At the time of its opening," writes Major Johnson, "our forces in Texas numbered only 3,554 men, notwithstanding that war had for some time seemed to be inevitable. There had been efforts to get Congress to increase the regular army, and suggestions had been made to call out volunteers and militia, but these efforts and suggestions were barren of result; hence Gen. Taylor met, on May 8, 1846, 6,000 of the enemy at Palo Alto, and shortly after, at Resaca de la Palma, with an army of 2,222. Gen. Gaines in Mississippi had illegally raised and sent to Gen. Taylor over 8,000 troops, enlisted for six months; but so lacking were these in equipment and training that they remained in idleness, and were discharged at the expiration of their enlistment without having fired a shot. On May 11, 1846, Congress authorized the raising of 50,000 volunteers. Another act of the same date authorized the President to increase the companies of dragoons, artillery, and infantry to 100 men each. Under these and other laws, an aggregate of 31,024 officers and men were enlisted in the regular army and 73,200 in the volunteers. These forces were not organized into brigades and divisions at the beginning of the war, though such organizations were necessary and were made later.

"In spite of the experiences of former wars many of the men were enlisted for such short periods as to interfere seriously with the military operations, thus causing the prolongation of the war with additional loss of life and cost. To illustrate by one example: After several months' delay owing to lack of equipment, transportation, &c., Gen. Scott captured Vera Cruz, and on April 8 began his march to the City of Mexico. On April 18 he defeated the Mexicans at Cerro Gordo so decisively that in his own words, 'Mexico had no longer an army.' The road to the capital lay open before him, and the war should have been brought to a speedy end. But was this the case?

"The inherent defects of our military system stopped Scott's progress at the very time any proper system should have been ready to aid it. The law had provided for enlistments of twelve months, and the greater part of this time was spent in recruiting, assembling, and training raw men, and in obtaining of supplies, equipment, and transportation for the army, so that on April 18 the terms of enlistment of the volunteers were about to expire. With the certainty of ending the war almost at once with the force he then had, Scott was obliged to send home the bulk of the volunteers from Puebla on May 4, and remain on the defensive at that place, in the heart of the enemy's country, cut off from all supplies, for over three months, with a little army of regulars and with a few volunteers who had re-enlisted, in all 5,820 men.

"At the end of three months, fresh contingents had arrived, but by that time the enemy had raised a new army greatly superior to that of Scott, and the war dragged on for eight months, in the series of bloody battles during which we suffered our heaviest losses.

"In this war there were called into service 31,024 regulars and 73,534 volunteers, a total of 104,558. If we consider the number of troops the Government was able to bring on the field of battle we see that of this large number only a small proportion was ever actually present.

"The Battle of Monterey was fought by Taylor with 6,645 men, opposed to 10,000 Mexicans, 7,000 of whom were regulars. The Battle of Buena Vista was fought with 4,759 men, against 20,000 Mexicans. When Scott, in August, resumed the offensive, it was with 11,000 effective men, against 36,000 Mexicans. His army on reaching the capital was on Dec. 4 reported to be only 6,000 strong. These were the maximum forces the Government, owing to the faulty system, was able to bring against the enemy, in spite of the fact that we had in service, at all times, an average number of 53,000 men, as opposed to 36,000, the largest number of Mexicans in service at any one time.

"If we consider the cost of the war we find that the losses in killed and wounded were 4,841 officers and men, of whom 3,010 were regulars, making for these a loss of one in ten, and 1,831 volunteers, a loss to these of one in forty. The number that died from disease was 6,541; and discharged, ruined in health, 3,530.

"The heaviest loss from disease fell on the short-term men, the losses among troops of the old establishment, who had enlisted in the regular army in 1846 for the war, being at the rate of 6¾ per cent. per annum, and among regulars who enlisted in 1847 and served a year or less, 19 per cent. per annum, showing that a much greater proportion of loss falls on short-term troops, which may be attributed to their inferior training and inability to properly care for themselves in the field."

The cost in money for the war with Mexico, Major Johnson writes at the end of his remarks on Mexico, was $102,051,039, exclusive of pensions.

Robin Quits the Penitentiary.

A taxicab with its motor running was waiting at the foot of East Fifty-third Street yesterday morning when the ferryboat Bronx crossed from Blackwell's Island to Manhattan, bringing to this city Joseph G. Robin, who had completed his term in the penitentiary. Robin dodged the waiting camera men and was driven downtown rapidly.

VOLUNTEER GUARDS BODY.

Engle Observes Jewish Rites for Woman Who Dies Suddenly.

Mrs. Sarah Herman, 48 years old, of 420 East Eighth Street, died suddenly from heart trouble at the Vanderbilt Clinic, Sixtieth Street and Columbus Avenue, late yesterday afternoon. Patrolman Murray of the West Sixty-eighth Street Station was called and summoned Dr. Wright of Flower Hospital.

In the waiting room of the clinic at the time was Arthur Engle of 210 Stanton Street, who, on seeing Mrs. Herman fall to the floor, lifted her to a bench. After Dr. Wright had said she was dead Engle announced that he would stand guard, according to the Jewish faith. He told those in the room that until some member of the woman's family arrived he would not leave the body.

A patrol wagon was called, and with Engle as guard, the body was removed to the West Sixty-eighth Street Station. There Engle received permission from Lieut. Quinn to stay on guard until the arrival of the husband of the woman. He also asked to be allowed to purchase some candles and a white sheet, and, furthermore, that the body be put on three chairs. The Lieutenant granted the request. The body was taken to the rear room in the station, put on the chairs, covered with the cloth, and the candles were lighted.

ASSASSIN STABS GEN. LUNG.

Then Chinese Governor, Fearing Treachery, Kills Four of His Guards.

HONG KONG, Nov. 29.—Gen. Chi Kuang Lung, Governor of Canton, today, for the second time within a fortnight was attacked by an assasin, who endeavored to plunge a knife into his heart. Gen. Lung, however, escaped with only a wound in the hand. The General personally killed four of his guards, fearing treachery at their hands.

Serious trouble in Canton is expected shortly. The Chinese are apprehensive, and business is becoming stagnant. The police have been reinforced. Stores of bombs are frequently found in the city.

Bennett Eaton Titus Dead.

DANVERS, Mass., Nov. 29.—Bennett Eaton Titus, prominent in Methodist-Episcopal journalism of New York and New England, died to-day. He was 53 years old. Mr. Titus was formerly editor-in-chief of The Northern Christian Advocate, published in Syracuse, N. Y.

URGE EXPRESS STOP FOR TIMES SQUARE

Associations of Business Men Address a Resolution to the Service Board.

POINT OUT TRAFFIC NEEDS

These Cannot Be Met, They Insist, by an Express Station Below Forty-second Street.

A meeting of the Executive Committees of the Broadway and Times Square Associations was held yesterday to consider the progress made in impressing upon the Public Service Commission the importance property owners and business men attach to a modification of its plans for the B. R. T. Broadway Subway so as to place an express station under Times Square from Forty-second to Forty-fourth Streets. The entire matter was gone over in detail, and particular attention was paid to the difficulty which the commission's engineers foresee in planning an enlarged sewer under Times Square with an express station above it.

As a result of the conference it was decided to represent anew to the commission the sense of the associations that it was of prime importance to the city at large, as well as to those with immediate interests in the vicinity, to give Times Square at Forty-second Street an express station on the B. R. T. line as well as the Interborough Subway. Moreover, it was agreed that to serve the needs of the city this station should, unless it was found to be absolutely impracticable, run north from Forty-second Street into the middle of Times Square.

Reasons in a Resolution.

A formal resolution expressing the views of the associations was passed. It reads:

Whereas, The Public Service Commission in its tentative plans for the construction of the Brooklyn Rapid Transit Broadway subway has proposed to place only a local station at Times Square and to run it south from Forty-second Street to Fortieth Street; and,

Whereas, Times Square, as statistics of population and traffic show, is the most important centre of the uptown business section of New York, and is bounded by one of the most frequented of crosstown streets; and,

Whereas, In designing a new system of transportation the first essential is to lay out the lines so as to reach the destinations of the greatest number of people, and it is undoubted that the ever-growing number of hotels, theatres, and office buildings at the southern end of Times Square draws annually larger crowds to the neighborhood of Forty-second Street and Broadway; and,

Whereas, An express station under Seventh Avenue from Forty-seventh to Forty-ninth Street, as now planned by the commission, would serve a centre of less commercial importance than a similar station from Forty-second to Forty-fourth Street, and would, moreover, be far removed from the express station on the Interborough Seventh Avenue subway at Times Square and from the important crosstown thoroughfare of Forty-second Street; be it

Resolved, That the Executive Committees of the Broadway Association and the Times Square Association, in joint session assembled, therefore urge the Public Service Commission to modify their tentative plans so that the Brooklyn Rapid Transit will have an express station at Times Square; that this station should start at Forty-second Street and run north under Broadway to about Forty-fourth Street, and that underground connections be provided between it and the Interborough express station at Forty-second Street and Seventh Avenue.

Needs of New Thoroughfare.

In deciding that the commission should be urged, in spite of engineering difficulties, to build the B. R. T. express station from Forty-second Street north to Forty-fourth Street, the committees were moved by the great opportunity the open space at the junction of Broadway and Seventh Avenue gives for the handling of passengers. The mezzanine concourse which could be designed there would practically duplicate the space in the streets above, and would permit passengers alighting at the station to separate themselves according to the places they wished to reach, and would also permit those taking any of the three subways meeting at this point to approach them from a number of entrances around the square without having to cross the crowded streets.

Another point brought up by E. A. Tredwell, one of the Governors of the Real Estate Board of New York, turned on the rather unusual lay-out of the city in this district with regard to cross-town streets. There happen to be near Times Square a number of big institutions which break the regular street plan. South of Forty-second Street, Bryant Park and the Public Library cut off Forty-first Street so that the blocks from Forty-second Street to Fortieth, east of Broadway, stretch only as far as Fifth Avenue. North of Forty-second Street Grand Central Station cuts across Forty-third and Forty-fourth Streets. Consequently, Forty-fifth Street is rapidly acquiring quite unusual importance for a 60-foot cross-town thoroughfare, and is becoming a business street. Between Broadway and Sixth Avenue it is lined by the little stores, which are the harbingers of a commercial invasion, and between Sixth and Fifth Avenues stores of the first class and several fine office and loft buildings have been erected. The amount of vehicular traffic already has increased perceptibly, and the street is likely to be reckoned in the very near future as one of the most important uptown streets. To serve this an express station running as far north as Forty-fourth Street would be distinctly better than an express station at Forty-seventh Street.

Problem Affects Whole City.

Speaking of this after the meeting, Col. Tredwell dwelt upon the necessity of looking at the station problem at Times Square as affecting not only the actual vicinity but the city at large.

"We must remember," he said, "the enormous railroad connections which focus at the Grand Central Station and the new long piers for shipping which are to be constructed on the North River. But even more important than the provision of adequate transit facilities for these is the necessity of making access as easy as possible to the important cross-town thoroughfares, Forty-second and Forty-fifth Streets. It is most important that the B. R. T. express station should serve these properly. To do so may involve considerable engineering difficulties, but these should not be permitted to interfere with the lay-out of the new subway, when the extraordinary inconvenience that would result from placing the express station anywhere else is considered."

Then Col. Tredwell pointed out that in the course of time the actual operation of the subways would pass under city control. When the forty-nine years of the dual-system contracts have run out the city will own the rapid transit lines practically, as it now does legally. It is likely that then it will desire to establish some kind of transfer arrangement at Times Square, and it would be a thousand pities if this should be rendered impossible or inconvenient by a faulty placing of the station now for private advantage or temporary convenience.

"The permanent interests of the city," said Col. Tredwell, "must be considered at the present juncture, and they will be served only by the provision of the best facilities for transferring from one system to another and of transportation at the greatest speed to the frequented points."

The Broadway and Times Square Associations also decided yesterday to seek further expert advice and to invite engineers of the highest eminence to consult with Henry G. Opdyke, their consulting engineer, over the Times Square sewer problem.

MAKE FRATERNITY RULES.

Conference Against Inter-fraternity and High School Societies.

The fifth annual meeting of the Inter-Fraternity Conference, which is composed of delegates from thirty-two college fraternities, was held yesterday at the University Club. The main business of the meeting was the organization of a campaign to establish in the public mind a sharp line of distinction between the strict college fraternities whose membership is drawn entirely from academic undergraduates and all other Greek letter societies. Resolutions condemning certain classes of Greek letter organizations were passed and the relation between undergraduate and post graduate fraternities was described.

Undergraduate inter-fraternity societies and the High School fraternities were among those condemned. Theta Nu Epsilon, an organization popularly known as "T. N. E." was the object of special attack. This society recruits its membership from members of other fraternities, and the Inter-Fraternity Conference went on record as being opposed to its activities. It was recommended to the fraternities represented in the conference that they forbid their members to join "T. N. E."

The high school fraternity was also declared to be an unnecessary evil. The conference recommended that the college fraternity refuse to initiate members of high school fraternities after giving a fair warning to students now preparing for college. It was said that nothing affecting those who have already joined high school fraternities would be done.

The officers of the conference for the coming year were elected. They are: President, F. W. Shepardson, Associate Professor of History in the University of Chicago; Secretary, H. H. McCorkle of Columbia University, '01; Treasurer, O. H. Cheney, President of the Pacific Bank of New York, and Executive Committeemen, Dr. O. H. Rogers of Union College, '77, and W. A. Trimpe of Miami, '08, retiring President of the conference.

Among the delegates, the majority of whom are executive officers of the fraternities they represented, were:

W. H. P. Faunce, President of Brown University, and organizer of the conference; Prof. Carlton H. Hayes of Columbia University; the Rev. Otis A. Glazebrook, founder of the Alpha Tau Omega Fraternity; John L. Kind, Professor of German in the University of Wisconsin; Guy Potter Benton, President of the University of Vermont; W. J. Sears, President of the Board of Regents of Ohio State University; A. O. Bowman, President of the University of Iowa; J. D. Livingston, Trustee of Columbia University, and Mitchell May, Secretary of State of New York.

DEAF-MUTE DEPORTED.

No One Knows Where He Came From, but He's on His Way.

After vainly trying for days to discover his identity or what port he came from, the immigration authorities yesterday deported a deaf-mute on the Lamport & Holt steamer Vestris, which sailed at 10 o'clock for South America. The man was 6 feet in height, weighed 170 pounds, and looked to be about 24 years old.

The mute was discovered hiding on Nov. 19 on the steamship Byron, which arrived here last Tuesday from Buenos Aires. No one on the ship recalled having seen him come aboard at any of the ports she called at in Brazil or Barbados. He seemed to understand signs, for when a knife was put into his hand by the ship's cook and a bucket of potatoes was placed in front of him he started in at once to peel them.

Attempts made to learn his nationality at Ellis Island, where he was taken, were without result. Deaf-mute experts there talked on their fingers to him in all the known languages without getting a reply, and there was no clue in his clothing, which consisted of dungaree overalls and a blue flannel shirt, to the place from which he had come.

No port of discharge was marked on the papers yesterday when the deportation officer went to the Vestris, and Capt. Davis became frantic when the thought struck him that he might have to carry the afflicted stowaway about for years without being able to land him.

It was suggested to him by the Immigration Inspectors that the purser should take the stowaway ashore at every port and point objects out to him to see if he could recognize anything, and so show that he had been there before.

DRAGS HUSBAND TO JAIL.

Wife Gives Calhoun the Alternative of Going with Her or a Policeman.

Mrs. Frances Calhoun, a young woman, of 510 West 124th Street, entered the East 126th Street Station at 9 o'clock last night dragging her husband, Irving Calhoun, by his coat collar. Her friend, Miss Nellie Robinson, of the same address, assisted her in bringing Calhoun to the police station.

"Here is a warrant for my husband's arrest. I got it to-day in the Domestic Relations Court, and I have served it myself," said Mrs. Calhoun, to the Lieutenant in charge.

Calhoun pleaded with his wife to be merciful, but she ignored him. She told the Lieutenant that her husband abandoned her a month ago, and that when she met him last night she gave him the alternative of going to the station with her, or of being taken there by a policeman. Calhoun said he had no home and was out of work. He was locked up.

AUTOS CRASH IN THE PARK.

Mrs. Rockhill Cut by Glass from Broken Windshield.

An automobile owned and driven by Frank Muretto of 517 East Fourteenth Street crashed into an automobile containing Mr. and Mrs. William Rockhill of the Ashford Hotel, Broadway and Seventy-ninth Street, at 2:30 o'clock yesterday afternoon on the West Drive in Central Park, just above Seventieth Street. Mr. Muretto and the chauffeur of the Rockhill auto, Emil Rowse of 461 West Forty-sixth Street, were thrown out, but were uninjured. Mrs. Rockhill was cut about the face by broken glass from the windshield of the auto in which she was riding, but she refused medical attention, and her husband took her home.

The Muretto auto was going north at the time of the collision, and the Rockhill auto was going west on a cross road. The Rockhill auto, the police say, skidded and ran into the Muretto motor.

TRUCK RUNS OFF FERRYBOAT

Motor Pushes a Wagon Before It and Horse Is Drowned.

As the ferryboat Oswego approached its slip at West Forty-second Street at daybreak yesterday morning the chauffeur of a six-ton motor truck laden with milk cranked his engine and was climbing back to his seat when a sudden lurch of the boat started the truck. There was no stopping it then.

The gates of the ferryboat were smashed, a horse and wagon were pushed into the river, and the auto truck followed them. The horse was drowned and the truck and the wagon were lost.

FITZGERALD A CANDIDATE.

Mayor of Boston Wants a Third Term—Other Aspirants.

BOSTON, Nov. 29.—Mayor John F. Fitzgerald announced to-day that he would be a candidate for re-election to a third term. His candidacy has been strongly urged by the Democratic City Committee. Congressman James McCurley, Democrat, has refused to withdraw in the Mayor's favor.

The Citizens' Municipal League has indorsed City Counsellor Thomas J. Kenney for Mayor. Several independent candidates are securing signatures to nomination papers.

Lorraine Brings Riggs Armor.

The French liner Lorraine, which arrived from Havre last night several hours late, brought two cases of ancient armor and objects of art, which were said to be part of the N. E. Riggs collection which the owner presented to the Metropolitan Museum of Art.

NEW SUBWAY WORK WELL UNDER WAY

Some of the Lexington Avenue Sections Are More Than Half Completed.

FAR AHEAD OF SCHEDULE

Broadway Line of B. R. T. and Seventh Avenue Branch Being Pushed Rapidly.

From the report of Alfred Craven, Chief Engineer of the Public Service Commission, it appears that work is now under way or about to begin on twenty-six sections of the Dual Subway system, and that the contracts call for the payment of $86,371,000 for this work. It gives employment on the average daily to 6,649 men.

In Manhattan work is under way for the Interborough on the Lexington Avenue and Seventh Avenue lines and for the B. R. T. on the Broadway line. As the Lexington Avenue line was the first to be started in this borough, a great deal of progress has been made upon sections of it. Digging is actually going on all along the avenue from the Harlem River to Fifty-third Street, and already the end of parts of the work is almost in sight.

For example, the Oscar Daniels Company, which is building from 106th to 118th Street, is 79.8 per cent. through its job and is months ahead of the time allowed to it. Patrick McGovern & Co., who are building from Sixty-seventh to Seventy-ninth Street, can report that they are 60 per cent. finished, and the Bradley Contracting Company, which has the work from Ninety-third to 106th Street, is just about half way through.

On the Seventh Avenue line, which is also to belong to the Interborough system, the work is only just beginning. Two contracts have been let, but not yet executed. The bids on one have been turned down and the readvertising of that section ordered, and the contract for a fourth will be let in the near future.

In Manhattan the B. R. T. is interested in the Broadway line. While the controversy over the Times Square situation is lively, excellent progress is being made on lower Broadway and on that part of the line which runs under Church Street and Trinity Place in the Battery. Twenty-sixth Street south the contractors are at work, and in two places at least their progress is giving great satisfaction to the commission. The Underpinning and Foundation Company, to which was intrusted the section between Howard and Bleecker Streets, under Broadway, need have completed only 52 per cent. to be keeping up with their contract. They are actually 77.8 per cent. finished. Then the Degnon Contracting Company, whose platforms have become a familiar feature of Broadway near City Hall, Park have done 71 per cent. of their job.

It is in connection with this line that the Astor House had to be cut in half. Every scrap of the southern end of the hostelry has disappeared, the old rotunda gaping on passers-by. Vesey Street, and F. L. Cranford, the contractor, is beginning to bore underneath its site.

As far as Brooklyn is concerned with the practical completion of the Fourth Avenue Subway the activity shown is nearly up to the record constructions of the Coney Island lines. The commission itself is undertaking the erection of an elevated line above New Utrecht Avenue to that resort, and the B. R. T., under the supervision of the commission, is looking after the making over of the Sea Beach line. In addition the company is constructing the Lutheran Cemetery extension of the Broadway and Myrtle Avenue elevated lines.

In the Bronx the commission has to deal with the northern end of the Interborough's Lexington Avenue subway and its branching out into the Jerome Avenue and Southern Boulevard lines, and it also has to erect the White Plains Road extension of the present Subway. Here Rodgers & Hagerty, who are responsible for the section from 138th Street, through Mott Avenue to 157th Street and River Avenue, have as good a record as some of the Manhattan contractors. They have already done 79 per cent. of their task. The next section of the Jerome Avenue line, which extends to 182d Street, and will be an elevated road, is to be begun soon.

The three-track subway under the Southern Boulevard is already under construction from 138th Street and Park Avenue as far north as 147th Street, and the bids for the next section, which will run as far as Whitlock Avenue, are to be opened to-morrow.

In Queens work is under way on the three sections of elevated line which will start from the Queensboro Bridge and will serve Astoria on the one hand and Corona and Flushing on the other. The contract for the extension of the Steinway Tunnel from its Queens terminus to the bridge plaza has been already let, and it is expected that before the end of the year the contract for the preparation of the Steinway Tunnel itself for temporary operation will be also awarded. As the Queens lines are all elevated, it would not be surprising if the route between Forty-second Street and Lexington Avenue and Corona and Astoria was one of the first of the new roads in operation.

As a matter of fact, however, since the Summer the Loop Line from Chambers Street to the Williamsburg Bridge has been in temporary operation and its use in the tide of travel is already distinctly visible on the Brooklyn Bridge.

The contracts let by the commission up to Nov. 18 for the B. R. T. lines, including the Fourth Avenue and the Loop Line, amounted to $45,136,771.50, and for the Interborough to $38,967,794.50, making a grand total of subway and elevated investment on the part of the city and the companies of $82,104,566.00.

COLUMBIA HEIGHTS STATION.

Suggestion Made for One at Hicks and Montague Streets.

Residents of Columbia Heights, Brooklyn, who have been protesting to the Public Service Commission that they have been left out in the cold by the plans for both the Interborough and the B. R. T. lines, which will run under them to the neighborhood of Borough Hall, made yesterday a new suggestion. The commission decided a week or so ago to modify the Court Street station on the Montague Street line, so that it should have an entrance with an elevator at Clinton Street, but the Columbia Heights folk refuse to be satisfied thereby.

They have written to Chairman McCall, asking that a station be built at Hicks and Montague Street with an elevator service at Hicks Street. If this is done, they express themselves as willing to see the Clinton Street elevator entrance to the Court Street station abandoned. They point out that this will make the operating cost of the two plans the same, and urge that the commission should not consider the cost of construction of paramount importance in face of the crying needs of a large and thickly populated district.

The letter to Chairman McCall is signed by more than twenty well-known residents of Brooklyn, including the Rev. Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis of Plymouth Church, the Rev. Dr. Howard Melish, Sanford H. Steele, John J. Pierrepont, County Judge Norman S. Dike, Dr. Andrew D. Parker, Mrs. Mary T. F. Low, Stephen Bulkley, Winthrop M. Tuttle, Philip Ruxton, and Joseph D. Wood, Secretary of the Eagle Bank and Loan Company.

WILL NOT LEGALIZE ROUTE.

Appellate Division Will Not Override Stuyvesant Avenue Owners.

The Appellate Division in Brooklyn has declined to confirm the report of the three Commissioners who recommended the legalization of the route of the so-called Stuyvesant-Utica Avenue subway in that borough. The commission was appointed to consider the public necessity of the line after property owners in Stuyvesant Avenue had protested against its construction and refused their consents. On the ground that the public necessity has not been established the court refers the matter back to the Commissioners for further proof.

The line was planned to run through Stuyvesant and Utica Avenues and connect with the Eastern Parkway subway. The Stuyvesant Avenue owners protested that if the road was built the shade trees there would be destroyed and the residential character of the street spoiled.

The court does not anticipate the actual building of the Stuyvesant Avenue line for years, but it believes that if it were once legalized it would affect property values in the already built up sections of the street.

"While it is true the public necessity overrides private and personal rights," says Justice Putnam, writing the opinion, "still the question is sharply presented: Does such public need exist as to justify the taking and occupation of this street against the protest of its residents? We think the facts shown fall short of proof of that public need, which alone could warrant the invasion of a residential street with jeopardy to private property rights."

The Stuyvesant Avenue residents proposed that Reid Avenue be substituted for their thoroughfare, but as that question was not before the court, it was not considered in the decision.

SUBWAY NAP COST HIM $300.

While He Dozed Some One Got B. Hertsberg's Jewelry and Cash.

Taking the Subway toward his home, at 1 Arden Street, at 1 o'clock yesterday morning, Benjamin Hertsberg intended to get off at Ninety-sixth Street to change to a Broadway express, but as he failed to mention this to any one the guard let him sleep until the train came to a halt at Bronx Park. Hertsberg growlingly paid another fare, and feeling that the Ninety-sixth Street station was a long way off, closed his eyes for forty winks. When the guard awakened him again he was at the Atlantic Avenue station in Brooklyn, greatly refreshed.

He reached for a third fare and found his change pocket empty. His wallet was gone with its $45. He must have been sleeping very soundly for his $5 cash reserve in another pocket was also missing, as was his watch, chain and locket, his diamond scarf pin, his gold penknife and his diamond and sapphire ring—jewelry valued all told at $300.

But tucked in his little vest pocket were a few coins that had carelessly been overlooked. He parted with a nickel from his reduced store and with his eyes wide open rode back to Washington Heights.

KINGS CUT McCALL.

Official Canvass Shows How Democrats Deserted Him.

According to the official canvass of the vote in the last election in Kings County, announced yesterday, County Judge Lewis L. Fawcett, running for re-election on the Republican, Progressive, and Independence League tickets, received the highest vote of any candidate, 145,024. The next largest vote was that cast for John Purroy Mitchel for Mayor, 137,074. County Clerk Charles S. Devoy and Register Edward T. O'Loughlin, both of whom were re-elected, polled, respectively, 136,719 and 135,091. The vote for Lewis H. Pounds, elected Borough President, was 133,088.

The canvass shows to what extent the candidacy of Edward E. McCall, Tammany nominee for Mayor, was cut by the Democrats of Kings County. Although the party enrollment in Kings is 129,000, the vote cast for Mr. McCall in the county was only 77,826. A feature of the count is the apparent lack of interest shown by the voters in Kings in the constitutional amendments. One of these propositions particularly affected Kings, as it provided for two more county Judges there. On this question 104,142 ballots were returned blank. The canvass shows that 91,377 voted for this amendment and 33,506 against it.

SANTA CLAUS RESPONDS.

Triplets Arrive After O'Hara Children Write to Him.

The four small children of James O'Hara put their heads together a few days ago and after an afternoon of great effort produced this letter:

Dere Mr. Sandy Claws: Will you please forr brung us a baby brodder or mayhe a baby sister what we want to play witt us we have pese to do it forr christmus and hang it on our Christmus tree and pleese do not fogit. I am Annie Josephine what is writtin this and I am yure dere friend, so pleese bringe another baby forr us. Goodbe, and I hope you will git this al rite. P. S. I wants a baby brother cause we have got fore girls all reddy but Mary Lizzie and Veronica want a baby sister and Nora wants a brother like me. Please help us out.

And yesterday the answer came, while the children were out playing and the father was laying brick on the new annex of the St. George Hotel in Hicks Street. He hurried to the O'Hara home at 32 Gunther Place, East New York, and found the house in an uproar.

"What's the riot?" he asked, pretending not to be excited himself.

And the nurse who met him at the head of the stairs answered: "Triplets."

FAIL IN RACE WITH DEATH.

Haverford Student's Parents Arrive Too Late to See Him Alive.

PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 29.—A railroad race from Chicago to Philadelphia by the parents of Hibbard Garrett, a Haverford College student, in the hope that they could save his life, has gone for naught. Young Garrett died to-day in the Hahnemann Hospital.

Hibbard Garrett was the son of William A. Garrett, President of the Chicago Greatwestern Railroad. Mr. and Mrs. Garrett arrived at the bedside of their son on Tuesday night, after a remarkable chase after a fast express train on the Pennsylvania Railroad, which they had missed by a few minutes at Pittsburgh.

The boy was suffering from heart disease, and because of his weakened condition the hospital authorities communicated with his parents early in the week.

CAPE CANAL OPENING JULY 4

Pageant to be Arranged in Celebration of the Event.

ONSET, Mass., Nov. 29.—The date of the official opening of the Cape Cod Canal has been set for July 4, 1914. The announcement was contained in a letter from Supt. J. W. Miller of the canal company to the Directors of the Cape Cod Board of Trade, which was made public to-day.

A pageant is to be arranged to celebrate the opening.

Beginning at the head of Buzzard's Bay, the canal cuts through Cape Cod to Massachusetts Bay at Sandwich, making it possible for coastwise shipping to avoid the dangerous shoals of the present route.

WRECK ON JERSEY CENTRAL.

Freight Train Derailed by Broken Wheel Nearly Hit Flier.

Special to The New York Times.

PLAINFIELD, N. J., Nov. 29.—Several cars on the Allentown fast freight were wrecked near the North Avenue Station of the New Jersey Central shortly after 8 o'clock to-night and narrowly escaped striking a fast east-bound Philadelphia express which had just cleared that point. The wreck was caused by a broken wheel on a freight car. Before the train could be stopped the derailed cars rolled up the fence separating the east and west bound tracks and left it standing in a huge pile. A considerable portion of the west-bound freight track was torn up by the derailed cars.

BILL AIMS TO END COLD STORAGE EVILS

McKellar Presents One to Insure Purity of Food Products and Stop Corners.

SAFEGUARDS FOR EGGS

Drastic Remedies Provided for Misbranding, Adulteration, Excessive Storage, and Price Fixing.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 29.—The initial step toward legislation designed to regulate the sale of cold storage products and the manipulation of prices was taken in the House of Representatives to-day when an elaborate bill was introduced by Representative McKellar of Tennessee.

The measure was drafted after Mr. McKellar had held a series of conferences with Attorney General McReynolds, who has begun a cost-of-living investigation, with a view to ascertaining whether there have been violations of the anti-trust law, and with Secretary Houston of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. McKellar has taken the lead in the House in urging legislation to remedy abuses which he believes have a direct bearing on the high cost of foodstuffs, and it is known that he expects the Administration to support his bill, which was referred to the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The measure aims to prohibit interstate shipment of certain food products and the transportation and sale of others adulterated or misbranded, and to regulate cold storage.

The bill provides that certain articles of food held in cold storage for longer periods than those fixed shall be deemed adulterated and their shipment prohibited in interstate commerce. These articles and the periods of their storage, so as not to be considered adulterated and banned, are:

Beef and its manufactured products, seven months.

Veal and its manufactured products, two months.

Pork and its manufactured products, four months.

Sheep and goats, or their manufactured products, four months.

Lambs and kids, and their manufactured products, three months.

Game and poultry, and their manufactured products, three months.

Fish and their manufactured products, two months.

Eggs and manufactures of eggs, three months.

Butter and its manufactures, three months.

Any other articles used for human food which, having been held in cold storage for any period of time, and has been removed from cold storage, is again returned to cold storage, without reference to the time the same has been held in cold storage.

With respect to eggs, those held in cold storage not less than three months or more than six months may not be classed as adulterated if upon inspection they are found to be sound and wholesome and are marked or labeled "second period cold storage eggs."

This stamp is to be on the container from which the eggs are sold and in plain view of the purchaser. Any article of food that has also been held in cold storage is to be deemed to be misbranded if its package fails to bear a label plainly stating the date of production, killing, packing, or manufacturing of the product, and the period it has been in cold storage.

When any package containing adulterated or misbranded food products is broken and the contents are sold the seller must, at the purchaser's request, state correctly the information required to be placed upon the original package upon a tag to be attached before the package is delivered to the purchaser.

As used in the McKellar bill, the term "cold storage" is to be construed as meaning the depositing of food products in warehouses, buildings, or other receptacles for a longer period than ten days, where the temperature is artificially kept at 40 degrees Fahrenheit, or below, except when the products are actually in transit and have not been in cold storage previous to such transit.

There is likewise a prohibition against placing in cold storage any products that are diseased, unsound, or which are not caught, handled, and slaughtered in a sanitary manner under regulations to be made by the President.

Those guilty of misbranding or adulterating any food product would be subject, on conviction, to a fine of not less than $500 or over $5,000 and to a sentence of from six months to ten years' imprisonment. The penalty for any agreement by which food products are kept in cold storage for a longer or shorter period, or are to be sold or withheld from sale, for the purpose of affecting prices, is to be from $1,000 to $10,000, combined with one to ten years in prison. Participation in such agreement for withholding food products from sale to affect prices is prohibited.

The bill carries a similar penalty against agreements whereby any territory in which such food products are bought or sold "is to be divided up."

Any person or firm offering for sale any cold storage product as a fresh product would be fined $100 to $1,000 and imprisoned from three to six months upon conviction.

Another sweeping provision is a requirement that all packers of meat and other foods using cold storage and all cold storage firms must furnish to the Government a full and accurate statement of all goods on hand, received and delivered each day, or otherwise be liable to a fine of from $100 to $1,000 for each offense, and imprisonment for not over five years.

EGG BOYCOTT TO GO ON.

Chicago Housewives and Dealers Fail to Reach a Compromise.

CHICAGO, Nov. 29.—Across a table on which repose a symbolic egg the housewives of Chicago and the egg dealers, through their representatives, met here to-day to discuss the boycott being conducted by the women. The conference lasted two hours, and there was no compromise. The boycott will continue.

The wholesalers said the high prices were due to a shortage, and that the boycott might be a good thing for all concerned, as the abstemiousness of the boycotters would lighten the task of the dealers, who haven't eggs enough to go around. The women declared that every effort would be made to enlist women throughout the country in addition to the 100,000 in the ranks in Illinois.

"You ask for co-operation," said Mrs. Caroline E. Bley, President of the Clean Food Club and leader of the boycott. "We would be glad to sit with you at meetings of the Butter and Egg Board." To this there was no response. John Mitchell, President of the board, said the reserve supply of 554,000,000 eggs would give only six eggs per capita for six weeks. Mrs. Bley said:

"There are thousands of persons in this city who have not eaten an egg in six months. If the eggs will not last six weeks or until the new crop comes, why don't you give them to us at decent prices? We are not concerned with the shortage; we are fighting the high prices, which seem to be brought about by profits to four or five middlemen, including speculators."

Eggs, "strictly fresh," are selling at 46 cents a dozen, and the women of ninety-six clubs in Chicago have pledged themselves to boycott them until the price drops to 32 cents.

KANSAS CITY, Mo., Nov. 29.—A meeting of the Kansas City Housewives' League, at which a nation-wide boycott of eggs will be discussed, was called to-day by Mrs. W. Q. Church, President of the league, for next Thursday. Mrs. Church issued the call on receipt of a communication from the national headquarters of the league in New York, calling on members in all parts of the country to "protest against the present manipulation of the egg market by ceasing to buy eggs until conditions change."

MORE REGIONAL BANKS.

Conference Adopts Amendment at Night Conference.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 29.—The caucus of Democratic Senators on the Owen-Glass Currency bill to-day had only eighteen Senators in attendance, and nearly all of them were interested in adding to the number of regional reserve banks for purely local reasons. The discussion on this phase of the measure has strongly resembled debates on public buildings bills, and the financial importance of a community figured but little in the arguments.

The Army and Navy football game in New York was partly responsible for the small attendance.

Finally, late to-night, the conference adopted an amendment which would permit the Federal reserve board to establish any number of regional reserve banks considered necessary between eight and twelve. This agreement met the board would have authority to divide Bacon of Georgia that the Atlanta territory might be compelled to transfer its banking operations to a reserve bank at New Orleans. The Federal reserve board would have authority to decide where banks were needed to meet ordinary business. The House bill fixed the number of banks at twelve, while the Owen bill provided for eight, and the Hitchcock bill for four.

Preliminary consideration of the bill was completed by the conference to-night, and the finishing touches will be added at a session to begin at 3 o'clock to-morrow.

Part of the discussion this morning was devoted to the question of retiring the notes upon the maturing of the paper which they were issued to rediscount. Senator Reed of Missouri proposed that the new currency be canceled as soon as it found its way back to a member bank of the proposed system, but it was objected that such a course would result in needless confusion. Many questions connected with the issue of the notes have been passed over or referred back to the Democratic half of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The programme for day and night sessions of the Senate until the bill is disposed of will probably be delayed until the conference concludes its work next Tuesday or Wednesday.

The principle upon which the committee split, the public ownership and Government control of the proposed regional reserve banks, was not brought before the conference, and the Administration plan for regional banks, capitalized by enforced subscriptions of the banks and controlled by bank-selected Directors was indorsed.

CURBS RAILROAD ISSUES.

Lewis Bill Empowers Commerce Board to Approve Them First.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 29.—Representative Thetus W. Sims of Tennessee, one of the radical Democratic members of the House, introduced in the House to-day a bill providing for Federal regulation of stock and bond issues of railroad carriers, including express, telephone, telegraph, and cable companies, but aimed only at issues which post-date the enactment of the proposed legislation.

It prohibits any such company from issuing stocks or bonds except for some necessary purpose, such as the extension or improvement without the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission after investigation by a public hearing.

The bill provides that the provision shall not apply to notes issued by the carrier which mature not more than one year after their date, but such notes shall not at any time aggregate more than 5 per cent. of the aggregate of the stocks and bonds of such carrier which may have been issued and are outstanding.

The bill likewise stipulates that its terms shall be so construed as applying only to the business of the carrier which is governed by the interstate commerce laws.

All issues of stock or bonds and other evidences of indebtedness contrary to the Sims bill could, it is provided, be enjoined in any court of competent jurisdiction at the suit of any Director, officer, or stockholder. Any Director, officer, or stockholder assenting to any issue forbidden by the bill would be punishable by a fine of from $1,000 to $10,000 or one to three years imprisonment, or both.

HONORS FOR OLD WARSHIPS

Constitution or Constellation May Be Brought to Washington.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 29.—Rear Admiral Victor Blue has recommended to the Secretary of the Navy that the old frigate Constellation, now at the Naval Training Station at Newport, R. I., or the old Constitution, now at the Boston Navy Yard, be brought around by sea and anchored off Potomac Park, Washington, to be viewed by the many thousands visitors to the capital. Congress having appropriated $100,000 in 1906 to restore the Constitution, the vessel is believed to be seaworthy and able to make the voyage to the Potomac. The purpose is to stimulate interest in the navy among the youth of the land.

A further suggestion has been made that the Constitution join the battleship Oregon in leading the pageant through the Panama Canal in 1915. Navy officers say the ship would stand the trip.

LIGHT ON FOOTBALL REVEL.

Congress to Sift Charges That Liquor Was Sold to Students.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 29.—Published charges that liquor was sold to "boys and girls" in the revels that followed the Georgetown-Virginia football game two weeks ago are to be investigated by a committee of the House. Representative Ben Johnson, who obtained the passage of the resolution providing for the investigation, declared the affair a "national disgrace."

Many arrests of college students were made the night of the game, and more than $1,000 was forfeited in small bail bonds.

PRESIDENT AT PIER SEES DAUGHTER OFF

Crowds Cheer as He Boards Liner to Wish Mr. and Mrs. F. B. Sayre Bon Voyage.

COUPLE FOIL CAMERA MEN

Shunning Special Gangway, They Reach Cabin Unnoticed—President Wilson's Day Here.

President Wilson, accompanied by Miss Eleanor Wilson, his youngest daughter, and Dr. Gary T. Grayson, U. S. N., went to Hoboken yesterday morning to see his daughter and son-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. F. B. Sayre, start for their wedding tour aboard a ship named after the first President of the United States. He arrived at the North German Lloyd pier at 9:10 o'clock in Col. House's automobile, followed by another car containing five Secret Service men.

Capt. Muller, marine superintendent of the line, was awaiting the President and took him in a private elevator to the upper floor, where he was escorted to a special gangway, decorated with red, white and blue bunting amidships on the George Washington.

As the word had been flashed from the entrance below by Capt. Muller, the bandmaster, with his band mustered on the promenade deck, was ready to start "The Star Spangled Banner" as the President came aboard. There he was received by Charles Von Helmolt, general agent of the line, and Capt. Frank.

In response to the cheers of the people on the pier President Wilson raised his hat and smiled and then went to suite 68 on the port side amidships, which had been reserved for Mr. and Mrs. Sayre.

They had not yet arrived, and so the President sat in the parlor of the suite chatting to Mr. Von Helmolt, Capt. Muller and Capt. Frank for half an hour. He asked a number of questions about the ship and matters appertaining to the Atlantic steamship trade, while Miss Wilson and Dr. Grayson walked around the ship.

Meantime the small army of photographers and reporters waiting at the special gangway were wondering if the newly married couple were going to make their exit. The father of the bride was not wondering. He was quietly chuckling. He knew. Just twenty minutes before 10 o'clock, the advertised sailing hour, Mr. and Mrs. Sayre walked into the suite and exclaimed "Here we are."

Capt. Muller had posted men at the entrance to the dock and the special gangway to signal the approach of the bridal pair, and appeared puzzled at the way in which they had escaped notice.

"We saw the gangway with its gay bunting and all the photographers waiting for us," said Mrs. Sayre, "but we did not want to come on board that way."

"It was just this way," said her husband. "We came over in the Hudson tube with a lot of other passengers and took one of those ancient hacks from the Hoboken terminal to the pier. The driver took us to the entrance at Pier 1 and we came up in an elevator filled with people."

"Which gangway did you use?" asked Capt. Muller.

"Why, the ordinary first cabin one, just beyond the gangway you had so kindly arranged for us, and no one noticed us at all," said Mr. Sayre.

In the centre of the parlor was a magnificent basket of roses sent by the North German Lloyd Company, which was much admired by the bride and her father.

After chatting with his daughter and her husband for ten minutes, President Wilson wished them a happy voyage and safe return, and left the George Washington at 10:10 o'clock. As he went down the gangway the people cheered him heartily, and the passengers on the promenade deck joined in, while the band played the "Wedding March" from "Lohengrin."

Mr. and Mrs. Sayre remained in their suite until five minutes before the George Washington sailed at 10:30, just twenty minutes late, and then went upon the bridge at the invitation of Capt. Frank. They leaned over, and at last gave the disappointed photographers a chance to snapshot them.

President Wilson drove back to New York to have an early luncheon at the home of Col. E. M. House, 145 East Thirty-fifth Street, preparatory to going to see the Army and Navy football game at the Polo Grounds.

After spending the afternoon at the Army and Navy football game, the President returned to the home of Col. House. He dined there, and then went to the Astor Theatre, accompanied by Col. House and his secretary, Joseph Tumulty, to see "Seven Keys to Baldpate."

The lower right-hand box had been decorated with American flags for the President, and he stepped into it the audience greeted him with cheers. The band struck up "The Star-Spangled Banner," and the President and the audience remained standing while the national anthem was played.

After the applause had died away, Secretary of the Treasury William G. McAdoo and his daughter Noma entered the Presidential box. They were soon followed by Miss Eleanor Wilson, Mr. and Mr Engineer E. P. Goodrich Tells How Gov. Glynn Can Improve Situation Up-State.

District Attorney Whitman's John Doe investigation, which showed the attempts of the Barber asphalt interests to get a monopoly on the State highways work, has drawn attention to the asphalt paving of the city which has been carried on by Borough President McAneny. When Mr. McAneny took office, his friends said yesterday, the Barber asphalt interests were firmly intrenched, but McAneny broke their monopoly. Now Gov. Glynn has announced that he intends to recast the specifications so that one company shall not have a monopoly of all the State contracts.

When the present administration went into office four years ago the Barber company was the only one that could supply crude asphalt to comply with the Manhattan specifications. This was so because of a resolution that had been passed by a previous Board of Estimate. On motion of Borough President McAneny this resolution was rescinded, and the way was opened for competition. The next step was a recasting of the specifications so that bidders previously excluded got a chance. Only recently nine bidders as a result of the free-for-all field created by Mr. McAneny, entered the competition for a paving job in the Borough of Manhattan.

The Consulting Engineer of the Borough President's office, E. P. Goodrich, who has been in direct charge of paving, explained yesterday how the plan put into operation by President McAneny has worked out. Said Mr. Goodrich:

"It is perhaps not generally known that the conditions up-State which have aroused so much comment are similar to those which we faced in the city when the present administration came in. I am not referring now, of course, to the campaign contributions and alleged blackmail which the District Attorney is investigating, because I know nothing about them, but to the reported fixing of specifications so that the asphalt paving was in the hands of a monopoly.

"When Mr. McAneny took charge of Manhattan Borough affairs, he found that action taken by a previous Board of Estimate excluded all varieties of asphalt in Manhattan except that which was controlled by one company. Naturally, it was not expressed in that bold way. The fact was concealed under a great deal of technical language, but it was a fact nevertheless. The specifications were very adroitly drawn; nobody but an expert, and not even an expert who had not made a particular study of different varieties of asphalt, could have detected the purpose of the specifications.

"Soon after he came into office, Mr. McAneny directed me to make an investigation of the whole problem, and we called in a number of chemists and engineers who had a wide knowledge of all matters pertaining to asphalt. The specifications were done over entirely, and we now have companies dealing in different kinds of asphalt bidding on paving contracts in the city. The result is that we are getting asphalt for 25 cents a yard less than we did formerly, and on account of our insistence that specifications be lived up to, we are getting a much better quality of pavement.

"The other boroughs have followed the example of Manhattan, and now it can be truly said that the whole city is freed from the asphalt monopoly.

"The big company has an advantage in that it has control of the supply of what is known as 'natural solid asphalt,' but it is possible to use other asphalts in combination with certain kinds of oil or 'flux,' so that they give just as good service. To define just what ingredients should be allowed to enter into the paving material, and in just what proportions, was a tedious work, and required the most minute studies and thorough tests. However, it was done successfully, and New York now has specifications that may well be taken as models.

"It is no easy job to break up a monopoly that has been intrenched for several years. Possible competitive bidders have been out of the field for so long that they are not prepared to re-enter. Early in this administration Mr. McAneny undertook negotiations with a Chicago concern in order to bring them into the bidding, and at last he succeeded in this. The Chicago people put in a bid for maintenance of the asphalt pavements for one year. To use a current expression, this 'flung a scare' into the asphalt monopoly.

"Then the Warner-Quinlan Company, which had operated up-State, but had been excluded from New York City, came in with its bids. Then came Dayton Hedges, and the Cleveland Trinidad Company, and the Aztec Company, and the Cranford Company. We have genuine competition now.

"Though, as I have said, the drawing of fair specifications involves a great deal of work and requires the best of expert talent, there is no reason at all why it cannot be done. We offer our own experience as proof. The main thing is to have the will to do it, and not to let some powerful interest dictate what the city or what the State shall use for streets and roads. The specifications for the work up-State can be just as successfully recast as ours were.

"Mr. McAneny's final move toward absolute independence on the part of the city was to obtain an appropriation for a municipal asphalt plant on the upper east side. This is almost finished now. The city will receive there the raw asphalt and will apply the 'flux' in its own way. At first this plant will not take care of new asphalt pavement, but will be devoted to repair work. Undoubtedly it will save the city a great deal of money, and at the same time repairs will be made more promptly. Eventually the city may be able even to lay new asphalt pavement. It is not likely that contract work will be done away with altogether, but the asphalt plant will be a powerful help in making the companies give good service at a reasonable price."

Mr. McAneny, it is known, expects important results from the municipal asphalt plant. Within a year or two, it was said, he expects that the city will be able to lay new asphalt pavement.

TRANSFER TAX UPHELD.

Administrator Must Pay State on New Jersey Stocks.

Special to The New York Times.

TRENTON, Nov. 29.—The act of 1909 providing for a transfer tax for the State upon stocks in New Jersey corporations was upheld by the Supreme Court to-day. The decision came in a suit brought by F. W. Senff and others against Controller Edward I. Edward. The decedent named in the action was a resident of New York and owned stock in New Jersey corporations. After his death, the Controller refused to consent to a transfer of the stock under the will because of the failure to pay the transfer tax.

Justice Swaze in the opinion says that the stocks of New Jersey corporations are subject to a transfer tax payable to the State on the transfer thereof by a foreign administrator.

GRAFT GRAND JURY BEGINS TO-MORROW

Many Well-Known Men on Special Panel of 250 Talesmen for Supreme Court.

TWO WITNESSES READY

John A. Hennessy Has Said That Indictments Will Follow Their Testimony.

Bankers, brokers, manufacturers, and capitalists may be selected to sit on the special Supreme Court Grand Jury which will sift the mass of evidence in District Attorney Whitman's campaign, highway, and barge canal graft hunt. The complete list of 250 talesmen drawn for the selection of the Grand Jury before Justice Davis in the criminal branch reached the District Attorney's office yesterday.

The work of this Grand Jury, it was pointed out, would be extensive and broad in scope. It is not unlikely that legislation regarding the collection of campaign contributions may grow out of its proceedings, and the work, it was thought, might prove exceedingly inviting to some men of wealth. The Rockefeller Grand Jury which investigated the white slave evil interested several very busy men of means.

C. K. G. Billings, the wealthy horseman; W. W. Appleton, publisher; Eugene S. Benjamin, clothing manufacturer; Edward D. Harkness, the oil man; Philip Lehman and Joseph S. Marcus, bankers, are among those on the panel. Others on the list are:

Harry A. Day, broker, 10 Park Avenue; Edward C. M. Kemp, 135 Water Street; Arthur B. Proal, 2 Rector Street; John P. Kirwin, real estate, 118 West Eighty-eighth Street; William H. Parsons, 174 Fulton Street; Dennis F. Driscoll, insurance, 7 Pine Street; Samuel Brill, merchant, 270 Broadway; Samuel Robert, importer, 20 Beaver Street; William H. Hurst, 26 Beaver Street; Edward B. Patch, hotel manager, 2 East Forty-fifth Street; John P. Leo, architect, 511 West 146th Street; William S. Harkness, Harold H. Hackett, clothier, 841 Broadway; William L. J. Duffy, 533 West Twenty-fourth Street; Herbert H. Dean, manager, 27 Pine Street; Harry M. Rau, 139 Pearl Street; Walter S. Sullivan, insurance, 45 Cedar Street; John W. Jacobus, thread, 250 West Broadway; Fred M. Johnson, insurance, 346 Broadway; William E. Schaffner, retired, 407 Washington Avenue; John F. Caragher, trucks, 595 Washington Street; Ed. A. Maher, Vice President, 2,806 Third Avenue; Jeremiah C. Lyons, builder, 50 East Forty-second Street; Christian Goetz, retired, 16 West 120th Street; Albert L. Stern, 110 Fifth Avenue; H. C. Blumenthal, banker, 5 Nassau Street; Herman Lecy, 59 East Seventy-fifth Street; Elmer E. Overpeck, 350 Broadway; Max W. Solomon, clothier, 691 Broadway; Louis A. Lehmaier, printer, 78 Beekman Street; Lewis W. Haskell, 14 Broad Street; Otto E. Dryfoos, merchant, 274 Church Street; H. T. Carey, broker, 66 Broadway; Kenneth M. Murchison, architect, 298 Fifth Avenue; Ellis G. Richards, insurance, 76 William Street; Isaac Steinan, 729 Broadway; Clarence Morton Whitman, 2 West Fifty-fifth Street; David M. Frank, manufacturer, 150 West Seventy-ninth Street; David Freed, paints, 158 Pearl Street; Edmund Dwight, manager, 25 Liberty Street; Emil Frankel, insurance, 80 Maiden Lane; Francis H. Cabot, merchant, 69 Worth Street; Moses Anathan, manufacturer, 15 East Sixteenth Street; Charles H. Paddock, cloaks, 340 Broadway.

The Grand Jury will be selected tomorrow morning, and it is expected that it will go into session in the afternoon and immediately hear the testimony of two contractors regarding the extortion of campaign contributions. These two contractors were found by John A. Hennessy, who has said that indictments are sure to follow their testimony. Six contractors have been subpoenaed for to-morrow, but only these two are expected to testify before this special body.

The other four, it was said, would be used in the John Doe proceedings, which will be resumed at 2:30 P. M. to-morrow. These four, it was said, are M. F. Dollard, John E. Consalus, a representative of the Shaunnessy Construction Company, and a representative of the Kennedy Construction Company. The Shaunnessy Construction Company was a heavy bidder for barge canal contracts.

Reports of friction between James W. Osborne, Gov. Glynn's special investigator, and Mr. Whitman, were taken to Gov. Glynn in his suite at the Vanderbilt Hotel yesterday, and the Governor again asserted that he could see no reason for friction. He adhered to the idea that Mr. Whitman would work only in New York County, and that Commissioner Osborne would rake the rest of the State. When it was suggested that these courses would necessarily overlap, the Governor said, in effect, that he did not purpose to cross any bridges until he got to them. He depended on Mr. Osborne, he said, to find his own way.

Reports of interference with Mr. Whitman's work in the Secretary of State's office, it was said at the District Attorney's office yesterday, had been exaggerated. The serving of a subpoena upon an assistant to the Secretary of State, it was explained, was necessary in order to get certain papers out of the files. Assistant District Attorney Clark said that his relations with Secretary of State Mitchell May had been very cordial. The most annoying obstacles placed in Mr. Clark's path came from the offices of the Canal Board, it was said.

Gov. Glynn was a member of this Canal Board until he became Governor. Under the law the board is composed of the Lieutenant Governor, the Secretary of State, the Controller, the State Treasurer, the Attorney General, the State Engineer, and the Superintendent of Public Works. This Canal Board has great powers and Mr. Whitman was anxious to get a record of all of its proceedings. Chapter 13 of the Laws of 1909 defines its powers and says:

"The Canal Board has power to fix and change canal boundaries; may determine whether certain canal lands may be sold or abandoned; may investigate all matters and transactions connected with canals; examine and approve or disapprove of plans and estimates submitted to it by the State Engineer; may order sale of surplus waters of the canals or creeks; grant permits for erection for commercial or manufacturing purposes, and may investigate charges against certain canal officials."

The complete records reached Mr. Whitman's office by express on Friday after several of Mr. Whitman's men had made fruitless trips to Albany for them. It is understood that Mr. Whitman can get from these records a number of names of men whom he is desirous of questioning. The real reason for wanting these records, however, it is believed, has not yet come to light. It was suggested that they might show that charges against canal officials had been discussed at some of the meetings of the Board in the Controller's office.

A large part of the graft investigation hereafter will rest on Assistant District Attorneys Clark, Embree and Edwards. The suggestion that Mr. Whitman was giving all of his own time to the investigation for the sake of his political ambitions has annoyed him and he is leaving as much of the work to his assistants as he can.

"This talk of Whitman's political ambitions is based on misinformation," said a friend of the District Attorney yesterday. "It should not be forgotten that it was not Mr. Whitman, a Republican, but Mr. Hennessy, a Democrat, who started this investigation.

"Hennessy made sensational charges during the campaign. They were ruining Tammany's chances, and Tammany did not hesitate to call Hennessy a liar. Prominent Democrats demanded an immediate investigation of the Hennessy charges, and they got it from Whitman. They got it to their sorrow, for Hennessy was not proved a liar. Hennessy was vindicated.

"When Whitman found out that he had to go out of this county and through the whole State to finish the investigation which Democrats had thrust upon him he went immediately to Gov. Glynn and Attorney General Carmody, and these officials assured him of their heartiest co-operation. After the election, however, Whitman's path became less rosy. And now we find not one investigator, but two in the field. There is room enough for another, I dare say, but Mr. Whitman should not be hampered in the investigation which he was urged to make."

MORE INDIANAPOLIS POLICE.

Special Powers for Business Men in Case of Teamsters' Strike.

INDIANAPOLIS, Nov. 29.—Harry R. Wallace, who became Mayor of Indianapolis when Mayor Shank resigned yesterday, continued preparations in the Police Department to-day to handle serious trouble in the event of the threatened strike of union teamsters next Monday.

The new Board of Public Safety granted special police powers to a number of business men who will be affected by the strike. The special powers were granted, it was explained, that the men might be better enabled to protect the business in which they were interested. In order to increase the number of patrolmen the City Civil Service Commission was authorized to reduce the minimum height requirement from 5 feet 9½ inches to 5 feet 8½ inches.

Plans to place the downtown district under a system of military patrol have been completed by Acting Superintendent of Police Coffin. The reserves, which heretofore have been held at Police Headquarters, will be divided into squads, commanded by a sergeant, and will patrol the district between pairs of stationary patrolmen.

The order prohibiting the congregation of crowds was promulgated today. Capt. Coffin said the order did not mean men and women waiting for street cars were to be loaded into patrol wagons, but added that these gatherings would be closely watched. The order reads:

"Do not disperse the crowds with strength until you have urged them to move on, but when that fails, do not hesitate to use other means."

The union teamsters will meet in the Labor Temple to-morrow and vote on the strike proposition. It is believed that the men will vote to strike. Thomas Farrell, General Organizer for the union, continued to-night to meet employers of teamsters and explain to them the demands of the union. It was said that a number of employers had signed an agreement.

It was announced to-day that the Public Service Commission of Indiana would begin on Monday its hearings in the dispute between the Indianapolis Street Railway Company and its employes who recently were on strike.

GOVERNMENT SUES AMERICAN CAN CO.

Seeks Dissolution of $88,000,000 Corporation in Anti-Trust Action at Baltimore.

WANTS IT SPLIT INTO UNITS

Petition Opposes Separation on Pro Rata Basis—Head of Concern Feels Sure of Victory.

BALTIMORE, Nov. 29.—Suit was filed here to-day in the United States District Court to dissolve the American Can Company, the so-called Tin Can Trust, which the Department of Justice alleges controls a large percentage of business of the United States in tin cans, containers, and packages of tin. In addition to the co-called trust the American Sheet and Tin Plate Company, the Sanitary Can Company, the Missouri Can Company, Martin Wagner Company, Boston Wharf Company, Max Ams Machine Company, Freeman Duncan Transfer and Realty Company, the Hawaiian Pineapple Company, Ltd., are named as defendants.

In its complaint the Government alleges practices in restraint of trade, agreements by absorbed concerns not to re-enter the field, contracts by consumers to buy from the trust exclusively, and arbitrary fixing of prices. In the bill Attorney General McReynolds seeks a dissolution other than on a pro rata basis, by asking for a separation into units of different ownership to insure the restoration of competition.

The Government's bill was filed by William T. Chantland, special assistant to the Attorney General, and was signed by W. C. Todd, the assistant to the Attorney General in charge of trust prosecutions.

It sets forth that the alleged conspiracy and combination in restraint of trade was entered into in 1901. J. Hobart Moore, Daniel G. Reid, Fred S. Wheeler, Henry W. Phelps, William T. Graham, and George G. McMurty are named as active in its formation. The American Can Company, the principal defendant, was incorporated in New Jersey with a capital of $88,000,000, and within a few months, the Government charges, obtained control of about 100 independent tin can manufacturing plants scattered over the country.

The Government hopes to prove that for some time after organization the American company controlled about 85 per cent. of the trade. While that quantity is admitted to have diminished, it is said now to be close to 50 per cent. In agreements made with the American Company by the concerns it absorbed, they were not to engage in tin can manufacture within a radius of 3,000 miles of Chicago for fifteen years, according to the Government's petition.

The Government alleges that the combination has at times increased the price of cans and that its domination of the market is so absolute that such independents as have come into being have been forced to follow its prices. It has compelled customers, the Government charges, to make long-term contracts to purchase cans exclusively from it and used other methods of getting trade familiar to such combinations.

The defendants must appear and answer within twenty days after the service of the subpoenas and bill of complaint. These documents will be issued next Monday.

President Wheeler of the American Can Company said yesterday that the suit would be defended vigorously and confidently, and that it was the belief of the company's officers and counsel that stockholders need not feel any alarm as to the outcome.

"While the company regrets that the Government has thought proper to bring this suit," he said, "it has no fear or misgiving as to the result. Neither in the origin of the company nor in the subsequent conduct of its business has monopoly or restraint of trade been attempted or attained. None of the methods commonly known as 'unfair competition' has been employed by the company. It has been party to no agreements or understandings, express or tacit, seeking to control or regulate prices, nor has it sought in any way to rule or dominate the industry in which it is engaged. It has no such share of that industry—only about one-third—as would enable it to rule or dominate it, even if it had the purpose to do so.

"Competition is wholly free and keenly active in that industry. The company has striven, and will continue to strive, to get all of the business it can, profitably to its stockholders, but it has done and will do this not by futile attempt to monopolize or dominate the trade, but by seeking through the very best methods of efficient organization, of manufacture, and of distribution, to meet better than others all the rightful needs of those who use its products."

NEW CEMENT EXPERIMENTS.

University of Wisconsin Studying to Make It Watertight.

Extensive experments are being conducted at the College of Engineering of the University of Wisconsin to find a simpler means of making concrete water-tight. Results of great importance to contractors, engineers, and farmers who have to do with concrete construction are said to have been obtained already, and still more important ones are expected. A large cement company in the Middle West is co-operating with the college by offering the facilities of its plant.

Already some interesting results have been obtained in the effect of the length of the time of mixing in a machine mixer of the batch type; the effect of the percentage of mixing upon the imperviousness of the concrete; the effect of having sand in dry condition before mixing, and the effect of having the sand wet.

The experimenters have found that good results are obtained if the concrete remains in the mixer from two to three minutes when dry materials are employed. For cases where the sand and gravel or stone are damp a considerably longer time is required. Therefore the use of wet sand should be avoided if possible. The experiments showed that mixtures consisting of 1 part of cement, 1½ parts of Janesville sand of the torpedo grade, and 3 parts of Janesville gravel, when mixed to a wet consistency, are impervious to water when subjected to a pressure of 40 pounds per square inch. Mixtures as lean as 1 part of cement to 6 parts of gravel (a graded mixture) have been made impervious at high pressures by using care in proportioning the amount of water and in mixing the batch. The specimens used in making these tests are cylindrical in form and so made that the faces of the cylinders, which are 13⅛ inches in diameter, are exposed to the predetermined water pressure. The thickness of the concrete through which the water must pass can be varied from 4 to 18 inches. Ample provision is made for cleaning both faces of the cylinder before placing it upon the testing apparatus. The apparatus itself is so arranged that very accurate tests can be made.

The importance of these experiments will be more sufficiently appreciated when it is understood that a large proportion of the trouble arising from poor concrete is due to the use of defective sand or gravel.

The department is also studying the effect of varying the percentages of cement and water, the gradation of the sand and gravel, (by this is meant the size of the rocks and the fineness of the sand,) the proportioning of the mixture, the thoroughness of mixing, and the effects of different conditions on the hardening of the specimens.

Spencer to Hang Dec. 19.

AURORA, Ill., Nov. 29.—Harry Spencer, murderer of Mrs. Mildred Allison-Rexroat, was to-day sentenced to be hanged at Wheaton, Dec. 19. Spencer argued for a new trial himself and repudiated his confession of the murder, but was overruled by Judge Slusser. The insane manner he employed before the jury during the trial was absent. He spoke calmly and without gesture.

Held for Erie Railroad Deals.

BOSTON, Nov. 29.—Walter O. Hastins, an oil merchant, was arrested to-day on an indictment returned by the Federal Grand Jury of New Jersey charging him with unlawfully soliciting and accepting concessions from the Erie Railroad. He pleaded not guilty and was held for a hearing Dec. 4.

SPRUNG A TRAP ON WALKING DELEGATE

Hyman Shatz Had a Detective Near When He Gave Marked Money to J. J. Collins.

SAYS BRIBE WAS DEMANDED

Union Officers Aver He Once Before Made a Similar Charge and Retracted Under Oath.

John J. Collins, a walking delegate of the District Council of the Brotherhood of Painters, Decorators and Paperhangers of America, was arraigned before Magistrate Nolan in the Yorkville Police Court yesterday on the charge of extorting a bribe from Hyman Shatz, of Shatz & Cantow, painters and decorators at 179 Columbus Avenue. Collins was arrested on Nov. 22 after receiving $10 in marked bills from Shatz as part payment of a bribe which Collins is alleged to have demanded as the price of refraining from calling a strike of workmen employed by Shatz at a time when he was pressed to complete an $11,000 contract.

According to the testimony at the hearing yesterday, Collins told Shatz that he had violated the union regulations in failing to give notice that he was employing men on the building at 65 West Forty-fourth Street. Shatz explained that since all his employes were union men he was not obliged to give notice to the union. According to Shatz, Collins replied to this:

"We have 'broke' bigger men than you, and if you don't pay that $25, I will have a strike declared at the meeting of the council to-night."

Shatz agreed, he said, to pay $10 on Nov. 22 and $15 at a later date. A meeting was arranged to take place in a building in West Forty-fourth Street. Meantime, however, Shatz applied to the police for help and Detective Hauser of the East Fifty-first Street station was present at the meeting.

"What are you going to do?" Collins asked, when they met at the appointed time, according to the testimony of Shatz.

"I am going to do as I promised," Shatz replied. He thereupon produced five $1 bills and one $5 bill, all marked for future identification. As soon as Collins had accepted the money and thrust it into his pocket, he was placed under arrest by Detective Hauser.

Assemblyman Patrick T. McGrath and Bernard Sandler, counsel for Collins offered in evidence at the hearing yesterday two complaints drawn up by Shatz in November, 1911, in which he charged that representatives of the union had attempted to extort money from him. In addition to this, counsel for Collins produced a document sworn to by Shatz before a Notary Public in April, 1912, retracting his former charges. Shatz admitted that he had sworn to the retraction, but said he had done so because his life had been threatened.

"I was forced by several officers of the union to make that retraction," he said.

Magistrate Nolan adjourned the hearing until Thursday, when further testimony will be heard in the office of the Chief Magistrate at 30 Mulberry Street. Collins is out on $1,500 bail.

OPEN FIRE ON TRUSTS IN NEW CONGRESS

Radical Democrats Will Be Ready with Restrictive Bills When the Session Begins.

BUT WILSON IS SILENT

And All Signs Point to Belief That His Policy When Made Known Will Prevail.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 29.—The opening gun in the Democratic campaign for new anti-trust legislation will be fired in the House of Representatives on Monday, when the Congress will meet for its regular session. On that day Representative Henry of Texas, Chairman of the Committee on Rules, will offer a bill proposing amendments to the Sherman law, so as to make that important statute more drastic. Mr. Henry's bill will provide for the punishment by imprisonment of persons violating the Sherman act, and one of its provisions will exempt from prosecution "members of organizations or associations not for profit and without capital, and agricultural products or live stock in the hands of the producers or raisers."

But Mr. Henry belongs to that segment of the Democratic membership which is called the radical element. This element has not always been in accord with President Wilson's wishes. The bill Mr. Henry will introduce is of his own making, and cannot be construed as in any way having the authority or the sanction of the Wilson Administration.

It is expected that many other bills intended to curtail the operations of combinations in restraint of trade will be presented at the new session, but these will represent the views of individual members and must be regarded as of the same unauthoritative character as the measure which Mr. Henry has prepared.

Wilson's Policy a Secret.

Whatever anti-trust legislation may be enacted at the forthcoming regular legislative session will be based on ideas which have the approval of President Wilson. Oddly enough, practically nothing is known of the trust policy the President will advocate. Even those who are closely associated with him appear to be in the dark. Mr. Wilson has kept his own counsel.

Reports that the President would base his anti-trust recommendations on the so-called "seven sisters" bills which were enacted by the New Jersey Legislature during the closing months of his term as Governor have no foundation traceable to the President himself. In fact, the President has indicated clearly that he has learned much on the subject of controlling combinations since he came to Washington that has brought him to an attitude of an open mind on the subject. He has said that while the seven sisters laws embodied his views their application was to conditions within a State and he realized that other conditions pertained in the country at large and might require a different method of handling.

Furthermore, the President has shown a disposition to hold in abeyance the formulation of any definite policy pertaining to corporations and it is evident that he does not intend to lay down the principles upon which he will stand until after he has taken counsel with party leaders.

Not Hounding Corporations.

The Wilson Administration has shown no disposition to enter on a drastic and far-reaching policy of prosecuting corporations. There has been no lack of prosecutions after evidence has been prepared, but the Department of Justice has not undertaken to run amuck in proceeding under the law, and there is every reason to believe that it will continue this comparatively conservative course. It is assumed in official circles that the policy followed by Attorney General McReynolds has the sympathy of President Wilson. Mr. McReynolds inherited many trust suits which his predecessor started, and these are being handled as rapidly as possible. In only one respect has the Attorney General shown a disposition to differ in a major sense from the course pursued by his immediate predecessor in anti-trust cases.

This difference was exemplified in the proceedings for the dissolution of the Union Pacific-Southern Pacific merger. Mr. McReynolds insisted that the dissolution be complete in every respect, and he based his course in this connection on dissatisfaction previously expressed by him with the character of the decree for dissolution of the Standard Oil Company and the American Tobacco Company each into their original component parts. Mr. McReynolds was one of Mr. Wickersham's special assistants in the tobacco cases and he did not agree with the terms of the dissolution decree in those cases. He insisted that the decree should be so sweeping that persons connected with one of the concerns ordered dissolved should not be permitted to purchase stock in any of the other concerns while retaining their original stock holdings in one of the component companies.

Views on Federal Control.

A recent speech by Joseph A. Davies, Commissioner of Corporations, Secretary of the National Democratic Committee, and close personal friend of the President, gave the impression that Mr. Wilson had an open mind as to whether the better anti-trust plan was to permit monopolies under governmental control or forbid monopolies in order that there might be active competition. It is understood, however, that the President has distinct views in this connection, and that he does not believe that governmental control of monopolies is the right way to correct the evil.

Although in the dark as to what policy President Wilson ultimately will adopt, some of the Democratic Legislators who are interesting themselves in the matter believe that the supplementary anti-trust legislative action will embrace separate measures forbidding transportation companies from controlling industrial corporations, making interlocking directorates of national banks and interstate corporations illegal and providing for Federal supervision over the issuance of corporation securities. The separation of industrial corporations and railways also is provided for in considerable measure by existing Federal law and the other two subjects became prominent topics of discussion as a result of the Pujo money trust investigation.

While the pending currency measure was under consideration by the Democratic caucus of the House of Representatives the radical element endeavored to amend it so as to provide against interlocking Directorates of banking organizations. The sentiment behind this proposal was very strong, but Representative Underwood, leading the Administration forces, managed to produce harmony by a compromise suggestion that the subject should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to report an appropriate bill at the regular session of Congress. This bill will be an Administration measure for Mr. Underwood, the one proposing the compromise, acted with the sanction of the White House.

Hit at Money Trust.

Right on this point the advocates of legislation to curtail the operations of the so-called Money Trust have produced an utterance of President Wilson which they are citing as evidence that he is with them in what they desire to accomplish. This utterance reads as follows:

"The great monopoly in this country is the money monopoly. Our system of credit is concentrated. The growth of a nation, therefore, and all our activities are in the hands of a few men, who, even if their action be honest and intended for the public interest, are necessarily concentrated upon the great undertaking in which their money is involved, and who necessarily, by very reason of their limitations, chill and check and destroy genuine economic freedom. This is the greatest of all, and to this statesmen must adjust themselves with an earnest determination to serve the long future and the true liberties of men."

When Representative Clayton of Alabama retired from the contest for Senator in his State at the instance of President Wilson, the President placed his request that Mr. Clayton remain in the House on the ground that he desired Mr. Clayton's aid and counsel as Chairman of the Judiciary Committee during the regular session. It was well understood that the President meant that Mr. Clayton would be intrusted with initiating an anti-trust programme for the Administration.

In the near future, probably next week, the President will confer with Representative Clayton on the subject, and it is not likely that either Congress or the public will obtain any idea before then of the provisions of legislation supplemental to the Sherman act which the President desires to have placed on the statute books.

Dickens League Benefit.

The American Dickens League will give its annual performance for the benefit of the "Little Nell" Hospital beds, on Sunday evening, Dec 14, at the Harris Theatre. Among the artists who will lend their help will be Mortimer Kaphan, the impersonator of Dickens characters, and Miss Helen Wetmore, soprano. Cyril Maude, the English actor, has sent a check for the fund for the "Little Nell" beds The Honorary Committee for the performance consists of Cardinal Gibbons, the Rev. Dr. Joseph H. Hertz, chief rabbi of England, Bourke Cockran, Prof. Franklin W. Hooper, Francis P. Garvan, Health Commissioner Ernst J. Lederle, and the Rev. Madison C. Peters. Tickets are for sale at the headquarters of the league, Room 425 Marbridge Building, 1,328 Broadway.

CHRISTMAS NUMBER OF THE TIMES.
Next Sunday's Christmas Number of The New York Times will be sold out in advance. The only way to get a copy is to order early. It will contain Sargent's "Prophets" in the original colors and The Girl of To-day photographs in rotogravure.—Adv.

BOSTON BROKER A SUICIDE.

Chesley D. Barton Shoots Himself in a Downtown Hotel.

Chesley D. Barton, an insurance broker of 141 Milk Street, Boston, Mass., was found dying in his room in the Glen Island Hotel at 88 Cortlandt Street late yesterday afternoon by Daniel Kelly, a porter in the hotel, who entered the room after he had heard a shot fired. Barton had a bullet wound in his right temple, and in his right hand he held a small revolver which had just been discharged. The man died a few minutes later.

According to the management of the hotel, Barton registered a week ago. He said he was in the insurance business. Kelly was on the third floor of the hotel when he heard a shot and saw smoke coming from an open transom over the door of Barton's room. He ran downstairs to the office and told the clerk. The police were notified and an ambulance was called.

Dr. Conkey of the Hudson Street Hospital found Barton still alive, but he died as he was being carried to the street to be taken to the hospital in the ambulance.

BOSTON, Nov. 29.—Chesley D. Barton lived at 1,678 Beacon Street, Brookline, with his wife and his father-in-law, David B. Sears. He was an insurance solcitor n ths city. Mr. Sears says he can thnk of no reason for aBrton's suicide. His business was prosperous and his domestic relations were happy. He left home a week ago to transact some business in New York.

GEN. C. F. ROE'S NAME IN LIBEL ACTION

Eliot Norton Wants $50,000 from Charles Unangst, Creditor of Van Schaick & Co.

HE CHARGED COLLUSION

In a Circular Said the General Was Allowed to Withdraw $700,000 from Firm.

A libel suit for $50,000 was begun yesterday in the Supreme Court by Eliot Norton, a noted corporation lawyer, against Charlee Unangst, also a lawyer. The action recalls the famous failure of the big stock brokerage house of Van Schaick & Co. about two years ago. Tangled up in the suit are the names of many distinguished persons who did business with Van Schaick & Co., and it especially involves the name of Gen. Charles F. Roe, once head of the New York National Guard.

The liabilities of the bankrupt firm amounted to $824,000. Gen. Roe had about $700,000 on deposit with the concern. A few days before the failure he withdrew $400,000 of this amount. It was alleged at the time that the General knew of the shaky condition of the concern and that he inflicted serious damage upon the other creditors by the withdrawal of such a large sum.

Mr. Unangst and his wife had a claim against the concern for about $70,000 and they were very angry at the timidity displayed by the General. Mr. Norton said last night that he was appointed assignee for the firm. He said that in a circular sent out by Mr. Unangst Gen. Roe was bitterly attacked and that his own name was also mentioned in very unfavorable terms. For this circular, which received wide circulation, Mr. Norton said he intends to bring Mr Unangst to account.

The head of Van Schaick & Co. was John Van Schaick, son of Jenkins Van Schaick, a well known citizen. Mr. Norton, the plaintiff in the present action, is a writer on legal subjects and is the author of a book on Abraham Lincoln. He was made a Chevalier of the Order of Sts. Mauricio and Lazare by the King of Italy. He is the son of Charles Eliot Norton, who was professor of the History of Fine Arts at Harvard for twenty-five years.

After the failure Mr. Unangst said that the main cause of it was the heavy withdrawal of cash and securities by Gen. Roe. Mr. Unangst said at the time the assignment was made:

"Prior to the assignment and on or about Aug. 22, we understand, one of the partners of the firm and Gen. Roe, against the interests and rights of the creditors, turned the business of Van Schaick & Co. over to Prescott Slade and William C. Camman, representatives of Gen. Roe. As a result the General was enabled to withdraw from the company cash and securities worth more than $700,000, to the complete exclusion of all other creditors."

It was said that only a few months before the firm failed Gen. Roe's account with it aggregated $1,250,000. Mr. Unangst made other attacks on the General, and in some of these the name of Mr. Norton, the assignee, came in for sharp criticism. It is because of these attacks, that continued for a long time, that Mr. Norton is now seeking damages.

FOR SAFETY ON RAILROADS.

New York Central Lines to Hold an Educational Meeting.

The New York Central lines will hold an educational "Safety First Meeting" to-morrow night in the auditorium of the Engineers' Society Building at 29 West Thirty-ninth Street. F. V. Whiting, General Claims Attorney of the road, will preside. The programme includes addresses by Vice President Hardin, General Manager Crowley, and Marcus A. Dow, General Safety Agent of the lines.

On the subject, "The part of the employe in a campaign for greater safety," there will be five-minute talks by a conductor, an engineer, and a trainman. This programme is under the auspices of the American Museum of Safety, and the museum's quarters in the Engineers' Society Building will be open from 7 P. M. to 8 P. M. for inspection by those arriving early.

Williams Heads Journalism Teachers

MADISON, Wis., Nov. 29.—Dr. Talcott Williams, dean of the Pulitzer School of Journalism in Columbia University, was elected President of the American conference of teachers of journalism to-day. Other officers are: Vice President—F. L. Martin, University of Missouri; Secretary and Treasurer—James Melvin Lee, New York University; Executive Committee—W. G. Bleyer, University of Wisconsin; J. W. Piercy, University of Indiana.

TO INDICT EX-CAPTAIN.

Whitman Ready to Start Prosecutions in Wire-Tapping Scandal.

District Attorney Whitman's investigation of the alleged collusion between the police and a syndicate of wiretappers, clairvoyants, and disorderly house keepers will be brought to a head early this week, when Assistant District Attorney Frederick J. Groehl will ask the Grand Jury for indictments. One of these indictments will be against an ex-Police Captain, who is charged with receiving protection money from the wiretappers.

Mr. Groehl did not seem to be disturbed by the denial printed in an evening newspaper of the confession attributed to Frank Henry Wolf, who was arrested on Thursday, charged with swindling Mrs. Francesca Groehnert of Astoria out of $10,000. Wolf, who is said by his physician to be dying of cancer of the stomach, was released in $5,000 bail yesterday and was removed from the hospital to the home of his mother-in-law, Mrs. Caroline Schaefer of 1,375 Franklin Avenue, the Bronx. He is said to have called the statements attributed to him involving police officials "lies."

It was learned that Wolf's confession was embodied not only in his statements to the Assistant District Attorney, but also in a stenographic report of a statement made to Philip Bloch, Chief Clerk of the Board of Magistrates.

THREE GUNMEN ROB AGAIN.

Baker's Driver in Eighth Holdup by Two on Hackensack Road.

Three gunmen, their faces partly concealed with handkerchiefs, robbed Ernest Heidrich, driver for C. Marten & Co., bakers, of 317 Mercer Street, Jersey City, of his day's receipts while he was passing Fairview Cemetery on the Hackensack Plank Road at 6 o'clock last night. Heidrich was compelled to alight from his wagon and step into the roadway, where two of the bandits took $42 from his pockets, while the third man held a revolver in his face. Then the thieves knocked Heidrich down and left him lying in the road as they fled through the cemetery.

This is the eighth hold-up in this neighborhood within three months. In each one a trio of gunmen appeared. Among the victims were two men and a girl, who were robbed of jewelry. A mile from the scene of last night's holdup three bandits armed with revolvers waylaid a physician and his wife in their automobile, but they escaped by putting on speed, and forced their assailants to jump aside to keep from being struck by the machine.

TARIFF DRAWS JAPAN GOODS

Exports Here from Nippon Stimulated by Lower Tariff.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 29.—Trade reports from Consular agents in Japan represent that the new American tariff is having a remarkable effect in stimulating exports to this country. The Japanese regard the American market as one of their best for their earthenware and porcelain goods and for the great variety of art objects suited to the holiday trade. Japanese exports in these lines have largely increased this year under the lower tariff rates.

There is also an export movement among their manufacturers of silk handkerchiefs, cotton mattings, art silks, carvings, silver handiwork, and similar goods. The exports of these goods have already greatly increased, and there is a prospect that they will do so still more.

In foodstuffs there is no apparent stimulation, except in crab meat and certain other canned articles, which are shipped for the Japanese in this country, and are now beginning to be consumed by Americans. Japanese soy is also finding a market in this country.

WANTS ALIENS IN UNIONS.

Gompers Advises Labor to Win Immigrants After Canal Opens.

SAN FRANCISCO, Cal., Nov. 29.—"Make immigrants members of unions as fast as they come in after the opening of the Panama Canal," said Samuel Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labor, in an address before the San Francisco Labor Council last night.

Mr. Gompers added that unless Pacific Coast union men endeavored to obtain the membership of newcomers from foreign lands the West would have the same conditions to contend with in the labor situation as the East had to-day.

NEW KIND OF LABOR UNION.

Against Strikes and for Arbitration and Graded Wage Scale.

KANSAS CITY, Mo., Nov. 29.—A new labor organization bound by its constitution to oppose strikes and uphold arbitration for settling disputes and also to favor a graduated, rather than a uniform wage scale, was chartered in the Circuit Court here to-day.

Founders of the organization, which is known as the National Association of United Building Labor, says it is their plan to extend the body to all parts of the United States. So far 200 members have been enlisted in Kansas City.

CREDIT FOR CANAL CLAIMED FOR OHIO

Society of Sons of That State Told We Owe It to Gov. Herrick and Mark Hanna.

BEAT THE NICARAGUA PLAN

Then Taft Discovered Goethals, the Builder—W. H. Truesdale Elected President.

Members of the Ohio Society of New York who attended its twenty-eighth annual meeting following an informal dinner at the Hotel Manhattan last night took great satisfaction in applauding the Panama Canal as an Ohio enterprise. William S. Hawk, the retiring President, read a letter from J. G. Schmidlapp of Cincinnati which recalled that M. Bunau-Varilla had been brought to this country by the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce and introduced by M. Schmidlapp to Gov. Herrick, who in turn put him in touch with the late Senator Mark A. Hanna.

It was Senator Hanna who fought the battles of the Panama route for the interoceanic canal on the floor of the United States Senate after the House of Representatives had almost unanimously passed the bill for the Nicaragua route, wrote Mr. Schmidlapp, and he asserted that but for the Ohioans bringing M. Bunau-Varilla to this country at that critical time and giving him hearty support the country would now probably still be "tinkering with the Nicaragua route" instead of getting ready to open the canal in a few months.

Charles D. Hilles, Chairman of the Republican National Committee, won applause by pointing out other reasons why Ohio could claim the credit for the Panama Canal. He said that William Howard Taft, whose secretary he was when Mr. Taft was President, had been the Secretary of War who discovered Col. Goethals, the army engineer who had carried the work of building the canal to successful completion.

Mr. Hilles announced that the Panama Canal would be the topic discussed at the annual dinner of the society at the Hotel Astor on Dec. 20 next. Ex-President Taft, Secretary of War Lindley M. Garrison, ex-Secretary of War Henry L. Stimson, and John Barrett, Chief of the Bureau of American Republics, would speak at the dinner, Mr. Hilles said. He also asserted that Col. Goethals had considered attending the dinner if exempted from speechmaking.

The society elected William H. Truesdale, head of the Lackawanna Railroad, its President for the ensuing year. It elected as Vice Presidents Emerson McMillin, Mr. Hilles, Paul D. Cravath, Theodore N. Vail and Hart B. Brundrett. Milton P. Jackson was elected Secretary, and William A. Dobbyn, who was secretary to the late Col. John Jacob Astor, was elected Recording Secretary. Howard Elmer Crail was elected Treasurer. Harry B. Logan, David Homer Bates, Jr., and Benjamin B. Avery were elected Trustees for three years.

The meeting voted to present an engrossed testimonial of appreciation to William S. Hawk, the retiring President, who had served three years. Among those present were Commissioner of Patents Thomas Ewing, Adam K. Stricker, Col. William D. Mann, Arthur B. Townshend, Samuel M. Williams, Russell I. Hare, Henry W. Taft, Ernest K. Coulter, Gen. Nelson A. Miles, Colgate Hoyt, and Thomas O. Baker.

O. S. U. ALUMNI GATHER.

Hear Speech and Song Sent Out to Graduates Everywhere.

Several hundred of the alumni of Ohio State University gathered at the Waldorf-Astoria last night for celebration of Ohio State Day. It was the third celebration of its kind, and, as was the case in past years, it was marked by a feature. Last night the graduates heard the voice of their Alma Mater's President, Dr. William Oxley Thompson, through a phonograph. When he had finished his speech the operator turned the disk over, and out of the phonograph came a song of the Ohio State University Glee Club.

The significant thing about this double-faced phonograph record, however, was that ones like it were heard at the same moment at the smokers and dinners of some 200 other Ohio State Alumni Associations the world over. They had been sent out from the university in Columbus two months ago and reached farthest China and India in time to be played last night. Eight-thirty was the hour everywhere, and the speech was heard in many parts of the globe simultaneously.

The President of the university told of the glories of the institution. He informed the alumni that the Ohio State University boasted of 4,400 students, fifty buildings, fifty departments of instruction, and of 500 graduates a year. When he mentioned the fact that there were 500 "co-eds" in the institution there were many cheers. Two new buildings, each costing $150,000, he announced, were in the course of construction. At the end he called for a big, rousing cheer, and the alumni foregathered at the Waldorf responded well with their "Whaa Whoo" and the "Locomotive." And they were doing the same thing all over the world at the same moment.

Ernest K. Coulter, founder of the "Big Brother" movement, the President of the local alumni association, was Chairman and played the glee club songs over and over again. Walter J. Sears of Chillicothe, Ohio, a Trustee of the university, was the special speaker of the evening.

Weeklies Meet High Living Cost.

PITTSBURGH, Nov. 29.—The cost of living in Western Pennsylvania has received another impetus, publishers of six weekly newspapers in Clarion County having notified their subscribers that beginning Jan. 1 the yearly price will be advanced 50 per cent. Increased cost of labor and materials without a corresponding advance in advertising rates was given as the cause.

RECOVERS VALUABLE DOG.

Miss Colfort Thanks The Times Lost and Found Department.

Miss Edith Colfort, well known in society and in the Meadow Brook Hunt Club until a few years ago, when nervous prostration caused her temporary retirement, lost a valuable Eskimo dog on Thanksgiving Day. The dog is said to be the only one of its kind in America, and was given to Miss Colfort, who lives at the Plaza Hotel, by Paul J. Rainey after his return from one of his expeditions in the arctic regions. Miss Colfort had trained the dog to follow her automobile, but when she returned to the hotel on Thursday after a short drive the dog had disappeared.

Miss Colfort at once advertised in the Lost and Found column of THE NEW YORK TIMES and in other morning newspapers. The advertisement appeared in the issue of THE TIMES on Friday morning. Yesterday morning Miss Colfort was called on the telephone by a man who said she could get her dog back if she would meet him at 9 o'clock at Ninety-eighth Street and Lexington Avenue and pay a reward. The man said he thought $20 was about the right amount of money to pay. Miss Colfort agreed, but asked the man to postpone the time to 6 o'clock last night and he agreed.

Accompanied by an employe of the Lost and Found Department of THE TIMES, Miss Colfort met the man at the appointed hour and place. Two plain clothes men from the East 104th Street Station were also on hand. When the man identified himself as the finder of the dog, the whole party went to his home at 144 East Ninety-seventh Street. The man said he was a chauffeur of the Consumers' Wine and Liquor Company and that when he found the dog following his truck on Thursday he took the animal home.

The next day he saw the advertisement in THE TIMES and at once called Miss Colfort on the telephone to tell her he had her dog. Miss Colfort paid the reward and refused to press any charge against the chauffeur. She expressed her gratitude and complete satisfaction with the service rendered by THE TIMES Lost and Found Department in aiding her to recover her pet.

TO SHOW CRIPPLES' WORK.

Federated Institutions to Hold an Exhibition and Sale.

To demonstrate the possibility of operating on a paying basis a shop for the sale of work produced by cripples, philanthropic institutions in the Federation of Associations for Cripples have arranged for an exhibition and sale of cripples' work to be held on Tuesday and Wednesday afternoons at Delmonico's. Industrial training designed to make cripples economically independent is the last word in this branch of philanthropy and the work is progressing satisfactorily because the associations have united to prevent a duplication of effort.

Those participating in the exhibition are the Brearley League Industrial School for Cripples, the Crippled Children's East Side Free School, the Harlem Day-Home and School, the New York State Branch of the Shut-in Society, the Trade School of the Hospital of Hope and the Blythedale Home for Crippled Children.

TWO DOGS BITE CHILDREN.

One Escapes, but the Other Is Held for the Board of Health.

Children playing at Walton Avenue and Belmont Street, in the Bronx, yesterday noon scattered in every direction as a brindle bulldog ran snapping along the street. Three of them were not quick enough. Joseph Tonti, Rose Longino, and John Kraus were bitten, but physicians in the neighborhood attended them. The dog went on its way undisturbed.

At about the same time a bull terrier bit 9-year-old Vincent Grate, playing in front of his home at 586 Eagle Avenue, the Bronx. The wound was cauterized at Lebanon Hospital and the dog was caught in Jackson Avenue and penned up until the arrival of a Board of Health physician.

READY FOR FRENCH LOAN.

It Will Be Subscribed Twice Over, Says John L. Waterbury.

John L. Waterbury, the financier, with his wife and daughter, Gladys, returned yesterday on the White Star liner Baltic from a four months' automobile tour through Europe.

He had been resting during his entire trip, said Mr. Waterbury, and had not attended to any work. Business conditions abroad he had found good, except on the stock markets. There every one was waiting for the issue next month of the $150,000,000 French domestic loan. This he expected would be taken up twice over, Mr. Waterbury added.

The Baltic encountered rough weather the whole way across, and this caused her to arrive a day late.

SMALL FIRE IN ART MUSEUM.

Smoke from Blaze in a Locker Overcomes an Attendant.

Thomas Ferry, an attendant in the Metropolitan Museum of Art, was overcome by smoke at five o'clock yesterday afternoon when fire was discovered in a locker in the copy room in the basement on the south side of the building. There were many visitors in the museum, but although the smoke was dense there was no excitement. Ferry was overcome in trying to put out the blaze. He was dragged from the room by Patrick Foy and Louisi Mora, attendants, and a fire alarm was turned in. Battalion Chief Dougherty and his men had little difficulty in extinguishing the blaze. Henry Kent, secretary of the Museum, said the fire started from spontaneous combusion among the rags and paints used by the artists which were stored in the locker. At the home of the President of the Museum, Robert W. De Forest, it was said last night that the damage was less than $100.

To Lecture on "Art and Empire."

By invitation of the Trustees of the Metropolitan Museum Mrs. Arthur Strong, Assistant Director of the British School of Archaeology in Rome and a leading authority on Roman sculpture, will give an illustrated lecture, entitled "Art and Empire: The Influence of Imperialism on Later Antique Sculpture," in the lecture hall of the museum on Monday afternoon, Dec. 1, at 4 o'clock. This lecture will be open to the public without tickets.

FIND MANY FAULTS WITH SEAMEN'S BILL

Longshoremen Fear It Will Throw Sailors Out of Work to Compete with Them.

CREWS MUST OBEY ORDERS

Union Leaders Might Interfere with Discipline, It Is Feared—Many Real Grievances Exist.

The Seamen's bill now before Congress does not meet with the support of the longshoremen, according to Walter B. Holt, organizer of the International Longshoremen's Association. It would cause, he said yesterday, a number of sailors to be left on the beach, and they were sure to seek odd jobs about the piers. Moreover, as the bill requires steamship companies to carry enough lifeboats to accommodate every person aboard and to employ two able seamen for each boat, a number of steamships were likely to be laid up, and this would mean a corresponding decrease in cargo work for the longshoremen.

"We are considering the question," said Mr. Holt, "of making a protest against the bill, and are waiting for the Atlantic Coast Seamen's Union to take action in the matter. When we see what they intend to do our plan will come up for discussion.

"The Atlantic Coast Seamen's Union has withdrawn from the National Seamen's Union, which is controlled by its President, Andrew Furuseth, the promoter of the bills now under consideration."

The Marine Superintendent of one of the big steamship lines said yesterday that he was quite in favor of certain clauses in the bill improving the aboard-ship conditions of sailors and firemen, but he was wholly opposed to any interference with the discipline of the ships.

"What is the use of having lifeboats and fire appliances on the big passenger liner," he asked, "if the Captain has no control over the crew?"

"Just imagine what it would mean if the Olympic, Mauretania, or Imperator were ready to sail with mails aboard and her cabins full and the walking delegate of the union stepped on to the bridge and told the Captain that the ship could not start because there was no red currant jelly served with the roast haunch of mutton at the firemen's dinner that day. That is no more ridiculous than the recent holding up of a passenger liner for five hours at San Francisco because the firemen's sheets were not properly laundered to suit the union delegate.

"On the other hand," the Marine Superintendent went on, "to my own personal knowledge the steamship companies of all nations have practically neglected for years to make any improvement in the accommodations provided for their crew, including the officers and engineers, unreservedly.

"Only a short time ago the firemen on the Imperator struck because their quarters, they complained, were too hot to live in, and the agents of the line here promised to remedy the mistake made when she was built. There are big liners going out of this port today in which the chief officer's room is so small that he has to go outside to take off his sea boots. Owners never consider any member of the crew in their calculations except the Captain, the doctor, the purser, and sometimes the chief engineer.

"The firemen and sailors live in close, confined quarters forward and have to eat their meals in the same places where they sleep and live for the entire voyage. The stewards are even worse off. They have to sleep generally in some dark cave over the propellers or forward in the eyes of the ship and have not even a place in which they can sit down for their meals. They stand in dark corners or under staircases and eat like horses at a manger. Some of them, I have been told, become so accustomed to this that they cannot eat in daylight when they go home to their families.

"Then sailors and firemen go to sea all their lives, but the companies make no provision to help them along in their old age, when rheumatism or lumbago compels them to retire. These are just grievances and should be remedied.

"Then the officers have another just cause of complaint. They receive, they say, no recognition at the hands of the companies, and the name of not even the chief officer is put on the passenger list, although it has the names of the chief steward and the stewardess on it. The junior officers, who have had to obtain masters' certificates before entering the service, are treated like schoolboys, through the ridiculous red tape rules enforced by the company.

"In the big English steamship offices on the other side it is common to find the captain of a liner worth over $5,000,000 waiting for hours to see a general manager who has sent a message by an office boy to tell him to wait there, and who has gone away and forgotten all about him.

"These are some of the grievances in the mercantile marine that are making it difficult for the companies to get officers and men."

It is understood that the Atlantic lines will hold a conference during the coming week to decide on their attitude toward the Seamen's Union bill when it comes before Congress.

SUE McGILL FOR AUTO DEATH

Administrator of Man Killed in His Motor Seeks $50,000.

A lawyer has been engaged to prepare the papers in a suit for $50,000 to be brought against Alexander McGill of Jersey City, a son of the late Dr. John D. McGill, by Ernest J. Heppenheimer, administrator of the estate of Paul Pareidt, who was killed in August on the Hudson Boulevard in an accident to an automobile driven by McGill.

McGill inherited a share of his father's estate, which gives him a yearly income of $15,000. If a judgment is obtained the proceeds will go to the parents of Pareidt, who are in Cologne, Germany. A suit for $50,000 for alienating the affections of her husband, Walter Mayer, was begun by Mrs. Mary Mayer of 78 Sherman Avenue against Alexander McGill's sister, Miss Eleanor McGill, not long ago.

UNIONS BACK FIREMEN.

Will Urge City to Use Two-Platoon System.

A committee has been appointed by the Central Federated Union to ask for the two-platoon system for the firemen of this city. This is part of a movement which has been started on behalf of the firemen throughout the United States in which organized labor has been asked to assist, though the firemen are not organized.

Matthew McConville, delegate of the Safety Engineers' Union and Chairman of the committee, said that its members would appear at the Aldermanic hearing on Friday, and make a request for the two-platoon system. He also said that efforts would be made in the meantime to have as large an attendance as possible of the members of the labor unions at the hearing to back up the request.

"The men in the Fire Department of the city have the longest working days of any of the city employes," he continued. "There are 4,500 of these firemen and they have to be on duty, or at least subject to a call to a fire, practically twenty and a half hours a day. We feel as workers that it is our duty to obtain the proposed system for them if we can."

OBLIGATORY GIVING RELIC OF BARBARISM

Spugs Can Assail the Exchange Xmas Gift as a Reversion to Primitive Origin of 'Trade.'

RETURN GIFTS EXACTED

And Travelers Report That Giving In the Soudan Is Just a Crafty Form of Investment.

The Spugs, in the closing days of their second campaign against the perverted Christmas gift, can draw ammunition from the fact that the system of obligatory exchange giving at this season of the year is really a reversion to the gifts of hospitality that some historians consider to have been the origin of trade. Their fight against the sort of giving that has been so heavy a burden to the working girls can be strengthened by denunciations of that sort as a reversion to barbarism.

Carl Bucher, in a paper on "Industrial Evolution," argues ingeniously for the exchange of presents as the origin of modern commerce. He points out that the first discoverers of Australia, finding the aborigines with absolutely no conception of barter or trade, were puzzled to explain the brisk exchange of pots, hatchets, and the like.

"The solution of this riddle is simple enough," he says, "and has now been confirmed by direct observation on the spot, while previously it could only be assumed. The transfer ensues by way of presents, and also, according to circumstances, by way of robbery, fine, compensation, and winnings in gaming. From tribe to tribe there prevail rules of hospitality which recur with tolerable similarity among all primitive peoples.

"The stranger, on arriving, receives a present, which, after a certain interval, he reciprocates, and at his departure still another present is handed him. On both sides, wishes may be expressed with regard to these gifts. In this way it is possible to obtain things required or desired, and success is the more assured inasmuch as neither party is absolved from the obligations of hospitality until the other declares himself satisfied with the presents.

"Among many primitive peoples, peculiar customs have been preserved which clearly illustrate the transition from presents to exchange. Among the Dieris in Central Africa, for instance, a man or a woman undertakes for a present the task of procuring as a reciprocal gift an object another desires or of hunting for him or of performing some other service. The one thus bound, until the fulfillment of the obligation, wears a cord about his neck. As a rule, the desired object is to be procured from a distance."

It is pointed out that among the Indian tribes of Central Brazil trade is still an interchange of gifts of hospitality, and from the countries of the Soudan the constant giving of presents becomes a burden to the traveler, because, according to Mr. Bucher, it is often only a concealed begging. The Spugs could draw many a withering analogy between the Soudan gifts and the obligatory presents at Christmas time.

"The gifts of hospitality that are received at camp," reports one traveler, "are in accord with good custom and are often very welcome. But with every stop in a larger town things are frequently obtained from high and low which are ostensibly given as a mark of respect to the white man; in reality, they arrive only because the donors expect a three or four fold response from the liberality of the European. Indeed, I am convinced that many a poor woman has herself first purchased the hen or duck that is to be presented in order to do a profitable piece of gift business with it."

There are some social historians who are inclined to smile at such emphasis upon the gift as the origin of trade. They would caution us against too implicitly crediting the primitive man with altruism, and are decidedly of the opinion that trade had its roots less in giving than in taking. At all events, it is the cautiously balanced give and take of the barbarous Christmas giver who is the object of Spug scorn and Spug reproach.

SEEKS 180-LB. BRIDE.

Now, George H. Yale Appeals to the Patchogue Editor.

The success of Ernest W. Darrow, contractor and builder, of Patchogue, L. I., in obtaining a wife by advertising has caused George H. Yale of 519 Nostrand Avenue, Brooklyn, to follow his example. Yesterday J. B. Green, a Justice of the Peace of Patchogue and editor of The Patchogue Argus, in which paper Darrow published his appeal for a better half, received a letter from Yale asking aid in his loneliness.

Yale said he was a nurse, attached to the Home Bureau, at West Thirty-ninth Street, with a salary of $25 a week. He said he was 42 years old, a widower, and very lonely, having lost his wife and seven-months-old baby a few months ago. Yale further said he wanted a good woman, (he didn't care if she were poor,) 37 years old, with auburn hair, who tipped the scales at 180 pounds. He said nothing about her disposition, but hopes to hear in the near future that Judge Green has found him a wife.

The Wheelock
Regular Price $375

The Weber
Regular Price $700

The Stuyvesant
Regular Price $300

The Aeolian Company announces an extraordinary

Sale of New Pianos including the magnificent Weber, the Wheelock and the Stuyvesant in discontinued styles at from $195 upwards

Terms as low as $10 down and $6 monthly

The Aeolian Company will place on sale tomorrow a superb collection of high-class, new pianos. These instruments represent, in their respective grades, the finest examples of modern piano making art.

They belong to that limited class of pianos on which the price is rigidly maintained, and which are sold strictly on their quality appeal.

The reason they are to be disposed of this week at reduced prices is because they represent discontinued styles—that is, styles which do not appear in the new 1914 catalogs, just issued.

This does not mean that they are, in any sense, old style. The Aeolian Company is recognized as the leading house in the music industry in the design and casewoods of the pianos built under its direction. These instruments will compare most favorably in appearance with the latest productions of other houses, while musically they are far ahead of any that at all approximate them in price.

A Majority are WEBERS

This, in itself, is enough to establish this selling event as the most important piano opportunity of the season.

The quality of the Weber Piano is too well-known to need emphasis. The two styles which are to be sold, are the most expensive Uprights that are made, selling regularly at $650 and $700 respectively.

The other pianos, the Wheelock and the Stuyvesant, are models of these well-known instruments that have been most popular during the past two years. Every instrument in this sale is, at its reduced price, an unparalleled bargain.

Sale will begin tomorrow morning and last until all the pianos are disposed of. As the stock is limited, an early call is advisable. A small down payment will secure any piano for immediate or Christmas delivery.

The Victor Salon at Aeolian Hall is the most completely appointed Victor Store in New York.

Aeolian Hall will be open evenings until the holidays

NATIONAL SOCIETY TO FIGHT CANCER

Its Campaign Begun to Spread Sound Medical Knowledge to All Ranks.

SAFETY ONLY IN SURGERY

Radium Still Considered Uncertain —Study of Cancer Statistics the First Step.

The campaign mapped out by the American Society for the Control of Cancer is described by Graham Romeyn Taylor in the next number of The Survey. He says that 75,000 persons die every year of cancer, and that the deaths from this disease are constantly increasing. Only two other diseases are more deadly, Mr. Taylor says. Theee two are tuberculosis and pneumonia. Many of the brightest medical minds in the country are engaged in finding some method in checking the scourge. The fight against it is nation-wide. Recently the American Society for the Control of Cancer was organized. Mr. Taylor says that, in spite of the premature enthusiasm over radium and the conscientious statements of quacks, the surgeon's knife is the only known cure. Then he says:

"Prompt diagnosis and an immediate, thorough operation offer a high probability of saving the patient's life, while delay and neglect mean certain and terrible death. To spread this simple gospel to every corner of the land, the society is beginning an active campaign of publicity and education.

"For the decade ended with 1911 the cancer death rate has increased from 65.8 per 100,000 of the population in 1901 to 83.9 in 1911. With minor exceptions, the increase has appeared at all age groups and for both sexes. The estimate of 75,000 deaths for 1913 is made by so well-known a statistician as Frederick L. Hoffman.

"From the social standpoint it is of peculiar interest to note that cancer is distinctly a disease of adult life. Deaths from cancer make up one-sixteenth of the mortality from all causes at the ages of forty-five and over. This means that cancer directs its terrific onslaught largely against mothers and fathers of families. A splendidly organized campaign is being directed against infant mortality, another of the great controllable causes of deaths. The loss of a baby's life is, of course, a sorrow, and too often doubly sad because it is preventable. It represents also the loss of a potentially valuable unit of society. But the immediate total of misery and suffering entailed upon the community may well be considered greater when cancer removes, often with terrible agony, the parent who is the main source of support of a family.

Social Control of Cancer.

"Society then must organize its defenses against this terrible enemy as it is so effectively doing in the case of tuberculosis, typhoid fever, and many other diseasee subject to administrative control. The problem, however, is somewhat different. When society turns to medical science and asks the cause of cancer and how to prevent it the answer is, 'We are trying to learn, but we do not yet know.' In the meantime, however, modern medical knowledge givee us one fact and one warning of the utmost significance. Cancer cannot be cured, but it can be extirpated from the system by an immediate recourse to skilled surgery. The patient's life can be saved in almost every instance if the disease is discovered early enough and a single thorough operation is at once performed.

"Cancer is not at first a general disease of the blood, and despair and surrender in face of the disease is not warranted. We now know that cancer is always at first a local disease which can often be completely removed by adequate surgery. The knife is the only known sure remedy, and the terrible scourge gives its victim only one chance. Delay means not simply danger, but inevitable death. And again, the result of a delayed or incomplete operation is almost always fatal. The percentage of recovery after a second operation is desperately low.

"Radium is considered by enthusiasts to promise a curative agency of unmatched beneficence to mankind, but we must know much more than we do now of its effects before we can abate in the slightest the urgent emphasis on surgical treatment. We have not yet been able in this country to make an authoritative determination of its value. Few American surgeons have sufficient radium available to give a thorough trial, especially as it appears that extensive doses sometimes cure when smaller amounts have but little effect.

"Only time will tell what percentage of cases can be cured with radium, and in the meantime the Society for the Control of Cancer warns the public that early surgical treatment affords the best chance for cure of cancer. While the results of radium must be taken into consideration, at the same time the men who have reported the best results are still urging early operation whenever possible.

"To meet the need of a definite special agency to fight the battle of society against this disease the American Society for the Control of Cancer has been formed. Patterned somewhat after the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis, yet recognizing an entirely different problem and planning different methods, the new organization aims to establish a clearing house of information on cancer, and to become the channel through which authoritative statements, based on the study of medical and statistical records, will be made to the public from time to time.

"The society has been launched by men of the highest standing in the medical profession, including Dr. Clement Cleveland of New York, Lewis M. McMurtrie of Louisville, Dr. A. D. Devin of Chicago, Dr. Joseph C. Bloodgood of Baltimore, Dr. Edward Reynolds of Boston, Dr. Edward Martin of Philadelphia, Dr. F. F. Simpson of Pittsburgh, Dr. C. Jeff Miller of New Orleans, Dr. Charles Powers of Denver, Dr. F. R. Greene, Secretary of the American Medical Association, and Dr. Livingston Farrand, Executive Secretary of the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis. Frederick L. Hoffman and Samuel Hopkins Adams, who have done much for popularizing sound medical knowledge, are members of the Executive Committee, as are also such leaders in the world of affairs as George C. Clark, James Speyer, New York banker, and V. Everit Macy, who is identified with several of the great movements for social advance. The movement started in a committee appointed by the American Gynecological Society. The organization was approved by the other constituent bodies of the Congress of American Physicians and Surgeons, and by the American Medical Association. Further stimulus has come from the Clinical Congress of Surgeons of North America at its recent meeting in Chicago.

Methods of Work.

"One of the first objects will be to obtain the keeping of systematic and uniform records of cancer cases in hospitals and dispensaries to provide the basis for more detailed and positive deductions as to the value of surgical treatment in different manifestations and stages of the disease. When by this method and by the collection and study of statistics from all available sources new light is thrown on the cancer question the findings will be spread abroad through all available channels. The society will endeavor to obtain the co-operation of magazines and the daily press, and will further the organization of lecture courses in women's clubs, factories, and wherever opportunity offers. Local branch associations will probably be formed and all available agencies utilized to spread authoritative information on the subject of cancer to every city and village in the country. The new association will not undertake medical research and will not encroach upon the work of any existing agency, but will devote all its energy to the dissemination of information provided by the multitude of present workers in the field."

NEW POLICE SIGNALS.

Lights Will Flash When Patrolmen Are Needed at Their Stations.

To meet the difficulty of summoning patrolmen from fixed posts to their stations quickly, Commissioner Waldo has tested a new flashlight and telephone signal system that will be put into operation soon in the Twenty-third Precinct, of which the West Thirtieth Street Station is the headquarters. At present there is a boxed telephone attached to the wall of a building near each fixed post, but its bell cannot be heard more than a few feet away. In cases of riot and fire, when extra policemen have been needed quickly, a roundsman has had to go from post to post to summon the men.

The new system will make this unnecessary, it is thought. On ten street corners in the Twenty-third Precinct, iron posts, surmounted with green glass globes twelve inches in diameter, have been erected. On each post is a telephone in direct connection with the station. When the desk Lieutenant in the station wants to communicate with a patrolman on post he pushes a button and a light flashes in the green globe and continues to flash at intervals until the telephone is answered. There are five lights on a circuit, so that when the desk Lieutenant pushes one button the signal is flashed to five patrolmen simultaneously. The telephones on the posts are inclosed in locked iron boxes, to which only policemen have keys. If the new system is a success in the Twenty-third, it will be installed in other precincts.

The first ten telephone stations of the new system will be at Seventh Avenue and Twenty-seventh Street, Seventh Avenue and Thirty-first Street, Sixth Avenue and Twenty-ninth Street, Sixth Avenue and Broadway, Sixth Avenue and Thirty-fifth Street, Sixth Avenue and Thirty-seventh Street, Sixth Avenue and Forty-first Street, Broadway and Thirty-ninth Street, Broadway and Thirty-first Street, and Fifth Avenue and Thirtieth Street.

GETS WASHINGTON LETTER.

James F. Drake of This City Purchaser at London Sale.

The important historical letter of George Washington referring to the first attack of madness of George III., which was sold at Sotheby's in London on Friday for $900, is already on its way to America. It was bought by Stevens & Brown, London book dealers, for James F. Drake, 4 West Fortieth Street, this city.

The price paid would be high for an ordinary Washington letter, but this particular one is believed to be unpublished and to be one of the most interesting ever penned by Washington. It was written the day after his election as the first President of the United States. It was published in full in THE TIMES a few days ago. The letter is dated Mount Vernon, Feb. 5, 1789.

Washington's reference to George III.'s first attack of madness is considered remarkable. In the Autumn of 1788 the King returned to Windsor after taking the waters at Cheltenham, and on Oct. 16 got wet while walking. The next day he was taken ill, and on the 22d signs of derangement appeared. However, he got better, and on the 24th held a levee. His mind dwelt on the loss of the American Colonies. While at Windsor on Nov. 5 he became delirious, and for a while it was thought that his life was in imminent danger. On Dec. 5 his physician told the Privy Council that the King's disease was not incurable, but it was impossible to say how long it might last.

The estate of Alfred Lee Manierre, who died on Oct. 1, 1911, has just been appraised at $248,754.93. The value of the realty is placed at $194,969.02, and the personalty at $71,925.14. His equities in real estate consist of $85,250 in property at Broadway and 231st Street, $14,000 at Tenth Avenue and 210th Street, $50,000 in 26 West 24th Street, and $95,000 in 23-25 Lispenard Street. The mortgages are valued at $56,480.22, and the stocks and bonds at $9,101.24. A number of notes and accounts, probably acquired during his political work in behalf of the Prohibition Party, amounting to $21,204.06, the Appraiser believes to be "uncollectible."

Mr. Manierre was a candidate for important public offices on the Prohibition ticket. In the Columbus convention of 1908 his name was proposed for President. He was a Director and Treasurer of the New York Red Cross Hospital, and a Trustee of organizations for improving the condition of colored people, and for the protection of colored women.

HARLEM DINNER TO MITCHEL

Members of Board of Estimate and County Officials-elect to be Guests.

A dinner will be tendered to Mayor-elect John Purroy Mitchel, the members of the Board of Estimate, District Attorney Charles S. Whitman, John J. Hopper, Max S. Grifenhagan, and County Clerk William F. Schneider, by the citizens and merchants of Harlem on Dec. 17 at Pabst's, Harlem, 256 West 125th Street.

The other guests of honor include Mayor Ardolph L. Kline, Andrew Carnegie, ex-Mayor Seth Low, Oscar S. Straus, Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, and Dr. A. Jacobi.

The guests will be entertained during the dinner with music, and several well-known singers will appear.

E. von der Horst Koch is Chairman of the Committee of Arrangements, J. M. Horton is Vice Chairman, Samuel Wallach is Secretary, and William B. Stambaugh is Treasurer. The headquarters for the Dinner Committee is at the Hotel Theresa, 125th Street and Seventh Avenue. The menu will be especially attractive typographically.

Xmas Sale for Crippled Children.

A Christmas sale of novelties will be held at the residence of Mrs. Charles H. Marshall, 6 East Seventy-seventh Street, on Dec. 4, from 10 to 6 o'clock. The sale will be for the benefit of the Darragh Home for Crippled Children, which is now in the fifteenth year of its active, useful life. Among those who are working with Mrs. Marshall are Miss Marshall, Miss S. B. Skelding, Mrs. Herman Westinghouse, Mrs. T. H. Willard, Miss Mary Macy, Mrs. Frank Dempster Sherman, Mrs. W. L. Baner, Mrs. E. M. Munsill, Mrs. Alfred Morris, and Mrs. B. E. Martin.

CITY BREVITIES.

The Honest Ballot Association will give a dinner at the Hotel Astor on Tuesday evening, Dec. 9. Among the speakers will be Gov. Martin H. Glynn, Mayor-elect John Purroy Mitchel, George W. Perkins and District Attorney Whitman.

A dinner will be given to John M. Price at the Aldine Club on Thursday evening, Dec. 11, in recognition of his services in the organization of the fusion movement of 1913. The Committee of Arrangements includes Mayor Kline, William A. Prendergast, George McAneny, District Attorney Whitman, Norman Hapgood, William Loeb, Jr., and W. G. Willcox.

The Broadway Association will hold its first annual dinner at the Hotel McAlpin, on Dec. 11. An entertainment will be given presenting some idea of Broadway from its early days to the present time. The Committee of Arrangements includes: W. D. Washington, Chairman; E. A. Muschenheim, John David, Marc Klaw, John Slater, A. F. Berry, Frederick Feigl, C. B. Collins, C. L. Taylor, H. R. Limburg, D. Liberman, R. L. Hatch and James A. Metcalfe.

WILL HOLD KLINE FOR FIRETRAP JAIL

Presentment Would Make Him Personally Responsible for Loss of Life.

FIRE ESCAPES DEMANDED

Queens County Grand Jury Says Long Island City Prison Is a Menace.

Should loss of life due to fire occur among the more than two hundred inmates of the old Queens County Jail in Long Island City, Mayor Ardolph L. Kline is to be held "personally responsible," according to a presentment handed up to Judge Burt J. Humphrey in the Queens County Court by the Grand Jury yesterday. Thomas Napier is foreman of the Grand Jury.

The presentment says similar presentments have told of the unsafe condition of the old jail, but no attention has been paid to them by the city authorities. It calls attention to the "general unfit, unsafe and insanitary condition" of the jail, and, continuing, it says:

"After an inspection of the aforesaid jail we are so strongly impressed with the menace to life therein by reason of the fact that the jail is a veritable firetrap, that we add to the former recommendation one calling for immediate action with regard to rendering the jail fireproof by the removal of all inflammable material and the providing of proper fire exits. We, each and all of us, feel that personal responsibility in this matter, which would make us culpable should loss of life occur through our failure to do our duty, and we therefore place this matter in the hands of the Mayor as the official with power to correct, that he may be personally responsible in case of loss of life should he fail to use every means in his power to remove this menace to life.

"We further indorse in every particular the former recommendations and instruct the District Attorney of Queens County to deliver a copy of this resolution to the Mayor of the City of New York personally."

This presentment means that Patrick A. Whitney, Commissioner of Correction, who has supervision over the jail, is directed to remove all inflammable material from the building. District Attorney Matthew J. Smith said he would comply with the direction of the presentment and serve a copy of the document on Mayor Kline to-morrow.

The old jail was built in 1875, but has been repeatedly added to and rebuilt since. Shortly before consolidation in 1897 the old Queens County Board of Supervisors spent several thousand dollars overhauling the place, but after they got through the prisoners leaked out of the jail like water through a sieve. Ten made their escape at one time. Instead of chilled steel bars being used in the cells and windows it is said they were of soft iron, so that they could be sawed with a common table knife. It was alleged that not a cell in the place could be locked.

Conditions in the way of management became so notorious a few years ago that following a report by the Prison Association, in which the jail was characterized as about the worst place of its kind in the country, the institution was taken out of the hands of the county authorities of Queens and made a city prison under the control of the Commissioner of Correction. Since that time the discipline has been better, but nothing has been done to improve the building. Last June the Prison Association condemned the building as a firetrap and as in bad sanitary condition.

The jail is a four-story brick structure in the rear of the Queens County Court House, which fronts on Jackson Avenue, Long Island City. Those who know its history as it was run under the old county management a few years ago say fire escapes were not necessary to aid prisoners in making their exits, for they simply oozed out of the building at all times.

WOMAN OF 70 A SUICIDE.

Carefully Concealed Her Identity When Renting Lodgings.

A woman dressed in deep mourning, about 70 years old, who rented a furnished room on Friday afternoon from Mrs. Julia Riley of 75 South Eighth Street, Williamsburg, was found dead yesterday, having committed suicide by inhaling illuminating gas. She had made most careful preparations for the act, removing initials and means of identification from her clothing, but she neglected to obliterate the initials "C. E. F.," which were on her suitcase. She also plugged up every cleft in her room, and, besides locking the door, had braced a chair against it. All her wearing apparel was of good material.

The woman was greatly distressed when she called upon Mrs. Riley on Friday. She said only that she had been a resident of Williamsburg for more than thirty years, and Mrs. Riley refrained from asking her any questions, but showed her to her lodgings on the second floor, in the rear. When the woman failed to appear yesterday, Mrs. Riley made an investigation and, detecting the odor of escaping gas, she notified a policeman, who forced an entrance through a fire-escape window. The woman had been dead at least twelve hours. The body was sent to the Morgue.

UPHOLDS BEEBE ALIMONY.

Physician Must Pay $5,000 a Year Pending Divorce Suit Trial.

The Appellate Division affirmed the order of the Supreme Court yesterday, giving Mrs. Mary Beebe of Eton Street, Flushing, $5,000 a year alimony and a counsel fee of $500 pending the trial of a suit for divorce which she has brought against her husband, Dr. Silas N. Beebe, a member of the Faculty of the Cornell University Medical School. Dr. Beebe, in his appeal from the court's award, alleged that his wife had been adjudged insane, and that she was incompetent therefore to bring the action.

Mrs. Beebe, in reply to this, asserted that the Judge who declared her insane was misled when he signed an order committing her to an insane asylum. Mrs. Beebe is now suing Dr. Johnstone MacLeod of Flushing and Dr. Arthur W. Jagger for $50,000 for having had her sent to the asylum.

Mrs. Beebe's counsel said yesterday that he expected to have the divorce action tried in the January term of the Supreme Court in Queens.

AUTO DRIVERS IN CELLS.

Broadway Speeders May Be Fined $100 After This.

Twenty-six automobile speeders appeared before Magistrate Krotel in the West Side Police Court yesterday on complaint of Motorcycle Policemen Kerrigan and Crawford. They said the men were going over fifteen miles an hour between 6 P. M. and midnight of Friday on Broadway, between Fiftieth and Fifty-ninth Streets. Twenty-four were fined $50 or five days in jail. John Emerson, an actor playing in "Within the Law," did not appear in court, and the Magistrate issued a warrant for his arrest. One speeder was fined $25.

Magistrate Krotel announced that this week he would impose the maximum penalty on speeders, a fine of $100 or the option of fifteen days in prison.

Those who did not pay their fines at once and who went back to the prison from court were: Hugh Brady, 238 West Fortieth Street; Alonzo Coles, 141 West Ninetieth Street; William Brooks, 1,888 St. Nicholas Avenue; William Walden, 430 West 124th Street; Ross Nicol, 9 Columbus Avenue; Richard Lewis, 37 Bayard Street; Joseph Gratzer, 523 Ninth Avenue; William Thorne, 533 West Fifteenth Street; Frank Higger, 345 West Seventieth Street; James Ciffello, 1 West Centre Market, and Robert Otto of Princeton, N. J.

MADISON HOUSE SALE.

Fancy Articles Will Be Offered to Aid Settlement Work.

A Christmas sale of fancy articles of all kinds, dolls, books, bags, lingerie, and such things, in aid of Madison House, will be held at the Meeting House of the Society for Ethical Culture, 2 West Sixty-fourth Street, Dec. 4 to 6, inclusive, afternoons and evenings. No admission will be charged, tea and supper will be served. On Saturday afternoon there will be children's entertainments and games for the young folk.

Madison House is a settlement at 216 Madison Street, whose attempt is to solve some of the problems of an immigrant neighborhood. Established fourteen years ago, it has grown to include more than forty self-governing clubs, social activities, various classes, playground and bank. During the Summer the house has two Summer homes for juniors; Camp Moodna, the car-colony for older girls; and Camp Astra for older boys. The members are encouraged to self-support, and last year contributed one-third of the budget. Local leadership is evidenced by the predominance of former members of clubs as leaders and workers.

FAILED REALTY FIRM ASKS FOR MORE TIME

Receiver Urges Mortgage Holders Not to Sue Real Estate Security Company.

MECHANICS' LIENS FILED

Creditors Enter Claims Against Bankrupt Concern and McVicker-Gaillard Company as Contractors.

James N. Rosenberg, receiver of the New York Real Estate Security Company, which has gone into bankruptcy, due to inability to pay mortgage calls and taxes on its sixty-six parcels of real estate, said yesterday that he had sent letters to all of the mortgage holders asking them to refrain from instituting foreclosure suits. Every effort was being made, it was said at the offices of the company, at 42 Broadway, to come to a satisfactory understanding with the bondholders, so that the financial difficulties of the concern might be tided over until better conditions prevailed in the real estate market.

Seventeen mechanics' liens, aggregating $12,000, were filed yesterday against the New York Real Estate Security Company, as owner, and the McVicker-Gaillard Realty Company, as contractor, on properties at Ninety-fourth and 119th Streets and Riverside Drive, 100th Street and Central Park West, 3,099, 3,100, and 3,134 Broadway, and other places. Among the liens are Otto Gordon, for $3,365; Nathan Gordon, $2,089; B. Maiot, $2,103; Philip Pohlsky, $1,700, and Louis Robinson, $1,035.

Charles S. Sabin, Vice President of the Guaranty Trust Company, is Chairman of the Bondholders' Committee, and he is preparing a list of all the bondholders of the concern. Mr. Sabin hopes to call a meeting of the Bondholders' Committee to-morrow or Tuesday, and he hopes some plan may be determined upon then under which the company may resume business.

The firm of Barrow, Wade, Guthrie & Co., public accountants, was appointed by the receiver to prepare a statement of the liabilities and assets of the bankrupt firm. The accountants began their work at once, assisted by the officers of the company, and they hoped to have a detailed report ready early this week. The receiver has informed each mortgage holder that separate records will be kept of the different properties with their respective net rentals and payments, so that each mortgagee may be protected fully.

Hugh McAtamney, who was one of the three petitioners in the bankruptcy proceedings, said yesterday that every one was working harmoniously to straighten out the company's affairs, and he expressed confidence that with a little time every dollar of its indebtedness would be paid.

HEALTH IMPROVED IN 'FLYLESS' BLOCK

A. I. C. P.'s Experiment Points the Way to Saving Babies' Lives.

SIGNIFICANT CONTRASTS

Only One-third as Many Cases of Summer Complaint in Screened as in Unscreened Area.

The results of the most thorough practical study of the relationship between housefllies and disease ever made in a Northern city have just been tabulated by the Bureau of Public Health and Hygiene of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor.

Last Summer the Bureau, under the direction of its Superintendent, Dr. Donald B. Armstrong, began an investigation having for its object the determination of the responsibility of the housefly for diarrhoeal diseases, especially those of infants. For the purposes of the investigation two city blocks in the Little Italy of the Bronx were selected, in one of which all the approved methods of preventive sanitation were employed, while in the other the forces of nature—including the human variety—were allowed to take their course. The results, while admittedly not conclusive, are sufficiently suggestive in character to determine the bureau to pursue its investigations another season. It was shown, for instance, that in the protected area the number of cases of infantile Summer complaint was only one-third the number in the unprotected area.

Experiment in Little Italy.

The boundaries of the protected block were 150th and 151st Streets and Park and Morris Avenues. The unprotected block was in the same general neighborhood, and the character of the population and of normal conditions in the two blocks was the same. The total population was practically the same, as was the infant population. A census was made according to age groups, a careful record kept of the amount of sickness in the two blocks at the beginning of the inspection period, and a thorough medical inspection given to the two areas weekly for a series of fifteen weeks, during which a record was kept of all deaths and cases of disease, with the facts relating to them.

The two blocks started fairly, except that the inhabitants of the protected area had the advantage of a three weeks' campaign of education. In this section many anti-fly tracts, both in Italian and English, were distributed by nurses and Boy Scouts, and the instruction contained in these was supplemented by the exhibition of a local moving-picture theatre at every run for a week of the film "The Dangerous House Fly," lent by the Merchants' Association. Free tickets admitting all but the youngest children were distributed among the residents of the block, and most of the tickets were used.

At the expense of the association screens were placed in every window and door of the block—about 1,700 openings in all. The people were instructed concerning the desirability of keeping the screens in place and of protecting them from injury. With the aid of the local Boy Scout organization large traps were constructed and placed in the courtyards and stables in or adjacent to the district. These were baited and emptied regularly, and of the thousands of flies thus captured many were sent to the Department of Public Health of the Museum of Natural History, where determination was made of the types, about 1 per cent. of the catches being stable flies (supposed to be transmitters of the germs of infantile paralysis) and the great majority house flies.

1,106,017 Bacteria Per Fly.

At the same time numbers of living flies were caught in the houses, and with the co-operation of the Health Department laboratories were examined to make bacterial counts. Some of these flies were caught in houses of the protected area and others in unprotected houses. The average number of bacteria found on flies—or in the cultures made from the surface washings of the insects—taken in the "protected" houses was 13,986, of which 4,489 were intestinal organisms. The average count of the flies from "dirty" houses, i. e., in the unprotected area, was 1,106,017 per fly, of which 292,117 were intestinal. Of course, flies in a filthy section have a better—or worse—opportunity for bacterial contamination than those in a clean area.

Cleanliness was enforced in the protected area in relation to the streets and courtyards as well as the interior of the tenements; and particular attention was paid to the stables as constituting the chief breeding places of the flies. The bureau had sent to all the stables in the district sufficient quantities of iron sulphate to insure the efficient treatment of the manure (for the destruction of fly larvae) throughout the experiment. The cost of this treatment was 9 mills a horse a day.

With the assistance of a special inspector assigned to the district by the Department of Street Cleaning it was possible to maintain the streets in a decent and sanitary condition.

The Tenement House Department assigned an inspector to the section and greatly aided the bureau in its efforts to maintain cleanly conditions inside the houses, to encourage the use of garbage cans equipped with lids and to prevent the throwing of garbage and other refuse out of the windows and into the courtyards. The bureau reports, as a by-product of its investigation, remarkable success in the educational work in this direction; the number of new garbage cans and cleaned-up courtyards being surprisingly large.

Health Department Co-operates.

"In all of our work," says Dr. Armstrong, "we have received enthusiastic and substantial assistance and co-operation of the several divisions of the Health Department, particularly the Sanitary Division. A special Inspector was assigned to our district in the Bronx, and the work which we were able to do with this co-operation was illustrative of what could be done were the department in a position rigidly to enforce the Sanitary Code.

"The reason why fly breeding nuisances are not entirely eradicated by the Health Department is because of the small number of Inspectors which the appropriation for this purpose enables them to obtain. There are at the present time seventy-three men in the Division of Sanitary Inspection. It happens that only seven of these can be assigned to the wide area covered by the Bronx, and with this small force it is possible to do little more than take care of complaints as they come in. A continuous, aggressive, and thorough inspection is out of the question.

"It must be remembered that if there seem to be defects and deficiencies in the official handling of sanitary problems these are largely the result of an inadequate machinery for attack. It must also be remembered that most of the disease-carrying insects in which we are interested could be eliminated along with the unsanitary fly-breeding nuisances if the department were supplied with the means of enforcing the Sanitary Code."

The statistics collected by the bureau's investigators show that during the period of inspection there were in the protected area 111 cases of sickness from all causes; in the unprotected area 165. The cases of non-communicable disease were almost the same in number—36 in the protected, 49 in the unprotected block. This leaves the great differences in the total figures to be accounted for on the theory of greater and less transmission of communicable diseases, of which in the protected group there were 75 cases and in the unprotected 125. Of the diseases of the germs of which it is reasonable to suppose the fly in this climate acts as the transmitter through surface carriage the ratio was 22 to 65.

The figures just given are for all age groups; for children under five years they are still more striking, the total morbidity being 82 in the protected and 113 for the unprotected area. When cases of diarrhoeal disease only are considered, the ratio of 20 to 57 is observed, and the average duration of illness is seen to be 2.9 days less in the protected section. There were no deaths from diarrhoeal disease of children in the protected area, while there were 2 among the children of the outside families; but in view of the small number of cases involved in the comparison the bureau is not inclined to attach much significance to these mortality statistics.

As to the general conclusions to be drawn from the Summer's investigation the bureau does not attribute the better health conditions in the protected area solely to the anti-fly campaign conducted there; for example, it takes account of the fact that the babies in the protected block received bottled milk in 54 per cent. of the families, while only 37 per cent. of those in the unprotected area were thus safeguarded; and Dr. Armstrong's report further shows his fairness by the observation: "Notwithstanding the inevitable disappointment of the race suicide faddists, the bureau does not feel justified in accrediting the excessive birth rate in the protected area to the anti-fly campaign."

Experiment to be Repeated.

In summing up the results of the experiment, Dr. Armstrong says:

"The study is incomplete, and undoubtedly on the basis of the present findings we are not justified in attempting to revolutionize infant hygiene. No such attempt will be made, though the facts should be presented and given what credit they deserve until substantiated or revised by further experimentation.

"It is felt that sufficient reliance may be placed on the work, particularly the practical results in the field, to justify an insistence upon the enforcement of the Sanitary Code in so far as it reaches fly-breeding nuisances. The statistical results also justify the placing of a greater emphasis upon educational work among the mothers regarding the dangers of the house fly in the lives of the infants.

"Finally, the bureau thoroughly recognizes the limitations of the study this Summer and is convinced of the necessity of continuing this experiment on a larger, more comprehensive and complete scale through at least one other fly season before definite, positive conclusions can be reached."

R. CAMPBELL A SUICIDE.

New York Traveling Salesman Found Dead in a Boston Hotel.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Nov. 29.—Robert Campbell of 347 West Twentieth Street, New York City, died to-night in his room at the Touraine Hotel from a revolver shot. He is supposed to have been a suicide. A revolver was found near the body. He came to the hotel a few days ago and seemed to be in the best of health. Medical Examiner McGrath took charge of the body.

Robert Campbell was for many years a traveling salesman for various dry goods concerns, according to one of his daughters, who was seen last night at her home, 347 West Twentieth Street. Mr. Campbell left home about three years ago, and since then his wife and four daughters, living at the address in Twentieth Street, have heard from him only once. He also had two sons, but neither of them is living in New York.

According to his daughter, Mr. Campbell was about 60 years old. His family last heard from him about a year ago, when he wrote them from California. They did not know where he was until they were notified of his death. Nothing could be learned of Mr. Campbell's financial condition from his daughter. Asked if it was possible that her father's death might have been accidental or other than suicidal, Miss Campbell said she was convinced that her father had killed himself, but she would suggest no reason for his act.

KILLED TWO MEN IN A MINE.

Mexican Bandit Shot Deputy Sheriffs Who Pursued Him.

SALT LAKE CITY, Nov. 29.—Ralph Lopez, the Mexican bandit who killed four men last week, shot and probably killed two Deputy Sheriffs to-day in a battle in an underground workings of the Utah-Apex mine, near Bingham. The men who were shot are believed to have been Deputies Hulsey and Mandrich. They were left in the mine by their companions, together with two Austrians, who were uninjured, but were cut off from escape.

Immediately after the shooting a posse of fifty was organized for the purpose of storming the mine and capturing or killing the desperado.

The underground fight was the result of several deputies penetrating one of the mine entrances 900 feet and lighting a smudge with the intention of smoking Lopez out. As soon as a match was struck Lopez opened fire.

IN NEW JERSEY.

NEWARK.—Mary Page, a ten-year-old orphan, has written a letter to Gov. Baldwin of Connecticut, asking him to save Bessie Wakefield, recently convicted of murdering her husband. As an orphan she begs the Governor not to make the woman's little children orphans.

NEWARK.—Branch 4, Firemen's Mutual Benefit Association, will hold this afternoon a memorial service for deceased members of the Newark Fire Department in Payton's Theatre. "Back taps" will be sounded—that is, an electric light will be extinguished and two strokes will be sounded on a fire gong—as the name of each departed member is read by Chief Engineer Paul J. Moore.

BAYONNE.—A missionary campaign in the Protestant churches will be begun to-day with a conference in the First Baptist Church, led by David McConaughy and Harry S. Meyers of the Missionary Education Movement of the United States and Canada.

WEST NEW YORK.—Clemens Franke, a mechanic, was killed yesterday at his home, 641 Polk Street, by falling down stairs and breaking his neck. He was 64 years old.

MONTCLAIR.—President Henry E. Jackson of the Montclair Civic Association, announced yesterday that the Directors intended to enlarge its activities at the semi-annual meeting on Thursday evening. Mayor Ernest C. Hinck, Senator Austen Colgate, Assemblyman Bennett H. Fishler, Edmund B. Osborne, and Charles T. Root of New York will discuss "Taxation."

MONTCLAIR.—The Rev. Dr. D. Everett Lyon will preach to-day his last sermon at Grace Presbyterian Church. He leaves this week to assume the pastorate of Westminster Presbyterian Church at Baltimore. He came to Montclair more than a year ago.

MORRISTOWN.—Frederick Lindabury, who took bichloride of mercury tablets with suicidal intent a few days ago, is slowly dying in the Memorial Hospital. Despite the efforts of physicians to eliminate the poison from his system, he is growing weaker.

MOUNT HOLLY, N. J., Nov. 29.—Thomas Asay of Vincentown, one of the three persons injured when their horse ran into a train here Wednesday night, died yesterday in the hospital. He suffered internal injuries and his leg was broken in the accident.

MOUNT HOLLY.—Joseph Rogers of Lumberton, who was convicted at his second trial of setting fire to the hotel at Lumberton a few months ago, was sentenced yesterday by Judge Horner to the State prison for from three to fifteen years. Ellis Reed of Chesterfield was also sent to the State prison for from one to three years for shooting his brother.

METUCHEN.—Thomas L. Smack, the Pennsylvania Railroad agent here, disappeared on Nov. 4 and, without saying a word to anybody, went to Jersey City. There he met Miss Elizabeth Tilghman of Salisbury, Md., and married her. After a wedding trip they came back here on Monday night, but not until yesterday was it announced that he had been married.

TRENTON.—The State Board of Commissioners in its annual report, comments upon the high standard maintained by New Jersey in the matter of pilotage. With the exception of the grounding of a few vessels, there were no serious accidents during last year. Pilotage receipts for the year amounted to $223,009.50, for 1,450 inward and 1,445 outward bound vessels.

TRENTON.—In its annual report the State Board of Pharmacy calls attention to the unusual spirit of jealousy manifest among New Jersey druggists. During last year an extraordinary number of alleged violations were reported, but a thorough investigation failed to produce proof of any of them.

DEFENDS THE CIVIL SERVICE TESTS

Frank Gallagher Replies to Some of Chief Kenlon's Criticisms.

DOCTORS REJECTED BRADY

Chief Had Recommended Him for Promition in Letter to Commission.

Frank Gallagher, President of the Municipal Civil Service Commission, replied yesterday to the statements attributed to Fire Chief Kenlon regarding the physical examination of applicants for promotion in the Fire Department. Chief Kenlon said that armless men and men with cork legs had been put on the eligible list.

Mr. Gallagher said that the Chief was piqued because the commission had not passed a man named Brady, whom its surgeons had rejected.

"Chief Kenlen," went on Mr. Gallagher, "speaks of 'heart murmur' as a 'bugaboo.' It is inconceivable to me that the Chief of the Fire Department on such matters should put his judgment against the judgment of competent and experienced surgeons. It seems to me from his quoted statement as if the Civil Service Commission should have been as vigilant as it was in its attempts to secure for the city the best material for fire Captain. Chief Kenlon's reasoning, all these promotion examinations being competitive, is that cripples should have equal place upon eligible lists with strong, healthy men."

The Civil Service Commission, said Mr. Gallagher, would be glad to take any medical records Chief Kenlon or the Fire Department had in connection with promotion tests, but they would be used merely as a help to the Commission's examinations.

"But let Chief Kenlon," said the Commissioner in conclusion, "tell the candidates in the promotion examinations for Fire Captain why he was so interested in Brady as to write the President of the Civil Service Commission in Brady's behalf. And let him also tell them that I said that there wasn't a standard life insurance company that would take him as a risk, and that Brady, even with the backing of the Chief of the Fire Department, was no better and no more entitled to favor than the humblest candidate in the examination."

SPECIAL SESSION ENDS.

Regular Meeting of Congress To-morrow—Senate Lingers Till Then.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 29.—The longest continuous extraordinary session in the history of Congress practically ended to-night and the regular session will begin at noon next Monday.

Democratic leaders, acting in concert with President Wilson, would not permit an actual finish to be written to the special session, although the House adjourned finally. The Senate will meet again at 10 o'clock on Monday and adjournment will not formally come until a few minutes before the time for the regular session to convene.

Two great projects have held the attention of Congress and the country throughout the unprecedented work of the year. One of these, tariff revision, crystalized into law in September. The other, currency reform, is still the chief subject of legislative interest, and will remain so until disposed of in the regular session.

BEET SUGAR HEAD TO QUIT.

Reported That Havemeyer Will Succeed Morey in Great Western.

Special to The New York Times.

DENVER, Nov. 29.—Chester S. Morey, who is credited with being the founder of the beet sugar industry in Colorado, has decided to resign as president of the Great Western Sugar Company, according to report. It is expected that the resignation will be acted upon at the annual meeting at Plainfield, N. J., next month. It is reported that Horace Havemeyer, executor of the estate of H. O. Havemeyer, of the American Sugar Refining Company, will be chosen president.

Mr. Morey is said to intend to retire from business. He organized the Great Western Company, which has a capitalization of $30,000,000, and owns nine large plants in Colorado, Nebraska and Montana.

Teas at Women's Trade League.

The officers of the Women's Trade Union League gave the first of a series of Saturday afternoon teas at the headquarters of the league, 43 East Twenty-second Street, yesterday for the purpose of bringing the unions closer together and exchanging views and experience. The afternoon teas are to be held every Saturday from 2 to 5 P. M. and members of men's unions may attend them. They have been held as an experiment for four or five weeks, and yesterday it was decided to hold them regularly.

SCHENECTADY STRIKE OVER

Compromise Settles the General Electric Walkout.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y., Nov. 29.—The strike at the General Electric plant ended to-day. At a meeting between representatives of the company and the unions and Mayor Lunn an agreement was reached by which all employes were to return to work. The peace treaty was soon ratified by the Trades Alliance.

Statements were issued by company officials, the press committee of the strikers, and Mayor Lunn expressing satisfaction over the adjustment of differences.

The press committee's statement said the strike had been due largely to a "misunderstanding," expressed pleasure at the company's agreement to take back all employes and not discriminate against them on account of any part they had taken in the strike, and advising all of the men to report to their old places on Monday morning.

All of the striking employes, including Frank Dujay and Miss Mabel Leslie, union leaders, whose removal caused the strike, may return to work. Miss Leslie, it is said, will have her old post. Another place will be found for Dujay.

If it is found necessary to put some of the employes on part time, the agreement is that the hours of the out-of-town men shall be reduced first and then those of the single men. This is the plan that was followed in 1907.

The working people feel that credit for the settlement should go to the Mayor and he is the hero of the town.

FREW'S NEW HOME BURNED.

Flames from Costly Structure Illuminate the Preakness Hills.

Special to The New York Times.

PATERSON, N. J., Nov. 29.—A burning house illuminated one of the hills in the Preakness Range, about nine miles from here, last night, and threw a glare over Paterson and the vicinity between 9 o'clock and midnight. The burning building was the newly completed home of H. E. Frew. It was one of the finest of the country places in the Preakness Hills, and is said to have cost more than $100,000. Furniture which is said to be worth nearly as much as the building had been moved in recently.

Only the caretaker was in the building when the fire was discovered. He made his escape, but the blaze gained such headway in a short time that there was no chance to fight the flames. There was no fire department within reach of the place and persons living in the vicinity in country homes which dot the beautiful Preakness range could not get to the fire in time to save any of the household goods. The house was built of stone, and at midnight last night only the walls were standing.

WOMEN LOSE TEST SUIT.

Court Holds That Fire Commissioner Need Not Appoint Them.

Supreme Court Justice Seabury decided yesterday that no woman need be appointed an Inspector in the Bureau of Fire Prevention, no matter what her standing is on the civil service list, unless the Fire Commissioner pleases to appoint her. In other words, the Commissioner has the right of appointing men to all the places if he wants to do so, and is clearly within his rights if he prepares separate lists of applicants, one of the women and the other of the men.

The decision was on the suit of Miss Juliette Arden and five other women interested in the appointments, and in the words of Miss Arden, it was intended as a "test case to decide for all time the right of the Civil Service Commission to advertise an examination as being open to both men and women, requiring the same preparation, the same examination, the same duties, and offering the same salary for both sexes, and then to divide the result into two lists, thus enabling the appointing officer to pass over either list in its entirety if he sees fit to do so."

The suit was directed against Fire Commissioner Johnson in an effort to compel him to appoint a woman when a woman's name came in order on the preferred list.

WM. A. FERGUSON MARRIES.

Progressive Party Committee Secretary Weds Miss Grace Haynes.

The wedding of William Archibald Ferguson of New York and Miss Grace Alice Haynes, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Paine of Bar Harbor, took place yesterday afternoon at 112 East Seventy-first Street. Miss Elizabeth Stanley of Bar Harbor was the maid of honor, and the bridesmaids were the Misses Florence Ferguson, Rosalie Frank, Josephine Auchincloss and Bertha Delehanty. Arthur Lawrence was the best man, and Isaiah P. Haynes, a brother of the bride, C. Vernet Smith, Warren C. Dubois, and Edward N. Abbett were the ushers.

Mr. Ferguson is a lawyer and secretary of the New York County Committee of the National Progressive Party.

RAILWAY CONTROLS OIL CO.

Southern Pacific Interest in Associated Brought Out in Testimony.

SAN FRANCISCO, Nov. 29.—Through W. F. Herrin, as trustee, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company holds 200,685 shares of the 400,000 shares of capital stock of the Associated Oil Company, according to testimony given here to-day by P. G. Williams, Secretary of the oil corporation. Williams said that the railroad had subscribed for $12,104,000 of the $13,685,000 bonds issued by the Associated Oil Company on Jan. 15, 1910.

Williams was testifying in the Government's suit against the railroad in the United States District Court. This suit seeks to recover lands in the Elk Hills (Cal.) oil region.

OPEN DEER SEASON A MERE SLAUGHTER

For Six Days Each Year Massachusetts Provides a Pothunters' Carnival.

DEER AS TAME AS COWS

So-Called Sportsmen Killed 1,571 In Recent Season—About 6,000 Are Left In State.

Special to The New York Times.

SPRINGFIELD, Mass., Nov. 29.—The results of the recent six-day State-wide open season for deer are not wholly satisfactory to a majority of Massachusetts citizens. Plainly speaking, the Massachusetts open deer season, which is participated in by few true sports men, savors strongly of a pothunters' carnival. The degree of skill required to kill a deer, under the conditions the statutes impose, is not greater than that exercised by farmers in the annual hog-killing season.

For a quarter of a century Massachusetts has handled the deer question with strange inconsistency. At the time of the civil war deer were almost unknown in the Bay State. Under the stimulus of perhaps the most rigid protective laws for game ever enforced the few deer remaining began to multiply. In course of time the depredations of deer became so extensive that provision was made to compensate farmers for damage to crops and fruit trees.

At this time the farmer was powerless to protect even the flower gardens in his dooryard. The agriculturist, in fact, bitterly declared that the same courts which permitted him to slay a human being in self-defense stood ready to impose a stiff penalty provided he resisted being gored to death by an angry buck.

About ten years ago deer became so numerous that they frequently strayed into Springfield and other cities. The plate-glass window is a mystery which the deer has never been able to solve. That the fleet-footed animals do not regard it as a barrier is indicated by the fact that they seldom change their course when a show window bars their path. When the inevitable crash occurs, more likely than not the deer will make its exit by breaking through another expanse of plate glass. The list of Western Massachusetts merchants who have suffered loss of this nature is a long one.

Demands for an Open Season.

As deer became increasingly numerous claims fur damages from the agricultural population multiplied. All this time the demands of hunters for an open season for deer had been growing insistent. The number of men not suspected of possessing any abnormal civic instincts, who nevertheless expressed before a legislative committee a willingness to take a week off every Fall to help kill the deer which were making life miserable for the farmer, was legion. Not until the open season had been decided upon did it apparently occur to the lawmakers that one way to help the farmer would be to permit him to protect his own crops.

The first open season, in 1910, attracted hunters from far and wide. In that year, and likewise in 1911 and 1912, the open season was restricted to the five western counties. This year, in response to constant pressure from hunters, the killing of deer throughout the State in the open period was legalized.

Last year about 1,200 deer were killed. This year's total, as announced by the State Fish and Game Commission, is 1,571. Fewer than 200 deer, it is said, were killed in the territory thrown open to hunters for the first time this year. The State Fish and Game Commission places the present number of deer in Massachusetts at less than 6,000. In other well-informed sources this estimate is considered too small. There were no fatalities in the open deer season this year, and only two of the forty persons wounded were seriously injured.

So far as deer are concerned, wounds which permit the maimed animals to wander in hopeless suffering and ultimately to die in some sequestered spot are more unfortunate than those which mercifully kill. The number of disabled deer now roaming Massachusetts forests is said to run into the hundreds. Nevertheless, there will be no change in the attitude of the State Fish and Game Commission relative to the open season, according to one member of that body.

Killed at Baited Springs.

The snuffering of the deer themselves is probably the least considered phase of the question by thousands of citizens who are opposed to a continuance of the open season. The law provides that springs shall not be "baited" with salt; yet it is stated that many deer lost their lives in visiting baited springs. The law also provides that only shotguns shall be used, and to make sure that there is no misunderstanding, prohibits the use of rifles for any purpose during the open deer season.

According to all reports, however, the air was fairly well charged with rifle balls. An Indian Orchard citizen, while taking a bath, heard the whir of a rifle ball close to his head. The bullet buried itself in the woodwork. Frank Gerald, a State Highway Department foreman, while overseeing construction work near Greenfield, was wounded in the shoulder by a rifle ball which undoubtedly was intended for a deer.

In Lee eight hunters filled a single deer with lead and divided the carcass. Wilbraham Mountain residents have long taken pride in a giant buck. A ruthless hunter killed the animal, which weighed nearly 500 pounds. Women joined in the hunting and in several instances brought down deer. Even a 35-pound doe was not spared.

A Ludlow resident, in an open letter, describes deer hunting in that town as follows:

"I saw a crowd of fully twenty-five men, some with guns and some with clubs. I asked them what was up, and they said they knew where there was a deer. I watched them, and very soon a poor little deer, wounded and hardly able to run, came out of the woods, driven by another crowd. They surrounded the poor little fellow, and as he lay on his side they shot and pounded him until he was dead. And then that crowd cheered. I have hunted all my life, but tears came into my eyes and I turned toward home, sick at heart."

The protection accorded deer by Massachusetts laws, with the exception of six days in the year, makes them as tame as barnyard cattle; in fact, it is not uncommon for deer to mingle with cattle in the pastures, nor is it uncommon for hunters to kill heifers under the impression that they are deer. A Hacket hunter relates that he shot at a deer which stood still and permitted him to fire two more shots before it cantered unconcernedly away.

Farmers complain that deer hunters are responsible for far greater damage than the deer, and, moreover, that the farmer has no redress in the matter of damages for which hunters are responsible. The average deer hunter, farmers declare, has no compunction in leveling fences, or even in using them for firewood.

Anticipated Open Season.

A considerable number of hunters took time by the forelock and began banging away at deer on Sunday, a day before the law was off. Wounded deer were seen, painfully limping, by churchgoers in several towns.

City dwellers, outside of the hunters' ranks, oppose the indiscriminate annual slaughter of deer on the joint grounds that the methods of killing are in many instances barbarous, and that inside of five years deer will be extinct in Massachusetts, provided the present rate of killing is maintained. Farmers, though in favor of keeping deer within bounds, are not in favor of laws which, they declare, practically make their land a free game preserve for city hunters.

That the incoming Legislature will be asked to consider a number of changes in the deer laws, more especially in relation to the open season, is a foregone conclusion. There is a growing sentiment in favor of legislation, which, if not permitting owners of land on which deer depredations are committed to take the law into their own hands, will authorize representatives of the State Fish and Game Commission to thin out deer by humane processes in territory in which the animals are obviously too numerous.

It is also suggested that the open season might advantageously be restricted by a provision that a hunter must be a resident of the town in which a deer is killed. Such a restriction, it is asserted, would not be a blow at the privileges of true sportsmen, few of whom engage in deer hunting. The deer hunter, however, is a more convincing talker at legislative hearings than the farmer, and just how much deer legislation of a practical nature is likely to be forthcoming this Winter is open to doubt.

WON'T ASK DEATH PENALTY.

Purpose of State Shown in Choosing Jury to Try Dr. Craig.

Special to The New York Times.

SHELBYVILLE, Ind., Nov. 29.—The trial of Dr. William Craig, charged with the murder of Dr. Helene Knabe of Indianapolis, was adjourned from noon to-day until 9 o'clock Monday morning without completing the selection of a jury. The attorneys for the State, however, said they thought the jury would be completed early Monday.

The examination of talesmen by the State revealed that the prosecution will not ask for the infliction of the death penalty. The State will contend that Dr. Craig killed Dr. Knabe in a violent quarrel over another woman to whom he had been paying attention. The other woman, it is said, lives at Avon. It is understood that the prosecution has no direct evidence against Dr. Craig. All of the evidence is circumstantial. The State expects to produce a witness who will say he saw Dr. Craig peering into the windows of Dr. Knabe's apartment late at night a few hours before the woman was killed.

CLEVELAND, Nov. 9.—A writ of attachment was served this afternoon upon Pavlowa, Russian dancer, at the Colonial Theatre, and scenery and costumes were seized by a Deputy Sheriff. The attachment was made on behalf of Ben H. Atwell of New York on a claim of $7,000, said to be due on money advanced. Bond was furnished and after some delay the matinée performance proceeded. The hearing on the attachment will be held here the coming week.

R. J. COLLIER BOOKS IN LONDON MARKET?

Library of a "Well-Known American Amateur" Will Be Sold at Sotheby's.

AN IZAAK WALTON RARITY

Interesting Autograph Collection of Robert and Elizabeth Barrett Browning Items—Byron Letter.

A choice collection of books, manuscripts, and autograph letters, described as "the property of a well-known American amateur," will be sold at Sotheby's in London on Dec. 10. Many of the books are from the Robert Hoe literary sale in this city. The general belief is that "the well-known American amateur" is Robert J. Collier, who was one of the buyers at the Hoe sale.

Among the rarities is the copy of the first edition of Izaak Walton's "The Compleat Angler," crown octavo, London, 1653, which was knocked down for $3,500 in the A. F. Xavier sale at the Anderson Auction Company's rooms in this city on March 7, 1911. This is the copy described by William Loring Andrews in his "Fysshynge with an Angle," where he says:

"A fine copy with unusually wide margins. Bound in black morocco elaborately tooled, to judge from the style of the decorations by one of the Mearnes."

It was previously sold in 1909 for $5,425. It was a presentation copy to Francis Foster. It is ruled throughout in red lines and contains in Izaak Walton's handwriting Foster's name filled in on Page 3.

There is an important and interesting collection in an album of two autograph manuscripts and seventeen autograph letters of Robert Browning and one autograph manuscript and seventeen autograph letters of Elizabeth Barret Browning. The Robert Browning manuscripts are of his well-known Cavalier ballads, "Marching Along" and "Give a Rouse." Both differ from the printed versions and are probably earlier drafts. Mrs. Browning's manuscript is a copy of one of her husband's poems, "A Face," and has at the end the following note by him:

I wrote the above poem for the album of Mrs. Coventry Patmore (the First Angel of his House) and this copy was made from the rough draught by E. B. B.
ROBERT BROWNING, March 27, 1874.

The most interesting of the letters are those by Mrs. Browning, which range from 1836 to 1859, and are addressed to Talfourd, R. H. Horne, Mrs. Jameson, Cornelius Matthews of New York, and Miss Fanny Hauntt. Writing to Matthews on April 28, 1843, she says of her future husband:

I do assure you I never saw him in my life—do not know him even by correspondence—and yet I am very sensitive to his thousand and one stripes with which the assembly of critics doth expound its vocations over him. The truth is, and the world should know the truth, it is easier to find a more faultless writer than a poet of equal genius. Don't let us fall into the category of the sons of Noah. Noah was once drunk indeed but once he built the ark.

Mrs. Browning and Her Work.

The two other letters to Matthews and a long letter to Horne are full of interesting talk about contemporary poets and the writer's own work. The letter to Talfourd thanks him for sending her a copy of his tragedy "Ion." The four letters to Mrs. Jameson, all dating from 1858-59, contain interesting references to the Brownings' friends in Rome and Florence, and show her passionate sympathy for the cause of Italian freedom. None of these four letters is included in Mrs. Browning's published letters. In a long early letter to Mr. Kenyon, also unpublished, she speaks of her two poems, "The Seraphim" and "Prometheus."

Robert Browning's letters include one to Poe about contributing to "Once a Week," dated Jan. 17, 1860. In later letters he refers to several of his poems by name, e. g., "Hervé Riel," and "Home Thoughts from Abroad," as to which he curiously enough makes a mistake, for the poem he means is "Home Thoughts from the Sea." In the same letter, which is addressed to his uncle, Reuben Browning, he alludes to his son's first portrait of him, painted in 1874, as "the best, as far as likeness is concerned, that was ever taken of me." Other interesting letters are addressed to Lord Leighton and to Mrs. Jameson, the latter of which concludes with a eulogy of Correggio:

At which of the Colnaghis can one see the Correggio you spoke of one evening at Carlyle's? I am just now hungry for his pictures, and mean, whenever I am sore at heart, to go and get well before the great cupola at—but why not versify, since that, or something like it, is my trade:

Could I, heart-broken, reach his place of birth,
And stand before his Pictures—could I chuse
But own at once the sovereign'st thing on earth
In Parma City for an inward bruise.

A copy of the rare first Kilmarnock edition of Robert Burns's "Poems" has his lines of an autograph manuscript of the "Twa Dogs" inlaid and inserted in that poem. Other lots contain parts of Burns's songs supposed to have been sent by him to Thompson for his musical work, and manuscript songs sent to William Stewart, Factor, Closeburn Castle.

There is also a first edition of Robert Burton's famous work, "The Anatomy of Melancholy," thick, small quarto, oxford, 1621. Among the Lord Byron items is the following autograph letter, dated Venice, Nov. 18, 1816, and addressed to Capt. Hay, Long's Hotel, Bond Street, London. "Angeiterre Inglishterra":

Dear Hay: This city is a mystery which I mean to unravel at leisure, for it is my intention to remain at Venice during the Winter. I have got some very good apartments in the house of a mercante, whose donna teaches us the Venetian dialect, so sweet and naive in the mouth of a woman. The Italian has nothing of the whimicalities of the French language. My reading is confined to Goldoni, whose men of mind I like. A Plautus, a Terence, and a Moliere are said to have formed his whole library, but the world and mankind and womankind were his chief study.

From that inexhaustible mine his keen and experienced penetration readily embellished his compositions with characters ever real with all the light gradations which passions throw on every character, and with very striking situations yet as natural with those which are perpetually springing up amidst the world, but, not being taken notice of, expira in the birth. It is of this kind of writing that Pascal says "the more wit one has the more originals one finds among meo, whereas your common people discern no difference between men." Goldoni is fertile, simple, and various as nature itself.

When tired of studying Italian in type I learn it by way of divertisement through the medium of the lips and eyes of Venetian women, who, as in the time of Paul Veronese, are still the handsomest and finest shaped of the petticoated tribe in Italy. By the Mars! they are sublime. I am speaking of the middle class, those of the highest orders are generally as ugly as Virtue. Living under the Pascal patronage of St. Mark I go out frequently and am in very good contentment. I do as the Venetians do; nay, I do more, for I take daily exercise on horseback.

Besides Nero's horses, now hoisted up over the front of St. Mark's, my own are the only quadrupeds in this place. Was it disdain or aversion to horses that the Venetians, who are but indifferent horsemen, did not pick out a better place for these animals? If you find England very dull, or which I have no doubt whatsoever, pack up your valise and cross the Alps. You may be sure of being welcome. Believe me, ever yours very truly,

BYRON.

Campion First Edition.

An excessively rare first edition is Thomas Campion's "Description of a Maske presented before the Kinges Majestie at White-Hall on Twelfth Night last in honour of the Lord Hayes and his Bride, Daughter and Heire to the Honourable the Lord Dennye, their Marriage having been the same day at Court Solemnized."

Mark Twain is represented by the manuscript of his famous romance, "A Yankee at the Court of King Arthur," which he is said to have considered his greatest work. There is a first edition of De Foe's "Robinson Crusoe." Thomas De Quincey is represented by an autograph manuscript and an autograph letter.

An item of special interest to American collectors is Nathaniel Hawthorne's copy of a "History of the Indian Wars," published at Rochester, N. Y., in 1828. It has his full autograph signature written in different parts of the book and in various forms. It is apparently the copy which was in the Van Antwerp sale some years ago.

There are ninety autograph letters of Dr. Samuel Johnson, one of them written when he was in great trouble; his wife was dying and lived only three weeks longer. The letters are addressed to John Levett, one of Johnson's earliest friends in Lichfield. Among the Scottish items is the famous James III manuscript, 137 quarto pages of "The School for Scandal." While in the hands of Fairburn the bookbinder, to whom it was intrusted by Sir George Chetwynd in 1834 for binding, the manuscript narrowly escaped destruction by fire. A few leaves of the first pages are slightly scorched at the edges.

Algernon C. Swinburne is represented by the original autograph manuscript of his "Ode on the Proclamation of the French Republic." There are also interesting books or autographs of William H. Ainsworth, Sir Walter Scott, Beaumont and Fletcher, the dramatists; James Boswell, George Chapman, Chaucer, Dante, Dryden, Fenelon, Oliver Goldsmith, Thomas Gray, Charles Lamb, Edmund Spenser, Robert L. Stevenson, Whistler, and Walt Whitman.

There are early editions of John Milton and William Shakespeare.

Al Woods Gets "The Guilty Man."

"The Guilty Man," the play which is to be given at a matinee by the Sociological Fund of the Medical Review of Reviews, is not to end its existence with that performance. Al Woods has obtained the rights to the play and immediately after the performance, which will take place late in December at the Lyric Theatre, "The Guilty Man" will be offered to the public. John Mason is to be starred in the play by Woods, arrangements having been made with Charles Frohman for his services. Mason will appear in the initial performance of the play.

EDISON WILL AID 5-CENT BUS LINE

Inventor Writes That He Will Gladly Appear Before the Board of Estimate.

SAYS ELECTRICITY IS BEST

Ready to Dispute Fifth Avenue Coach Company, Which Is Opposing Franchise.

Thomas A. Edison has notified the Franchise Committee of the Board of Estimate that he is ready to appear before it, in support of the application for a franchise of the Five-Cent Bus Line, at any time the committee may select.

The controversy over the granting of motor bus franchises in the city has taken on the aspect of a fight over the comparative merits of the gasoline buses operated by the present Fifth Avenue Coach Company and the electric machines which the 5-cent line proposes to use, and it is presumed that it is on this side of the question that the inventor is interested. In his letter to the committee Mr. Edison expresses the belief that for traction in cities the electric motor will soon displace all other forms of motive power, as it has already displaced them on the elevated roads and surface lines.

"If buses are desirable for intercity traffic," Mr. Edison wrote, "the electric one is the only practicable one. It is noiseless, odorless, and can be stopped and started quicker than the gasoline vehicle, and is also more economic in operation."

The Fifth Avenue Coach Company in addition to disputing the mechanical and economic possibilities of electrically driven motor buses, is opposing the application of the Five-Cent Bus Line on the ground that it would be unwise for the city to set up competition in buses plying on the crowded streets of New York.

CASH REGISTER MEN APPEAL

Patterson and Others Fight Conviction Under Trust Law.

CINCINNATI, Nov. 29.—John H. Patterson, President, and twenty-eight present or former officials of the National Cash Register Company of Dayton, Ohio, who were convicted last year of violating the criminal section of the Sherman Anti-Trust law, filed an appeal in the United States District Court of Appeals here to-day.

The petition alleges that during the trial of the case 393 errors were made, and the application is based on each one of these. Hundreds of the exhibits shown during the trial accompanied the appeal.

Patterson was sentenced to one year in jail and fined $5,000. A number of his friends tried to obtain a pardon for him, but he said that he desired none, as he had been guilty of no wrongdoing, and preferred to obtain vindication in the courts.

Lesser sentences were passed on the majority of the other defendants.

Judge Hollister, at the trial, refused to admit as evidence all matter pertaining to patents held by the National Cash Register Company, and this ruling was the principal objection made in the appeal.

Miss Lester Had Saved That Sum from Her Salary.

Miss Ordelia Amanda Lester, a public school teacher, who died on Feb. 6, 1912, left a net estate of $10,041.44, as shown by the appraisal that was made public yesterday. Miss Lester saved this amount from her earnings. Her possessions consisted partly of $3,000 in the Title Guarantee and Trust Company and mortgages of $2,500 on property at Seventh Avenue and Seventh Street, and $1,800 on property at Throop Avenue near Quincy Street, Brooklyn. When she died she had in savings banks $2,559.51.

Possessions that were called of no value by the appraiser consisted of thirty-seven volumes of school books, all of them out of date, but from which she evidently learned her first lessons or which were used in teaching lessons to her first pupils, and many photographs and pictures.

H.R.Hardwick, Harvard Star, to Wed

BOSTON, Nov. 29.—Huntington R. Hardwick, the Harvard strong man and a star of recent crimson football and baseball teams, is engaged to be married to Miss Margaret Stone of Brookline, it was announced to-night. The date of the wedding has not been set. Miss Ston is the daughter of Galen Galen L. Stone, a Boston banker.

"THE COWARDLY DOLLAR."

Marshall Says Bankers Are Anxious for a Law to Correct It.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 29.—Refreshed by a vacation in Arizona, Vice President Marshall returned to Washington to-night ready for the severe grind of the opening weeks of the new session of Congress.

"Bankers I know and on whose opinions I rely want corrective currency legislation as soon as possible," said Mr. Marshall. "They believe no time should be lost in passing legislation that will give the people more confidence in their banking system and that will open the way for the average man to have equal opportunity with every other man in the use of capital and credit.

"I have no criticism of the American dollar for the luxury or comfort that may honestly be gotten from it. My criticism is of the bluff and cowardice in the dollar. When a time of money stringency comes the banks call in the money they have loaned, because they fear they will have to pay the money they have borrowed from their depositors.

"The whole country should and will welcome a speedy reinforcement of the currency system that will effectually take this cowardice out of the dollar and make it a thing to be depended upon in time of stress."

NEW HAVEN MERGER SUIT?

Boston Hears Rumors of Action, but Washington Denies It.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Nov. 29.—It was asserted in some quarters yesterday that Attorney General McReynolds was about to take drastic action regarding the New England Railroad situation, and that two suits aimed at the Boston & Maine-New Haven merger and the Boston & Maine lease of the Fitchburg soon would be filed.

It also was said that within a few weeks the partnership made under Mr. Mellen in the Boston & Albany Railroad would be no more. It is understood that the New Haven has perfected plans whereby its agreement with the New York Central to share equally in its operating results from the leased road will terminate.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 29.—There is good authority for the statement that Attorney General McReynolds, who is in New York, has not decided on any aggressive step regarding the New Haven-Boston & Maine merger. As recently as yesterday this statement was made. Some wonder was expressed at the deliberation with which the matter had been pressed by interested persons and the impression was conveyed that nothing would be done in the immediate future.

PULLS WOMAN FROM RIVER.

Ramsey Dived When He Heard Her Cry as She Fell In.

John Ramsey, a laborer, of 657 Water Street, was standing near the pier at Jefferson Street and the East River at 10 o'clock last night when he heard a cry from the end of the dock and a splash. He got to the pier just in time to see a woman struggling in the water. Without hesitating he dived and grabbed her.

James McCarthy, a deck hand, was in a rowboat about forty feet from the pier at the time, and he rowed to the spot where Ramsey was trying to keep the woman above water. He threw a rope to Ramsey and pulled him and the woman to the boat, and then towed them to the pier.

An ambulance took the woman to Gouverneur Hospital and up to a late hour last night she was still unconscious. She is about 40 years old, weighs 140 pounds, has dark hair, eyes, and complexion. She wore a black waist and skirt and black shoes and stockings. The police say she was sitting on the string piece of the pier when she fell into the water.

GETS GAINSBOROUGH PORTRAIT FOR $1,700

H. Y. Rosenberg Pays That Sum for "Squire Hallett" at the Kneeland Sale.

REMBRANDT GOES FOR $650

A Total of $12,447 Realized at Two Days' Sale of Old and New Masters.

The concluding sale of the pictures of Gen. Stillman F. Kneeland and other collectors at the Fifth Avenue Art Galleries last evening brought $8,184, making a total for the two evenings of $12,447. A large buyer was H. Y. Rosenberg, who paid $1,700 for the beautiful Gainsborough portrait of "Squire Hallett," $300 for "Lady Hallett," by the same artist; $340 for the Harlow "Lady Euston," $200 for the portrait of the "Comtesse d'Arches," by Robert Fournieres; $150 for the pretty little Wyant, "Morning Lanscape," $100 for an Inness landscape, and $310 for Baron Gerard's "Louis Philippe."

The small Rembrandt "Portrait of a Man," which had attracted much attention, went to G. A. Gage for $650. A "View of Hampton Court Bridge," by S Scott, was withdrawn for want of a satisfactory bid. A woman buyer, whose name was not given, paid $350 for Sir Joshua Reynolds's "Lady Donoughmore," and the same buyer paid $300 for Frederic Edes's "The River Loise."

A marine, "Coast of Wales," went to Arnold for $230; Prinz Bros., Brooklyn, paid $110 for "After the Hunt," by Lesrel, and the Whistler "Venice at Night" sold for $210, going to Wilkins. A nice little interior by Portielje brought $105; "On Guard," by Delort, $100, and two pictures by Berne Bellecour, "A Marine Guard" and "Staff Officer," went to Powers for $110 each. "The Violinist," by Lesrel, brought $130, and two exquisitely painted little pictures "Jealousy" and "Caught," artist unknown, brought $150 for the pair. "The Wounded Officer," by Beauquesne, went to Dr. Givens for $100, and a small Daubigny landscape brought $100. The three big pictures, 114 by 182, "The Maine in Havana Harbor," "The Blowing Up of the Maine," and a "Submarine View of the Wreck," went to J Tacker for $50 each.

TUXEDO YACHTSMEN DINE.

Lewis S. Chanler the Winner of Commodore F. DeP. Foster's Cup.

Special to The New York Times.

TUXEDO PARK, N. Y., Nov. 29.—Frederic De Puyster Foster gave a dinner to the members of Tuxedo Lake Yacht Club at Tuxedo Club to-night. The racing season closed two weeks ago and the Commodore's Cup, presented by Mr. Foster, was won by Lewis Stuyvesant Chanler. J. Frederic Tams was the winner of second prize.

About fifteen members attended the dinner to-night, including the officers, who are: Commodore, F. DeP. Foster; Vice Commodore, J. Philip Benkard; Secretary, Pierre Lorillard, Jr.; Treasurer, Grenville Kane; Preston Davie, Frederick O. Spedden, Amos T. French, William Gordon Fellows, Newbold Edgar, Newell W. Tilton, Frank B. Keech, and Eben Richards.

Each member was presented with a souvenir showing the season's results. The special prize presented by J. F. Tams and Frederick O. Spedden for the highest average during the year was won by F. DeP. Foster. The winners of monthly cups were: May, J. F. Tams; June, L. S. Chanler; July, J. F. Tams; August, Preston Davie; September, L. S. Chanler; October, J. P. Benkard.

The Tuxedo Club had its usual weekend dance to-night, which was preceded by many large dinners. In spite of the inclement weather a large crowd came out for the weekend.

RAT HALTS SEVEN TRAINS.

Eats Insulation Off an Electric Cable, Stopping P. R. R. Signals.

Special to The New York Times.

WILMINGTON, Del., Nov. 29.—Three passenger express trains and four fast freight trains were held up yesterday by a rat for considerably over half an hour on the Pennsylvania main line at Moore's Station, Penn., between this city and Philadelphia. The rodent had eaten the insulation off a large cable containing wires that are an important factor in the operation of electric signals. This caused a "grounding" of the wires, with the result that the signals were put out of business.

The trouble was first discovered by the engineer of an express train. The signal at Moore gave him a "clear indication," whereas he knew another train was but a short distance ahead. Rather than take chances he stopped the train. Then other signals at that place began to act queerly. An attaché known as a signal maintainer, stationed at a near-by interlocking tower, began a hurried investigaton as other trains arrived and were held up.

Matters were becoming serious, the entire line being affected, until the trouble was discovered. The insulation had been eaten off for fully five inches. The difficulty was remedied by installing new insulation.

Hebrew Technical School Benefit.

A special matinée of "Hop o' My Thumb" will be given at the Manhattan Opera House on Dec. 29 in aid of the Hebrew Technical School for Girls, Second Avenue and Fifteenth Street. The school is attended by 535 pupils daily, the annual cost of maintenance being $54,000 against a membership income of $34,000. The 1889 graduates earn annually $1,123,460. Mrs. Nathaniel Myers of 135 Central Park West is Chairman and has tickets for the theatre for disposal.

NEW STORE, 1448 Broadway, S. E. Cor. 41st.

Sub. to Times Sq. Downtown store discontinued.

During the 56 years we have been established we never bought diamonds through regular trade channels. We are known to buy loose diamonds from dealers who are pressed for ready cash at our own price and mount them into the finest platinum designs at our own factory.

This enables us to sell to our patrons for much less than charged elsewhere.

At our new location we continue to sell at the same low prices for which our name is famous.

Pay us a visit and be convinced of the truth of our statements.

Everybody is moving uptown, so we came along with the tide.

We quote below just a few specials from our enormous Xmas stock.

Diamond Lavalliere, a mass of glittering blue-white diamonds of the finest quality, 5 karats, set in platinum; would cost elsewhere $400; our price..... $275

SIEBRECHT DIVORCE REVERSED ON APPEAL

Appellate Division Rejects Evidence of Woman Peeper on Which It Was Granted.

MRS. MINER IS VINDICATED

Testimony That Siebrecht Kissed Her Shown to Have Been Based on Malice.

The Appellate Division of the Supreme Court in Brooklyn has reversed on appeal a decree of absolute divorce obtained by Mrs. Julia W. A. Siebrecht from Henry A. Siebrecht, Jr., member of the firm of Siebrecht & Son, wholesale florists and owners of the Siebrecht Building, at 425 Fifth Avenue. The decision was made public yesterday, and it not only clears the defendant of the charges made by his wife, but vindicates Mrs. Francescina Miner of New Rochelle, who was named as co-respondent.

Mr. and Mrs. Siebrecht and Mrs. Miner and her husband, Frank W. Miner, who is connected with the Gorham Company, at Fifth Avenue and Thirty-sixth Street, were friends for many years, and the incidents on which Mrs. Siebrecht based her suit were alleged to have taken place in the Summer of 1907 at Hawleyville, Conn., where the two families were accustomed to pass their vacations. It was the proprietress of the Summer home, Mrs. Thurza Tucker, the most important of twenty-two witnesses for the plaintiff, who testified that while gazing through a hole in the attic floor of the farmhouse, she had seen Siebrecht kiss Mrs. Miner. In the record of the case on appeal, Mrs. Tucker was referred to as the "stovepipe hole peeper."

Both families resided in New Rochelle. The Siebrechts lived on North Avenue and the Miners on Park Place. Since the divorce was granted by Justice Mills in White Plains on Aug. 5, 1912, the Miners have continued to reside together. Mrs. Siebrecht, who was a Miss Acker and a granddaughter of one of the founders of the firm of Acker, Merrall & Condit, got the custody of two of her four children with alimony of $250 a month.

Siebrecht's attorney, John M. Gardner of 141 Broadway, made his strongest appeal before the Appellate Division for the vindication of the name of Mrs. Miner. Referring to the testimony of Mrs. Tucker, the attorney told the Appellate Division:

"Thurza Tucker, the so-called 'stovepipe hole witness,' is shown to have been inflamed with bias, growing out of a personal quarrel between herself and the co-respondent years ago. Besides the physical conditions under which she made the alleged observations on her own statement convict her of deliberate perjury concerning the vital fact in the case, while her many contradictions and most improbable statements thoroughly impeach her and show her to be an unreliable and revengeful witness."

Concerning the weight of evidence necessary to decide a divorce case beyond doubt, and the careful scrutiny of the facts and evidence to command the confidence of a careful, prudent, and cautious Judge, the attorney added this appeal in behalf of Mrs. Miner:

"Guided by this standard of judicial exaction and protection we invoke the most careful attention to and scrutiny by this court of the evidence upon which the judgment on appeal was based. We make this request not only in behalf of the defendant herein, my client, and his entire family, but in the interest of an honored mother, daughter, and wife, whose whole family and her numerous friends champion her cause, and whom we and they believe to be the victim of a criminal conspiracy, and against whom the decision of the learned court below has been accomplished by manufactured and biased testimony.

"In making this request, we believe that, had the court below possessed the advantage which a more analytical examination of the evidence now presents in a printed record, which counsel for the defendant is able herewith to present, the result would have been different."

The testimony which the higher court repudiates in its decision and on which the divorce decree mainly rests, includes that of Mrs. Tucker, describing the departure for Manhattan of Mr. Miner and Mrs. Siebrecht one day in August, 1907, in these words:

"After Mr. Siebrecht drove Mrs. Siebrecht and Mr. Miner to the station he came back and hitched the horse to a tree in front of the house. While he was hitching the horse to the tree I went up in the attic of the house to make sure there was nothing wrong. Mrs. Miner came up stairs while I was in the attic. While in the attic I looked through the stovepipe hole (an opening through the floor to the room below) and saw Mrs. Miner, Mr. Siebrecht came up stairs. I saw him kiss Mrs. Miner."

By several architects it was shown on the appeal of the case that it would have been physically impossible for any one in the attic, looking through the six-inch stovepipe hole, to have seen what Mrs. Tucker said she had witnessed in the room beneath. It was also shown that the door to this room was open and the place in full view of all the guests of the house and members of the two families, some of whom were passing by or through the room in which Mrs. Miner and Siebrecht were said to have been at the time of the "stovepipe peeping."

Most of the other witnesses were discharged maids and servants of Mr. and Mrs. Miner, and their testimony had little bearing on the case. According to the attorney for the defense, the decision cannot be appealed to the Court of Appeals.

Season's First Thin Ice Victims.

LEWISTON, Me., Nov. 29.—The season's first thin-ice victim in Maine was Clarence R. Fish, 24, Principal of the Flagstaff High School, who was drowned while skating at Flagstaff to-day. Walter Eames, a companion, broke through, but was rescued.

GARDNER, Mass., Nov. 29.—John Best, 13, was the first thin-ice victim in Massachusetts this season. He ventured on skates over a light skimming of ice on Parker's Pond yesterday, broke through, and was drowned.

SILK STRIKE CHECKED.

Ribbon Weavers Only Employes Likely to Go Out.

Special to The New York Times.

PATERSON, N. J., Nov. 29.—It is thought that only the ribbon weavers, to the number of about 5,000, will go on strike on Monday morning for a nine-hour day. The mass meeting of dyers called for to-day was a flat failure, nine dyers out of the 7,000 in the city attending. The broad silk weavers have not agreed to strike, though they have agreed to help finance the ribbon weavers if they go out. The plan is to have the ribbon weavers report for work on Monday morning and leave their looms at 5 o'clock in the afternoon after a nine-hour day. On Tuesday morning they will again report for work, and if the manufacturers lock them out they will then declare a strike.

The manufacturers say they positively will not grant any nine-hour demands made by the I. W. W. Some of the manufacturers have said they would let the men work nine hours a day, but at the end of the week they would dock their wages six hours. It is expected that about 5,000 of the ribbon weavers will go on strike; this will throw about 5,000 more dependent workers out of employment. Though the I. W. W. agitators and leaders insist there will be a big strike, it is hardly probable from the turn matters took to-day.

COPPER STRIKE NEAR END.

Believed That Eight-Hour Law May Settle Miners' Troubles.

CALUMET, Mich., Nov. 29.—It is believed that the introduction of an eight-hour working day for mine, mill and smelter workers, on Dec. 1, will cause a break in the ranks of copper mine strikers. Early in the strike the mine managers promised Gov. Ferris that an eight-hour day would be in effect by Jan. 1, 1914, and at a meeting yesterday it was agreed the plan should go into operation Monday at all except a few shafts of the Calumet & Hecla. In these shafts the men work on contract basis, and experiments will be made to determine the best manner of applying the shorter shift.

Another announcement made by mine managers is that they will devote Tuesday afternoon of each week to hearing and adjusting complaints and grievances of employes.

NO PAY FOR CONSTABLES.

Sheriff's Orders Refused in Hudson County Controversy.

Thirty-five constables employed at the Hudson County Court House, Jersey City, were not paid yesterday. The trouble arose over a recent ruling of the Civil Service Commission that these officials are subject to the Civil Service act, and that their payroll must first be certified by the commission. Sheriff Wedin has refused to accept the ruling as law and failed to send the payroll for certification as required.

County Collector Rider, acting, it is said, upon legal advice, refused to cash any warrants issued by the Sheriff until the latter has complied with the ruling of the Civil Service Commission. Wedin says that his counsel, Joseph M. Noonan, will test the matter in the courts for him. This will take several months, and in the meantime the constables are wondering how they are going to live.

COMPLAINT WAS VERBOSE.

School Teacher's Suit Against Mining Stock Promoter Halts.

Special to The New York Times.

TRENTON, Nov. 29.—Without going into the merits of the case, the Supreme Court dismissed to-day as verbose and incorrectly drawn the complaint filed by Miss Emma A. McCoy, a New Brunswick school teacher. She had sued Arthur W. Milbury of Hoboken for $5,000, alleging he induced her to invest in worthless mining stock.

Miss McCoy has been a teacher for twenty-three years. She says she became acquainted with Milbury in 1900, when he was aiding Miss Elizabeth A. Allen in promoting the teachers' retirement fund. Seven years later she received letters signed by Milbury and Allan Benedict, then a Congressman, and urging her to buy the stock. Milbury, she declares, represented that he had personally invested $80,000, and that Miss Allen had invested $5,000.

INQUIRY ON RUSSELL DEATH.

"Dakota Dan," Who Fought for Estate, Demands an Investigation.

MELROSE, Mass., Nov. 29.—William C. Russell, son of the late Daniel Russell, and one of the central figures in the famous Russell will case, died at the family homestead to-day. He was about 65 years old.

Mr. Russell supposed himself to be sole heir to the half million dollar estate of his father until about four years ago, when a man from Dickinson, N. D., known as Daniel Blake Russell, or more familiarly as "Dakota Dan," set up a claim as a long lost son of the testator.

Later a man from Fresno, Cal., called. "Fresno Dan," was recognized by the Russell family as the missing heir, and the courts sustained his claim after three years of litigation.

"Dakota Dan" mailed to the medical examiner to-night a demand for an investigation of the death of William Russell, in view, the letter said, "of many rumors circulated as to the causes." His attorney sent a similar request to District Attorney Higgins.

BURIED UNDER PASTRY.

Mill Girls in Their Haste Upset Pie Cart and Got Up Crusty.

When a heavily-laden Elmhurst bakery wagon drew up yesterday afternoon before Jacobson's silk mill on Montgomery Avenue in Corona and the girls of the mill swarmed out to make their selection from the cakes and pies and bread, four of them climbed onto the hubs in their hurry and their combined weight was enough to overturn the wagon, so that they were buried beneath it and an avalanche of pastry.

All four were bruised and one girl, Marie Schilling of 157 Kingsland Avenue, Greenpoint, had her nose broken.

FINDS GEN. ZELAYA BROKEN IN SPIRIT

Visitor to Deposed President in the Tombs Says Nicaraguan Has Been Maligned.

PRISONER SEES FAMILY

Gives His Legion of Honor Button to His Son So as "Not to Disgrace France."

Gen. José Santos Zelaya, the deposed President of Nicaragua, who is held in the Tombs on behalf of the Nicaraguan authorities, who seek his extradition for murder, sent for his son Horatio yesterday and turned over to him the Legion of Honor button which was in his coat lapel when he was arrested. Gen. Zelaya asked his son to care for the decoration until he was released, as he said he did not want to disgrace the French republic by wearing its decoration in prison.

When he visited the Tombs Horatio Zelaya was accompanied by his younger brother, C. Alfonso Zelaya, and his Nephew, Robert Lee Zelaya, who is 5 years old. The visitors stayed with Gen. Zelaya for more than an hour. Gen. Zelaya's sons found their father in a cell in the part of the prison where men charged with murder are detained. The cell of Hans Schmidt, accused of killing Anna Aumuller, was only a short distance away.

Horatio Zelaya told his father, it was said, that on Monday United States District Judge Holt would rule upon the writ of habeas corpus which was sued out before him on Friday. Gen. Zalaya had hoped that President Wilson and Secretary of State Bryan would take the case out of the hands of the State Department officials, but the General's sons could bring him no assurance that the President or Mr. Bryan would interfere. The disposition in Washington, according to private dispatches to Horatio Zelaya was to wait for the outcome of the habeas corpus proceedings before making the next move. Mrs. C. Alfonso Zelaya joined her husband and brother-in-law while they were with Gen. Zelaya in the Tombs.

"It is too bad," she said, as she departed, "that a sensitive, refined man like my father-in-law should be cast into a prison merely because political enemies that the United States marines keep in power in Nicaragua, against the wishes of the whole country, wish to get him into their hands. I hope for our own country—since the United States is my own country—that we may not come to be a small power instead of the big, overshadowing power that we are now. I hope this because I would not like to think of our own citizens being humbled as the United States is now humbling Gen. Zelaya after another great nation has made him a member of its Legion of Honor."

In addition to the members of his family, the only visitor Gen. Zelaya saw yesterday was a graduate of Yale University who was for eight years a mining engineer in Nicaragua. This visitor, who asked that his name be withheld, because he would soon visit Nicaragua, had come to offer his services to Gen. Zelaya.

"I never saw a man so changed," he said. "When I saw him last before my visit to his Tombs cell it was in his palace in the Nicaraguan capital. There the courtiers were all around him. His rooms were furnished magnificently in native mahogany. Machine guns were the portico decorations, and soldiers and guards stood on duty at the entrances. He seemed a very dashing figure, full of life and vim. Now I find him broken and old and sad. His spirit has left him. I am certain he seeks to start no revolution. He told me he merely wanted a place to live and be at peace with the world.

"The American people have been wickedly deceived about Zelaya," his visitor continued, "for he never was the hard-hearted despot and murderer he has been pictured to us. He used Americans well if they were in the country legitimately. I notice some of the papers speak of his great wealth. In my own case I located mineral mines and he backed my mining enterprise as a personal venture on his own account for many thousands of dollars. He got it all back and 100 per cent. besides. But there was no quarrel about it.

"He was an intelligent man and very often he displaced native administrators with Americans of proved ability. Mr. Knox sent him a rude ultimatum about a certain Emery lumber claim. An intimate friend of mine, an American, and a college graduate, was the authority upon whose report Gen. Zelaya replied to cancel the concession which Mr. Knox pressed back upon Zelaya with an ultimatum.

"The American concession holders owning the Emery claim were supposed to plant two young trees for each mature tree they dug up, and were supposed to import duty free, only machinery for their own use. My friend told me the whole situation when he made the examination for Gen. Zelaya. And a little later on another pretext intervened. I knew both Cannon and Groce. They were roustabout characters, and Groce was perhaps the most shiftless foreigner in Nicaragua. I have talked to the widow of one of these men and heard her own version of his death. We all were at a loss to account for the action of Mr. Knox, because we understood what drew the two men into the army of J. J. Estrada.

"I was in Zelaya's palace talking to him when the message came from Mr. Knox telling him he must quit the Presidency or be driven from power. He turned the Government over to Dr José Madriz, who was the most distinguished citizen of any Central American State and President of the Central American Peace Conference. How it came that he was distasteful to Mr. Knox while acceptable as President of the Peace Conference, was a mystery we who were in Nicaragua could not fathom. Yet Mr. Knox would have no more to do with him than with Zelaya. He went away to Mexico and died in sorrow over the plight of his country.

"I agree with the members of President Zelaya's family that Gen. Zelaya's life will be worth hardly anything if he is turned over to the present Government in Nicaragua. President Alfonso Dias has close affiliations with President Cabrera of Guatemala, who is the most bitter enemy Gen. Zelaya has ever had. Alliances reaching from these two men to men conspicuous in American commercial concerns and in politics are generally understood in Central America to be responsible for much of the diplomatic action on the part of this country."

Gen. Zelaya, according to the present plan, will be taken from the Tombs to the Federal Building on Monday morning for a hearing before United States District Judge Holt on his writ of habeas corpus. If the writ is dismissed he will be taken before Commissioner Shields in the afternoon, and will probably be held without bail to await the arrival of extradition papers from Nicaragua.

Taft's Son to Take Law Examination

COLUMBUS, Ohio, Nov. 29.—Robert Alphonso Taft, son of former President Taft, is one of about one hundred applicants who will take the examination for license to practice law in the courts of Ohio before the Law Examiners' Board, which will convene next Tuesday. Dean Thayer of Harvard University, where young Taft graduated, signed the certificate showing that the applicant was a proper person to undertake the examination.

Why the Christmas Season Really Begins Tomorrow at GIMBELS

once heard of a little girl who was very sad because her birthday was on Christmas, he conceived the unique idea of giving her his birthday. By so doing he gave her a joy that no one else had ever thought of giving her, for thereafter she had a real Christmas celebration, and one on her birthday, too.

This little incident of thoughtfulness suggested to us that we might name a day—hitherto uncalendared—when the Christmas season should begin.

The Deed of Dedication

Whereas, GIMBELS has given to New York The Store of a Million Gifts:

Whereas, kind-hearted people are eager to commence their Christmas shopping so that the strenuous last-minute burden might be lifted from the shoulders of salespeople;

Whereas, early selection is most pleasing, because Yuletide gift stocks are now complete—having just arrived from the four corners of the earth;

And, whereas, there are only 21 shopping days until Christmas;

Now, therefore, we do hereby name Monday, December First,

The Opening Day of the Christmas Season

And tender the resources of this store to the people of New York, and all of these United States.

Among the Holiday Showings of Gimbel Comfortables & Blankets

There is a great deal of beauty, some of which you may embody in a gift expressing fully the Christmas sentiment.

Silk Top Comfortables at $7.50

These are all wool filled, with plain border, balancing the Dresden design covers; soft tones, among which are pink, blue, heliotrope and yellow.

White Woolen Blankets, $5.75 a Pair

In attractive gift boxes, tied with huge ribbon bow; complete, even to the Christmas card.

Tres Chic! This Velvet Turban which Introduces Quite Different Lines At $12.75

When one looks at it from the left side, it seems to have an upturned brim, from another angle it is apparently draped—and that is what it really is, for it is the creation of a Paris modiste who is an artist in the draping of velvet.

The women who adopt this chapeau will have the distinction of wearing a very unique mode. We very nearly forgot to say that it is adorned with the new Cocoanut Tree fantasy or ostrich.

Other New Models will also be introduced at $10 to $14.75.

Lyons Black Velvet Untrimmed Hats in New Paris Modes at $5 to $8.75

Medium-Price Salon, Third Floor.

Corsage Bouquets in "Poiret" Boxes, $1.75 to $3.75

These dear little Band Boxes which are covered with paper from the Martine Shop in Paris, were inspired by the ingenious Monsieur Poiret. The Bouquets are composed of the flowers that the Parisiennes are now favoring. Third Floor.

A Christmas Greeting From the Manufacturers of the Famous Nemo Corsets

And it is our good fortune to be a distributor of this compliment, which gives the opportunity to get

A New 1914 Model in Nemo Corsets of Exceptional Quality at $2

Besides making these special corsets in one of the new models—with low bust and very long hips—for the coming season, they have made them of materials that are generally used in their $3 corsets.

Every corset is fashioned with elastic "Holtite" straps in the front, and bands of Lastikops Webbing across the hips in the back—the latter for the purpose of reducing the flesh.

A Yuletide Box with Each Corset

Women's Complete Four-Piece Suits, $29.50

As practical as it is clever—this costume, which consists of a good-looking tailored suit of navy or black cheviot, a Scotch plaid worsted waistcoat, and a plaid skirt. Really two suits in one, for the duration of a coat is twice as long as that of a skirt.

Fur-trimmed Velveteen Suits, $29.50

Also, Velours de Laine and Peau de Souris Suits, trimmed with fur, $29.50.

A Jeanne Halle Dancing Frock Reproduced for $35

This mode introduces a delightful usage of taffetas—in a pannier-like drapery over a skirt of lace flounces. Its bodice is made charmingly quaint by a garland of flowers.

290 Evening and Afternoon Dresses Lowered to $25 and $35

Silks! Chiffons! Velveteens! A number of the Dresses at $25 were $35, some were $29.50. In the $35 collection there will be models that were $45, and some that were $40. But the original prices were exceptionally modest. Third Floor

Petticoats of Shimmering Gloria Silk—First Time at $2.25

You are undoubtedly acquainted with this silk, even though you may not know it by name. Although 15 per cent of cotton is woven into it invisibly, it is durable, and yet very good looking. These Petticoats, which are fashioned with sectional flounces, edged with wide pleating, are in plain and two-toned colors. Extra and regular sizes.

Fitted-Top Silk Petticoats, $3.25

Silk Jersey and Peau de Cygne—not combined, for the petticoats are entirely of one silk or the other.

Crepe de Chine Petticoats, $3.25

A wide band of fine lace is inset around the foot of each of these petticoats of pink, light blue or white Crepe de Chine.

Pleated Chiffon Petticoats for Dancing, $3.95 and $5.50 Second Floor

KING SEEKS TO END HOME RULE FIGHT

With Queen Mary, Is Trying to Bring Parties Together by Tactful Negotiations.

BONAR LAW BELLIGERENT

Urges Ulstermen to Conflict—Lloyd George Retorts It Will Be One-Sided.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

LONDON, Nov. 29.—That King George and Queen Mary have been, and are, trying to bring the Liberal and Unionist Parties together on the question of Home Rule for Ireland, which is so full of menace to the peace of the United Kingdom, is known.

It can be stated just what form the activities of their Majesties are taking and exactly what foundation there is for the many reports current as to so-called intervention by the King.

There can, of course, be no intervention in the strict sense of the word. Practically the only political office left to the Crown in England is tactfully to negotiate between the parties when serious difficulty arises. Both King George and Queen Mary are doing this to the best of their respective abilities, and neither is doing or has done anything more. Their object is to enable the different sides to find a common basis of agreement.

So far there has only been a communication of views all around, and if a general conference should come in any form it will not be till Parliament is in session and Home Rule is nearer. Of all members of the Cabinet, the Marquis of Crewe is the most intimate friend of the King and Queen, and he is a frequent channel of communication between the Court and the Government.

Queen Mary, it may be added, is as keenly interested in the matter as is King George, and, as his consort, also is well aware of the constitutional limitations upon the throne.

Lloyd George to-day wound up a week of political speechifying on a scale suggesting an imminent general election. The Premier and Mr. Bonar Law, leader of the Opposition, have both spoken, and there have been other orators too numerous to mention. The immediate net result of all this flood of oratory is that both sides seem to be strengthened in the determination to fight the Ulster question to a finish.

Premier Asquith, in his own impressive fashion, declared that the Government were not going to be turned from their path by menaces of civil war. There could be no surrender either to the threats of Sir Edward Carson or the hints of Lord Lansdowne that the British Army would refuse to do its duty in the event of a civil rebellion. The Premier was confident that in the long run neither the imagination nor the judgment of his fellow-countrymen would be impressed by such methods.

Bonar Law's reply the next day, delivered in Dublin, was a plain incitement to armed resistance by Ulster to home rule.

"If the Government," he said, "attempts to coerce Ulster before it has received the sanction of the electors of Ulster they will do well to resist, and we will support them in their resistance."

In the words of a Unionist paper, this is the gravest answer ever uttered by a responsible statesman in these islands since the great civil war.

In Ulster, according to reports displayed by the Unionist press, preparations for armed resistance continue on a great scale. One authority says the Ulstermen now possess 48,000 rifles, of which at least 18,000 are of modern type. This admission is one of the many humorous touches in the Ulster campaign. Another incident that provoked mirth was the discovery that the Lord Mayor of London's official sword-bearer had been absent from duty for several weeks. Aldermen who missed his doughty presence were informed that he was drilling potential rebels in Ulster.

Another Governmental declaration which has raised the wrath of the Unionists to white heat is that there is no intention of dissolving Parliament and seeking the verdict of the country on the Ulster question.

Mr. Augustine Birrell, Chief Secretary for Ireland, had spoken lately of the possibility of a general election in 1915.

It is stated in well-informed political quarters that the collapse of Larkin's fiery crusade has not been without its influence on the present resolute attitude of the Government in this matter. The alarm aroused by the effect Larkin's rough eloquence had upon his British audiences has been dissipated by the fact that on consideration the workingmen of this country seem to have come to the conclusion that their recognized leaders are more reliable guides. Philip Snowden's cool, reasoning temperament proved stronger than Larkin's magnetic personality.

Lloyd George, an optimist always, reflected the enhanced confidence of his party in his speech to-day. He was in great fettle and indulged in that form of rhetoric which his opponents call Limehousing, but which his audiences enjoy hugely. One characteristic passage was:

"A certain statesman in America who was giving great trouble was described as a wet dog in a drawing room. He was miserable himself and a nuisance to everybody else. I cannot help thinking that the Tory Party regard Sir Edward Carson in that light. He is dropped head-over-heels into the River Boyne; he comes out dripping with Boyne water and they are begging us to give him a biscuit that will lure him out until he is dry."

"To those who are simply using Ulster's legitimate fears to fight their own selfish battles at home in this country I have this to say: That if fighting begins we will guarantee that it will not be all on one side. Mr. Bonar Law talked very glibly about revolution yesterday. If a revolution begins on their initiative Ulster isn't the only question that will be settled. He gave two or three examples of revolution, but he forgot one. He forgot how in the French Revolution the French aristocracy exploited religious bigotry and narrowness in order to prevent democratic progress in France. He also forgets how all that ended for the French aristocracy, their lands, their possessions, their privileges, and their powers."

RUGS from the Orient Are Exquisite Holiday GIFTS

Fantastic in their rich colorings and curious patterns, and instinct with all the glamour of the days of the Caliph Haroun Al Raschid.

Macy's is a wonderful collection. Rugs great and small, by the hundred. Most of them genuine antiques, all of them handloomed by the patient weavers of the Orient, and almost all of them direct from our resident agent in Constantinople.

Sentiment, however, is forgotten when we price our Rugs. They are merchandise to us, and nothing more. As gifts, the smaller sizes are very inexpensive in proportion to their intrinsic worth—which, of course, increases with the lapse of years. Suggestions only can be given here.

WIRELESS AND CABLE DISPATCHES TO THE TIMES

PAGE'S CAUSTIC WIT DELIGHTS ENGLISH

At London Banquets the Ambassador Makes Sly Hits at Foibles of British Character.

TO SHOW AMERICAN GOODS

Our Manufacturers to be Well Represented at London Exposition—Doings of Americans in England.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Nov. 29.—Thanks to the frequent opportunities to practice thrust upon him, Ambassador Page is fast establishing a reputation in London as an after-dinner speaker, gifted with caustic wit.

On two or three recent occasions at Anglo-American banquets he has enlivened the proceedings by sly hits at the English, which Englishmen among the guests have seemed to appreciate as highly as the Americans.

At one Anglo-American function, after elaborating on the blood-thicker-than-water theme and expressing the profoundest admiration for our English cousins and their great country, he turned from grave to gay, and, after admitting the charge that Americans were provincial, he dryly suggested that Englishmen might be improved, too, if they had their insularity sandpapered off.

On Thursday, at the Thanksgiving banquet of the American Society of London, at which were many English guests, the Ambassador told some good stories of his experiences in England. He said that he was talking with a fairly enlightened specimen of the Member of Parliament, when the latter remarked:

"Now that New York has gotten rid of its Governor, who is going to be Vice-President?"

Recently he asked another Englishman, 'in all good faith, what he thought the one great thing that Americans could learn from the English. The Englishman replied:

"You're sure you won't be offended if I tell you the candid truth?"

Mr. Page answered "Certainly not."

"Americans could learn modesty from us," was the answer.

After loud laughter from the Americans present Mr. Page said:

"I see you perceive the joke—it was an Englishman who said that."

In the same vein Mr. Page has not spared himself or his Ambassadorial functions.

"The modern riddle of the Sphinx," he said. "is the question: What is an American Ambassador?

"If an American Ambassador should try to tell you what he really was and if he happened to be in a truthful frame of mind, he would tell you that an American Ambassador was a person to whom Americans come if they happened to want to get married, or to escape the new income tax, or had mines in Mexico, or desired to remove the bones of their dead grandmother to the other side—a quasi undertaker. He also opens bazaars and things."

The Duke of Teck, President of the Anglo-American Exposition of London for 1914, and Earl Grey, President of the British committee for the celebration of the hundred years' peace of English-speaking peoples, have issued invitations to a dinner at the Cecil on Friday. Ambassador Page is to be among the speakers.

Lord Kintore and his colleagues behind the Anglo-American Exposition are greatly pleased by the extraordinary demand of the last two months for space on the part of intending exhibitors, which assures the success of the enterprise. They say that requests have been pouring in, not only from organizations in this country, but even more from American business concerns. The demand for space can be gauged from the fact that the alimentation section has applied for a building twice the size originally allotted to it, the decorative arts textile sections have asked for a 50 per cent. increase of space, and the powerfully organized chemical trades section wants a location four times as large as that first ordered. It is hoped that the Anglo-American Exposition will result in a really comprehensive British representation at the Panama Fair, as it will furnish the machinery required for such an exhibit, which could easily be transferred en bloc to San Francisco.

The Ambassador and Mrs. Page entertained at dinner last night at the Embassy in Grosvenor Square, the guests including the American Minister to The Netherlands and Mrs. Henry van Dyke, the Servian Minister and Mme. Grouitch, Senator and Mrs. Oliver, the Countess of Jersey, the Bishop of London, Sir Hugh and Lady Bell Parker, Mr. and Mrs. Norman Sturgis, Secretary of Embassy and Mrs. Irwin Laughlin, Mrs. Low, Mr. Field, Commander Symington, the naval attaché and Col. Squier, the military attaché.

Viscountess Curzon, Mrs. William B. Leeds, and Countess Granard were among the guests at Mrs. Robert Grosve 's small tango tea on Wednesday.

Ambassador Page lectured on Wednesday before the Cavendish Club on the Ideals of American civilization.

Rear Admiral Richardson Clover and Miss Clover left Claridge's yesterday for Paris and Marseilles en route for India on a pleasure trip.

Mr. and Mrs. Denis A. Upson arrived at Claridge's on Monday.

At the Berkeley Frederick Townsend Martin, who was seriously ill at the beginning of the week, is somewhat better now.

Mrs. A. R. Shattuck is staying at the Berkeley.

At the Carlton, Mr. and Mrs. W. Bowne, R. W. Atwater, Jr., and Mr. and Mrs. C. D. Martin, all of New York, arrived on Tuesday; Capt. Barclay Warburton and Clifford B. Harmon, both from Paris, also came on Tuesday; Kenneth H. Cowan, Mrs. George R. Turnbull and Miss Turnbull, all from Paris, on Thursday.

At the Ritz, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Kingsland, Mrs. William B. Leeds, Mrs. Samuel Newhouse, Mrs. P. A. Valentine, J. Henry Smith, John Sanford, are all staying. Mr. Sanford has just engaged an English jockey for his horses, which are going to race in France.

DINNER FOR THOMAS N. PAGE.

New Italian Ambassador at Washington Is Host in Rome.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

ROME, Nov. 29.—John E. D. Thrask, the chief commissioner of the fine arts section of the Panama Exhibition, has reached here on his tour of Europe and will remain three days.

Moses Ezekiel, the American sculptor, has completed his statute of Senator Daniel, which will be erected at Lynchburg, Va. The Senator is shown seated. The statue will be cast in Berlin and will be unveiled at Lynchburg in the Spring.

The sculptor has also a study of Edgar Allan Poe in his studio. The poet is revealed listening to inspiring voices.

Stephen Bleeker Luce, of Boston, will spend a year in Rome working chiefly at the School of Classical Studies of the American Academy.

One of the most interesting dinners, given in honor of the new American Ambassador and Mrs. Thomas Nelson Page, was that of the new Italian Ambassador at Washington, Count Vincenzo Machi di Cellere. The Countess di Cellere is a South American but speaks English fluently. Among the guests were the Marquis di San Gulliano, Minister of Foreign Affairs whose conversation was full of the southern exhuberance of his native island; Baron di Bildt, the Swedish Minister and his beautiful wife and daughter, Marquis and Machioness Cavrianla, Marquis and Marchioness Patrill, Count de Witten, Cavallere Lecca and Dona Maria di Sangro Lecca, and Count Durini. The table was beautifully decorated with lights and flowers and the music was characteristically Italian.

Thanksgiving Day was quietly celebrated by all the American families residing in Rome. Special gatherings took place at hotels and pensions where Americans congregate.

Mr. and Mrs. Page gave a dinner to the staff of the Embassy which included Arthur Hugh Frazier temporary Secretary of Embassy, who has gained much popularity here and whose return to Vienna about the end of December is regretted; Mrs. Grace White, wife of the Naval Attaché whose husband is with Admiral Badger; Col. Dunn, the Military Attaché whose wife and daughters are spending the Winter in the south of France, and J. P. S. Harrison of Philadelphia, the Private Secretary of Ambassador Page.

After dinner all adjourned to the Villa Mirafiori, where Mrs. Stevens, wife of the Director of the Art School of the American Academy and the students were giving a fancy dress dinner. No such brilliant scene has been witnessed at the Villa since it has been in American hands, although it is said that in the times of Rosa Vercellone, when she was the morganatic wife of Victor Emmanuel II., the entertainments were gay enough.

The dinner was for twenty-five and the guests, all American, were effectually disguised as Pierrots, Indians, and great ladies of all ages, etc. The new dances were much to the fore and delighted all present.

Princess Giusippe Rospigliosi, formerly Mrs. Parkhurst of Bangor, Me., spent a short time in Rome to settle some business matters here, as she does not intend to make the Italian capital her home now that her husband has passed away. She offered her apartment in the Rospigliosi Palace to Ambassador Page. The latter, however, did not see his way clear to accept the suggestion as he wishes to have a garden or park and the beautiful terraced garden of the Rospigliosi Palace, was, a short time ago sacrificed to the construction of the Apollo Theatre.

The Princess has expressed her intention of settling in Paris, where she has numerous friends.

PARIS CELEBRATED THANKSGIVING DAY

The American Holiday More Generally Observed There Than Ever Before.

MANY DINNERS AND BALLS

Festal Spirit Pervaded the Entire Week—Official Ban Placed on the Tango.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Nov. 29.—Turkey, cranberry sauce, and the Stars and Stripes figured more prominently in Paris on Thursday than on any former Thanksgiving Day celebrated by Americans abroad.

The day before being St. Catherine's Fête, when all Paris thronged the boulevards, it seemed on Thursday, when American flags decorated the principal hotels and cafés, that the American holiday was included in the list of French national celebrations.

In Passy, which is the centre of the American colony, the street in which provision shops are located reminded one of any American city, many butchers displaying tempting turkeys with printed signs announcing the American Thanksgiving. One establishment, near the Bois, announced in Parisian English that "a turkey trot" was on sale.

All the principal hotels gave special dinners. At the Plaza the dining room was decorated with the Stars and Stripes and patriotic music was a feature of the evening concert by artists from the Opera, followed by a dance.

The Astoria went in for red, white, and blue floral effects, and after dinner there was a dance.

The Hotel Lotti indulged in an evening of American ragtime. At the Cecil Gilbert White presided at a large dinner, after which there was a cotillion. Other hotels also had special dinner menus.

In order not to clash with family celebrations, the American Club gave a Thanksgiving banquet on Wednesday night at the Elysée Palace Hotel. One hundred were present, W. S. Dalliba presiding, with Ambassador Herrick and Consul General Mason, respectively, at his left and right hand. Among the guests were Maitre Fernand Labori, the famous junior counsel in the Dreyfus case; Prof. C. H. Van Tyne, J. W. Baldwin, C. Inman Barnard, and Admiral W. P. Day.

Ambassador Herrick made the principal address, lauding America as an idealistic nation.

The American colony was busy with Thanksgiving entertainments the entire week. More teas, dinners, and balls were on the programme than at any previous time in the present year.

Mrs. Lawrence V. Benet gave a large dinner party.

Mme. Emma Nevada and her daughter Mignon held a reception which was attended by many members of the colony.

Miss Florence Heywood gave a dance, the guests being Consul General and Mrs. Mason, Alexander Harrison, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Miller, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Frieseke, and Henry Funk.

The Marchesa de Amodio, formerly Miss Wainwright, held a reception in her salon in the Avenue Henri Martin. Among the guests were Mrs. Stewart Taylor, Mrs. Gilbert King, and Admiral and Mrs. Swinburne.

The American group of the Lyceum Club resumed its Winter activities with a Thanksgiving Day tea, when Miss Vida Sutton gave a monologue.

Admiral Charles J. Badger left the Continental for a brief visit to Brussels; the Duchesse de la Rochefoucauld went for a week-end visit to the Château de Chaumont as the guest of the Princess de Broglie; Mrs. Peter Larsen returned from several months in America. Mr. and Mrs. C. R. Williams left the Hôtel Crillon for Cherbourg, sailing on the Kaiserin Auguste Victoria, and Mrs. Henry Clews left the Ritz for America.

Mr. Verner Z. Reid gave a dinner at the Astoria to Colonel and Mrs. Watterson; Mr. and Mrs. J. L. Brice and Mr. and Mrs. Van Vleet arrived at the Crillon from Carlsbad; Mr. and Mrs. H. Crosby Randell left the Meurice for London; Alexander Harrison has gone to his Winter painting quarters in the country; Mr. and Mrs. E. Tolman have sailed for New York, but will return in the Spring to their home in Brittany; Mr. and Mrs. Walter H. Webb, and Mr. and Mrs. Walter Sheftel left the Astoria for London, and Mr. and Mrs. George Sherman arrived at the Crillon and will go to Egypt next week.

Although Parisians have apparently gone tango-mad, those in the seats of the mighty have made up their minds to boycott the dance. It is announced that M. Deschanel, the President of the Chamber of Deputies, having consulted the director of the Protocol, has decided to exclude the Argentine novelty from Parliamentary balls. On the other hand, every encouragement is to be given to revive the graceful classic dances of France—the pavane, gavotte, and minuet.

M. Deschanel's decision has caused a sensation among tango enthusiasts, for, apart from his official position as President of the Chamber, he is accepted as an authority in matters of good taste and elegance.

It is believed that President Poincaré, who has hesitated as to giving the tango a place on the Winter dance programmes at the Elysée will follow M. Deschanel's example.

The Duchess de Talleyrand, formerly Anna Gould, gave a Thanksgiving luncheon at her home in the Avenue du Bois de Boulogne for Mme. Vesintch, wife of the Servian Minister. Among those present were Mrs. Lawrence V. Benet, and Mrs. John and Miss Marie Stewart.

Mrs. Stanford White gave her final reception of the season this week and has gone to Rome, on her way to the United States. Her guests were Mrs. Beatrice Grant, Mrs. Gilbert King, and Mrs. Fred Parsons.

Mrs. William E. Corey is entertaining Lady Paget at the Château Ville Genis.

Lole Fuller gave a reception in her studio at Passy. Her child pupils danced before a distinguished audience. She will give a matinée at the Odéon in December of the works of Princess de Polignac and then start on a tour of Athens, Smyrna, Bucharest, Cairo, and Alexandria. The Princess de Polignac will accompany the party directing the orchestra.

Among the prominent Americans sailing this week on the Kaiserin Auguste Victoria were James D. Spreckels and family and Townsend Scudder.

Heir to the Austrian Throne Arriving in London.

The Archduke Francis Ferdinand has recently paid a visit to England. Great interest in his journey was displayed throughout Europe on account of its possible political significance.

LONDON, Nov. 15.—A great deal of interest is being taken in England in the visit to this country of the heir to the Austrian throne, the Archduke Francis Ferdinand "The great Empire over which he must soon, in the course of nature, be called upon to rule, has by its curious composition and its internal complex problems puzzled most political students and not a few statesmen," says a writer in The Daily Chronicle. He goes on: "Europe's political ravens have long been foretelling the Empire's downfall; the Austro-Hungarian question haunts the dreams of the statesmen and rulers of to-day. The Heir Apparent has been termed an enigma like his country, and its downfall has been predicted to take place on the passing of the aged Emperor.

"But, as a close observer recently stated, 'those who assume that Austria-Hungary's existence depends upon the life of the present Emperor-King overlook one supremely important factor in the situation—namely: the Heir Apparent, the Archduke Francis Ferdinand.'"

The Archduke was not educated as the future wearer of a crown. When the tragic death of the Crown Prince Rudolph took place in 1889, and brought Francis Ferdinand to the steps of the throne, he began to prepare himself eagerly for the high position which seemed destined to be his. He studied politics, jurisprudence, and political economy, and received instruction in all branches of knowledge from the best men in the country. Previously he had served with credit in the army, particularly distinguishing himself as a horseman.

Though enormously wealthy, one of the most prominent characteristics of the Archduke is economy. He watches personally over every detail of the administration of his vast forests, his factories, dairies, &c. There is only one thing in which he may be said to be extravagant. That is in his love for building. He builds much, and with extraordinary splendor.

Perhaps most of all he is distinguished for his unbending will. That manifested itself in his resolve to marry the Countess Sophia Chotek, whom he made his morganatic wife and who now bears the title of Princess of Hohenberg. She belongs to an old Bohemian family, and was governess to the Archduke Frederick's children. According to the family law of the Hapsburgs, the future Emperor might marry only a Princess of the royal blood. The struggle was long, but at last the Archduke led the woman he loved to the altar. Before doing so, however, he had to renounce his children's rights to the succession. The Princess consequently can never become Empress of Austria, but she certainly will become Queen of Hungary, because, according to Hungarian law, the King's wife is Queen.

There is in existence a remarkable volume which throws a flood of light on the personality of the Archduke. It is his "Tagebuch meiner Reise um die Erde"—"Diary of My Journey Round the World." At the end of his "wanderjahr" the Archduke suffered a decline in health, and he spent a considerable time in the Tyrol and in Egypt. There he wrote his "Diary," intended only for his relatives, but afterward given to the world. In the book the Archduke shows himself a great admirer of England, though during his journey the English people he encountered struck him as "stiff." The Archduke, too, likes the French, and he has a good word to say for them wherever on his travels he met them. He makes no secret of his dislike for Americans, though he expresses admiration for their enterprise. Their manners and customs continually rubbed him the wrong way, and their loud and noise annoyed him. Above all, he objected to the way in which the human element was ground down to secure success. He speaks strongly against fortunes built on the ruin of thousands of lives.

Only one people did he dislike to a greater extent—the Chinese. They are to him "unsympathetic," "suspicious," "treacherous," "selfish," "repulsive." The "kindly, good-tempered" Dutch and the Spaniards appealed strongly to him, but the Portuguese horrified him. For the Japanese he has mingled feelings. Their women are charming, but only dolls; their men he admired in some ways, but in others found them "stilled and affected."

COMING ON THE CARONIA.

W. K. Vanderbilt, Jr., and C. Aubrey Smith Among the Passengers.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

LONDON, Nov. 29.—Among the passengers who sailed on the Caronia to-day were W. K. Vanderbilt, Jr., who is returning to work after a month's vacation in London and Paris. The Duchess of Marlborough saw him off at the station.

C. Aubrey Smith, the English actor, is going to play in America with Maude Adams in Barrie's "The Adored One."

Waldemar Kaempffert, editor of The Scientific American, said that he had been in Europe to see Prof. Hans Gross in Graz, Austria, the most expert criminologist living. On his return Kaempffert is going to advocate the adoption in America of a scientific system of crime detection.

To Gild Rouen Cathedral Spire.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Nov. 29.—A subscription has been raised in Rouen for $3,000 to gild the cathedral spire. The architect always wanted this effect. He will gild only the reliefs. The amount was easily raised because the people of Rouen are proud of their city buildings.

THANKSGIVING DAY FETE DAY IN BERLIN

Turkeys and Cranberry Sauce Enjoyed by Over 400 Guests —A Dance Followed.

LOVING CUP FOR THACKARA

Luncheon Club Presents Remembrance to the Consul General—Other Doings in Society.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, Nov. 29.—The week has been filled with social events which culminated in the American colony's Thanksgiving dinner and dance. Over 400 guests partook of a real American dinner, in which turkey with cranberry sauce had the place of honor.

In the absence of Ambassador Gerard, Consul General Thackara presided and proposed toasts to the President and the Kaiser, which were drunk standing.

The exchange professor, Coolidge of Harvard University, and the Roosevelt professor, Shorey of Chicago University, spoke most briefly. Mrs. Eleanor Painter Schmit sang "The Star Spangled Banner," and the guests joined in singing "America."

The dance programme which followed presented two novel features: Dance cards were done away with, and the first ten dances were waltzes. The latter arrangement was the direct result of the Kaiser's taboo of the one-step, the two-step, and the tango, and permitted those who opposed the new dances to enjoy the first half of the programme, even if they could not participate in the other ten dances.

The regular Wednesday luncheon of the American Luncheon Club was marked by the presentation to Consul General Thackara of a beautiful silver loving cup as a token of the friendship and esteem of the club for the retiring Consul. The presentation address was happily made by Ambassador Gerard, who acted as toastmaster. Mr. Thackara was deeply moved and replied briefly.

Ambassador Gerard, in the short time that he has been here, has won the reputation of being the most felicitous and witty after-dinner speaker in the American colony. In speaking at the Luncheon Club he declared that he had no doubt that Daniel, when cast into the lions' den, comforted himself to some degree with the reflection:

"Well, there is some consolation in the fact that I shall not be expected to make an after-dinner speech."

The lunchers enjoyed at the close two songs by W. F. Myers of San Francisco.

The Society for the Alleviation of the Condition of the Poor Educated Classes gave a tea on Wednesday which was graced by the presence of the Crown Princess Cecilie, who is the protectress of the organization. It was one of the most exclusive society events of the year, tickets being sold only to those receiving invitations.

The American colony was represented by Frau Hans von Below, wife of Col. von Below, the Commander of the Augusta Guards. The guests at her table included the Ambassador and Mrs. Gerard, Mahmud Mukhtar Pasha, and Princess Ismail, who is an aunt of the Khedive of Egypt; Count Calderari, Italy's military attaché at Berlin; Major Langhorne, and Lieut.-Commander and Mrs. Gherardi.

The Honorable Miss Portman entertained at dinner on Monday for the Ambassador and Mrs. Gerard and Consul General and Mrs. Thackara. A dance followed. The guests included Secretary Grew of the Embassy, the Gherardis, and Major Langhorne.

The Thackaras had issued invitations for a dance on Tuesday, but Mrs. Thackara received word on that morning of the death of her sister, Mrs. Thomas William Fitch of Gulfport, Miss. The invitations were recalled, as well as those for other functions already planned.

Mrs. T. Stewart White entertained at a small dinner on Tuesday for the Gerards. The guests included Mr. and Mrs. S. B. Conger, Count and Countess Untgelas, Mrs. Hazeltine, the Countess's mother, and Miss Agnes Kerr.

Exchange Prof. Coolidge lectured on Tuesday at the American Woman's Club's weekly reception on Mexican history. He was introduced by Dr. Alice Luce, and did not touch on politics further than to express the conviction that all thoughtful Americans were convinced that President Wilson's course was the only right one.

The hotel registers show a considerable falling off in the number of American tourists. The Hotel Esplanade, for example, has only two, Mr. and Mrs. H. F. Schlemmer of Pittsburgh.

At the Adlon are J. W. Henson, Herman A. Metz, Ralph Worms, Herbert Syrett, and Miss Charlotte W. Distern, all of New York; A. H. Blackiston of San Francisco, and A. A. Schentz of Detroit.

Walter Rosen of New York is at the Kaiserhof.

TURKEYS AT MUNICH, TOO.

American Students Met There to Celebrate Thanksgiving Day.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MUNICH, Nov. 29.—Munich's American colony, which consists almost exclusively of art, music, and university folk, celebrated Thanksgiving Day in becoming style with a banquet and ball at the Hotel Bayerischerhof, under the joint presidency of the new United States Consul General, T. St. John Gaffney, and Mrs. Gaffney.

There were two hundred guests, including distinguished members of the Bavarian Society, in attendance. Mr. Gaffney proposed the health of the newly created King and Queen of Bavaria, which was drunk with enthusiasm. Prof. Bumstead of Yale University, who is spending his sabbatical year in Munich, responded with a toast in honor of President Wilson.

The banqueters by a rousing vote of acclamation authorized Mr. Gaffney to send telegrams of greeting appropriate to the hour to King Ludwig and President Wilson.

Mr. and Mrs. Gaffney, who were recently transferred to Munich from the Dresden Consulate General, which the former so successfully administered for eight years, had already been warmly welcomed by their new constituents on the banks of the Isar.

Atlantic Shipping Pool Extended.

HAMBURG, Nov. 29.—It was decided to-day to extend the agreement between the North German Lloyd and the Hamburg-American lines, known as the North Atlantic shipping pool, from Dec. 31 to Jan. 31, and a conference is to be held in January at which an attempt will be made to reconstruct the pool.

AMERICAN OFFICERS AT A ROYAL DINNER

Entertained by King and Queen of Italy—Admiral Badger Unable to be Present.

KING'S KNOWLEDGE SHOWN

Officers Amazed by His Familiarity with the Condition of This Country's Navy.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

ROME, Nov. 29.—Probably the best souvenir many of the officers of the American warships will carry away with them from Italy will be their audience with the King and Queen to-day and the brilliant dinner given in their honor by their Majesties.

Unfortunately Admiral Badger was unable to be present, having made engagements for to-night at Villefranche that were too pressing to be broken. Admiral Badger has been especially desirous of paying homage to King Victor. It so happened that when the Admiral was in Italy the sovereigns were at their hunting lodge at San Rossore, where no audiences are given unless they are imperative.

The officers were astonished at the King's thorough knowledge of the condition of the American Navy and his perfect appreciation of its strength and efficiency.

After the dinner the Sovereigns mingled with the company in the most democratic and friendly manner. The Queen conversed at great length with Mrs. Page. It was the first opportunity her Majesty had had to receive the Ambassador's wife. She complimented her upon her knowledge of French, and especially upon the fluency with which she is able to express herself in Italian. Mrs. Page is, indeed, the first American woman of her position who has been so much at ease in the language of this country.

NAPLES, Nov. 29.—Capt. Roy C. Smith and Capt. William J. Maxwell, respectively of the United States battleships Arkansas and Florida, paid farewell visits to the municipal authorities of Naples to-day and tendered their thanks to them for the courtesies that had been extended the men of the American ships while in port here. Later the Mayor of Naples visited the battleships and expressed the satisfaction of the people of the city for the long visit the Americans had paid them.

NEW GUN PROMISES REVOLUTION IN WAR

American Officer's Invention So Light That a Man Can Transport It Easily.

NEEDS NO WATER COOLING

Bisley Tests, Witnessed by a Host of Military Men, Regarded as Very Impressive.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

LONDON, Nov. 29.—That the general adoption of the Lewis automatic machine gun would revolutionize warfare, sending the present-day rifles and Maxims to the junk heap and rendering current military tactics antiquated at one stroke, is the opinion of a high army officer who was present at the trials this week at Bisley of a new gun invented by Col. I. N. Lewis, formerly of the United States.

The army officer, who stipulated that his name should not be mentioned for fear of a reprimand by his Government, drew a vivid picture of the war of the future, if that one desire of all war offices—a portable automatic machine gun, not dependent on water for cooling—should prove no mere toy, but able to stand up under actual service conditions.

Squadrons of cavalry going into action armed with machine guns instead of the lance, sabre, or carbine; regiments of infantry carrying machine guns, each soldier having a potential deadliness of two or more companies armed with mere rifles; flocks of swift, light-armored aeroplanes, each mounting one or two machine guns, swooping down on the enemy with a deadly hail of fire, were some of the military novelties that he prophesied for the not distant future if the new Lewis gun, which was highly successful in the preliminary tests, could stand the gruelling of actual service. He said:

"For the first time a machine gun, capable of firing 500 to 800 rounds a minute, is to be carried by an infantryman. No horses or mules are needed, as with the Maxim. This gun weighs only twenty-six and a half pounds, or less than half a soldier's normal equipment. Think what that means! One infantryman can carry a gun and his comrade can carry the ammunition. Every company of 150 men could carry seventy-five guns. A single company would have a destructive power equal to a whole regiment at present.

"My opinion is that the new gun is bound to displace Maxim's, for it takes five mules and ten men for every Maxim as against no mules and two men for the Lewis gun. Another thing is that it will do away with the necessity of having cavalry escort for wagon trains. A machine gun could be mounted on every wagon."

The scene which THE NEW YORK TIMES correspondent witnessed at the Bisley tests was a tremendously impressive one. The new weapon, which to a layman looked more like an overgrown rifle than a machine gun, was mounted on a small iron tripod on the 200-yard range. The inventor, Col. Lewis, was visibly nervous as he gave final instructions to the civilian operator, while grouped behind in an interested and silent semi-circle stood Major Gen. Vondonoph, Master General of Ordnance; Major Gen. Allenby, Inspector of Cavalry, and many other high English Army officers, representatives of the admiralty, military men from South Africa, New Zealand, and Australia; the Bulgarian Minister, Col. Squier; the American military attaché, the Belgian, Austrian, and Japanese attachés, and representatives of nearly all the other foreign Governments.

Some idea of the interest aroused may be gained from the fact that a Russian Colonel, who was present, had been ordered from Sevastopol to England on two hours' notice by the Russian Minister of War.

After several thousand rounds had been fired in what seemed only a few moments the whole company of a hundred went to inspect the riddled target. Other tests were made at the 500-yard range, then the officers present had an opportunity to fire the gun themselves from the 200-yard range. The American Attaché was one of those who eagerly availed themselves of the chance.

Then the word passed that an aeroplane was coming. The company hastened to the watch tower in time to see a heavy lumbering ark of a biplane climb slowly into the cold gray sky against the brisk and treacherous head wind. In a special seat fastened under the pilot seat sat an officer with a machine gun mounted before him.

As the biplane swung toward the target at an altitude of 600 feet he fired the whole magazine of forty-seven rounds in less than five minutes, scoring a high percentage of hits. Even to the laymen the demonstration was impressive.

Col. Lewis beamed all over with pleasure at the success of the tests. He said:

"We have had more encouragement in England in four months than I could get in America in fifty years. I offered the invention free of charge to the United States Government, but it would not touch it at the time. Now the Birmingham Small Arms Company has taken it up and holds the manufacturing rights.

"Already the gun has been subjected to preliminary official firing trials in Russia, Belgium, Italy, Austria, and Sweden, and is now under full official trials by a special board of officers in the United States. As a result of the tests trial orders have already been placed by several Governments."

WOMAN'S AFRICAN TRIP.

Miss Benham Traveled from Nigeria to Portuguese East Africa.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

LONDON, Nov. 29.—Miss Gertrude M. Benham, in a letter dated from the steamship Gascon in the Mozambique Channel, Oct. 27, gives a short account of a remarkable journey made by her across Africa.

She left England in October, 1912, and proceeded up the Niger to Buro and by train to Kano. From there on foot she traveled at the beginning of December to Bauchi and Yola and across the frontier into Kamerun to Garua, Ngaundere, Babua, Caunot, Nola, and thence to Mongoremba on the Ubanghi River, where she had to take a boat to Irebu on the Congo, as there were no roads there, the country being mostly forest and swamp.

While waiting for the steamer at Irebu she visited Lake Tumba. She traveled from Irebu to Stanleyville and thence on foot went via Bafwaboli, Avakubi, and Irumu across Soliki into Uganda. Proceeding by Mbarara into German East Africa, she went to Kigari and to Lake Kivu. She visited some volcanoes, among them a new crater formed by an eruption last December.

She came down the lake in a native canoe and then went on foot to Lake Tanganyika. She continued her journey by steamer down the lake to Bismarckburg, and then traveled on foot via Abercorn and Kayambe and Fife to Karenga on Lake Nyassa. Taking the steamer to Zomba, Blantyre, and Mount Mlanje, she visited the plateaux there, and at Zomba went on to Mlanje Road, where her camp life ended, and she took train and river boat to Chinde, Portuguese East Africa.

Miss Benham traveled with only a cook boy and seven porters, and was absolutely unarmed, and she writes that, except for a few worries with porters, she had no annoyances of any sort and remained quite free from fever.

A TRIBUTE BY ISAACS.

He Speaks of London's Great Work in Cause of Religious Liberty.

LONDON, Nov. 15.—A tribute to the leadership which the City of London has taken in the cause of religious liberty was delivered by the new Lord Chief Justice, Sir Rufus Isaacs, in responding for "His Majesty's Judges" at the Lord Mayor's banquet on Nov. 10. Sir Rufus said in part:

"Mr. Sheriff Painter has been good enough to propose the toast of 'His Majesty's Judges,' to which, for the first time, I have the honor and privilege of responding. You will, I am sure, forgive me if, before I say a word on behalf of my brother Judges, I give utterance to two thoughts which are foremost in my mind at this moment, when I stand here, in this historic hall of the ancient City and address you in response to the toast.se felicitously proposed.

"The first is that I count it indeed fortunate, and, may I say appropriate, that my first public utterance outside the courts of justice should be made here in the City, bound as I am to the City by memories of my early youth, my early association and training; and remembering, as I do, that much of what has stood me in good stead in my life in later years was learned in the City and among business men.

"The second is, you may perhaps think, a little more irrelevant, but I am in my infancy as a Judge, and, therefore, you must forgive me if I stray a little into irrelevancy. I cannot address you here, to-night, in the City, without recalling that I should not be here, occupying this position at this moment, if it were not for the great struggles of the City—now so many years ago—in the cause of religious liberty.

"I should be ungrateful, indeed, if I allowed this opportunity to pass without reminding you that, first of all, it was the City that insisted upon members of my community being members of your corporation. And it was the City that led the struggle for representation, again, by members of my community in the House of Commons.

"If I have strayed for a moment into those paths which, perhaps, are not peculiarly appropriate to the toast for which I am responding, it is because I should think that I were false to everything that is within me if I did not give utterance to these sentiments, remembering as I do that memories so quickly fade, and that, while a whole nation now agrees that there should be the fullest religious liberty and toleration, that was not the case when the City fought the battle which placed me here."

In his speech Sir Rufus Isaacs amplified some remarks that he had previously made when the new Lord Mayor was presented to the Judges at the Law Courts. On that occasion the Lord Chief Justice also spoke of the great part that the City of London had taken in the heroic struggle for religious liberty.

The Incandescent Bomb in Aerial Warfare.

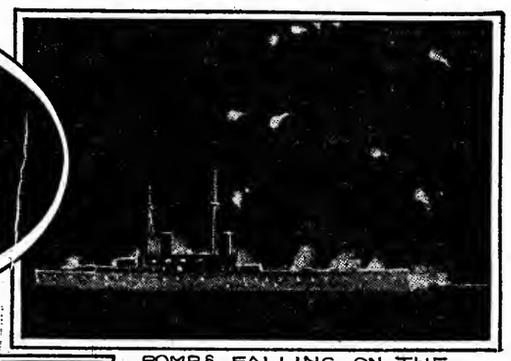
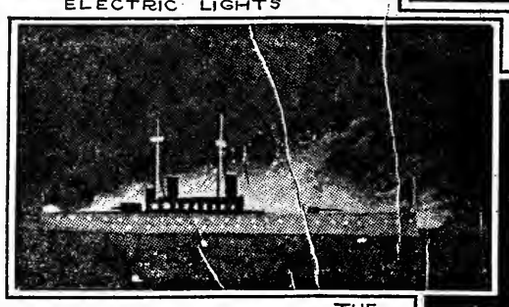
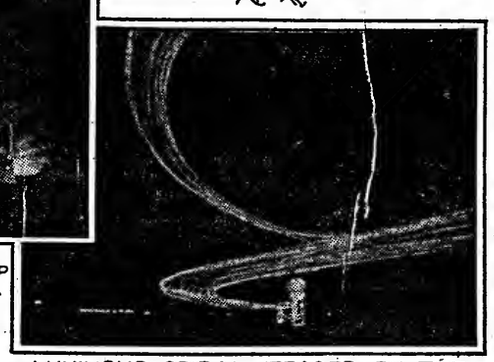
THE BIPLANE WITH ITS ELECTRIC LIGHTS



BOMBS FALLING ON THE MODEL OF A BATTLESHIP



THE BATTLESHIP SET ON FIRE BY THE BOMBS



LUMINOUS SPIRAL TRACED BY THE AEROPLANE

LONDON, Nov. 18.—The British Admiralty recently conducted at the aerodrome at Hendon a series of remarkable experiments at night. The model of a full-sized battleship was constructed in a field and filled with combustibles protected by the usual deck plates of a battleship in commission. A biplane dropped bombs upon the model from various altitudes, and, after the third bomb, the ship burst into flames.

The biplane then turned on the electric lights with which she was furnished and performed wonderful evolutions in the air, leaving behind her a trail of light that was as startling as it was beautiful.

The experiments prove that not only can aerial bombs penetrate the decks of a battleship as now constructed, but also that these bombs can be directed with deadly aim from varying altitudes.

BIG FIELD FOR INSURANCE.

Fewer Than One-Fifth of Adult Englishmen Have Policies.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Nov. 29.—England is still almost a virgin field for the life insurance agent.

According to an article in The Statis:

The nation's income has doubled in the last 30 years, but the premium income of the life offices in this period has increased 221 per cent. From all the data available it is apparent that the savings of the British people for the current year will not be far short of $2,000,000,000, which is equal to nearly $45 per head of the population.

In the past year the total contributions made by the nation for the purposes of life assurance amounted to about $260,000,000.

Excluding interest on investments and calculating only the premium income of the life offices the country is now paying over $5 per head per annum for life assurance premiums against $2 per head 30 years ago.

The number of ordinary policies for sums of more than $50 issued at the present time is only slightly below 3,000,000, the average per policy working out at about $1,415.

If allowance be made for duplicate policies the number of persons insured for any amount that would make a moderate provision for wife and children probably does not exceed 2,000,000, and may be even less, as those who insure usually possess several policies.

Thus only about one-fifth of the male population is yet able to make reasonable provision against the unknown future and the remaining four-fifths make practically no provision whatever.

NEW BACILLUS IS DEADLY.

Pasteur Institute Confirms Discovery of the "Hypertoxicus."

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

PARIS, Nov. 29.—The recent tragedy at Cholet, where dozens of persons died after partaking of a wedding supper, has resulted in a scientific discovery—that of the "bacillus hypertoxicus," which was found in the cream eaten by the wedding guests, by Dr. Rappin of the Pasteur Institute of Nantes, who was summoned for the investigation.

He found the same bacillus in the blood and excretions of the victims. A guinea pig inoculated with it died in a few hours.

Dr. Rappin says that the new bacillus is terribly fatal, and belongs to a new species not yet classified. Nothing is known of its habits or the conditions in which it lives and develops. Dr. Arnold Netter of the Academy of Medicine says:

"Dr. Rappin has often spoken to me of mysterious poisonings followed by death and due to an unknown bacillus. This microbe must belong to the family of perdaos, and must be allied to that of paratyphiques, but it preserves a distinct individual pathological effect."

The Pasteur Institute confirms the discovery of Dr. Rappin.

GERMS IN VARICOSE VEINS.

Prof. Landousey of Paris Shows Their Nature is Tuberculous.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Nov. 29.—Prof. Landousey, Dean of the Faculty of Medicine and one of the most eminent champions of the social war against tuberculosis, demonstrated at the Academy of Medicine yesterday the tuberculous nature of varicose veins. Heretofore this condition has been taken for a rheumatic manifestation.

Prof. Landousey revealed microscopically in lesions the famous bacillus. He also showed that inoculation of a guinea pig produced tuberculosis in the animal.

At the same meeting, Prof. Pierre Marie of the Salpetriere Hospital, demonstrated that in cases of softening or hemorrhage of the brain, trepanation brought relief and held out hope of a cure. It should take place on the side opposite the lesion. Otherwise he saw there were risks of aggravation.

AVIATORS MAP OUT WORLD TOUR BY AIR

Trip Is Regarded as Entirely Possible and the Only Question Is the Expense.

A CROSSING AT ALASKA

From Canada the Airman Could Reach Europe by Way of Labrador and Greenland.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Nov. 29.—Aviators are already discussing the project of round-world aeroplane tours. Heretofore a ship has been the only means of making the circle. It seems perfectly possible, and that it has not already been done is simply a question of cost.

Brindejonc made the journey from Paris to Warsaw. Russian officers have flown from Odessa to Moscow. The American continent has been traversed. Daucert reached Mount Taurus, 3,000 miles from Paris, on a flight to the Pyramids, and then, in a hurricane, irreparably smashed his apparatus.

Vedrines, who has reached Vienna in a flight toward an unknown destination, has announced that he will probably continue his flight to Lake Tchad, in Central Africa, or to Australia, 10,000 miles away.

It is evident that a tour of the world is only a question of adequate arrangements for oil, relays, &c. From Paris to Kamstchatka should take three weeks; then to the American coast, following the Aleutian Islands, the last of which, the Commander, is only 60 miles from the Russian coast. Then from South Alaska the aviator can descend the Pacific Coast, traverse Canada to Davis Strait, Labrador, and Greenland, and thence go by the Gulf of Denmark to Iceland and Scotland.

The total distance would be about 25,000 miles and the trip would take two months.

Chilean Aviator Plans to Cross Mountains 20,000 Feet High.

SANTIAGO, Chile, Nov. 29.—Preparations for a flight over the Andes are being made by Señor Ligueroa, a Chilean aviator.

The attempted point of passage will be where the mountains attain an altitude of nearly 20,000 feet.

METZ FLIES IN AIRSHIP.

Former Controller Makes Round Trip from Frankfort to Wiesbaden.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, Nov. 29.—Former Controller Herman A. Metz of New York sailed to-day from Frankfort on Main to Wiesbaden and back in the Zeppelin passenger airship Victoria Luise, which was manned by a German naval detachment engaged in practice cruises.

Mr. Metz spent the fore part of the week in Berlin prior to proceeding to Frankfort to attend a conference of important German chemical interests, at which the Controller represents the United States. He lunched with Ambassador Gerard on Tuesday and gave him a graphic account of the recent political upheaval in New York.

Mr. Metz is going to Paris and will sail for the United States on Wednesday from Cherbourg on the Olympic.

ITALY'S KING WINS FOES.

Socialists in the Senate Show a Great Change in Attitude.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

ROME, Nov. 29.—Things move rapidly in Italian politics. Two years ago Signor Dissolate, the Socialist leader, who, in April, 1900, shouted thrice in the Chamber, "Death to the King," who was actually killed three months later, has climbed the steps of the Quirinal Palace to be received by the son of the murdered Sovereign and had a portfolio offered him in the present Giolitti Cabinet, and three Socialists have been appointed Senators, which, in Italy, is an honor conferred for life by the King on the suggestion of the Cabinet.

This is the first instance of Socialists entering the Upper House under a monarchial régime. It is, however, not a new departure, as for nearly a century the House of Savoy has successfully followed the policy of killing extreme parties with kindness.

It was this policy that made it possible for Garibaldi, the Republican, to put his sword at the service of King Victor Emmanuel II, and for Mazzini, although staunchly antimonarchial to support the aspirations of the House of Savoy. Later examples are plentiful, the most salient of which was the conversion of Crispi, the conspirator Republican and revolutionist, who became a most devout and loyal servant of the monarchy.

LOIE FULLER IN PERIL.

A Fishbone Stuck in Her Throat and She Narrowly Escaped Death.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

PARIS, Nov. 29.—Loie Fuller, the American dancer, almost lost her life as the result of an accident at the Thanksgiving luncheon given in her honor by Somerville Story, the editor of the Paris Daily Mail.

A fishbone stuck in her throat, causing severe spasms and then unconsciousness. A doctor worked over her for four hours until he succeeded in extracting the bone and pronounced her out of danger.

She was able to receive visitors on Friday. She told THE NEW YORK TIMES correspondent a curious psychological coincidence regarding the affair. Her friend, Princess Eristoff, the Russian portrait painter, had excitedly appeared at Story's house five minutes before the accident. Although not invited to the luncheon, she ran to the dining room and said that she had come because she knew that something was going to happen to Miss Fuller.

UNEMPLOYED SEEK AID OF REICHSTAG

Startling Number of Workers Without Jobs Reported by Berlin and Other German Cities.

BUILDING TRADES HARD HIT

Other Industries Also Affected—Insurance Against Unemployment to be Considered.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

BERLIN, Nov. 29.—The Reichstag, which convened on Tuesday after the long vacation, has a number of important measures to consider, but none more pressing, judging by present conditions, than the question of providing some form of insurance against unemployment.

The demand comes from the parties of the Left, but the Conservatives and the Government itself are fully awake to the necessities of the situation, and a positive result of some nature may be hoped for before the Summer recess.

Six meetings were organized by the Socialists this week to agitate for the relief of the unemployed. They were attended by over 10,000 persons and a resolution was adopted urging the Reichstag to appoint a committee to consider the problem and asking the Government to proceed immediately with work already planned in order to keep workmen from starving.

The gravity of the situation is shown by the figures of the Municipal Committee, which found 25,308 unemployed in forty unions of Greater Berlin. As these unions embrace less than one-third of all the workmen and workwomen of the city, it is calculated that the number of unemployed reaches 80,000.

At Interfürt there are more than 1,000 unemployed—a startling number when it is considered that the city's population is less than 95,000, of whom not more than 30,000 are probably workers. This means that one of every thirty breadwinners is without work. Besides this many hundreds are employed for only part of the time.

Slackness has long been most acute in the building trades, but it is now involving other industries. The management of one of Berlin's biggest department stores is doubtful whether it will be necessary to hire more than half the usual number of extra employes for Christmas.

The City of Breslau has just established a municipal fund to be lent on first mortgages to encourage building. Whether this will help remains to be seen. It has been most difficult for several months to borrow money on even gilt-edge first mortgages, and it may be too late in view of the general business situation to hope that building can be noticeably stimulated at this time.

TO GUARD MRS. PANKHURST.

Band of Amazons Forming to Protect Her Upon Arrival at Plymouth.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Nov. 29.—When Mrs. Pankhurst arrives at Plymouth on Wednesday, she will be met by a suffragette bodyguard.

A band of amazons whose mission it will be to defend the leader whom the police will try to arrest, is being formed. Mrs. Dacre Fox told a reporter that the idea of a central fighting force originated in the scuffles at the Pavilion Theatre.

Mrs. Drummond is the General, and her troops are being carefully drilled. Volunteers for the fighting force have offered their services from all parts of the country.

"The body organized in the East End for Sylvia Pankhurst," said Mrs. Dacre Fox, "is distinct from the official central army, though on the same lines. In the central army no men will be enrolled. The troops will be armed in a way not at present revealed, but will only fight on provocation from the police.

WHAT! GRAB THE INVALIDES?

Never! Says M. Dumont, Guardian of Napoleon's Tomb.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Nov. 29.—Gen. Niox has proposed a plan to transfer the remaining eighteen "Invalids" to other retreats and to transform the entire Hotel des Invalides into an army museum. M. Dumont, the most representative of the old veterans remaining and a guardian of Napoleon's tomb, was asked to-day what he thought about it.

Dumont is a perfect type of the old soldier, with a wooden leg, frank, fearless eyes, and a martial air that the passing of the years has in no way affected.

"Oust us from the Invalides!" he snorted, indignantly. "Why, we're at home here; we inherited the place. Louis XIV.'s Invalides belongs to us. Besides, in 1834, $16,000,000 of the Invalides' funds was taken to build the fortifications of Paris on the express condition that the building would be insured to its future inmates in perpetuity.

"And it is at this very moment when the destruction of these fortifications and the sale of the land thus left free will net a considerable sum to the city and the country, that we are to be thrown into the street and the promises of 1834 broken!

"It is true there are only eighteen of us, but it is because they don't know this that many of our old comrades do not join us. There's room for a hundred."

TO PROTECT MONUMENTS.

New French Law Makes Private Owners Responsible for Upkeep.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Nov. 29.—The law for the protection of historical monuments was passed this week by the Chamber of Deputies after having been under discussion four years.

The new law gives the Government greater power of control over the national treasures and has been passed with the object of preventing private individuals and public companies from deriving profit by charging admission to places of historic interest, of which they are merely the temporary proprietors.

It is decreed that an inventory of all historical monuments and buildings in France shall be taken during the next three years with the view of discovering those in need of restoration. The law also decrees that private owners shall be held responsible for their upkeep.

WANT NUNS RESTORED.

Parisians Petition for Their Return to Hospitals as Nurses.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

PARIS, Nov. 29.—Efforts to have nuns restored to their old places as hospital nurses are unceasing. This week a great petition to this effect, bearing 167,849 names of citizens of Paris and the environs, was presented to the Municipal Council. As the hospitals are about to be reorganized, the petition asks that places be reserved for the sisters, and says:

"The petitioners have no political design; our sole desire is to permit sick persons who ask to be attended by the sisters to have their wish. We do not wish to interfere with the rights of the present staff of the organization, but we think that patients have also a right to express their wishes, and that their rights are equal to those of the staff."

Stamp for French Aerial Mail.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Nov. 29.—The Minister of Posts and Telegraphs is considering a special stamp for mail carried by the proposed aerial post. This will have a picture of the Eiffel Tower and an aeroplane in place of the figure of the "Semeuse," a female sowing grain, which now adorns letter stamps.

BERLIN MERCHANTS AID MONEY LENDERS

Trial of Countess Fischler von Treuberg Shows How They Tempt the Impecunious.

PRINCESS LOUISE A VICTIM

Hotel Made Her Pay Daily for Her Rooms Before Breakfast—80 Per Cent. Interest Charged.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

BERLIN, Nov. 29.—The trial of Countess Fischler von Treuberg, which is still proceeding, has thrown an interesting light on the methods of certain Berlin merchants and, more especially, on book dealers and their connection with money lenders.

A typical case involved Princess Louise of Belgium. The Princess, who lived during the Winter of 1908-1909 in Berlin, was in financial straits. Her hotel suite cost 400 marks or $100 daily, and the hotel demanded its money each morning before it would serve her breakfast. In this extremity an agent approached her with a proposal to raise money by the following means:

A book store would sell her 200,000 marks worth of books at catalogue prices, taking her notes for the sum. The agent would then resell the books to a second-hand dealer for 80,000 marks, from which his commission would be paid and the remainder would go to her. She agreed, but saw neither the books nor the money. This case was later settled.

In a similar case a spendthrift student gave notes for 30,000 marks worth of books from the sale of which he realized 3,100 marks. The same plan is followed by certain dealers in rugs, art objects, &c.

If the borrower later regrets the transaction and shows a disposition to resist the payment of the notes, he discovers that the papers, signed by him, include an agreement that the title to the goods shall remain the seller's until the latter has been paid, and that in reselling the goods the borrower has committed a crime.

As a matter of fact, prosecuting attorneys have several times proceeded against persons in this situation and secured convictions.

One witness, who testified to transactions with money lenders, was asked if a certain money lender named were not an unconscionable shark and said: "No. He only charged 80 per cent. interest yearly and is one of the most decent money lenders in Berlin."

Testimony in the case has involved a number of army officers and other prominent persons. One Lieutenant, who lived with the defendant for some time, and was declared by her to have allowed her to support him, to buy his clothes and other things, was asked how he could reconcile his conduct with his position.

He declared in his answer that he did not want her to give him anything or to support him, but she compelled him to accept the favors named.

There has been little evidence incriminating the defendant yet produced, except that she recommended various clients to money lenders and received a commission.

GAIETY COMPANY COMING

And the London Theatre Will Close Until After the New Year.

URGES THAT RADIUM BE NATIONALIZED

Prof. Soddy Wants to Have Great Curative Agent Taken Out of Private Hands.

GREATEST HOPE IN CANCER

Sir Alfred Gould, Nevertheless, Points Out That It Is Valueless In Some Cases.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Nov. 29.—Prof. Frederick Soddy whose researches in radium qualify him to speak on the subject, voices the opinion of a large number of scientists in an article in the current issue of Nature in which he recommends that the British Government lift the question of the national supply of radium out of the domain of private speculation and enterprise in which it now lies, and make it a matter of public concern.

After pointing out that Austria and America have radium and Germany mesothorium, a raw material, while England has no apparent source of supply, Prof. Soddy expresses regret that Great Britain has no Ministerial department like the United States Bureau of Mines to take action in the matter. He expresses the hope that the Institution of Mining and Metallurgy may fulfil this public duty in place of an inactive Government and take energetic steps to meet the situation.

Sir Alfred Pearce Gould, the cancer specialist, sounded a similar note at the Hospital Board meeting this week, urging the purchase of radium as a gilt-edged investment for hospital funds and remarking that there was no more permanent way of investing money than in radium, as radium purchased now would be valuable to the end of time, as far as the mind of man could carry, and that there was no other form of investment into which hospitals could put their money so certain to be actually in the possession of the governors of the hospital a hundred years hence.

Sir Alfred Pearce Gould made an important pronouncement on the therapeutic value of radium:

"As to the use of radium I must speak guardedly. It is of the greatest importance in cancer cases, but the disease is one that somehow cures itself. A man was recently discharged from a hospital after being ill two years and was pronounced incurable. Without radium, any specific, or an operation the man got well, and is now in robust health. That fact makes one careful how to speak of the disease.

"In some cases we have the most striking results from radium. The introduction of a single tube has been followed by the rapid disappearance of the malignant growth after only one application.

"On the other hand, tumors, closely allied to those successfully treated, have been treated in precisely the same way with the same tube of radium and no improvement followed.

"It is also known that one-half of an extensive cancerous area is quickly removed by radium, while the other half, equally exposed to its influence, is entirely unaffected.

"I think that with increased knowledge the now inexplicable freaks of radium will become simplified. It would be inaccurate to call radium an ascertained, proved, and certain cancer cure. There is no hope in radium to deal with some cases.

"Cancer has a tendency to diffuse itself over the body. When it has affected the internal organs, as far as we know, it is beyond our hope to be able to deal with it by radium emanation, or radium itself; but so long as it is a singly localized disease the results we have had at present are sufficient to warrant saying that its use is attended with the very greatest hopes—brighter, purer, and more effective hopes than have ever before attended any remedy.

"With the exception of the Radium Institute, which possesses four milligrammes of radium, worth $330,000 at current prices, it is doubtful whether any hospital in the United Kingdom has sufficient radium for the purposes of treatment. One expert says that 500 milligrammes of radium is necessary for serious work in a hospital."

ACTRESSES WILL PARADE.

Ten to March, Masked, to Boom London Women's Theatre.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Nov. 29.—Actresses interested in the Women's Theatre shortly to be opened in London, controlled and run and presenting plays written for and entirely by the fair sex, are determined to make every effort to insure its financial success.

Recognizing the utility of advertisement, the management has pondered long over a scheme which is novel enough to attract wide attention even in this advertising age, and the result of the deliberations will be seen on Monday, when ten actresses described as "well known" will parade the streets of the theatre district just before the performance.

Exactly who the well-known sandwichwomen will be it will be difficult for an outsider to say, for they will be masked.

What the Women's Theatre advertising manager is counting upon even more than the attraction of masked beauty is the costumes, which are said to be the most weirdly effective seen for a long time.

They are copies of the costumes in which Pietro Loghi, an Italian painter of the eighteenth century, garbed his feminine sitters.

Florence Macbeth, the American soprano, who has been singing with the Liverpool Philharmonic, has just been engaged by Campanini to sing coloratura rôles with the Philadelphia-Chicago Grand Opera Company. She will sail on Dec. 14 for her début in Chicago early in January. The American singer has had a flattering reception in Liverpool, and was enthusiastically praised by the press, The Liverpool Post saying:

"In Miss Macbeth we have an experience with one of those voices which is somewhat detached from a mere mortal experience and sensation and simply carols forth like a skylark. She possesses exquisite beauty of tone and wonderful technique."

Ernest Schelling, the American pianist, is also achieving success in his present tour of the provinces.

LONDON BOOK SALES POOR.

One Publisher Blames Tango Teas —Poetry In More Demand.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

LONDON, Nov. 29.—London publishers have found this present Autumn season to be unsatisfactory in a business sense. One of them blames tango teas for taking money out of the coffers of the booksellers.

The supply of books is much larger than the demand.

The best sellers of the Autumn have been Hall Caine's "The Woman Thou Gavest Me," W. B. Masowell's "The Devil's Garden," Compton Mackenzie's "Sinister Street," and Florence Barclay's "The Broken Halo."

The three first-named doubtless owed something of their success to the fact that they received extraordinary advertisement by the Circulating Libraries, exercising a sort of censorship over them.

Among biographies those of Florence Nightingale and Bulwer Lytton head the list, while among books of travel Capt. Scott's record of his Antartic expedition is first. The rest are nowhere.

Lord Morley and Thomas Hardy are two names that stand out prominently in the Winter lists. Morley's contribution is only a university address, but that is better than nothing. Hardy's volume will be a collection of stories, the last that may be expected from his pen.

Curiously enough, despite the slump in other lines, there has been a revival of the demand for poetry and several volumes of verse are selling well. George Allen & Co. are seizing the opportunity to publish a volume by R. Valentine Heckscher, the American poet, whose earlier work met with high praise from various critics, including Sir Lewis Morris. The book is entitled "Rose Windows," and one poem in the volume is called "Legende of the Christmas Tree."

German Suffragettes Not Militant.

BOCHEM, Germany, Nov. 29.—A resolution disapproving the excesses of the British militant suffragettes was proposed by the delegates from Breslau to the Congress of German Woman Suffrage Associations which opened here to-day. The Congress rejected the motion as being beyond the competence of the German associations.

HALDANE'S ADVICE ON HOW TO SUCCEED

Chancellor Tells Students to Guard Themselves Against Depression Owing to Misfortune.

CULTIVATION OF URBANITY

"Jarring Manner" Should Be Avoided—Unselfishness a Cause of Strength in a Man.

LONDON, Nov. 15.—Viscount Haldane, the Lord Chancellor, as Honorary President of the Associated Societies of Edinburgh University delivered an address last night in Edinburgh, taking as his subject "The Conduct of Life."

Lord Haldane is celebrated for his ability to avoid the trite, and his reputation in this respect was well sustained in this address. Ex-Premier Balfour, Chancellor of the university, presided at the meeting and introduced Lord Haldane.

The Lord Chancellor said in part: "In life we are subject to all sorts of reverses, great and small. There is only one way of providing against the depression which they bring in their train, and that is by acquiring the large outlook which shows that they are not the most important things in life. The undergraduate may find himself plowed in an examination or in debt or for that matter (and do not let us overlook its possibility) hopeless in a love affair. Or he may suffer from the depression which is deepest when it arises from no external cause. If he would escape from the consequent sense of despair he must visualize his feelings and set them in relief by seeking and searching out their grounds.

"It is probably his best chance of deliverance. For these feelings often turn out on resolute scrutiny to arise from the obsession of his own personality. This obsession may assume varied forms. It may become really morbid. There is a remarkable book by a modern man of genius, one whom Nietzsche and Ibsen both held in high esteem—the 'Inferno' of August Strindberg—where you may read with advantage if you would be warned against a self-concentration that verges on the insane. There is another and better known book which in my time at the university was much read and which is, I think, still much read, Carlyle's 'Sartor Resartus.' There you have an analysis of the very process of deliverance of which I am speaking. The hero works out his own relief from the burden of his depression.

"You must aim at the largest and widest view of life and devote your highest energies to attaining it. This view of life, with its sustaining power, will come to you if you strive hard enough.

"The only foundation of what is abiding," said Lord Haldane in another part of his address, "is the sense of the reality of what is spiritual—the constant presence of the God who is not far away in the skies, but is within our minds and hearts.

"How is the student, with or without the supreme source of strength of which I have spoken, to prepare himself so that he will have the best chances of success? I have seen something of men and of affairs. I have observed the alternations of success and failure in various professions and occupations. I have myself experienced many ups and downs, and in the course of my own life have made abundant mistakes. It always interests me to look back and observe in the light of later and fuller knowledge how I came to fail on particular occasions. And the result of the scrutiny has been to render it clear that the mistakes and failures would nearly always have been avoided had I at the time been possessed of more real knowledge and of firmer decision and persistence.

"We all, or nearly all, get a fair number of chances in life. But we often do not know enough to be able to take them, and we still more often pass them by, unconscious that they exist. Get knowledge and get courage. And when you have come to a deliberate decision then go ahead, and go ahead with grim and unshakable resolution to persist."

Another piece of advice that the Chancellor gave was the cultivation of urbanity. "We may," he said, "be unconscious of the jarring manner; that is very common. But it ought to be avoided. It is worth the while of every one, and from every point of view, that of his own worldly interest included, to practice himself in the social virtue of courtesy and urbane manners. Let us accept what comes to us undisturbed.

"Given the same qualities, a man will be stronger as well as better, and will have more power of influencing circumstances as well as other people, if he is resolute in accepting without complaint what comes to him, and remembers the duties of his station in life, and thinks of others as much as of himself."

HEEDS ENGLAND'S REQUEST.

Austria to Let Canadian Pacific Resume Emigration Business.

VIENNA, Austria, Nov. 29.—The Austro-Hungarian Government, it is understood, is about to grant again to the Canadian Pacific Company the right to carry on emigration business in the dual monarchy.

This was withdrawn recently in consequence of allegations that the company's agents were assisting Austro-Hungarian subjects to evade military service by emigrating. The restoration of the right was, it is said, requested by the British Government.

Samuel Altmann, the principal agent of the company, was arrested on Oct. 1 on the charge of luring Austrian emigrants to Canada, but was released on Nov. 16 after a parliamentary committee had inquired into the charges.

EUROPE TO PROTECT EGRETS

Manufacturers of Plumes Offer Prize for Plan of Domestication.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

PARIS, Nov. 29.—Although the new American law against the importation of aigrettes has aroused such a fury of protest on this side of the ocean, it now seems likely that the majority of European countries will join in adopting measures protecting the birds from which the plumes come.

The great popularity of aigrettes and the enormous demand for them by women of fashion have at last aroused manufacturers to a realization that the beautiful birds are in serious danger of early extermination, and, as a matter of business precaution, plume manufacturers this week informed the Academy of Sciences that they would offer a prize of $2,000 to any one discovering a method of domesticating the egret and removing the plumes without killing the bird.

The offer will remain open for eight years. The academy has decided, however, that the egret is such a shy, wild bird that eight years is not long enough to allow for the discovery of a method of domesticating it, while on account of the great demand for plumes a period of eight years affords plenty of time in which to exterminate it. Hence an international commission will soon be called at Basel to prepare a programme for the protection of egrets and other wild birds and animals.

DANCE TANGO IN PRIVATE.

Americans Forego at Official Functions Steps Banned by Kaiser.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, Nov. 29.—Uncle Sam, in the person of his official representatives in Berlin, has been the first to bend the knee to the Kaiser's anti-tango decree.

At the request of Ambassador Gerard none of the banned dances, such as the tango, one-step, two-step, and turkey trot was tripped at Thursday night's Thanksgiving celebration of the American colony until Mrs. Gerard, her secretary, Mrs. Grew; the Naval Attaché, Capt. Gherardi and Mrs. Gherardi, and other members of the embassy had formally taken their leave. Then the company were at liberty to dance anything their transatlantic hearts desired, which included the latest variations of all the proscribed steps.

The tango, which would have reigned supreme at the American Embassy this Winter, will, of course, be tabooed officially in deference to the Kaiser's wishes.

GRIP SPREAD BY CARDS?

Paris Doctors Say Bridge May Cause an Epidemic.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

PARIS, Nov. 29.—Bridge, according to certain Paris doctors, may be responsible for a great epidemic this Winter unless some means be found to sterilize cards.

Warnings are issued that playing cards are peculiarly likely to carry infection, while the constant passing of the cards from hand to hand multiplies the chances of contagion.

Bridge, if one were to believe the Faculty of medicine, will be one of the surest means this Winter of spreading the grip.

Manufacturers have sought anxiously a method of sterilizing cards, but so far have been unsuccessful, because superstitious players say that the oil used brings bad luck.

ATROCITIES ROUSE BRITISH.

Government Urged to End Conditions in Rubber Trade.

LONDON, Nov. 29.—Immediate legislation effectually to bar British subjects from evading the Slave Trade Acts was urged in a memorial presented to Premier Asquith to-day by an influential committee.

The signatories stated that they had been stirred to action by the revelations made during the inquiry into the atrocities on the rubber fields of Putumayo, Peru, and by evidence that "conditions of native labor elsewhere in South America and other tropical and semi-tropical regions where British subjects and capital are operating are closely akin to slavery."

A demand for the revision of the anti-slavery treaties with foreign powers is also made by the memorialists with the object of insuring their application to "modern forms of slavery," and they suggest the appointment of a special body of consuls with roving commissions to visit the more inaccessible parts of the world and keep watch over native labor and commercial conditions.

Among the signatories of the memorial are the Archbishop of Canterbury, Lord Cromer, Lord Curzon, Viscount Milner, the Earl of Selborne, James Bryce, former British Ambassador at Washington; Sir Claude MacDonald, Chief Rabbi Hertz, and the Lord Mayor of London.

Must Use His Title in English.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

BERLIN, Nov. 29.—Titles conferred by American colleges may be used in Germany, but must not be translated. This is the decision of the Baden courts in the case of a German dentist who holds the degree of Doctor of Dental Surgery from a Pennsylvania college of dental surgery. Alleging that the English title is not understandable to the majority of his German patients, he applied for permission to translate it into "Doctor of Dentistry, Graduated in America." The petition was refused, and the court upheld the refusal.

HOW MAYOR NATHAN CAME TO RETIRE

Had Been Executive Head of the Eternal City for Over Six Years.

A LONDON JEW BY BIRTH

He Defended Rome Alike from the Vatican and from the Pseudo-Taste of Foreigners.

ROME, Nov. 21.—The most recent important event in Italian politics is not, as many may imagine, the general election sustaining the policies of Signor Giolitti, but the withdrawal from the Mayoralty of the Eternal City of Signor Ernesto Nathan, a man who for six years has defended the advance of Rome alike from the conservatism of the Vatican as well as from the over-anxiety of erudite foreigners, lest the city of the past should be utterly overwhelmed by the commercialism of the present.

When in 1906 the Anti-Clerical Party obtained for the first time since 1870, a majority of the Town Council, it had the difficulty of choosing one of their own members as Mayor. Few had had experience in executive office, and fewer still gave any promise of fitness. The office was offered to Don Scipione Borghese, but he declined, as he feared failure. Commendatore Vasai, head of the coalition, was approached, but he wished to remain near the throne for national purposes, so the lot fell to Ernesto Nathan, a disciple of Mazzini.

There were various valid arguments, from the Anti-Clerical standpoint, in favor of this apparently strange selection. Signor Nathan represented more than any one else the traditions of Mazzini, although he had himself ceased to be a Republican and had lectured on his great master before the King.

As a Jew and an ex-Master of Frees masonry (in Italy an anti-Clerical political association) he was peculiarly odious to the Vatican, which the blocco, in the first flush of its long-deferred victory, was anxious to slight. He was known to be a man of business and of scrupulous honesty, and he was financially independent, although (as Signor Giolitti subsequently discovered,) he did not pay sufficient in direct taxes to entitles him to be created a Senator—the great aim of his ambition, to which he has never attained.

But Signor Nathan had also serious defects. He was not a Roman, and his predecessor had been not only a Roman, but he was a great Roman Prince—Don Prospero Colonna. He was a Londoner by birth; and, if his English was not precisely that of John Bright, his Italian left much to be desired. Above all, he had a complete contempt for art and archaeology, and he looked at all questions from a purely utilitarian point of view. Now, in Rome art and archaeology cannot well be ignored, and consequently, when the Mayor spoke of eminent sculptors, who had agreed to criticise his schemes, as "the usual artists," or remarked, apropos of his proposal to join the three Capitoline Palaces, that "Michael Angelo altered other people's buildings, why should I not alter his?" he provoked the vehement opposition of the intellectual classes. His tenure of office has been, therefore, an almost continuous series of incidents between himself and the artists and archaeologists, and of late times his motto has been:

"I will not embalm Rome."

Signor Nathan had one other defect, which got him into frequent trouble—his fatal gift of eloquence. Beginning his Mayoralty with the famous telegram to the King of Sweden, which was addressed to "his capital of Christiania"—a telegram still remembered in Rome as a geographical masterpiece—he told a Congress of Archaeologists that "Rome is not a museum, but a modern city," addressed a mixed French audience on the folly of beatifying the national heroine, Joan of Arc, told a French Minister that he was "au desous," instead of "en dessus" the exigencies of his position, and greatly injured the Exhibition of 1911 by delivering a vehement attack upon the Oecumenical Council of 1870—a speech which led to an acrimonious controversy between the two Mayors of Rome and Montreal.

Signor Nathan in one sense resembled Frederick the Great, who bade the bill-stickers of Berlin paste the libels upon him lower, so that all might read them. Similarly, the Mayor went to the theatre and congratulated the actor who took him off in the famous comedy "La Turlupinade."

He possessed, too, the great gift of forgiveness; and the present writer, after a considerable controversy with Signor Nathan had been carried on in these columns on the subject of certain archaeological demolitions, was treated by him with marked courtesy.

The Italians say, however, that his adversaries found that he had, as the Italians say, "no baira on his tongue." As time went on, this ex-Democrat, after the fashion of Rabagas all the world over, became more and more autocratic, and flat contradiction of his opponents took the place of argument. In his zeal for the union of the three Capitoline Palaces, he not only trampled upon the unanimous decision of the Supreme Council of Antiquities and Fine Arts (composed of the fifteen most eminent artists and scholars in Italy,) but defied the Italian Government itself—a risky experiment when Signor Giolitti is in power. Politically, indeed, the Mazzinian Mayor has gravitated toward Conservatism.

He accepted a high decoration from the King, and an invitation to dine with another autocrat—him of All the Russias—at Racconigi, and thus lost Republican and Socialist support. He divided the more from the less aristocratic guests in most undemocratic fashion at the receptions of the Jubilee year; and he was on very friendly terms with "the great" who frequent social gatherings.

NECKLACE REWARD HELD UP

Question of Division of Money Is Still Unsettled.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Nov. 29.—There is a hitch in the arrangements for a division of the reward of £10,000 ($50,000) offered for the recovery of the pearl necklace belonging to Max Mayer and stolen in transit between Paris and London. MM. Branstatter and Quadranstein have left London without their due reward pending a settlement.

In addition to the reward Lloyds will have to pay the insured value of the four pearls that are still missing, two from the necklace and two pearls unattached.

The claim is admitted and it is stated that the amount to be paid has been agreed upon, but it is not disclosed.

Mr. Mayer puts the value of the missing necklace pearls at about $60,000, and that of the drop pearls at $6,000. The necklace in its present state he values at $700,000.

"The sum of £100,000," ($500,000,) he says, "is often paid for a painting. Why should not a similar amount be paid for a necklace which adds to the charm of woman?

"Dark or yellow pearls become dark women, while light pearls are worn to better advantage by women of fair complexion.

"During recent years the demand for pearls has increased, because the ostentatiousness of diamonds and rubies often offends the taste. A woman can easily wear $500,000 worth of pearls in excellent taste, but diamonds worth $100,000 would be very obtrusive."

Mr. Mayer said that so far as he knew his necklace was the most valuable in existence, but it was possible that necklaces bought for a far less sum ten or fifteen years ago were now worth more than his because of the great advance in their value.

"The trouble is," Mr. Mayer added, "that there are so few pearls of size and quality coming into the market. Only three pearls of real worth have been found in the largest fishery this year. There is approximately only one pearl of fine quality in a million, and it is probable that my necklace represents the pick of 100,000,000 pearls."

TO WATCH NAVY'S POWDER.

French Experts Will Detect Deterioration of Explosives.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Nov. 29.—Pierre Baudin, the Minister of Marine, announces that in a few weeks a new naval laboratory will be opened at Sevranlivry for special study and control of the explosives used in the navy with a view of preventing such accidents as the recent explosions on the battleships Iéna and Liberté.

The laboratory building and the materials will cost $120,000, and will be directed by M. Darzens, the chemistry professor at the Polytechnic, who will have under him naval officers and engineers of artillery.

The object is to control the manufacture and tests of all powders and also make arrangements to keep a sample of each lot of powder placed on given ships, &c., which is to put in conditions of heat and moisture more extreme than is usual in the service.

"You know," M. Baudin said, "that the two principal causes that work toward diminishing and finally destroying the stability of powders are heat and moisture. At the first sign of change or decomposition in the sample under our constant observation, the laboratory will notify the proper authorities and the bulk of which the sample was a part will be destroyed. A large margin of safety will thus be insured.

"My predecessor, Mr. Delcassé, had already arranged to have naval control of powder manufacture and a scientific means of determining when the moment of danger begins. With these means concentrated and directed at the new laboratory our sailors will know that their lives will be safe from accidents like those on the Iéna and Liberté."

REGRET VAN TYNE'S SPEECH

Americans Criticise Reference to the French in Our Revolution.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

PARIS, Nov. 29.—There is much unfavorable comment among the old American residents who attended the Thanksgiving dinner at the American Club last Wednesday night at what they considered the tactless speech of C. H. Van Tyne, the exchange professor, now lecturing before the French provincial universities, who was on the programme of speechmakers with Ambassador Herrick.

The part of the speech, to which exception was taken was:

"The French, in aiding the United States during the Revolution, acted selfishly and purely for the purpose of damaging England. Therefore it is useless to talk about our debt of friendship."

OUR INCOME TAX ALARMS THE FRENCH

Deductions from Interest on Securities Seem Unreasonable to Investors.

MAY SACRIFICE HOLDINGS

Ignorance of English Adds to Their Concern—French Banks May Ask Change in Law.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Nov. 29.—The American income tax this week caused consternation among the French holders of American securities on account of the paragraph in the statute which requires all foreigners to sign certificates proving that they are not American citizens before they can get their interest without the deduction of the tax.

THE NEW YORK TIMES correspondent has followed up his investigation of a week ago among American business men, among whom he discovered much dissatisfaction with the new statute on account of the requirements to pay the tax on incomes derived from France, by making another investigation this week among French bankers. He found that they declared that unless the law be modified American securities to the amount of many million dollars were likely to be dumped on the market.

The reason given is that the French resent outsiders prying into their business. There is also much ignorance on the part of French investors of both American law and the English language, all of which will cause utter misunderstanding and apprehension concerning the American securities.

As a matter of fact the deductions already made on the certificates paid to French holders have caused incipient panics at several banking institutions so far as American securities are concerned—many French holders who have not read the law are receiving interest coupons minus the tax reductions, and as they do not understand English, have been appearing in swarms, all volubly declaring their suspicions of American investments.

The bankers patiently try to explain that they must present certificates of their French citizenship through collecting agents in America, but all of this is utterly unintelligible to them.

The banks purpose asking for a modification of the law so as to allow such certificates to be presented through French banks, instead of being sent to America, in order to make their clients realize that their interests will be protected.

There are hundreds of millions in American securities invested among the French. Several bond issues of American railways and other corporations have been entirely sold in Paris, and in addition a vast number of American securities are held by the French rural population.

Several French institutions have asked the American Chamber of Commerce to aid them in presenting the matter adequately to the Federal Government and to suggest an answer to the question: How does America purpose to tell the French farmer in central France how to make his returns to the Collector of Internal Revenue, who does not exist in Europe?

SIX NEW RULES ON INCOME TAX

McAdoo Explains Its Relation to Foreign Firms and Licenses for Their Agents.

ALSO INTEREST ON BONDS

Department Hopes Latest Regulations Will Clear Many Objections to the Law.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 29.—Another series of important income tax regulations was issued to-day by the Secretary of the Treasury. There were six regulations in the series, all relating to the collection of the tax at the source.

It is the belief of Secretary McAdoo that these regulations, coupled with those promulgated last night and printed in THE NEW YORK TIMES this morning, will go far toward meeting the objections that have been raised by holders of bonds and others who were either puzzled by some features of the earlier regulations, or objected to them outright.

The regulations issued to-day prescribe the form of certificate to be furnished by foreign organizations not engaged in business in the United States and not subject to the income tax on interest or other income collectible at the source; to the license to be required for the collection of income received from foreign countries; to partnerships; to the designation of guardians, trustees, executors, administrators, agents, &c., as the "source," and as to making annual and list returns and withholding the tax; to the authority of duly authorized agents to sign certificates of ownership which accompany coupons or registered interest orders when presented for collection, and also as to the acceptance of certain certificate forms and changes in previous regulations so as to adapt them to the use of fiduciary agents and the use of foreign organizations and partnerships.

Those of the regulations issued to-day which relate to foreign bondholders are the result of conferences which Secretary McAdoo and Assistant Secretary John Skelton Williams and other Treasury officials held last week with representatives of leading international bond houses in New York.

One of these regulations relates to foreign organizations not engaged in business in the United States and not subject to the income tax. Here is its text:

"Regulations prescribing form of certificate to be furnished by foreign organizations not engaged in business in the United States, and not subject to the income tax on interest or other income collectible at the source.

"The certificate to be furnished by foreign organizations not engaged in business in the United States shall be in substantially the following form: of the.....a.....

I.....the.....
(give name.) (give official position.)
(name of organization.) (character of organization.)
of ..... located at.....
do solemnly declare that said.....

(give name of organization.)
organization, not engaged in business in the United States, and is the owner of $..... bonds of the denomination of $..... each, Nos. ..... of the.....
(give name of debtor.) (describe bonds.)
bonds, from which were detached the accompanying coupons, due ..... 191.., amounting to $....., or upon which there matured ..... 191.., $..... of registered interest, or is the owner of.....
(property or investments.)
upon which there was accrued ..... 191.. $..... of income, and that under the provisions of the income tax law of Oct. 3, 1913, said organization being a foreign organization, said interest or income is exempt from the payment of taxes collectible at the source, which exemption is hereby claimed.

Licenses for Collecting Agencies.

The second of the new regulations deals with license required for collection agencies of income from foreign countries. Its text follows:

"Supplemental regulations as to making applications, filing bond, and issuing licenses to collecting agencies of income from foreign countries:

"All persons, firms, or corporations undertaking for accommodation or profit (this includes handling either by way of purchase or collection) the collection of coupons, checks, bills of exchange, &c.—(a) For or in payment of interest upon bonds issued in foreign countries; (b) Upon foreign mortgages or like obligations, and (c) For any dividends upon stock or interest upon obligations of foreign corporations, associations, or insurance companies engaged in business in foreign countries—who are required by law to obtain a license from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, shall make application to the Collector of Internal Revenue for the district in which they do business for special license in the following form:

State of .....
County of .....

The undersigned (name and office) of (state name of person, firm, or corporation,) being duly sworn according to law, declares that on and after the ..... day of ....., 191.., he intends to engage in the business of collecting foreign income payments of interest or dividends by means of coupons, checks, or bills of exchange. The aggregate amount of annual collections of such foreign income at the principal and branch offices is estimated at $.....

The location of the principal and branch offices is as follows:

Principal office, ...
Branch offices, ...

Said person, firm, or corporation is now engaged in business as ..... and desires to conduct the business of collecting foreign income at the above address or addresses, and hereby makes application for license required to be secured by persons, firms, or corporations engaged in the business of collecting income from foreign countries under the provisions of Paragraph E of Section 2 of the Income Tax law of Oct. 3, 1913, and I (we) hereby premise and pledge myself (ourselves) to comply strictly with the provisions of said law and the rules and regulations of the Treasury Department which have been or may hereafter be issued in respect to the collection and payment of such foreign income.

Signed (name of firm or corporation.)

The Collector of Internal Revenue, upon receipt of such application, shall satisfy himself that the person, firm, or corporation making application is considered to be of good character and business standing and may require that he or they shall be able to show a financial rating in one or more of the recognized mercantile agencies of the United States equal to at least one-tenth of the estimated amount of annual collections of foreign income as stated in the application.

License Without Bond.

The Collector of Internal Revenue having thus satisfied himself of the business and financial reliability of the person, firm, or corporation making application for license may issue the license without requiring a bond for the faithful performance of duty and compliance with the law and regulations. The regulation then says:

"In cases where the person, firm, or corporation shall fail to satisfy the Collector of Internal Revenue of his or their business or financial reliability the Collector may refuse to issue license or may issue a license upon the applicant filing a surety bond satisfactory to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for a penal sum equal to 2 per cent. of the estimated amount of collections stated in the application, the minimum penal sum, however, to be $1,000 and the maximum not in excess of $100,000.

"The bond when required shall be executed in duplicate, one of which shall be retained in the office of the Collector of Internal Revenue with whom the bond is filed and the other shall be forwarded by the Collector to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue at Washington.

"The form of license to be issued shall be as follows:

License for collection of foreign income.

....., located and doing business at .....
having made application in accordance with the provision of Section 2 of the act of Oct. 3, 1913, and the regulations made in pursuance thereof, is hereby licensed to accept for collection coupons, checks, and bills of exchange for or in payment of interest upon bonds issued in foreign countries and upon foreign mortgages or like obligations and for the dividends upon stock of foreign corporations, foreign joint stock companies or associations, or foreign insurance companies engaged in business in foreign countries, from ....., 191.., until revoked.

This license will not be valid until countersigned by the Collector of Internal Revenue for the district in which issued.

Countersigned,
....., Collector.
District .....
Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

"This license, made up in the form of bound books containing fifty each with appropriate stubs, will be furnished in blank to the Collector of Internal Revenue with the fac simile signature of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue thereon.

No License Fee.

"This license may be issued without cost to the persons to whom issued and shall continue in full force until revoked. Failure to give or renew the bond in cases where a bond is required will automatically revoke the license.

"In cases where licenses are issued without bond, the Collector shall, at stated yearly periods, inquire into and satisfy himself of the financial responsibility of all licensees.

"When any person, firm, or corporation has branch offices and desires to collect said coupons, interest, or dividend income through said branch office, the application for license or licenses shall be made (and bond furnished when a bond is required) by the person, firm, or corporation through its principal office for its branch office or offices.

"The bond in such cases shall be based upon the total amount of such foreign business transacted by both the home office and its branch office or offices.

"This application for licenses shall be made (and bond furnished when bond is required) to the Collector of Internal Revenue for the district in which the principal or home office is located.

"No bond will be required in any case for the month of December, 1913, but the regular license may be issued by Collectors of Internal Revenue immediately upon receipt of the blank licenses in all cases where the applications for licenses which may have been filed shall have been duly approved.

"The bond, if required, must be filed for the calendar year 1914, and for each calendar year thereafter. All bonds must be renewed or new bonds furnished on or before Jan. 1 of each successive year."

Rules for Partnerships.

The third of the new regulations deals wholly with partnerships in connection with collection of income at the source. Here is the text:

"Inasmuch as individual members of a partnership are liable for income tax upon their respective interest in the net earnings of said partnership, and are required to include said net earnings in their personal returns, the partnership may file with the debtor corporation or with a withholding agent a notice signed in the name of the partnership, by a member thereof, claiming a deduction of a specific amount on account of the legitimate expense (not including the personal or living expenses of the parners) incurred in conducting the business of said partnership, and upon receipt of said notice, said withholding agent shall not withhold, and shall not be held liable for, the normal tax on the amount of income equal to the amount of deduction claimed in said notice, but in no event shall the total of the amount claimed as provided herein be in excess of the total amount of the actual legitimate annual expenses incurred by said partnership in the conduct of its business. Application for such deduction shall be made in substantially the following form:

I, ..., a member of the firm or partnership of ....., and residing at ....., do solemnly declare that the said (give full address) ..... partnership is the owner of $..... bonds of the denomination of $..... each, Nos. ....., ..., ..., ..., ... of the ..... (name of debtor,) known as ..... (describe the particular issue of bonds) bonds, from which were detached the accompanying interest coupons, due ....., 191.., amounting to $....., or upon which there matured $..... of registered interest, or is the owner of ..... upon which there accrued $..... of income.

We hereby claim a deduction of $....., allowed on account of said ....., under regulations made in pursuance of Section 2, act of Oct. 3, 1913, and do solemnly declare that neither the partnership nor its individual members has claimed deductions in excess of its total actual legitimate annual expenses of said partnership, not including the living or personal expenses of the partners, for the same period.

(Signing for)
(Name of partnership) .....
(Address) .....

"Partnerships are not subject as partnerships to the income tax, and are required to make statements of their income and earnings as partnerships only when requested to do so by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue or the Collector of Internal Revenue for the district in which said partnership has its principal place of business, and when such a statement is required as aforesaid the said statement shall give a complete and correct report of the gross income of the said partnership and also a complete account of the actual legitimate annual expenses of conducting the business of said partnership (not including living and personal expenses of the partners) and the net profits and the name and address of each of the members of said partnership and their respective interest in the net profits thus reported.

"The net annual income of a partnership when apportioned and paid to the members thereof shall be returned by each individual partner receiving same in his annual return of net income and the tax shall be paid thereon by said individual partner as required by law.

"When the annual income of a partnership is not distributed and paid to the members thereof, the respective interest of each member in said profits shall be ascertained, and the individuals entitled thereto shall include the said amount in their annual return as part of their gross income, the same as if said profits had been distributed and paid to them.

"Undivided annual net income of partnerships thus returned by the individual members thereof, upon which the tax shall have been paid, shall not, when said profits are actually distributed and paid to the partners, be again included in their annual return as part of their gross income.

Foreign Partnerships.

"Foreign partnerships or firms, all the members of which are both citizens or subjects and residents of a foreign country, which are the owners of bonds and mortgages or deeds of trust or other similar obligations, including equipment trust agreements, receivers' certificates, and stocks, of corporations, joint stock companies or associations and insurance companies, organized or doing business in the United States, may file with the debtor or withholding agent, with their coupons or orders for registered interest, or orders for other income derived from property or investments in the United States, certificate and notice of ownership, setting forth the facts as non-residence and alienship, and the debtor or withholding agent shall not withhold any part of their said income.

"Where a foreign partnership or firm is composed of both non-resident foreigners and citizens of the United States, or foreigners resident in the United States or its possessions, the certificate of ownership shall show this fact, and the name and legal address of each member of said partnership who is a citizen of the United States or who is a foreigner residing in the United States or its possessions, shall be given on the said certificate, and no part of said income shall be withheld by the paying agent.

"The said certificate and notice of ownership shall be in substantially the following form:

Form of certificate to be presented with coupons or interest or other income orders detached from bonds or other obligations owned by partnerships or firms of foreign countries:

"I ....., a member of the firm or partnership of ....., and residing at .....,
(give full address)
do solemnly declare that the said partnership is the owner of $.... bonds of the denomination of $.... each of the.....
(give name of debtor)
of the ..... known as .....
(describe the particular issue of bonds) from which were detached the accompanying interest coupons, due ....., 191... amounting to $....., or upon which there matured ....., 191.., $..... of registered interest or is the owner of .....
(property or investments)
upon which there has accrued ....., 191.., $..... of income, and that all the members of said firm or partnership, except ....., (give name and address of partners not non-resident aliens) are non-resident foreigners, and as such are exempt from the income tax imposed on such income by the United States Government under the law enacted Oct. 3, 1913, and that no citizen of the United States wherever residing, or foreigner residing in the United States, or any of its possessions, except those named above, has any interest in said bonds, coupons, or interest.

Name of partner signing, ...;
Of the firm of ....."

Certificates of Ownership.

The fourth of the new regulations is supplemental to others previously issued relative to the duty of authorized agents' authority to sign certificates of ownership. Its full text follows:

"Certificates of ownership, which are required to accompany all coupon or registered interest orders under regulations made in pursuance of Section 2, act of Oct. 3, 1913, may be signed in the name of the owner of the bonds, by his duly authorised agent, and the said certificates shall give the full name and address of both the owner and his authorized agent.

"If the person, firm, or organization to whom the certificate thus signed is presented for collection is reasonably satisfied as to the identity and responsibility of the person signing as duly authorized agent, he or it shall stamp or write on the face of said certificate 'satisfied as to identity and responsibility of agent,' giving name and address of person thus certifying, and said certificate may then be accepted by persons, firms, or organisations to whom presented, without requiring further evidence as to authority of agent.

"If the person, firm, or organization first receiving certificate of ownership signed by an agent is not satisfied or cannot satisfy himself or itself as to the agent's identity and responsibility, then in that event the authorized agent shall furnish evidence of his authority so to act, which evidence will be retained by the person, firm, or organization receiving it, and the certificate of ownership shall then be indorsed as provided herein."

Trustees and Fiduciary Agents.

The fifth of the new series of regulations is very important to trustees and fiduciary agents, whose duty it will be to aid in the collection of the new income tax at the source. There has been much correspondence between trustees and the Treasury Department concerning the exact status of the former. Here is the regulation:

"Supplemental regulations designating guardians, trustees, executors, administrators, agents, &c., as the 'source' for purpose of collecting income tax and as to making annual and list returns and withholding tax.

"Guardians, trustees, executors, administrators, agents, receivers, conservators, and all persons, corporations or associations acting in any fiduciary capacity hereinafter referred to and known as the fiduciary who hold in trust an estate of another person or persons shall be designated the 'source' for the purpose of collecting the income tax and by filing the following notice with other debtors or withholding agents said fiduciary shall be exempt from having any income due to them as such withheld for any income tax by any other debtor or withholding agent.

"Other debtors or withholding agents upon receipt of this notice shall refrain from withholding any part of such income from said fiduciary, and will not, in such case, be held liable for normal tax of 1 per cent. due thereon. The form of notice to be filed with the debtor or withholding agent by the fiduciary shall be substantially as follows:

"The following form of certificate should be filed with the debtor, or its paying agents, at the time of the payment to the fiduciary, or his representative, of all coupons, interest orders, rents, and all other kinds of income whatsoever, upon which the tax on income is required to be withheld at the source.

"I (we) do solemnly declare that I (we)

Acting for and in the capacity as stated herein, I (we) hereby assume the duty and responsibility imposed upon withholding agents under the law of withholding and paying the income tax due, for which I (we) may be liable, and acting in said fiduciary capacity as stated herein, I (we) do hereby claim exemption from having the normal tax withheld from said income.

Returns by Fiduciary Agents.

"Said fiduciaries shall on or before March 1 of each year, when the annual interest of any beneficiary in said income is in excess of $3,000, make and render a return of the income of the persons for whom they act to the Collector of Internal Revenue of the district in which the fiduciary resides.

"This return shall give an itemized statement of the gross income and deductions claimed, and shall be in the same form as prescribed for annual return made by individuals.

"Said fiduciary acts for and in behalf of the beneficiaries of said trust; in the annual return required as above in behalf of said beneficiaries has reference only to the income accruing and payable through said fiduciary and not the income of said beneficiaries from other sources, unless the said fiduciary is legally authorized to act for said beneficiaries in their individual capacity, in which case said fiduciary, acting as duly authorized agent of the individual, shall also make the personal annual return as provided by law.

"There shall accompany the annual return of said fiduciary a list giving the name and full address of each beneficiary and the share of said income to which each may be entitled.

List Returns by Agents.

"Fiduciary agents, in addition to the annual return of income required by these regulations, shall make an annual list return, as provided by regulations for withholding agents, whenever payment of income to any beneficiary is in excess of $3,000. Said list return shall be made on or before March 1 of each year to the Collector of Internal Revenue for the district in which said fiduciary resides or has his principal place of business, giving name and address of each beneficiary of said trust to whom annual income in excess of $3,000 is paid, the amount of income paid to each beneficiary, giving source of income, the amount of exemption claimed by each beneficiary, if any, and the amount of income withheld for tax, and the said list return shall be signed by the fiduciary making same, stating in what capacity acting, and give his name and full address.

"Fiduciaries having an annual income that is not distributed or paid to the beneficiaries of the trust under which said fiduciary acts shall make an annual list return, as provided herein, and said return shall show the name and address of each beneficiary having a distributive interest in said income in excess of $3,000, stating the distributive amount of each beneficiary, and shall give all information as required in said list returns, and shall withhold and pay to the collector as provided by law the normal tax of 1 per cent. upon the distributive interest of each of said beneficiaries in excess of $3,000, the same as if said income was actually distributed and paid; exemption under Paragraph C, however, may be claimed by the beneficiary of his legal representative by filing his claim for exemption with the fiduciary agent.

"When the fiduciary agents deduct, withhold and pay the normal tax on undivided annual net income as provided herein, they shall not be required to withhold and pay again the normal tax on said income when actually distributed and paid to said beneficiaries, nor shall the beneficiaries be required again to pay the normal tax on the amounts on which the tax has been paid when such amounts are distributed.

"Where the normal tax is withheld and paid by fiduciary agents on undivided annual income, beneficiaries (or their legal representatives) in whose behalf said tax is paid may file notice with said fiduciary and claim the benefit of any annual exemption they may be entitled to under Paragraph C of the act of October 3, 1913, as provided by regulations, the same as if their distributive interest in said income was actually paid."

Some time ago the department gave instructions respecting the use of what was designated as "Form 1,000" of a certificate to be presented with coupons in interest orders stating whether or not exemption was claimed under Paragraph C, Section 2, of the income tax law. Another form known as "Form 1,001" was prescribed for the certificate to be furnished by organizations not subject to tax on interest at the source; also a form known as "Form 1,003" for the certificate to be filled out and signed by members of partnerships; and also a form known as "Form 1,004" for the certificate to be presented with coupons or interest orders detached from bonds or other obligations owned by those who are both citizens, or subjects, and residents of foreign countries.

Uses of New Forms.

The sixth of the new regulations issued to-day is supplemental in character, and adapts these forms for use by fiduciary agents and for the use of foreign organizations and partnerships. Here is the new regulation:

"Supplemental instructions as to acceptance of certificate Form 1,000 as originally prescribed in regulation of Oct. 25, 1913, and the original and amended Form 1,000 as it has been adapted to the use of fiduciary agents, and certificate Forms 1,001, 1,003, and 1,004 as they have been adapted to the use of foreign organizations and partnerships.

"Certificates of ownership, Form 1,000, as originally prescribed in regulations of Oct. 25, 1913, shall be accepted by debtors or withholding agents when properly filled in and signed by the owner of the bonds or his duly authorized agent until Dec. 10, 1913, and after that date only the amended Form 1,000, as prescribed by regulations, shall be accepted.

"Form 1,000, original and amended, as it has been adapted to the use of guardians, trustees, executors, administrators, agents, receivers, conservators, and all persons, corporations, or associations acting in a fiduciary capacity when properly filled in and signed and given the information required by the regulations, shall be accepted by debtors or withholding agents until regulations giving a prescribed form of certificate of ownership for fiduciary agents are issued, and for thirty days thereafter.

"Forms 1,001, 1,003, and 1,004, as they have been adapted to the use of foreign organizations and foreign partnerships, when properly filled in and signed, and giving the information required by regulations, shall be accepted by debtors or withholding agents until regulations giving a prescribed form of certificate of ownership for foreign organizations and foreign partnerships are issued, and for thirty days thereafter.

FERRERO ON AMERICA.

Italian Historian Talks of Her Influence on Europe.

PARIS, Nov. 22.—Guglielmo Ferrero, the Italian historian, author of "The Greatness and Decadence of Rome" lectured here the other evening under the auspices of the Societe des Conferences Etrangeres on "America and the Crisis of old Europe." Some of his characterizations have been cabled to the American press, concerning the general complaint that the decline in art, literature, good manners, and even cooking noticeable in the Old World could be traced to America. Others have not. These show that the historian did not intend to condemn America so thoroughly but merely to point out that her private accumulations of wealth might be better employed than they are at present. He said:

"The old civilizations of Europe which are poor in material wealth are also slow in production, but in all things they strive to attain a difficult standard of artistic, literary, moral, or religious perfection. Almost all the industries of the past bear an artistic character, and the greatest importance is attached to the decorative arts, to questions of personal morality, to ceremonial, and to forms.

"In a word, quality counts for more than quantity. America is preeminently the land of quanity, but it is also true of Europe that it has entered upon a quantitative phase of history.

"The perfection of Greek art was only rendered possible when the Greeks renounced the ambition to extend their Empire over the world and its wealth. The modern world in conquering vast deserts by the railway has rendered many artistic and moral perfections which were the glory of the ancients.

"There is great advantage in classical studies even if they are to be reinvested with their old artistic and literary character and are aimed at preserving in the human mind the ideal of aesthetic perfection. The new bararism will, perhaps, not burn libraries and destroy statutes like the old, but what is the use of filling museums with works of art if there be no public to appreciate their beauty? Precisely because fire seems about to become master of the Old World and the supreme divinity of mankind, as it was at the dawn of history, it is necessary that in Europe and in America an elite should continue to cultivate the Muses, and amid the intrusive noise of machinery should remain capable of perceiving and enjoying the sweet harmony that breaths in the poetry of Virgil."

Reception for Jewish Poet.

Previous to his departure for Palestine a reception will be given to Solomon Bloomgarden ("Yehoash"), at the Carnegie Music Hall, Dec. 20. A literary and musical programme has been arranged. The works of the "Yehoash" comprise seven volumes in poetry and prose and have a high place in Yiddish literature. The Committee of Arrangements includes Herman Bernstein, Joseph Barondess, Dr. J. L. Magnes, and Alexander Harkavy. Tickets may be obtained from David Verbelowsky, 85 Canal Street.

CAPT. SCOTT'S SON AN OUTDOORS BOY

Little Peter Trained for a Strenuous Life, as the Explorer Wished.

IS A VIGOROUS SWIMMER

Only Four, He Takes Sea Baths in November — Never Wears a Hat or Shoes.

LONDON, Nov. 12.—The last message that Capt. Robert F. Scott left to his wife in regard to their little son Peter—the child whom he had scarcely seen when he started on his tragic journey—was as follows:

Make the boy interested in natural history if you can; it is better than games; they encourage it at some schools.

I know you will keep him in the open air.

Above all, he must guard and you must guard him against indolence.

Make him a strenuous man.

I had to force myself into being strenuous, as you know—had always an inclination to be idle.

Scott's wishes with regard to his little son are being carried out to the full. Little Peter, who is not yet 4, has always been brought up as a strenuous, open-air boy. Every morning he plunges into a cold bath. This he has never missed since he was 4 months old. Instead of objecting to cold water, as most little boys are inclined to do, he just chuckles and makes a tremendous splashing. Winter, and Summer this cold bath comes alike to him. In addition to this, he toddles to a swimming bath three times every week, and can hardly be induced to leave the water; for Peter, despite his very tender years, is a really fine swimmer. He dives as well as he swims, and recently, despite the fact that it is November, has been swimming in the sea.

Another peculiarity of Peter is that he is a strict vegetarian. He has never tasted meat. He has always been an open-air boy. And, more than this, he does not believe in clothes. He never wears more than a single linen garment which leaves his firm legs bare, and he never wears a hat or shoes.

It is a curious coincidence that Capt. Scott expressed a wish that his little son should take up natural history. For, so The Daily Mirror says, it is Peter's own particular wish, young as he is, that he should be a biologist. His favorite book at the present time is a work on anatomy. He is always looking at it, and cannot be taken away from it. Peter's great treat is to be taken to the South Kensington Natural History Museum by his mother. This happens some two or three times a week. When he is naughty it is his punishment not to be taken there. He paid a long visit to the museum yesterday afternoon and travelled to and from his home in an open car, his golden curls all tousled by wind.

Peter Scott is a richer boy than he is capable of realizing at present, for he is to have $17,500 "for his very own." This is derived from the Capt. Scott Fund contributed from all parts of the British Empire. Peter's interest in the fund does not stop with his $17,500. The fund's grant of $42,500 to Lady Scott will be a trust, and after her death the trust money will go to Peter. Peter, directly he is old enough, will be sent to Mr. Helbert's preparatory school at Winchester. After that he will go to a public school, which has not yet been fixed upon.

KING MANUEL TARRIES.

Failure to Arrive at Mansion Near London Causes Speculation.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

LONDON, Nov. 29.—King Manuel's failure to arrive yesterday at the Fulwell Park mansion at Twickenham, which he took on his marriage, is causing much speculation in the neighborhood. The house is now ready for King Manuel's occupancy after a complete overhauling and decorating.

The ex-monarch had announced his arrival with his bride for yesterday. Notice of his return on the date fixed was canceled, and further information is unavailable.

GENERAL'S SON IN POVERTY.

Had to Tell Pitiful Story to Police When He Restored Ring He Found.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Nov. 29.—A romance revealed itself in a Paris police station this week when a young man in tattered clothes and with his left arm in a sling, but possessing the appearance of a gentleman, presented himself to the Police Inspector and turned over a valuable pearl ring, which he said he had found in a gutter. The Inspector demanded his papers of identification, and was greatly surprised when he discovered that the name of the wretched looking youth was Vicomte de Bourgogne, son of the late Gen. de Bourgogne, who held a high command in the French army twelve years ago.

The young man said his father died, leaving fourteen children to divide an extremely small fortune. He himself had been graduated from the cavalry school at Saumur and had held a commission in the army, but his career had been destroyed when a motoring accident left him with a paralyzed arm. He fell into poverty, and, not wishing to appeal to the charity of his friends, was now living in destitution in a garret which he shared with three others in an obscure part of Paris.

LONDON TO HEAR DR. COOK.

Will Lecture First and Then May Go Into Vaudeville.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Nov. 29.—Dr. F. A. Cook has announced his arrival in London next week. Only one paper, The Express, has thus far taken any notice of his coming. This prints the following paragraph:

"Dr. Cook without his Etookishook. Those who still believe in the veracity of Dr. Cook of North Pole fame, as well as possibly the music hall patrons, will soon have the opportunity of submitting their credulity to practical test. Dr. Cook is expected next week in London, and if the public lecture, which he is announced to deliver at Royal Albert Hall, proves satisfactory, he will later make his bow at an important music hall. At Royal Albert Hall it is stated that no definite date has yet been fixed for the lecture."

TO HONOR J. M. RICHARDS.

Committee Will Entertain Him on Golden Wedding Anniversary.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Nov. 29.—Dec. 31 is the golden wedding anniversary of John Morgan Richards, the father of the late "John Oliver Hobbes," and it is intended to entertain Mr. and Mrs. Richards at dinner. Mr. Richards came to London from America in 1867.

A committee has been formed, with Lord Northcliffe as Chairman, supported by the Hon. Harry Lawson, Sir W. Robertson Nicoll, T. P. O'Connor, Sir George Riddell, C. Arthur Pearson, and Robert Donald, President of the Institute of Journalists.

Against Students' Intemperance.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

BERLIN, Nov. 29.—Another blow has been struck at excessive drinking by students—this time by the Governing Board of the University of Halle. It is but a few days since the Governors of Bonn University warned students that drunkenness would not be accepted as an excuse for disciplinary breaches. Now come the Governors of Halle with a similar notice.

BEHIND THE SCENES OF DUAL ALLIANCE

Formative Influences Which Brought About the Franco-Russian Entente.

SOME IMPORTANT MEMOIRS

M. de Freycinet Relates for the First Time the Familiar Way the Negotiations Began.

PARIS, Nov. 21.—Few students of contemporary history know that when the Czar of Russia first announced in a speech the entente between his country and France that negotiations to that end had been proceeding for nearly ten years. In the memoirs of M. de Freycinet, published to-day, one learns for the first time the altogether unusual initial phases of the Franco-Russian alliance. M. de Freycinet says:

"Early in November, 1888, occurred an apparently trivial incident which was destined to have considerable influence on our foreign policy. The Grand Duke Vladimir of Russia, whom I had had the honor of meeting, expressed a wish to have a conversation with me. I went to the Louvre Hotel, where he was staying, and there, without more ado, the Grand Duke said to me that he knew with what energy we were pushing on the manufacture of our new rifle, and that he would be pleased himself to handle the weapon of which every one spoke so highly. 'I am something of a connoisseur, and I should be pleased to possess a specimen with several cartridges. It will amuse me to experiment with it. You can be certain that it will not leave my hands.

"Somewhat surprised by this unexpected request, I asked him to allow me to consult my colleagues in the Government, as all war material is the property of the State, and no portion of it, however small, can be alienated without certain formalities. At the Council of Ministers on Nov. 6 I told of my visit to his Highness, reminding the council that the rifle could only be handed over by virtue of a Presidential decree. We were soon quite agreed that if the Grand Duke insisted we could not refuse his request. It would be necessary, however, in the first place to call his express attention to the necessity of keeping secret not only the mechanism of the weapon, but the fact that it had been handed to him. At the same time we decided that this communication should be made by Gen. Mathieu, who as a public official intrusted with a mission could speak more precisely than I had done.

"On the following day the General saw the Grand Duke, who seemed more eager then ever, and promised absolute discretion. On Nov. 8 the decree was signed at the Ministerial Council, and Gen. Mathieu personally handed the rifle and the cartridges to his Highness, who requested him to convey to me his warmest thanks. Obviously the examination of the weapon produced a favorable impression on the Grand Duke. Two months later the Russian Military Attaché, Baron Fredericks, came and asked me if our artillery would be willing to manufacture in our workshops for the Russian Government a rifle resembling ours. I promised him to look into the matter, and to give him a reply in a few days.

"I reported the conversation to the Council, observing that it might offer the opportunity of more intimate relations with Russia. All my colleagues, and Floquet and Goblet at their head, shared my opinion. I was in consequence authorized to continue the pourparlers, which became more frequent as a result of the arrival in Paris of several generals of the Russian artillery. Gen. Mathieu received orders to place himself at their complete disposal, and soon between them and our artilleryman most friendly relations were established. Some time later Russian engineers were sent to study our powder works, with a view to the erection of similar establishments in Russia. I enabled them to visit the factory of Sevran-Livry, and they admired the arrangements.

"In the course of the negotiations Baron Fredericks inquired if our manufactory of Chatellerault would accept an offer for 500,000 rifles, which would be probably followed by a second order for the same number. 'Most willingly,' I said, 'and we will talk about it again as soon as I have consulted with the competent authorities. We should like to be certain, however,' I added, half in jest, 'that these rifles will never be used against us.' He replied in the same tone, 'That is our feeling, too, and we will give you every guarantee.'

"This led to another negotiation, which finally ended in the Franco-Russian alliance. One day when I was alone in the drawing-room of Count von Münster-Ledenberg, the German Ambassador, with his daughter, Countess Marie, he said suddenly, 'What interest is driving you into the arms of Russia? Believe me, nothing good ever comes out of the East.' That was a favorite saying of his. He had spent a considerable time at St. Petersburg as Chargé d'Affaires, and had not a very pleasant memory of it. His preference was first for the English, whose bearing and manners he had acquired, and then for France, of whose spirit and culture he was a warm admirer.

"'My dear Count,' I replied, 'between the Russians and us there exists an old friendship which was manifested during the First Empire, and later beneath the walls of Sebastopol. It is also very natural that we should seek a counterpoise to your Triple Alliance.' 'Where is the need for it?' he replied. 'The Triple Alliance does not threaten you. Whereas you, who are pugnacious, if you ally yourselves with Russia, will attack us.'

"I protested, assuring him that our only desire was self-defense, and as he continued to question the utility of the new alliance I said: 'That you do not want to attack us, I can quite believe, but who knows what may happen with your new Emperor? Now that he has dismissed Bismarck he may yield to his bellicose tendencies.'

"'Make no such mistake,' broke in the Countess Marie, who so far had taken no part in the conversation. 'If know William well. I often played with him when I was a child. I never pass through Berlin without going to see him. He has strong religious sentiments, and would never provoke a war.' Often afterward Countess Marie said to me, 'Was I not right? You see that William is a peace lover.'

"M. de Freycinet, however, continued to question the perspicacity of the Countess. He had no doubt of the good disposition of the Emperor, but events very often do not depend altogether on the will of one person.

"As regards the Egyptian question, the book insists on the error committed by the Chamber in refusing on July 29, 1882, to participate with England in the protection of the Suez Canal from the fear of international complications. This vote, as will be remembered, brought about the resignation of the Freycinet Cabinet. M. de Freycinet says:

"On July 30 I received the visit of the Prince von Hohenlohe. He came to tell me that the Berlin Cabinet, adopting my point of view, was ready, if I wished it, to propose a collective protection of the canal in whatever form I should judge most practicable. This communication entirely justified the confidence I expressed in the Chamber the day before in the conciliatory disposition of the powers. Had I received it twenty-four hours earlier I should have been able to furnish the Chamber with the positive proof it required, and the issue of the debate would have been entirely different.

"On July 31 and Aug. 1 the approval of Italy and Russia reached me. Even Turkey withdrew her objections. From this it is evident that I was entirely right when, on July 27, after the reading of the report of the commission, I opposed the immediate debate demanded by our opponents. My only error was that I did not ask for a longer postponement of the discussion, which would have been granted me. Furnished with all these offers of support from the powers, I could have overcome the scruples of the Chamber."

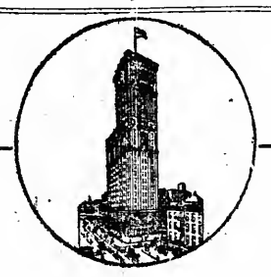
MME. POEKES ACQUITTED.

Paris Jury Finds Her Not Guilty of Murdering Her Husband.

PARIS, Nov. 29.—The Seine Assizes Court to-day acquitted of murder Mme. Suzanne Poekes, whose husband, a Paris business man, was found dead in bed in his home here last June with five bullets in his body and one bullet in his head.

The defense claimed that the woman loved her husband and that there was no motive for desiring his death. In explaining the number of wounds in the body, the woman said that Poekes had attempted to commit suicide and had shot himself in the head and that the five shots in his body were fired accidentally while she was struggling to take the revolver away from him.

Three days after the shooting, and while in Saint Lazare Prison, Mme. Poekes became a mother.



OFFICES TO LET

Before securing a location for an office in New York City, investigate the choice offices for rent in one of the best known and most centrally located office buildings in the world. It is the boast of the Englishman that if one stands upon the Strand in London long enough, he will there meet every man he ever knew, because every one must, at some time, pass through that thoroughfare. The same could probably be said of Times Square. No other spot on the American Continent is more used by the American people. An office in the building located at the juncture of Broadway and 42d Street and 7th Avenue, is surely one of the best in the world. Call at the office of the Rental Agent and investigate.

The Painted Furniture of Sheraton's Days

NOTHING perhaps is more suggestive of the lavender-scented Sleeping Chambers, which may still be found in some sleepy old Cathedral City of England, than the painted bed-room.

Such painted furniture as this, reproducing with exactness the delicate fancies of Sheraton and his contemporaries, takes a noteworthy place among our Hampton Shops Reproductions. From Bedsteads such as these with the gaiety of their painted floral decorations and the airy fragility of their spider-web cane-work, from the long roomy Dressing Tables with their tapering legs, or from the cushioned Chairs of inviting elegance, may be chosen fit furnishings for the bed-room of today.

A CHANGE NEAR AT HAND.

There is no question that rebellion in Mexico is making headway. As VILLA moves southward, from Juarez to Chihuahua and thence toward the capital, (for there is scarcely a doubt that he will occupy Chihuahua without much resistance,) it may be confidently expected that large numbers of Federal troops will desert to his standard, as the soldiers of MAXIMILIAN enlisted, when opportunity offered, in the forces of ESCOBEDO and DIAZ. They will still be fighting for Mexico, and the cause of HUERTA cannot be considered inspiring. The end of HUERTA'S rule, in fact, is now so close at hand that the question of the succession takes on a grave aspect.

VILLA says that CARRANZA will join him, and that their forces will go southward together. He does not pretend that he will go as a follower of CARRANZA. At this moment, this experienced bandit and guerrilla, PONCHA VILLA, is the most potent military commander in Mexico. Indian blood preponderates in his veins, and he has never been regarded until now as a force to be reckoned with in the government of the country. If he conquers and is willing to share the honors of conquest with CARRANZA and others who have some intelligible idea of civic government, all may yet go well in Mexico; if he turns out to be another OROZCO, the plight of the country may be worse than ever. We cannot look for a fairer beginning than MADERO made, when he established DE LA BARRA as Provisional President, and patiently awaited the result of the elections. Yet what humiliation and distress for Mexico followed the Madero Administration! The elimination of HUERTA, however, who has so shamelessly misused his power, is in sight, and that will be a great relief. We must hope that VILLA will prove tractable, that ZAPATA will be suppressed, and peace established.

MR. ROOT TO THE RESCUE.

It is of good augury for his party that Senator ROOT is to lay before a party conference a plan for the reorganization of the State Government which would make the management of its affairs simpler, easier, and cleaner, and would largely do away with the monopoly of politics now enjoyed by the professionals of each party.

The plan that is attributed to the Senator embraces a Direct Primary bill, a short ballot, the Massachusetts form of ballot, and the establishment of a State Board of Estimate. The first we are inclined to regard as a concession to the sentiment of the so-called Progressives. In itself the direct primary is no more a safeguard against professional monopoly than the representative system; is in fact likely to be rather a help to the professionals unless these are robbed of their rich opportunities by the shortening and simplifying of the ballot. The short ballot is clearly the most important element in any practical plan of reform. It makes it possible for the voter to do a great deal with little effort, to form a reasonable judgment readily and to put it into effect at a single election. It is, in substance, abolishes the business of politicians in great degree and withdraws from them the machinery by the control of which they now dominate political affairs.

It is reported that Senator ROOT contemplates reducing the number of elected State officers to three, or even to two, the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, and the Controller, or possibly the first two. The latter provision would be the better. There is no more need of electing a State Controller than of electing a United States Secretary of the Treasury. If the office remain elective, it would be filled without due care, attention being concentrated on the office of Chief Executive. If the Governor be elected with the power of appointment of the finance officer, as well as of the other heads of departments in his hands, he will be held to a closer responsibility. In the Federal Government it has been found that the choice of a Secretary of the Treasury has had more to do with the success of an Administration than almost any other single power. The same thing would be true in the case of a Governor. The one thing imperatively needed is to centre the thought and judgment of the voters on a single officer. This may seem a radical suggestion to those accustomed to our present elaborate and confused method, but it is shown by extensive experience in the Federal Government to be entirely rational.

As to the suggestion of a State Board of Estimate, we take it that that is intended to create a body which shall keep a clear and orderly account of the resources, receipts, and expenditures of the State and act in the capacity of a Budgetary Committee. It can hardly be intended to create in the State such a body as we have in this city. There are material differences in the situation of the city and that of the State. Here the Board of Estimate is in practice the legislative body, so far as concerns the appropriations, which are made by the board, while the Aldermen can only reduce such as they do not approve. The Chief Executive in the city, moreover, has the power of veto only in a limited degree. He can act only on the reductions made by the Aldermen. Such a body, with such powers, would hardly fit into the framework of the State, where the power of appropriation is in the hands of the Legislature, and where the Governor can veto any item, or items, of appropriation bills at discretion. It is, however, of great importance that there shall be some sort of organized and deliberate preparation of bills affecting revenue and disbursement, and toward this a body outside of the Legislature might be devised that would be useful. The matter is obviously subordinate to the main purpose.

And the main purpose in the State and in the city is the concentration of power and responsibility in the officers chosen and in the voters choosing them. When that is brought about, and to the degree that it is brought about, we shall see the voters able to make and ready to make a better selection of agents, and we shall see those agents able to perform and ready to perform public duties more efficiently, intelligently, and honestly. Elections will tend to cease being perfunctory registration of ignorant or misguided choice and tend to become the deliberate exercise of real choice. To the extent that this occurs the occupation of the professional politician, as now we know him, will gradually disappear.

GOOD-BYE TO MR. STOVER.

At last we can say farewell to Mr. STOVER as Park Commissioner with light hearts. He has formally resigned, and is seemingly having a good time as he rambles about the country. Nobody, so far as we have heard, has any ill-feeling for STOVER. As a Park Commissioner he was a deplorable failure, and showed daily less comprehension of the uses of parks than any other New York Park Commissioner ever fevealed. We do not say less comprehension than any other Commissioner ever had; but some if not most of the others managed to hide their ignorance; if they did nothing to improve the parks, assuredly they did very little to harm them. Mr. STOVER, on the contrary, was always "on the job," and too often in the wrong spirit. He had ideas concerning playgrounds for poor children and the "opening up" of slums which were valuable, but he did much to harm Central Park, and little if anything to benefit the others.

Nevertheless, the retirement of Mr. STOVER relieves the intelligent citizens of New York of no responsibility. The preservation of the parks from intrusion and their proper care will be beset with as many difficulties in the future as in the past. The incoming Mayor will have few more important offices to fill than the Park Commissionerships, and much will depend on his own judgment of the needs of city parks and his comprehension of the park idea.

THE BANK DEFICIT.

There is a deficit in the actual bank reserves of about one-tenth the amount of the loss of gold to Canada last week. Canada commands the gold because it has sold goods and is collecting the price. But Canada has not sold us any large part of the $200,000,000 worth of agricultural products for which it is taking its pay from us. How then does it take the price from us? That is in part because we can spare the cash better than we can afford to compel the European buyers to pay. We are lending foreign buyers the money to buy with rather than to see the Bank of England rate raised, as it would be if it were to lose the gold on any such scale as makes no real difference to us.

When Canada's exports are paid for, instead of borrowed for, the pay will come to us. We might have sold those goods instead of Canada, and have commanded the gold instead of lending to Canada's customers. But here the Treasury intervened and financed a speculation by the farmers such as does not exist across the border. If the Treasury had left banking business to the banks there would have been a larger movement of our breadstuffs and cotton, and perhaps at higher prices than may now be realized, for the world's markets do not seem to be rising. Nobody likes to sell on falling markets, and the Secretary now faces the problem of getting his money back. He chooses to connect the reluctance to pay to the pendency of the Banking bill, and offers an extension.

That is the customary course. It is hard enough for banks to get their advances repaid, and it is more ungracious for Government. The case now is not such as when the Treasury is absorbing funds for a surplus. There is a deficit, the Treasury having paid out more than it has collected by some seven or eight millions. That is an artificial supply of money which is already redundant. It is a demonstration that we should not be exporting gold if there were a shortage of either currency or the basis of credit. The supply of currency remains what it was, our currency being incompressible except for the export of gold, while the volume of business is more moderate.

Under such conditions it is worse than gratuitous for the Treasury to promise more funds to help along the new currency law. The offer itself discredits the relief which is expected from the bill, and which neither could nor should become law if its effects were such as the Treasury suggests. It is worse than useless for the Treasury to undertake to reassure the bankers. They know the situation better than the Secretary, and can better apply the appropriate remedy. What the Treasury might better do is to lend its influence toward making the bill such that the bankers would not need to be reassured.

LECTURES BY EX-PRESIDENT TAFT.

An old and honored institution, the lecture, in recent years too much neglected by the people of New York because of their fondness for music, the drama, and the lighter amusements of a great city, is to be revived this Winter by the New York Peace Society, which has made provision for four lectures on international and constitutional subjects by ex-President TAFT. The lectures will be given on Thursday evenings in Aeolian Hall in Forty-second Street, and these are the dates and subjects:

December 11. The Monroe Doctrine—Its Limitations and Implications.
January 22, 1914. Shall the Federal Government Protect Aliens in Their Treaty Rights?
February 26, 1914. Has the American Government the Power to Enter Into General Arbitration Treaties?
March 26, 1914. The Federative Trend in International Affairs.

In the list of the Committee of Invitation appear the names of Dr. LYMAN ABBOTT, President BUTLER, ANDREW CARNEGIE, JOSEPH H. CHOATE, R. FULTON CUTTING, JACOB H. SCHIFF, ROBERT W. DE FOREST, ALTON B. PARKER, OSCAR S. STRAUS, FRANK A. VANDERLIP, PAUL M. WARBURG, HORACE WHITE, and many other men of prominence in the large affairs of the city and in the peace movement.

We are sure that the people of New York whose tastes and habits of mind lift them somewhat above the need of mere diversion, of the empty satisfaction of unintermittent pleasure and pastime, will welcome the announcement of this series of lectures upon subjects that are no doubt serious but are of very great importance. They will welcome the lecturer, for Mr. TAFT'S competence to speak upon constitutional and international themes is of the highest. He speaks with the authority of life-long study, meditation, and experience. The great Continental cities have never permitted the lecture, the serious and informing lecture, to fall into disuse. In New York lectures of this degree of interest and importance have, in the last twenty-five years at least, been far too few. It is a good sign of the times that this series of lectures by Mr. TAFT is to be given here this Winter.

WAR IN PEACE.

While Premier ASQUITH on Thursday was proclaiming that his Government must go on building big ships at ruinous cost so long as "other Powers" would not join in suspending like operations, Premier BARTHOU was proclaiming that it would do no good for France to press the policy of general arbitration, because its attempt to do that in the Balkan war had failed, and for France to begin again would place her in a false situation. So Mr. ASQUITH will get the money for his new type of war vessels and M. BARTHOU will get his $260,000,000 for the deficit mainly due to the increase in the French army. The Reichstag in Germany has already voted a still larger sum for the increase of general preparation for war. Russia is borrowing to strengthen her shattered navy. Austria has to provide the money for the luxury of keeping a large part of her army on a war footing for nearly two years. The Balkan countries are looking around for loans to cover some $300,000,000, the cost and loss of two wars. And the Young Turks are engaged in a like search, with a half-avowed plan of still trying issues with Greece, if the means can be scraped together. The total of loans for purposes that are not only non-productive but destructive is well beyond a billion of dollars. And it must be borne in mind that these are loans, not resources; that every dollar of them must be repaid by productive labor, and in addition that a heavy draft on such labor will be made every year.

No rational man expects that this tremendous process of burdening industry for the present and for the long future can soon be checked, much less abandoned. It is the resultant of complex forces, deep seated and long existing, partly economic and material and partly moral, or, if you choose, immoral, but inherent in human nature. The only encouraging element in the world situation is that the nations most deeply involved in this costly process have within two years passed through a crisis which practically all European statesmen believed must end in a general conflict. Previous to that time, and, indeed, on the very eve of the Balkan struggle, so conservative an observer as Sir EDWARD GREY declared in effect that a war in the Balkans must lead to a widespread European war. The war in the Balkans came and the war in Europe did not come. The statesman who made the prediction found himself largely the instrument for preventing its realization. The belief, general a few years since, that the nations carrying this enormous load would seek actual war as a relief from the constant strain, has given place to the opinion that the load prevents the rulers from increasing it by war. Certainly this is the more rational view, and it may in the long run induce the rulers not only to refrain from war, but gradually to diminish the preparation for it.

SARTORIAL.

Careful observation of the prevailing attire of men indicates that the most favored costume for formal occasions after nightfall includes, besides the decent black swallow-tailed coat with trousers to match, and a waistcoat either of the same material or of white duck with unobtrusive buttons, a shirt with a plain linen front held together by small pearl or mother of pearl buttons, or else by small plain gold ones, and a white lawn necktie tied into a decent bow. This statement of fact would hardly be called for if the sartorial prophets had not so confidently predicted startling changes in the evening dress of men, and some of the forehanded haberdashers had not obviously overstocked their shelves with neckwear, waistcoats, and shirts of the amazing stewed-tripe pattern, and the tailors of advanced ideas had not insisted, until the season had well set in, that coats and trousers of various blue shades were bound to put the decent black out of fashion. As for silk shirts, they were to banish starched linen from the masculine wardrobe altogether, and certainly there are enough of them in the market, crinkly, plaited, and warranted to bulge.

But these things were not to be. Blue dress coats and silk dress shirts may still be worn, as they have been, by men who like to make themselves unduly conspicuous. The stewed-tripe effects in bosoms and cravats will still be esteemed as corollaries of the dinner jacket, which knows no laws, by flamboyant young men who wear plush soft hats, but the rigor of evening dress has not abated. Now, as in the past, one correctly dressed man in the evening must look as much like all other correctly dressed men as clothes can make him.

NOTES AND GLEANINGS.

The State scholars, 750 in number, appointed under the Scholarship act passed by the last Legislature, have distributed themselves in twenty-three universities and colleges of New York State. The scholarships, valued each at $100 a year in tuition for four years, go to the five students passing highest in the Regents' examinations in each of the 150 Assembly districts; eventually the number of holders will increase to 3,000. Of the first group Cornell University has 125 men and 25 women, and Columbia has 92 men and 75 women. Twenty-four women go to Vassar. The prize students have been called the "pick of the high schools of the State."

In declaring that the Government must protect its airplists, Arms and the Man adds a curious word to the language. The airplists make up the air corps of the army, which is subject to many fatal accidents because ill-equipped.

A varnished frog dies, not because bodily poisons accumulate in its skin, but because of overheating. When the air it breathes becomes warmer than 38 degrees Centigrade, Dr. VITTORIO PUNTONI of the University of Bologna reports that the frog must use its pores to radiate the extra heat. The Lancet, discussing his findings, remarks that disease germs were discovered to make short work of the varnished batrachians, already weakened by sweltering. The conclusions of Dr. PUNTONI have a practical interest in their relation to the deleterious effects of moist, warm climates and the use of improper clothing, which act by disturbing the cutaneous function.

The survey of the vintage of 1913, published in The London Times, shows that, excepting Italy, most countries producing fine wines have been handicapped this year by storms and the inroads of insects. The grape harvest of France is only two-thirds of last year's crop. Of her forty millions of people one and a half million are vineyard proprietors, cultivating 4,000,000 acres, with an average annual production of a billion gallons of wine, valued at $250,000,000.

That the space between earth and the stars is occupied with some medium that resists the rays of light is the belief, among others, of the astronomers BIRKELAND and SEE, who say that the whole sky is suffused with nebulous material. Dr. BIRKELAND thinks the matter scattered through the interstellar spaces exceeds in mass the aggregate of the suns and planets. An article in Popular Astronomy for December includes Dr. TURNER'S estimate that the resisting medium extinguishes about half the light in 4,000 billions of miles.

Woman Suffrage in Utah.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

After reading a few days ago in your journal Mr. Wheeler's interesting letter on the moral effect of the enjoyment of suffrage by women, I am led to cite Lecky, who, in his "Democracy and Liberty," New York, 1903, page 546, says that "woman suffrage proved to be one of the strongest bulwarks of polygamy" in Utah. I have never seen any explanation of this by any advocate of woman suffrage.

TIMES SQ. EXPRESS STATION

Queens Chamber of Commerce Finds This Place to be Best for All Interests

Chamber of Commerce of the Borough of Queens.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

We have noted the recent articles in THE NEW YORK TIMES urging that the B. R. T. Broadway-Fifty-ninth Street line should have an express station located at Forty-second Street and not at Forty-ninth Street, as proposed.

We beg to call your attention to the fact that the Transit Committee of the Chamber at a meeting held on May 19, 1913, adopted a resolution urging the Public Service Commission to locate the express station on the Broadway-Fifty-ninth Street line at the intersection of Forty-second Street and Broadway.

We believe that the express station should be located at the intersection of Broadway and Forty-second Street, as it will be of the greatest value to the Borough of Queens as well as other sections of the city if located at that point. With the extension of the Steinway Tunnel from its present terminus, near Third Avenue, in Manhattan, to Times Square, passengers on this transit line will have the advantage of being able to change to an express station on the Broadway-Fifty-ninth Street line. We believe that the best interests of the Borough of Queens and the entire City of New York will be served by the location of the express station at Forty-second Street.

MANY STREET MENDICANTS.

Deserving Should Be Cared For and All Others Suppressed.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Why must New York be infested with beggars? There are two very vital reasons why it should not be. These are, first, justice to the public, and, second, justice to the deserving beggar.

It annoys a liberal and sympathetic citizen terribly to be accosted continually by some palsied, deformed wretch for a coin. One cannot give to them all unless he is a millionaire. He could not give justly then, for how can he know which are grafters and which are not?

It is an appalling reflection upon the intelligence and humanity of a great city like New York that these creatures of a hard fate are thus allowed to prolong a miserable existence that can be compared only to that of a garbage-eating, crippled alley cat in a small town. Why aren't we as merciful to the crippled human being adrift in the street as we are to the crippled dog or cat? Why don't we either take care of it or shoot it?

There is no doubt that the citizens of New York, if they were only given the instrument, would gladly contribute enough in taxes or otherwise to give deserving beggars a chance to live decently or to work for their living. If people must beg they should be taken care of. If they need not beg they should be rigidly denied the streets and all public places for the purposes of begging.

Thanksgiving Day Beggars.

I am told that you did not favor the children's begging on Thanksgiving Day. I am with you. Watching their doings yesterday, I was convinced that their actions were far beneath the dignity and civilization of this great city. They did not reflect credit to their teachers, nor to their parents. I believe many parents would have been shocked had they known that their children were out begging money of all passers.

To destroy this custom let us put in its place a good one. Let the teachers and those who have charge of our children train them to organize and sing, or have other music, drums, &c., and thus make us parents applaud. The songs might be patriotic, social, or religious. This would not be a hard thing to carry out if the proper authorities took it in hand. D. A. SILLIMAN.

HYGIENE LECTURES PRAISED.

Instruction in Healthy Living at Natural History Museum.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

One of the vital problems confronting a resident of a large metropolis like ours is how to keep healthy in spite of the many dangers that beset him. The larger the city the more numerous and crowded are the inhabitants, and the more difficult does it naturally become to live a normal, healthy life. Information on the modes of healthy living is therefore highly desirable and important.

In view of these facts the American Museum of Natural History is to be congratulated upon its initiative in giving the public what it needs most—a series of popular lectures on "Principles of Healthy Living" by a number of experts in their respective fields. Such essential problems as "The Relation of the Body to Its Environment," "Pure Food," "Exercise and Rest," have already been treated in a most interesting and instructive manner. The questions of "Fresh Air" and "Control of Germ Diseases in the Household" still remain to be discussed by Prof. Lee of Columbia University and Prof. Winslow of the College of the City of New York respectively.

These lectures are given on Wednesday evenings at 8:15. All anxious mothers and loyal citizens should attend these lectures and learn how to preserve their own health, the health of their children, and the health of the community. In giving this series of lectures the American Museum is undoubtedly performing an invaluable public service.

"Forestalling" by Farmers.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

All this denunciation of the cold-storage people, who buy when they can buy cheaply, and sell, if possible, at top prices, is very amusing to a farmer. It is just what many farmers do now, and what more would do if they could afford to build a cold-storage plant.

I have read recently in farm journals of several farmers in the East who store their fruits and vegetables in refrigerating plants, and wait until the prices soar before they sell.

On Page 1,666 of The Country Gentleman for Nov. 15 is the picture of a large concrete building belonging to Farmer Henry Greffrath of South Lima, Livingston County, N. Y., an onion storage house, where the crop is held till the price is right.

After the criminal cold-storage man in the city is laid low, will the consumer fare any better at the hands of the farmer who holds his crops in cold storage till the price is right? W. S. SULLIVAN.

Remarkable Editions of The Times.

From the Fourth Estate.

THE NEW YORK TIMES is issuing some remarkable special editions. Last Sunday it printed a special sixteen-page illustrated section devoted entirely to football.

In its special Christmas number, to be issued on Dec. 7, Sargent's famous mural painting, "The Prophets," will be reproduced in colors on a separate sheet ten inches wide and fifty-six inches long for framing, and "The Girl of To-day" will be shown in twenty-nine portraits, selected by seven of the best-known artists of America from hundreds submitted by TIMES readers. The most representative picture will grace the front cover.

THE TIMES'S Christmas numbers are widely known for their excellence, but the 1913 edition promises to outdo anything THE TIMES has ever attempted.

COLOMBIA NOT COERCED.

Ex-Consul General Tells Why Oil Concessions Were Refused.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The oil concessions were not approved by the Colombian Congress solely because the Colombian people as a whole, without distinction of party, were opposed to them from the beginning.

The deliberations in the Colombian Congress and the attitude of the Colombian people generally were unaffected by opinions of the American Government or politicians in this country, because our right to manage our own affairs is inalienable and cannot be submitted at any time to a foreign Government for sanction.

The Colombians saw with calm, clear judgment that these concessions to Lord Cowdray were prejudicial to the best interests of their country, for which reason came their press attacks, to be followed later by the non-approval of Congress. If, on the other hand, these concessions had been considered advantageous to the development of our wealth and natural resources, they would have been approved by the Colombian Congress and people generally, notwithstanding protests from the American Government, just as in 1903 the Herran-Hay treaty was repudiated in spite of Mr. Roosevelt's threats.

Colombia, with 555,000 square miles of territory and barely 5,000,000 inhabitants, cannot live stationary, proclaiming to the world that she has natural wealth to be explored and enterprises to be developed. In the natural order of things she must advance. To do this she needs immigration and capital, but above all else absolute, complete, unlimited liberty to manage her internal affairs as a free and independent nation without the officious intervention of any other Government.

In the beginning of the present month the press of Bogota, already cognizant of this country's intervention in these oil concessions, condemned in no uncertain terms our Colombian Government's non-demurral, while our Minister of Foreign Affairs is obliged to make lengthy explanations in the matter.

While the so-called good faith of the American Government, with its spirit of equity and justice, remains unproved by deeds in its relations with the South American Republics, President Wilson's phrases and theories will arouse in them as much confidence and sympathy as did Mr. Roosevelt's "big stick," for "obras son amores y no buenas razones"—it is deeds that count, not words.

THANKSGIVING'S AFTERMATH.

Gastronomic Plaint of a Poet Who Ate Too Much.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Noting in THE TIMES this morning—the morning after Thanksgiving—some remarks by "Epicure" on the subject of the practice of stoicism in our eating on the national feast day, may I offer the following, the reader remembering as he reads that the poet learns in suffering what he tells in song? Listen:

On yestermorn full up with thanks I was
For all the blessings of the previous year
That had been mine, though maybe without cause,
And fitly sat me down to pleasing cheer.

On yestereve full up with cheer I was,
That makes Thanksgiving such a grateful day,
And when at last I had to give it pause,
I felt far more than I could say.

This morning—well,
Ain't Thanksgiving the very dickens?
And don't you think
The whole darn scheme of thankfulness is gezink?
And—and—why
Did I eat that extra slab of mince pie?
Oh, say,
Me for the bran and hay
Next Thanksgiving Day!
What?

MOTOR VEHICLE ORDINANCES

Do Not Require the Signature of the Secretary of State.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I beg to advise you that under the Motor Vehicle law of the State of New York, Section 288, it is provided that "Official copies of all local ordinances passed under the provisions of this sub-division shall be filed with the Secretary of State at least thirty days before they shall respectively take effect," &c.

The inference in your recent editorial article that the Secretary of State has authority to consider and sign the restrictive amendment passed by the Board of Aldermen on Tuesday last, rescinding the exemption from the traffic rules relating to motor vehicles carrying the United States mail, is entirely in error.

I am sure that every one interested in public safety would rejoice if your contention was right, but the Secretary of State has no authority in the matter, and the ordinance cannot become effective until Dec. 28, according to the statute. F. H. E.

Baggage Platforms at Custom House

To the Editor of The New York Times:

An improvement is much needed for the examination of baggage in the United States Custom House at the Port of New York. Baggage platforms should be erected for placing trunks and packages on while they are examined for dutiable goods. Now owners are obliged to kneel down on the soiled stone floors while unlocking and displaying their dutiable goods. Suitable platforms should be erected, at least one foot eight inches high and of sufficient width to receive two rows of trunks, with sufficient room at each side to enable the work of examination to proceed rapidly. Such baggage platforms are now in place in most of the Custom Houses in Europe. I trust Uncle Sam will have built these platforms before I return from Europe again.

Pensions for Widowed Mothers.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I wish that the greatest number of people may take an interest in the vital question of pensioning families left destitute by the death of the head of the family. The arguments that the dispensation of pensions would become a matter of politics, and that graft may flourish, and that altogether the measure savors of Socialism, are too flimsy. Why is it that professional charity workers are so much opposed to a measure which is only a corrective in our imperfect social structure? Do they not see that the pensioning the widowed mothers is not a question of charity, nor of benevolence, but a duty of society? As far as graft is concerned, a civic body similar to the Board of Education can have charge of granting and administering pensions.

PRODUCTION OF EGGS

Has Fallen Off Since Last Year, Resulting in High Prices.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The present agitation concerning the effect of cold storage on the price of eggs gives relevancy to the following facts, which may be of interest to your readers who believe in fair play. The figures showing a shortage in both the receipts of eggs and the quantity in cold storage are taken from The New York Produce Review of Nov. 26, 1913:

	Cases.
Receipts of eggs in New York market March 1 to Oct. 31, 1912.	4,056,159
Receipts of eggs in New York market March 1 to Oct. 31, 1913.	3,859,911
Decrease in receipts for above period	196,248
Average monthly trade output March to October, 1912	391,850

The above shows a decrease of receipts in the market during the above period of 196,248 cases, and at the same time an increase in the trade output for the same period of 155,200 cases; furthermore, on Nov. 1, 1913, there was a deficiency in storage holdings, as compared with Nov. 1, 1912, of 377,000 cases.

The present storage reserve, together with receipts on the same basis as last year, would show a prospective deficiency in supply on this market of about 185,000 cases up to Jan. 31, 1914, based on the average output since March 1, 1913. This, then, is the statistical explanation of why the wholesale price of cold storage eggs has ranged from 27½ to 30 cents a dozen this month, as against 21 to 24 cents a dozen during November, 1912.

These figures, together with the fact that the goods are not owned by the cold storage companies, but are controlled by a large number of competing dealers all over the country, should satisfy an unbiased person that cold storage is not responsible for the present range of prices.

The inexorable law of supply and demand is the governing factor in eggs, whether storage or fresh, as in all other products. FRANK A. HORNE,
President American Association of Refrigeration.
New York, Nov. 28, 1913.

UNCLE REMUS MAGAZINE STOCK

Walter Pulitzer Gives Out Some Correspondence from Mr. Julian Harris.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Julian Harris is within his rights in complaining of THE NEW YORK TIMES'S use of the phrase "Uncle Remus's stock." This should read Pulitzer Magazine Company stock, and if THE TIMES reporter had, as we requested, sought his information from the fountain head instead of others, this error would not have occurred. Mr. Harris's letter in other respects, however, is just as misleading as THE NEW YORK TIMES'S report, as the following extracts from letters will show. When I bought Uncle Remus's Magazine (renamed Pulitzer's Magazine) I cabled Mr. Harris offering him the post of advertising manager. In a long letter, dated Paris, July 12, he replied:

* * * First, please accept my very sincere thanks for your offer to continue as advertising manager of Uncle Remus's Magazine. I should not be wholly frank if I did not say to you that I felt immensely gratified; more than that, I was deeply sensible of an impulse to cable you that I accepted and would be able to return at once. * * * I am still deeply and sincerely interested in the future of what was once the original magazine.

Yet, on November the 13th, he writes me:

You will hereafter eliminate from Pulitzer's Magazine any reference to Uncle Remus's Magazine, and desist from using the name of Uncle Remus in connection with any publicity which may be given the Pulitzer Magazine.

To which I replied in part:

* * * It is rather late in the day to bring up the points you do. Six months ago the press of this country announced my purchase of Uncle Remus. If that was objectionable to your family or Mr. Fayram, these good people should have so informed me, and I would have known how to proceed. I did not relish the idea of filling unexpired subscriptions. I was told that the Post Office would expect it, and that it was also the Post Office regulations which required the use of the phrase "combined with Uncle Remus." Personally, I would have preferred dropping the name, for it has not done us any good.

I then gave Mr. Harris some excellent reasons why it had not done us any good, and why I would be pleased to eliminate from Pulitzer's any further reference to Uncle Remus. But this promise was made entirely of my own volition, and not under compulsion.

The plain fact remains: I bought Uncle Remus's Magazine and renamed it Pulitzer's. The combination has been put out of business—so peace be to the ashes of both of them!

FEDERAL MAIL WAGONS

Have No Right to Defy Police Powers of the State.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Traffic regulations are in the interest of safety. The safety of the throngs of men and women and children who fill our streets is paramount. Therefore, when the traffic policeman holds up his hand every traveling thing, on wheels or on foot, should stop. Ambulances and fire apparatus should pick their way carefully through the guarded area. Physicians should have the third preference and mail wagons the fourth.

It is no dishonor to the Federal Government to require that it transact its business with due regard for safety. The death of a child or the maiming of a worker is as much a Federal loss as a State or a municipal one. Police powers are delegated to the various States. If any officer abuses his authority, he is subject to investigation and discipline. The Government exists for the welfare of its citizens, not for their destruction or their embarrassment. CHARLES A. KINCH.

The Honest Ballot Association.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The Honest Ballot Association, Incorporated, has, we think, demonstrated its efficiency in establishing order at the polls on election day and excluding the dishonest vote from the ballot box. In our endeavor we have become indebted to the many friends of the association who have co-operated. We hardly need say that the publicity which your paper so courteously gave us was one very vital factor in our success. May we thus formally acknowledge our indebtedness and extend our thanks? OUR TARIFF RAISES PRICES IN CANADA

Scarcity of Foodstuffs Caused by American Drain Upon Dominion Supplies.

DOUBT LAURIER'S REMEDY

Suggestion of a Retaliatory Tariff Received with a Lack of Enthusiasm—Egg Stock Near Depletion.

Special to The New York Times.

MONTREAL, Nov. 29.—The new slogan sounded by Sir Wilfrid Laurier—a retaliatory tariff against the United States—to fight the high cost of living in Canada is one concerning the success of which both parties are dubious. For several years rents and foodstuffs have been going up steadily. The passage of the new American Tariff bill has accentuated the rise in the prices of vegetables, poultry, eggs, bacon, butter, and meat.

The law was enacted at a time when public attention was being directed through press and platform to the heavy cost of the necessities of life, and it has hit the average Canadian harder than anybody anticipated. There is a general tendency, however, to believe that the present extreme conditions will not be permanent, that they are in part due to a natural shortage, due to the present output being inadequate for the rapidly increasing population and to the eagerness with which American towns along the international line are availing themselves of the facilities afforded by the new tariff of buying in Canada what they must pay more for in their own country.

The eastern townships in the south of Quebec Province are the principal source of supply of butter, eggs, poultry, and vegetables in this part of Canada. Since the American Tariff bill was passed, indeed, before it became a law, purchasing agents of various United States wholesale and retail firms made big bids to secure present and future crops, and generally with success. Butter from the various creameries, which are run under Government supervision, eggs, vegetables, and other produce were bought up at prices greatly in advance of what had ruled here.

The result was that the wholesale markets in Montreal and elsewhere were seriously affected, and the present heavy advance in prices, both for the produce mentioned and for other articles of food, is attributed to this. Eggs are going up steadily. The cold-storage companies declare that their stock is fast nearing depletion, and that the season has been so bad that they will not be able to replenish here. Many wholesale and retail houses have ceased the farce of selling storage eggs as new laid. The farmers do not pretend to be making any effort to help the situation.

So far no real solution of the difficulty has been put forward. Sir Wilfrid Laurier himself made no suggestion beyond hinting that a retaliatory tariff is the easiest way out. People are paying the high prices grumblingly, but with a full realization that there is no immediate likelihood of relief. Western beef is going over the border into the United States, whereas it formerly came East to Montreal. Wages are not increasing in anything like the same proportion as the cost of living, and the tightness of money is in large measure ascribed to the heavy drain which the added cost of living has put upon the average citizen.

RAZE HILL TO STOP SLIDES.

Canal Dredges Sluicing Away Mud Glacier Menacing Culebra Cut.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 29.—At the office of the Panama Canal Commission to-day it was said that the new slide reported yesterday at Cucaracha was not unexpected, and was not regarded as having any serious significance. Such slides had been predicted as likely to occur, and several more, it was said, would in all probability happen before the channel of the canal was finally cleared.

The reports show that great progress has been made in dredging the slides in Culebra Cut, of which that of Cucaracha is the worst and the largest. On his recent visit to the Isthmus Secretary Garrison discovered, what is not generally understood, that the engineers had decided to remove the entire hill which caused the slides. Dredges are at work sluicing away the hill in the rear of the face of the mud glacier which produces the slides. The carrying out of this plan makes the slides a natural occurrence owing to the semi-liquid character of the formation.

Two big dipper dredges, Minda and Chagres, have been at work on the slide at Cucaracha, one at the east side and the other at the west side of the mass of material. The dredges on the north side have worked out a channel over 600 feet long, from 50 to 150 feet wide and 20 feet deep along the channel of the canal. But the largest bulk of the slide is yet to be reached, and extends for over 100 feet, after which the slide is much reduced in quantity.

An extensive hydraulic sluicing system is at work on the north side of the hill sending material that might cause possible future slides down into the Rio Grande Valley, away from the canal prism. This work is making great headway, and will be the ultimate salvation of the canal so far as the menace of slides in Culebra Cut are concerned. The power comes from Miraflores power station, and is used through 350 horse power induction motors operating hydraulic monitors, with a pressure of 150 pounds to the square inch.

VAUDEVILLE TO PAY HONORS TO KEITH

Founder's 30th Anniversary to be Celebrated for a Week by "Big Time" Theatres.

HIS FIRST SHOW IN STORE

Exhibited Baby Alice, "Child Wonder," on Dec. 1, 1883, and Now Owns Thirty Theatres.

Every "big time" vaudeville theatre in the United States will commence tomorrow a week's celebration of the founding of vaudeville by B. F. Keith thirty years ago, when he began his career as a showman in Boston with just one act, Baby Alice, a "child wonder."

That was on Dec. 1, 1883, and from that beginning the present modern idea of vaudeville has grown until Mr. Keith himself owns thirty theatres in the United States, and the United Booking Office, the clearing house for all "big time" vaudeville acts, supplies the attractions for many times that number of places of amusement. Mr. Keith is President of the United Booking Office.

Benjamin Franklin Keith was born at Hillsboro Bridge, N. H., being the youngest of a family of eight, whose father was of Scotch descent, while the mother's ancestors were of French extraction. It was at the early age of 7 that he left home, and soon after began his struggle with the world on a Western Massachusetts farm, where he remained until he was 18.

During this time he acquired his education in the district school and village academy. It was at this period that Mr. Keith saw his first show of any kind, when he was 17 years old, and coming to it, as he did, from the farm, it may well be imagined that he was greatly impressed. The show was a circus, given in an adjoining town to his country home, under the then famous Van Amburgh management.

A few years later he found employment with Bunnell's Museum in New York for two seasons, next with Barnum, and later with Doris and Forepaugh. During this time, in the Winter season, Mr. Keith amused himself by taking small shows on the road, coming home "dead broke" on three consecutive occasions.

In the latter part of 1883 Mr. Keith went to Boston with a definite purpose, though with a general idea of continuing in some manner or other along the lines which he had recently followed. All through his life thus far he had held well aloof from dissipation in any of its forms, and without being grasping or penurious had practiced economy.

While walking along Washington Street one day, not long after his arrival, his eye fell upon a vacant store, which has since been removed to make room for a portion of the present Adams House. At that time one-half of the lower part of the building was occupied as a confectionery store, and it was the southerly half which was open for rental.

Begins Career as showman.

It was in this contracted spot that Mr. Keith's career as a showman began, in company with Col. William Austin, formerly of Austin & Stone. The first attraction was a little child, called Baby Alice, whose principal claim to distinction lay in the fact that at the age of 3 months she weighed only one and one-half pounds. The admission fee to gaze upon this tiny morsel of humanity was 10 cents, and for two weeks the little one held the boards alone, the partnership with Col. Austin lasted only two weeks.

A few weeks later Mr. Keith obtained a lease of the entire property except the candy store, which, however, occupied one-half of the front and all of the rear floor, so that all the room available for show purposes for some time was comprised in the original store. His partner in this second venture was one Gardner, with whom business relations were retained for thirteen months.

For attractions he exhibited, in addition to Bay Alice, several curiosities of the ordinary type. These objects of interest were of necessity displayed upon a small stage on one side of the room, while in one end, on a stage, resting upon two dry-goods boxes, the performance proper was presented.

In May, 1885, an upstairs room, previously occupied by a piano dealer, was rented by Mr. Keith, and in it he put 123 chairs and a stage 2½ feet high.

It is worthy of note that in the limited space then at Mr. Keith's command he succeeded in introducing many of the foremost vaudeville artists of the day. Mrs Gen Tom Thumb also held her daily levees in these contracted quarters for many weeks.

It was in this hall that Fred Kyle, known for his dog, cat, baby, and bird shows in Horticultural Hall duplicated his successes while connected with Mr. Keith for about one year, adding to them the beauty show, which was the most successful of all.

During the period referred to the establishment bore a number of names. At the start it was the Hub Museum, which was later changed to the New York Museum, and still later, at Mr. Kyle's suggestion, to Gaiety Hall, and afterward to Gaiety Museum, which was retained until the premises were vacated at the expiration of the lease.

Some time prior to this, Mr. Keith had bought the Gardner interest in the establishment, and in May, 1884, was joined by George H. Batcheller of Providence. It was, also, at this time that the lower hall, above referred to, was secured by taking in the rear portion of the candy store, and two months later it was opened.

Continuous Performances.

The advent of continuous performances on July 6, 1885, marked a new era in the amusement world. It was a great day in the career of Mr. Keith and all his attaches, being purely experimental, original, and without anybody's sympathy.

The curtain rose at 10:30 o'clock A. M. and did not fall until 10:30 P. M. Everybody was anxious and nervous except Mr. Keith. Though Mr. Keith was firmly convinced of the value of his new idea, he did not advertise it, as he wished to be certain of its approval by the public through actual trial. A close watch of the box office receipts was kept, and it was immediately demonstrated beyond doubt that success was sure.

As the number of attractions was limited, it was necessary at that time to have six performances daily, each of two hours' duration. The participants on the first day of the continuous performance were the Durville family the youngest of which was a clever prodigy; an illusion, called "Rona;" Olympian Quintet, (colored,) who have since met with great success abroad; the "Artic Moon," which was lectured upon by S. K. Hoagdon; the Fiske Vocalists; Murray and Monarch, Ainsley Brothers, Hughes and West, with John Barker, the bone soloist, and Mr. Hodgdon in an amusing sketch.

The continuous performance scheme of Mr. Keith was a success. The uncertainty of being able to obtain a renewal of the lease of the property then occupied began to present itself, and after much skillful engineering on Mr. Keith's part, Keith and Batcheller obtained a lease on Aug. 1, 1886, of the Bijou Theatre, almost next door to the site of the one then occupied.

The firm opened the Bijou on Sept. 1, 1886, with Lillian Lewis and her company in "The Creole," giving two performances daily at popular prices. During the following year the Bijou gave standard dramatic attractions, including "The Banker's Daughter," "Little Emily," and "Sam'l of Posen."

On Monday, Aug. 1, 1887, the Bijou Theatre in Boston was opened with a "continuous performance" with Mr. Keith as sole proprietor. So identified had the word "Gaiety" become with Mr. Keith's enterprises at this time that, despite the fact that the old Gaiety Musée was no more, he decided to continue the name in connection with the new playhouse, which was called the Gaiety and Bijou.

E. F. Albee, now Mr. Keith's manager in all his various enterprises, became identified with his fortunes in the Winter of 1883. Mr. Albee came as an assistant, with no particular salary and no particular duties, but soon became indispensable.

RUSSIAN CHOIR IN CONCERT.

Cathedral Singers Make a Deep Impression at Aeolian Hall.

The choir of the Russian Cathedral was heard in a concert at Aeolian Hall last night, singing Russian ecclesiastical music in the native tongue. The audience was a large one, and among its number were many prominent musicians, attracted doubtless by the reports of the organization's quiet first appearance last year. There was every evidence that last night's singing made a deep impression on the hearers.

The whole atmosphere was foreign to the experience of New York concertgoers. The choir, which was made up last night of twenty-one boys and eight men, appeared in its black and scarlet robes. Ivan T. Gorokhoff, the choirmaster, used almost none of the visual manifestations of conducting we are used to, offering a striking reminder of the fact that if you take care of rehearsals the performances will take care of themselves. And, finally, the music itself and its singing was like nothing the average auditor could have heard before.

Harmony, scales, and rhythmic structures of this music were strange to ears attuned to the system of the classic composers It would have been almost impossible for one of our choirs to do full justice to a great deal of it, as there were presented passages which would be of tremendous difficulty of execution according to our standards. It is likely that to the singers trained in the Russian tradition it does not represent anything out of the ordinary, so that comparisons will not profit much But it is certain that some of the voices in the small choir were remarkable, the contra-bass, for instance, reaching to a low pitch and a volume that were essential in chorus singing As a whole the choir sang with notable variety of effect, and sonority of tone. What could be questioned was its sureness of intonation, but when it is remembered that all the selections were sung unaccompanied and the choir was two-thirds made up of young boys it could justly be accounted a miracle if there had never been lapses from pitch in music of such difficulty as was sung.

Miss Ferrin Weds C. R. Skinner.

The wedding of Miss Abbe Frances Ferrin, daughter of Mr. and Mrs Charles J. Ferrin, Jr., to Charles R. Skinner, Jr., of this city was celebrated at 8 o'clock last evening in St. Matthew's Church. The Rev. Dr. Arthur A. Judge, pastor of the church, officiated. The bride was attended by her cousin, Miss Ruth Fargo Ferrin of Rochester, N. Y., and Miss Gertrude Hawley, Harold B. Skinner was his brother's best man, and the ushers were: Albert M. Skinner, John A. Remmington and James Robert Miller, Jr., of Watertown, N. Y.; Robert C. Miller of Cranford, N. J.; Robert M. Converse of Albany, N Y., and Bertrand L. Taylor, Jr., of this city. The ceremony was followed by a reception at the home of the bride's parents, 6 West Ninety-first Street.

THEATRICAL NOTES.

"The Lure" is soon to leave the city, and on Monday night, Dec. 8, at the Maxine Elliott Theatre, where it has been playing, William A. Brady will present a new American comedy by Laurence Eyre, entitled "The Things That Count." Playing a principal role in Mr. Brady's new production will be his daughter, Alice Brady. Others in the cast are Florine Arnold, Albert Reed, Howard Estabrook, Hilda Englund, Wallace Erskine, and Nick Long.

J. Humbird Duffey, whose last Broadway appearance was made in "The Rose Maid," will sing the tenor role in "Sari," the Hungarian operette which Henry W. Savage is preparing for production.

Eva Tanguay comes to the Forty-fourth Street Music Hall for an engagement commencing Monday afternoon, Dec. 8.

Quentin Tod, who acted Bobbie in "Fanny's First Play," last season has been engaged by Charles Frohman to dance two dances with Miss O'Hara in "The Laughing Husband" which will be produced shortly.

Five hundred members of the Delta Upsilon fraternity have bought seats for Tuesday night's performance of "The Misleading Lady" at the Fulton Theatre in honor of Paul Lickey, one of the authors, who is a member of the fraternity.

The employes of Brill Brothers' stores have bought all the seats at the Astor Theatre for to-morrow night and will give a theatre party to see "Seven Keys to Baldpate."

Ernest D'Auben, stage director; Frank Borer, chief mechanician; Maud Compton, ballet mistress, and Mme. Hannon, chief of wardrobe, of the Drury Lane Theatre, London, called on the Carmania yesterday morning after superintending the staging of the pantomime "Hop o' My Thumb" at the Manhattan Opera House.

PARTIES FOR DEBUTANTES.

Misses Scott, Gunn, Richard and Rogers Among Buds.

A number of débutantes were introduced yesterday to society. The hostesses included Mrs. Clarence C. Chapman, Mrs. John A. Davis, Mrs. James Newton Gunn, Mrs. A. Moore Richard, and Mrs. Noah Cornwell Rogers.

Mrs. Clarence C. Chapman's tea at 555 Park Avenue was for her niece, Miss M. Evelyn Scott, a daughter of Mrs. Frank E. Hagemeyer. Mrs. Chapman, in blue satin; Mrs. George R. Dyer, another aunt, in taupe velvet; Mrs. Hagemeyer, in gray satin, and Miss Scott, in white tulle and satin, received. The young girls who assisted were the Misses Louise Herrick, Vera Cravath, Lucy Lord, Gay Reboul, Edith Farr, Elizabeth Griggs, and Betty Kirkpatrick.

Miss Scott will have a theatre party given for her on Dec. 17 by Mrs. Hagemeyer.

Mrs. John A. Davis gave a tea at 375 Park Avenue to introduce her daughter, Miss Amo Sessions. Afterward Mr. and Mrs. Davis gave those receiving a dinner, followed by a party to the play, to which a few young men were asked.

The Misses Catherine and Elizabeth Gunn made their débuts yesterday at a tea dance given for them in the State suite of the Plaza by Mrs. James Newton Gunn. Mrs. Gunn, in blue and mauve, and the Misses Gunn, in pink chiffon frocks, had assisting them the Misses Cordelia Hepburn, Marion Vendenhoef, Marion Hall, Louise Tiffany Frank, Carl Hackstaff, Dorothy Keene Taylor, Corinne Searle, Marjorie Gunn, and Miss Agnes Pfaff of Boston.

Mr. Gunn afterward gave a dinner for his daughters and those receiving and some young men, the latter being Frederick Hostetter of Virginia, Emory Johnson, Henry Hotchkiss, and John Searle.

Mrs. A. Moore Richard was the hostess in the banqueting suite at Sherry's yesterday at a tea dance to introduce her second daughter, Miss Elvine Richard. The débutante recently returned with Mrs. Richard and Miss Alice Richard from a Summer in Europe.

The débutante, in white satin and black lace; Miss Richard, in cerise brocade with silver, and carrying purple orchids, and the débutante in pale green satin and lace embroidered in pearls, and carrying green orchids and lilies of the valley, received, and had assisting them the Misses Margaret Henderson, Constance and Joy Williams, Dorothy Legg Howard, Rosetta Carson, Louise Herrick, Cordelia Hepburn, Mary Myers, and Florence Rand.

Mrs. Noah Cornwell Rogers introduced her second daughter, Miss Grace B. Rogers, yesterday afternoon at a tea at her residence, 19 East Fifty-sixth Street. The tea was followed by a dinner and theatre party.

Mrs. Rogers and Miss Grace Rogers had receiving with them the latter's two sisters, Miss Florence Rogers, already out, and Miss Anna C. Rogers, who will not make her début for a year or two. The girls who aided the hostess were the Misses Lois Goodnow, Laura and Mary Parsons, Louise Butler, Elizabeth Black, Lisa Todd, Elizabeth Hibben of Princeton, and Olive Huntington of Norwich, Conn.

A dinner and theatre party followed, the additional guests asked being Vernon and Stanley Bell, James Arnett, Guthrie Speers, Moore Gates, Noe Robinson, Beach Barrett, Harold Stuart, Henry Elliott, Thomas Day, Jr., James Adams, and James Rogers.

Mrs. Herbert Winslow Page introduced her daughter, Miss Lois Lee Page, at a tea at her residence in Edgewood Road, Summit, N. J., yesterday afternoon.

NEW MUSICAL CLUB OF SOCIETY WOMEN

Mrs. Wm. K. Vanderbilt and Others Form The Society of Friends of Music.

LECTURES ON NEW OPERAS

Organization to Give Opportunity to American Composers and Artists —First Concert Next Sunday.

In an effort to bring the composer, the artist, and the lover of music closer together, Mrs. William K. Vanderbilt, Mrs. Otto H. Kahn, Mrs. J. F. D. Lanier, Mrs. Robert Goelet, and other well-known society women have formed a club to be known as The Society of the Friends of Music. It is an organization entirely unprofessional in its management and similar in character to the societies now existing in Austria and Germany under the name of "Die Freunde der Musik," in Italy as "Gli Amica Della Musica," and in France as "Les Amis de la Musique." The new society will co-operate with these organizations, and with the existing musical organizations of this country.

The society will engage prominent musicians to give lectures at the Metropolitan Opera House on new operas to be produced there as well as on the new productions brought out in Europe. It will also provide for concerts of American music which has not been performed in public, and will arrange concerts of old music, both vocal and instrumental, including church music.

Mrs. Lanier has been elected the first President of the organization, and the Executive Committee includes Mrs. Winthrop Chanler, Miss Cottenet, Mrs. Robert Goelet, Mrs. F. Gray Griswold, Mrs. Thomas Hastings, Frederick A. Juilliard, Mrs. J. F. D. Lanier, Walter E. Maynard, Courtlandt Palmer, Mrs. Henry H. Rogers, Walter T. Rosen, R. Stroppa-Quaglia, Leonard M. Thomas, and Mrs. William K. Vanderbilt.

The first concert will be held next Sunday afternoon at the Ritz-Carlton.

"It sometimes takes many years," said one of the founders of the society yesterday, "before a small, well-trained band of musicians can get a public hearing, owing to lack of funds and lack of opportunity, for it is a slow process to establish a reputation before small but friendly audiences; therefore, those, who by merit have earned a hearing, may have the opportunity to procure publicity through this society.

"The idea of a series of concerts of music given by musicians chosen uniquely for their quality and finish, and providing endless variety as to the works rendered, and the kind of instruments employed, must surely meet with aproval from those whose greatest recreation and keenest intellectual pleasure come from a harmonious programme well rendered.

"The ideal of the society is a high one, both as regards attainment and obligation. It will earnestly endeavor to carry out the highest level of excellence, both as to the compositions brought before its subscribers and the artistic manner of their performance. As it is the inherent characteristic of the foreign societies of the friends of music, it is in duty bound to produce, from time to time, a new work by an American composer, as well as new works from different countries which may be considered worthy of the high standard of excellence it has pledged itself to maintain. It also proposes to revive many choice and rare old works."

Following is the list of the musicians who will act upon the Advisory Board of the society:

Georges Barrère, Frank Damrosch, Walter Damrosch, Rubin Goldmarck, Felix Weingartner, Franz Kneisel, Dr. Muck, Kurt Schindler, and Arturo Toscanini.

AID FOR DOWNTOWN NURSERY.

Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Minns Ware of Hingham, Mass., announce the engagement of their daughter, Miss Mary Elizabeth Ware, to George Harley Chamberlin, son of Mr. and Mrs. George Briggs Chamberlin of Brookline, Mass.

Mrs. Henry Rice of 25 West Ninety-fifth Street announces the engagement of her daughter, Miss Lucille Rice, to Arthur Samek of this city. The wedding will take place in the early Spring.

Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Blumenthal of 607 West 137th Street announce the engagement of their daughter, Miss Cecile Blumenthal, to David Bachenheimer of this city. No date has been set for the wedding.

WARNING.

The Christmas Number of The New York Times, to be issued NEXT SUNDAY, will be sold out in advance. The only way to get the Sargent paintings, reproduced in the original colors, and the 100 all-Sunday pictures, printed by the new rotogravure process, is to place your order at once.

MR. PADEREWSKI'S RECITAL.

The Great Pianist at His Best in His Third Appearance.

Each of the two recitals that Mr. Paderewski has given in New York this month since his first one has marked a long step in his return to his old self, his real self, to his command over his instrument, to his emancipation from the effects of the illness that made themselves felt at his first appearance. He has scarcely played more eloquently, more poetically, with a more profound beauty in his exposition of all the marvels of his tone upon the piano, than he did yesterday before an audience that filled Carnegie Hall completely, and that hung as though entranced upon his discourse. And, indeed, he spoke with the tongues of men and of angels.

His performance of Beethoven's sonata in D minor, Op. 31, No. 2, was of great nobility; the first allegro intense and fiery, the adagio sung with that poignant beauty of tone, that exquisite moldung of the melodic line in which he stands alone, and the interrupting recitative-like passage of the allegro had something that seemed to take it beyond the limits of the pianoforte's expression. The fire and passion of Schumann's F sharp minor sonata glowed and burned in Mr. Paderewski's interpretation of it, intensely romantic in spirit, and finding a marvelously varied exposition of its diverse and overflowing musical ideas that crowd so thick and fast upon each other.

Of exquisite and shimmering delicacy was his playing of the old French harpsichord pieces by Daquin and Couperin, which gave special delight to his hearers so that he repeated one of them. In his Chopin numbers he reached a field in which he has always stood alone and without a rival. No one is a truer interpreter, for his playing gives the very embodiment of Chopin's spirit. As so often before, the lambent flame of Chopin's poetical imagination illumined Mr. Paderewski's playing of these numbers—the two nocturnes Op. 15, three of the études from Op. 10, the A minor nocturne; and the A major polonaise was played with splendid spirit. A finely conceived "Chant d'amour," by Stojowski, was transfigured by Mr. Paderewski's playing of it; and in Liszt's tenth Hungarian Rhapsody with which the programme closed, he obtained some truly astonishing effects of tone and timbre.

Mr. Paderewski's generosity did not stop with the programme's close, for to the assembled enthusiasts he played in addition, Chopin's A flat prelude, the Berceuse and the so-called Butterfly Etude, and then finally Liszt's Sixth Hungarian Rhapsody.

MISS WEEKS A BRIDE.

Married to John H. Stewart in Church of the Heavenly Rest.

The wedding of John Henderson Stewart, a son of Mr. and Mrs. John H. Stewart of Pittsburgh, Penn., and Miss Marjorie C. Weeks, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Herbert A. Weeks, took place yesterday at 4 o'clock in the Church of the Heavenly Rest, which was simply decorated with vases of white flowers on the altar. The Rev. Hebert Shipman and his assistant, Mr. Monk, officiated.

Miss Weeks, who walked with her father, wore a slightly draped soft white satin gown having a point lace tunic and bodice. The large shawl veil of point lace draped to form a full frill about her head was held with sprays of orange blossoms. The veil fell over the side of the gown and far down the back over the draped train, but showed her coiffure. She carried lilies of the valley.

Miss Eugenie Philbin was the maid of honor. She wore a trailing pink satin gown with an overdress of pink chiffon and white lace, the neck cut out quite low and round and having a strap of deep pink roses over one shoulder. She wore a large flat tête de nègre velvet hat trimmed with fur, and carried small pink chrysanthemums.

The bridesmaids were the Misses Mary Jacob, Eleanor Nash, Tesson Thayer, Gertrude Welling, Virginia Stewart, and Eleanor Cary. They were dressed like Miss Philbin, save that the tunics were of pink chiffon only, and their hats were trimmed with blue flowers on one side and pink roses on the other, with none on the gowns, which had deep blue girdles. All carried small pink chrysanthemums.

Mr. Stewart's best man was William Emery, Jr., of Philadelphia. The ushers were John C. Weeks, Lindsay H. Welling, S. Bonsal White, Walter Hughson, Charles S. Snowden, Ernest W. Pitcher, and Francis A. Lewis, 3d. A reception at the bride's home, 70 West Forty-sixth Street, followed the ceremony.

WEDS MISS ANNE LOOMIS.

J. Henry Alexandre Married at Home of Bride's Mother, Mrs. Dyar.

Special to The New York Times.

DETROIT, Mich., Nov. 29.—In the home of the bride's mother, Mrs. John Dyar, at Grosse Pointe Farms, the wedding of Miss Anne Loomis and J. Henry Alexandre of New York City took place Saturday afternoon. The wedding party included the bride's sister, Miss Elizabeth Loomis, who attended as maid of honor, the bridegroom's sisters, the Misses Mary Elizabeth and Virginia Alexandre of New York and Miss Isabelle Lothrop, who was bridesmaid. Frederick Alexandre was best man. The ushers were William Wallace, Jr., Anson Hard, Seymour Johnson, and Courtland Diamond.

The ceremony took place in the living room of the home before an improvised altar of Easter lilies and palms.

The bride was of white satin draped in rose point lace and embroidered in pearls. Her veil was fastened with orange blossoms, and she carried a bouquet of white orchids and lilies of the valley. The maid of honor and bridesmaids wore gowns alike of peach colored satin, with draperies of blue chiffon held to the foundation with roses in delicate shades.

Miss Wardwell to Wed Harold Otis.

Henry L. Wardwell of 53 East Seventy-seventh Street announces the engagement of his daughter, Miss Alice D. Wardwell, to Harold Otis, a son of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Harrison Otis of 108 Joralemon Street, Brooklyn. Mr. Otis is a graduate of Harvard, Class of 1904. Miss Wardwell is a sister of the Misses Florence and Minère Wardwell of Mrs. Troop M. Waller, and Mrs. Howell, wife of the Rev. Alleyne C. Howell of Pittsburgh, Penn. No date has been mentioned for the wedding.

Newman-Hirsch Wedding.

The wedding of Miss Nannette Hirsch, daughter of Mrs. Leon M. Hirsch of 15 East Ninety-fourth Street, to Jacob Newman will take place on Wednesday at the Hotel Gotham. The bride's uncle, Charles Straus, President of the Board of Water Supply of the City of New York, will give her in marriage. Miss Gladys Hirsch will be the maid of honor and Moe Newman is to be his brother's best man. Mr. Newman is a lawyer in this city and a member of various clubs and charitable institutions.

Weddings.

The wedding of Miss Gertrude Beatrice Clarkson to Thomas Joseph Davis of Lawrence, L. I., was celebrated Wednesday morning in the Church of Our Lady of Good Council, Lawrence, L. I. The Rev. J. J. Mahon officiated. Miss Mamie Louise Bryant, a cousin of the bride, was her maid of honor. Thomas Eagan acted as best man. Mr. and Mrs. Davis are spending their honeymoon in the South.

Miss Bertha A. Steinmetz was married to Joseph T. Hanlon on Wednesday at the home of her brother, John A. Steinmetz, 912 Bronx Park South. Dr. Derbyshire of Grace Church, West Farms, performed the ceremony. Mr. Hanlon is a lawyer. He is a graduate of Harvard and the New York Law School. During the Spanish War he served in the Cuban campaign and was later an officer in the Philippines Constabulary. Mr. and Mrs. Hanlon left for a short trip to Washington and Old Point Comfort.

The wedding of Miss Rose Ohlhorst, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Hugo Ohlhorst of the Bronx, to George Walter Both of Scarsdale, N. Y., took place on Thursday evening at the Forest Avenue Congregational Church, Bronx. The Rev. A. MacDonald Rooch officiated. Miss Etta Ohlhorst was her sister's maid of honor and the bridesmaids were the Misses Gertrude Manisch and Emma Both. Walter Allen Holloway of New Rochelle, was best man and the ushers were Edward Evass and Frederick A. Lowe.

BERMUDA TO HAVE A LIVELY SEASON

Many New Yorkers Already on Islands in Leased Homes—Big Hotels Open Dec. 1.

C. LEDYARD BLAIR AT SONEY

Royal Yacht Club Gives Ball to Officers of the Battleship New Zealand.

Special Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

HAMILTON, Bermuda, Nov. 26.—Everything points to a busy season here. The two large hotels do not open for the Winter until Dec. 1, but many Americans are already here, having leased houses. The newly built homes are fitted with modern conveniences, but the old colonial model prevails. On this plan is the veranda house, famous for the splendid view of the islands. It is rented for the third time to Mr. and Mrs. W. C. Denny of New York.

Mrs. Russell Hastings is wintering abroad, and Soney, so beautifully laid out by the late Gen. Hastings, is let to C. Ledyard Blair of New York. W. Macpherson Roach of Chester is at Mount Vernon. F. W. and Mrs. T. S. Bradlee are again at Fairyland. D. B. Fearing of Newport is at Palm Ridge, overlooking the harbor. James S. McCobb of New York has taken Westmere. H. K. Elliott has Highlawn villa, and John Langan of New York is at Clifton cottage.

The beautiful old house in Paget—Bloomfield—has been leased by C. E. Goodrick of New York. Mrs. Magee of Watertown, New York City, and Mrs. L. Wyckow, Elmira, N. Y., have taken houses in Paget. Mrs. Lily Morrison Carr has taken a little cottage on the North Shore, Paget, and is expecting her daughters during the Winter. Also in Paget are Mr. and Mrs. James Hooper Poore, at Clermont, and Mr. and Mrs. H. A. Thorndike of Auburndale, Mass. Hamilton Parrish, New York, is going into his new house in Paget this Winter. Mrs. Fay of Boston is to be at Welwyn. Mr. Poore has bought Woodburn. Mrs. Harrison and the Misses Virginia and Alice Harrison of New Jersey have returned early. Their house is Longmeade, and they will stay until June.

J. E. Muster and C. and N. Fogel, formerly proprietors of the Marchmont, are managing the Imperial this year, having let the Marchmont. The Imperial is being enlarged.

The presence of the fleet this Winter adds greatly to the gayety here.

The ball given by the Royal Bermuda Yacht Club to the officers of the New Zealand battleship was a success. The Queen's Band supplied the music. There was a good deal of the new dancing, graceful and the reverse. Among the Americans present were Col. and Mrs. Denny, the Misses Spencer of Philadelphia, Mrs. W. M. Conyers, Mrs. W. O. Wilkinson, Mrs. A. M. Purcell, Mr. and Mrs. Rogers, New York; Prince George of Battenberg, Earl of Carlisle, Lord Berrgherah, Sir George and Lady Bullock, and Miss Bullock.

The New Zealand left the next morning for England.

A new golf course is planned for Bermuda for the large number of golfers who come here every year. The bathing pool at the Princess Hotel has been enlarged.

Mr. Higgins of New York has sailed from here in the steam yacht Marynthea with a large party.

Dedication of Montefiore Home.

The new buildings of the Montefiore Home at 210th Street and Gun Hill Road will be dedicated at 2 o'clock this afternoon. In its new quarters the home will be the largest institution of the kind in the world supported by Jewish philanthrophy. Jacob H. Schiff, the President of the home, will deliver the dedicatory address. The institution can be reached by taking the Lenox Avenue Subway, transferring to the Third Avenue Elevated, and taking the Webster Avenue car from the end of the elevated line to Gun Hill Road and walking four blocks west, or by taking the Broadway Subway to 207th Street and the Yonkers Avenue car to Gun Hill Road; or by taking the west side Elevated to 157th Street and the Jerome Avenue surface car to Gun Hill Road.

EX-GOV. H. W. LADD DEAD.

Old Merchant Was Twice Chief Executive of Rhode Island.

Special to The New York Times.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Nov. 29.—Herbert Warren Ladd, who was twice Governor of Rhode Island and President of the H. W. Ladd Company, a dry goods corporation which he founded here in 1871, died to-day of cerebral hemorrhage in the Butler Hospital, where he had been under treatment for some time. He was born in New Bedford, Mass., Oct. 15, 1843, and was a graduate of Brown University.

In 1860 Mr. Ladd entered the wholesale dry goods business, but withdrew to go to the civil war as correspondent of The New Bedford Mercury in 1862. Afterward he reported the war for The Boston Journal, and later issued the first Sunday paper ever published in New England outside of Boston to announce the details of the battle of Fredericksburg. In 1864 he re-entered business with White, Brown & Co., Boston, and seven years later formed the H. W. Ladd Company.

Ex-Gov. Ladd was the founder of the Commercial Club, Vice President of the Providence Board of Trade, and a member and officer of many other organizations and societies. In 1891 he presented to Brown University an astronomical observatory.

William J. Smith, Banker, Dead.

MEMPHIS, Tenn., Nov. 29.—William J. Smith, Brevet Brigadier General of the Union Army during the civil war, was stricken with heart disease and fell dead in the street here to-day. He was a veteran of the Mexican War, a member from Tennessee of the Forty-first Congress and at his death was President of a Memphis bank. At the outbreak of the civil war he enlisted as a private. He was ninety years old.

LACK OF RECREATION A CAUSE OF VICE

Crime, Too, Says Dr. Howe, Is Traceable to City's Inadequate Provision for Boys and Girls.

DANCE HALLS FLOURISHING

As a Nation, He Finds, We Have Turned the Leisure of People Over to Commercial Agencies.

A large part of the vice and crime of this city is traceable directly to inadequate provision for wholesome recreation of its people, according to a special report on the recreational and leisure time needs of New York prepared by Frederic C. Howe, Director of the People's Institute. In the report, which urges a wider use of the school buildings of the city for social and recreational purposes, Dr. Howe makes many bold and almost startling suggestions of extension of school functions. He says:

"Studies of the records of juvenile offenders show that a large percentage of arrests and commitments are for violations of city ordinances by children playing in the streets. The boy so arrested acquires a bad name. He is spotted by the police. If the offense is repeated, he becomes an old offender. For some cause or other he is detained in the police station or committed to an institution, and the long, weary journey to the penitentiary begins. This is true of a multitude of very young boys. Their offenses are traceable to the lack of opportunity for play and the fact that the only plays accessible to them involve a violation of law.

"The gang life of New York is a product of the play spirit led into criminal practices partly by the secretiveness made necessary by the law. Boys organize by streets or districts. They fight with one another, organize for stealing and other predatory purposes. In certain sections of New York gang fights are reported daily. Assaults, stabbing, and murders are of frequent occurrence, growing out of the predatory play of the gangs in the more congested quarters."

The same influences, the report points out, confront the girl, who has even less opportunity for play than the boy. Tracing the deleterious influences of inadequate provisions for leisure time on the character of girls in New York, Dr. Howe says:

"The school girl, keenly athirst for sensation and expression, wanders idly from three in the afternoon until nine at night, amid the perils of street and commercial resorts. Hundreds of thousands of young girls, worked to exhaustion in the factory or the department store, have only the alternative of a crowded tenement, the street or the dance hall for their leisure hours. Fatigued by overwork, they seek exciting amusement which only the dance hall offers.

"We are familiar with the New York dance hall, where the young woman is compelled to go for recreation; we know the terms on which she is able to attend these places, and the commercialized agencies that thrive upon her. We know that the wage earning girl does not pay her own way, but goes at the expense of a man. She makes chance acquaintances; the gathering is promiscuous, the atmosphere exciting; intoxicants are consumed, and the dance tends toward the vulgar if not the obscene.

"It is almost impossible to so supervise the commercial hall that it will be free from evil influences. The dance cannot be cultivated for its own sake under commercial auspices, and cannot be left to commerce without injury to public morals, and especially to young women."

Dr. Howe reports that there are 600 commercial dance halls in New York, twelve times as many dance halls as recreation centers, and that they are commercially successful. This, he says, is merely one of the many disproportions between commercial and public provision for play in the city. Dr. Howe concludes that for the great majority of people in New York, outside of commercialized agencies, there is no place for the young child but the street, no recreation place for the family group, no recreation place for the girl, and no social gathering place or political centre for men, for trades unions or for other masculine groups, except the saloon which is widely used for such purposes.

"As a nation," says Dr. Howe, "we have turned the leisure life of people for the most part over to commercial agencies, at terrible cost to the health, the morals, and the life of the people.

"The public school buildings, Dr. Howe maintains, offer the most possible agency for the development of a city-wide program of leisure. In this connection the investigator states:

"There are more than five hundred school houses in the city, which represent an investment of $135,000,000. The schools are used for but six or seven hours for five days in the week, and but nine months in the year. They lie idle in the evenings, the late afternoons, on holidays and Sundays, and are used to not more than 50 per cent. of their possible efficiency. The interest on this investment is $5,000,000 a year, and, measured in money terms, the loss to the community through failure to use these facilities up to their capacity is in the neighborhood of $2,500,000.

"The dangers of fraud and corruption in elections would be greatly reduced. Dr. Howe maintains, if the public schools were used for polling places. The character of elections would change. Men would come to the school house to vote with a new sense of citizenship that is not produced under the present environment.

"During the campaign of 1912," he says, "the auditorium of at least one of the public schools of New York was used for political meetings. The meetings were orderly and free from disturbance. The public schools in Jersey City have been opened to partisan meetings, as have the schools in Chicago."

Dr. Howe argues that the city would be justified in requiring teachers to live in the neighborhood of the schools in order that they might thus come into close contact and sympathy with the immediate community which they serve. He emphasizes the need of vital participation in school administration and insists that this must be brought about only by giving the local school boards powers and responsibilities which they do not at present possess.

Dr. Howe even suggests that an employment agency be part of the extended activities he proposes for the schools, and that his attention on the ground that unemployment is as dangerous as illiteracy to the welfare of the community and that the protection of the school and the community is never more needed than during the transition from school life to working life.

"There seems no good reason," he says, "why the public school should not house the local health office and be the headquarters of the Health Department and visiting nurses. It should be the community medical and dental dispensary. It is believed that economy could be effected and far greater efficiency secured were the local health administration closely correlated with the public schools. The condition of the child is a good barometer of the home, and the home can be most easily reached by health officers and visiting nurses through the child. It is also possible that the functions of the gymnasium directors with the health officers could be merged."

"A democratic use of the schools by the people themselves on a partially and increasing basis of self-support is possible," says Dr. Howe. "There appears to be no limit yet discovered to the use which a neighborhood will make of its school building once it is easily available for use, and there is also an apparent willingness on the part of the neighborhood to co-operate in a responsible, democratic way in the preservation of order and control."

Insurance Merger in Cincinnati.

CINCINNATI, Nov. 29.—The Western and Southern Life Insurance Company of this city has absorbed the National Progressive Life Insurance Company, also with headquarters here. The Western and Southern has been in business twenty-five years, has 500,000 policy holders, and assets of $8,000,000. The National Progressive had 25,000 policyholders and over $2,000,000 in insurance.

EDUCATION NOTES.

A mothers' club has been formed for the pupils in Public School 4, at 173d Street and Fulton Avenue, in the Bronx. A meeting of the Parents' Association of this school will be held in the auditorium at 8 P. M. to-morrow. Lester H. Scott of the People's Institute will address the meeting.

There will be five women in the Board of Education next year instead of four as in the present board.

The principals and teachers of the Evening Elementary Schools are publishing The Bulletin, an organ for the evening school teachers. In addition to pedagogical topics it is intended to be a medium for the free interchange of ideas, criticisms, and legitimate objections of any kind. The Chairmen of Committees on Publication are Charles H. Davis, Principal of Evening School 47, Queens; Henry Goldberger, Principal of Evening School 89, Manhattan; David Goldwasser, Principal of Evening School 70, Manhattan; Albert I. Loewinthau, Principal of Evening School 76, Manhattan, and Meivin C. Opperman, Principal of Evening School 25, Manhattan.

John Bardelmus, janitor of Public School 38, Queens, has been assigned to the temporary care of Public School 39, Queens.

The janitor of the Curtis High School has been authorized to detail a fireman at $1 an evening and one male cleaner at 75 cents an evening to duty at sessions of the evening school and at lectures.

A leave of absense for six months, without pay, has been granted to Margaret Acaster, janitress of Public School 36, Queens, for restoration of health.

The Board of Education has rejected all bids received on Nov. 24 for installing electric equipment in Public School 94, in Queens.

TRADING AT LOW EBB ON STOCK EXCHANGE

Sales of 3,765,998 Shares in November Smallest Month's Total in Many Years.

BOND SALES FALL OFF, TOO

Dullness Causes Dissolution of Some Firms and the Closing of Branch Offices by Others.

The ending of a business month yesterday that brought smaller commissions for Stock Exchange brokers than any similar period within the recollection of any but the oldest members, was signified by a fairly good increase in business, the day's sales reaching 75,750 shares, or 23,000 shares more than was done in the two-hour session of the previous Saturday. For the week, which was interrupted by the holiday, the total transactions were only 524,000 shares. For the previous week, which proved the smallest full week since 1897, the total was 100,000 shares larger.

November transactions on the Stock Exchange were the smallest in volume for any month in sixteen years. The aggregate sales for the twenty-three business days of the month were only a little larger than those for the single day which holds the record for activity. That was April 30, 1901, when the approaching culmination of the boom movement which broke with the Northern Pacific panic, on May 9 of that year, was marked by the transfer of 3,270,000 shares of stock in a single five-hour session. On May 9, 1901, this total was almost equaled, with sales aggregating 3,071,000 shares. For the entire month just closed the sales were only 3,765,998 shares.

The smallest trading in any previous November of recent years was in 1894, but even then there was a total of 4,530,000 shares. The best November came just ten years later, with total transactions amounting to 31,960,000 shares, or an average of considerably more than 1,000,000 shares for every working day.

The bond business done on the Exchange for the month was the smallest for any November since 1893. Bond sales so far this year have fallen below the total for the corresponding period for any year since 1897, and there is every indication that the year 1913 will set a new low mark for sixteen years in that respect.

There were less than half as many shares of stock sold last month as there were in October, and 4,941,000 less than for November of last year. The best day was Nov. 10, with a total of 464,000 shares. Monday established a new low record for a single day's trading for a period of twenty-five years, with 57,603 shares.

In the week of Dec. 22, 1900, the Exchange did nearly 8,000,000 shares of stock, and everybody was happy, because it made a big Christmas distribution. With less than a fifteenth of that amount of business last week a great many clerks were giving less thought to the possibilities of a Christmas bonus than to the likelihood of their being able to continue to draw a weekly pay envelope if business does not begin to mend before long.

Extreme dullness on the Stock Exchange was emphasized yesterday by the announcement of the dissolution of five partnerships and the discontinuance of six branch offices. The Secretary's bulletin for the week also showed the formation of two new firms and the opening of one new office.

The dissolved firms are Hendrickson, Hall & Co., Ulman & Co., Kendall & Whitlock, William Evans, Jr., & Co., and Johnson, Wood & Rogers. These firms have been absorbed as Hendrickson & Co. and Johnson & Wood.

Boody, McClellan & Co. have given up their branch offices at Stamford and Bridgeport. Chisholm & Chapman have closed an office at 320 Broadway, and Thomson & McKinnon one at Two Rivers, Wis. Pomeroy & Co. have discontinued their branch at 621 Broadway, and J. S. Farley & Co. have closed a branch at Hartford. Rhoades & Co. have opened an office at Worcester, Mass.

TRANSACTIONS IN NOVEMBER

Transactions in stocks on the New York Stock Exchange for the month of November aggregated 3,765,998 shares, the smallest total for any month since April, 1897, when the dealings were only 3,539,643 shares. The total for the past month showed a decrease of 3,645,571 shares as compared with the previous month, and of 4,941,736 shares as compared with the corresponding month last year. The largest trading occurred on the 10th, when the total was 464,325 shares, and the smallest on the 24th, with dealings in only 57,603 shares, the lightest trading on any full day since July 3, 1888, when the total was only 43,935 shares. For the Saturday half-holiday the maximum total was 127,470 shares, on the 8th, and the minimum 52,322 shares, on the 22d.

The following table gives the total transactions in stocks for November and the eleven months of this year, as compared with the corresponding periods in each year back to 1880:

The dealings in railroad and miscellaneous bonds amounted to a par value of $30,391,500; in Government bonds to $236,500; in State bonds to $838,500; in city bonds to $1,240,000; total in all classes of bonds of $32,668,000, against total in any November since 1893, and a decrease of $8,400,500 as compared with the previous month and of $5,963,700 as compared with the same month last year. The total on the 6th of November was the largest of the month, while that of the 24th of $804,000 was the smallest, the latter also the lightest dealings since Aug. 26, 1910, when the total was only $760,500. The maximum Saturday half holiday total was $810,000 on the 8th, while the minimum was $395,500 on the 29th.

Bond dealings for the month and the eleven months of this year make the following showings, as compared with preceding years:

Fire Department.

Fireman Jeremiah Looney, H. and L. 106, died on Thursday from injuries received on the 24th. The funeral of the fire department goes out to the family, relatives, and friends. The funeral will take place at 9 A. M., Dec. 1, from his late residence, 64 Freeman Street, Brooklyn, to St. Anthony's Church, in Manhattan Avenue. Interment at Calvary Cemetery. A detail of sixteen men, (six men as pall-bearers,) under the command of Lieut. E. J. Fallon, Engine 293, together with the members of H. and L. 106, will follow the hearse as mourners.

Lieut. Thomas Mitchell, H. and L. 22, died on Nov. 28 from injuries received while descending pole in company headquarters. The heartfelt sympathy of the department goes out to the family, relatives, and friends. The funeral will take place from his late residence, 344 West 150th Street, at 10:30 A. M., Dec. 1; thence to the Church of the Holy Name, 96th Street and Amsterdam Avenue. Interment at Calvary Cemetery. The funeral escort will consist of a battalion of two companies, ten men each, commanded by Capt. G. W. Murray, No. 1, Engine 68.

Special orders relating to the appointment of William McGarity as probationary fireman are revoked, he having failed to report for duty.

Leaves of absence will be granted only to members of the force who have served in the department for a period of six months or more.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

City.

The Municipal Civil Service Commission has approved these reports of Investigator Fuld:

Relative to assistant engineer, grade C, supplemental; recommends that report be filed.

Relative to gymnasium attendant, male; recommends that the report be filed.

Relative to school farm attendant, Sheldon J. Brady, who has recently been appointed; recommends that the report be filed.

Relative to Superintendent of laundries, supplemental, (Luke P. Gill;) recommends that report be filed.

Relative to nurse, supplemental; recommends that the report be filed.

Relative to plan examiner, grade C, supplemental; recommends that the report be filed.

United States.

The Civil Service Commission announces for Dec. 8 an open competitive examination for chief mine surgeon, for men only, to fill a vacancy in the Bureau of Mines, Pittsburgh, Penn., at a salary ranging from $2,400 to $4,000 a year, and vacancies as they may occur in places requiring similar qualifications. The duties will be to investigate and report upon health conditions in mines and the injuries to the human body; to direct methods of first aid instruction to miners, to attend mine disasters, and to direct and make pathological and physiological studies concerning the effect upon the human system of poisonous gases, death by shock at mines, and similar subjects. Competitors will not be assembled for examination, but will be rated on general education and medical training, experience as surgeon and physician to industrial workers, post-graduate laboratory and hospital experience on pathological or physiological investigations, and publications or thesis on surgery and sanitation. Graduation from a medical college of recognized standing and not less than three years' hospital experience among industrial workers are prerequisites. Applicants must have reached their forty-fifth birthday on the date of the examination. Further information may be obtained from the United States Civil Service Commission, Washington, D. C.

BOSTON COPPER GOSSIP.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Nov. 29.—North Butte's production this month is expected to reach 2,800,000 pounds, a record in the company's history. The recent strike on the twenty-sixth level makes a good showing thus far and very likely will develop well.

Wolverine has resumed shipments of rock.

Braden produced in October 2,006,000 pounds of blister copper, comparing with 1,148,000 pounds in October a year ago.

Tennessee reports for October output as 1,392,162 pounds, against 1,309,485 in September and 1,734,153 in the corresponding month last year.

October output figures of South Utah Mines and Smelters are 239,453 pounds, against 249,333 pounds in September.

In October Ohio Copper produced 720,300 pounds of copper. In September the production was 685,900 pounds, and in October of 1912 it was 167,100 pounds.

October production of Ray Consolidated was 4,871,306 pounds of copper, against 4,470,551 pounds in the preceding month and 3,582,900 pounds in October a year ago.

Nevada Consolidated in October turned out 5,098,040 pounds of copper, compared with 4,441,071 pounds in September and 850,741 pounds in October a year ago.

Chile Copper produced 4,914,044 pounds of copper, compared with 4,435,873 pounds in September and 2,333,380 pounds in October, 1912.

Late advices from Houghton are that the drift has cut the Great Eastern vein on the Superior and Boston property, and is still in ore.

The ore body encountered in the Nevada-Douglas property averages about 7 per cent. Ore running around 12 per cent. is being hoisted from the stope over the 750-foot level of the same mine—the Ludwig.

ARMY SMOTHERS ANNAPOLIS TEAM BY 22-9 SCORE

game—the tricky and costly turns of the forward pass—could be mastered the soldiers could win. Surely they could not hope to win against such a heavy, powerful line of giants as the midshipmen on old-fashioned line-breaking football. The Navy stuck to old-fashioned methods because its team was built and developed with that kind of a game in view. The naval campaign was to hold the enemy in check with a superior defense and then trust to the kicking foot of John Brown, the giant Annapolis guard, who can boot kicks from placement anywhere nearer than midfield. And John Brown did his duty. He did enough kicking to win the game if the Army had played as it had in other years. He scored all of the Navy's points with three kicks from placement.

Army Wins by Open Play.

But very adroitly the soldiers had mastered the open game. They made three touchdowns. Two of these were made on forward passes by Louis Merrillat, the Army end rush, who twice received long shoots from the unerring hand of Pritchard, the West Point quarter back. The other touchdown came after Merrillat, running like a deer, sprinted his way through the whole Navy team for a gain of 60 yards and landed the ball on the Navy's three-yard line, where Cont. Hoge, jammed through for a touchdown.

Besides the three touchdowns, with one goal resulting, the Army also scored 3 points on a field goal from placement, when Woodruff, a substitute, rushed in suddenly from the side lines and did the trick.

The Navy played gamely in its losing fight. Its line of giant forwards was like a wall. Little headway was made through it for more than half the game. Nicholls, the Navy quarter back, played a wonderful game at rushing back punts in the first part of the battle, wriggling away from the Army ends time and again for runs of from 10 to 30 yards. But later when the Army became thrilled with a sense of victory, Merrillat and Morkoe, the ends, took on a new lease of life, and Nicholls was downed in his tracks after every punt he caught. The attack of the Army ends finally became so wearing that the elusive Navy quarter was finally sent to the side line limp and tired, Mitchell taking his place. This player burst forth like a sensation, and for a few plays it was impossible to stop him, but he eventually succumbed to the overwhelming grip of the Army tacklers.

Brown's Fine Work.

Big Brown, his bushy hair unprotected by a headgear, was everywhere in the fray. Wherever the skirmish was thickest, Brown loomed up above all the leather-capped fighters. He was through the Army line and down the field as fast as the Navy ends on kicks and Prichard had few chances to run back Nicholls's high spiral kicks. Capt. Gilchrist, the Navy end, was a constant hazard to the Army's advance. McReavy and Howe of the Navy played the game of their lives and both were carried from the field exhausted. They both stuck to the fight until they were unable to stand up. They were down in a heap, but they had played their game and played it well.

But after all it is the name of Merrillat that will ring over the Army Plains for a long time. He was the hero of the Army's victory. In the days to come, when the present corps of cadets is scattered far and wide over Uncle Sam's domains and the officers are gathered after mess in the Army barracks of the West or around the camp fires in the Far East, and they are chatting of the old days at the Point, the name of Merrillat from Illinois is sure to come up, and it will be told all over again how he tucked the ball under his left arm and galloped down the Polo Grounds gridiron like a frightened deer; struck off half a dozen savage tackles and planted the ball on the Navy's 3-yard line before his nose was finally buried into the turf. Yes, and they will tell how this same Merrillat twice leaped into the air and grabbed the rampant ball on forward passes and made touchdowns. He did a real day's work yesterday and deserved all the praise and flattery and deafening cheers which rang in his ears long after the struggle ended.

President Wilson's Arrival.

There was a big rumpus about the Speedway gate when President Wilson arrived before the game. With his party he was escorted to his box on the second tier of the Army side, where he remained till the second half, when he moved to his box on the Navy side. On the gridiron a battalion of cadets stood at attention until he was seated. At that time the stands were crowded. The crowd was late in coming. Before 1 o'clock there were but a few thousand people present. But in the next hour they came so thick and fast by auto, Subway, and elevated train that the huge amphitheatre filled up in an hour. Never have so many automobiles been gathered in one place before. There were 10,000 machines, from stately limousines to rocking taxicabs, parked along every side street in upper Harlem and on all the streets on Washington Heights.

After President Wilson had bared his head to the applauding crowds, attention turned to the gridiron. The first cheer came from the Army when the Cadets gave a welcome to the Navy. The Navy barked back and cheered the Army. The grim-faced players on the field faced each other but there was no exchange of friendly greetings here. There was another business. The game was but a few minutes old when the Navy's powerful attack began to push the Army back. A dodging run by Nicholls of twenty-five yards brought the ball to the Army's twenty-yard line, and then McReavy tumbled through for ten yards. A double pass play brought the ball to the five-yard line and from the Cadets section came thundering cheers of encouragement.

"Hold 'em, Army; hold 'em!" was the cry.

The Cadet forwards began to stiffen. It looked like a sure Navy touchdown. The Navy backs came tearing into the Soldiers. The latter dug their feet into the ground and set their teeth with a snap. Then came the crash. But the Army line didn't move. Again came the crash, and the Army held like a rock. Twice more the Navy plungers—Harrison, McReavy, and Leonard—tried to jam a hole in the Soldiers' front, but when the last melee was untangled the Navy had failed to gain their distance and the Army took the ball on downs on the 3-yard line. It was a stubborn bit of defensive playing and showed the stuff the Army line was made of.

First Score for Navy.

Jouett, for the Army, tried to kick the ball from behind his own goal line, but the kick was short and Nicholls ran it back for enough toward the Army goal to give Brown a chance to make his first kick from placement. From the 20-yard line, with Capt. Gilchrist holding the ball for him, Brown scored 3 points for the Navy, and the the Middies in the north stand thought it was all over but the shouting. The siren yell of the Navy came across the field with ear-piercing harshness. But they reckoned too cheaply with the Army team. Soon after the start of the second period Nicholls attempted to punt from his twenty-five-yard line. Wynne, the left tackle, was through the line and blocked the kick. Weyand, the other Army tackle, was right behind him and fell on the ball on the 3-yard line.

The Army found it a hopeless task to try to batter down that massive human wall of midshipmen, and after wasting much effort in the attempt, Woodruff was sent into the game and kicked a goal from placement from exactly the same spot where Brown had kicked in the first period. Now it was the Army's chance to howl, and with the score tied at 3 to 3 the Army's rocket yell went across the gridiron with great volume. It was going to be a real football game after all.

Nicholls Gets 40-Yard Run.

Later on, in that same period, the Navy drove the Army back, and when Prichard dropped a punt on the Army's 22-yard line, the Navy recovered the ball. It rushed it eight yards, but the Army stuck. Brown then went back to the 25-yard line and kicked another goal from placement, giving the Navy the lead by a 6 to 3 score. On the next kickoff Nicholls sent a thrill of fear through the Army ranks when he tore desperately down the field for forty yards after catching the ball on the kickoff. Howe, the big Navy guard, and McReavy were both injured in this period. McReavy was hurt when he was some distance away from the scene of the play.

He was running across the field to intercept Prichard on a pretty twenty-yard run. An Army player hurled himself at the Navy man to block him off and the two went down hard. McReavy was unable to get up and had to be carried off the field. Cadet Blodgett of Brooklyn took his place.

Just before time was up in the first half the Army uncorked its open game. Prichard shot a fine forward pass to Markoe, which brought the ball to the 20-yard line. Quick as a flash Prichard made the same kind of a play and tossed the leather oval on a straight line at Merrillat as he galloped over the goal line. The fast Army end leaped and got the ball and grounded it for a touchdown. The Army cheering section on the south side of the field became a blaze of gold flags. The Cadets jumped on one another's backs. McEwan failed to kick the goal.

Nicholls was the life of the Navy back field, and in the second half he tore off another long end run of 20 yards, which brought the ball to the Army's 25-yard line. Nicholls and Blodgett jammed their way through the Army team for 9 yards, and then the Army rallied and refused to retreat. Brown was again called to the rescue, and from the 28-yard line he kicked another goal from placement, tieing the score again at 9 to 9. The game was becoming more exciting every minute. After each play the hopes of one side or the other would rise, only to fall on the next play. The Cadets and Middies were yelling themselves hoarse.

The Service Mascots.

The Army mule, which was a stage mule, made up of two young men with lively legs, and the Navy goat, which was real, paraded up and down in front of the stands proudly. Vaughn, the Navy right tackle, took the ball from one of the Army players in a scrimmage and ran down the field for a touchdown, but it was not allowed, as he got the ball illegally. Jouett was now back in the game and was getting away his punts better, more than holding his own against Nicholls.

The Army was fighting like mad. Merrillat and Markoe showed renewed speed and were down the field well under Jouett's kicks. They got Nicholls every time after that, and he made no more spectacular run-backs of punts. When an Army forward pass was intercepted on the Army's 38-yard line, Merrillat got the ball to skirt the opposite end. The Army interference surrounded him and he started down the field. One by one the Navy players were put out of the play. With a stout, straight right arm Merrillat sent two Navy tacklers to the grass. The only ones who now stood between him and a touchdown were Nicholls and Alexander. He sent Nicholls sprawling with the straight arm and dodged by Alexander. Alexander chased him madly, but did not bring him down from behind until Merrillat was on the 3-yard line. In two plunges Capt. Ben Hoge of Missouri then crashed his way through the Navy line for a touchdown, and McEwan kicked the goal. The score was then 16 to 9.

Then the Army began to sing to the tune of "Good Night, Ladies."

Good night, Navy! Good night, Navy!
Good night, Navy! Army will win to-day.
Army team will win to-day, win to-day, win to-day.

The "Charge" and the "Rocket" cheers of the soldiers rent the air in the boisterous outbrsak.

Merrillat's Second Touchdown.

Elated over success, the Army men in the last period went at their old rivals with trouble in their hearts. The Navy was fighting back hard, but was bewildered by the rush of the Army attack. Nicholls made a low punt over the line, and the ball was grabbed by Merrillat on the run. He carried it to the Navy's fifteen-yard line before he was toppled over by the giant Brown. Army was then set back five yards for offside play, but Prichard took the ball to the twenty-yard line on the next play. Merrillat rushed through the Navy forwards before they realized what his purpose was. In a jiffy he was over the line and Prichard shot a beautiful pass to him. The West Point end jumped for the ball just as it was about to be caught by Vaughn and made a touchdown at the corner of the gridiron. The kickout was illegal and McEwan was not allowed to try for goal.

When the game was over Head Coach Daly rushed out and patted the Army players on the back. The Army band forgot its dignity and began to dance around, hugging its big horns. The cheer leaders gave the call for "Rush the Colors," and the happy cadets began to swarm all over the gridiron. Around the field they marched behind the band, doing a serpentine dance.

Meecham Mourns Bad Ankle.

Far behind the last cadet in the joyous parade limped a big cadet on crutches. He was limping badly and couldn't keep up. He took his weight off the crutches and attempted to run to catch up, but he stumbled and had to use his crutches again. This was Meecham, the towering Army guard, who was so badly injured a few weeks ago that he had to sit in with the cheering cadets. He sat in the front row, and through watery eyes watched Huston playing in his place. Oh, how he wished he was in there plugging away at that Navy team. He sat silently and would occasionally forget the smashed ankle and jump to his feet. Each time he would drop into his seat with a little gasp of pain. Then, when the game was over Meecham couldn't even jump over the boxes with the other cadets. He had to hobble slowly down to the field. How he cussed that broken ankle.

It was no use; poor Mecham couldn't catch up with the parade of joy-crazed young soldiers. So he waited until the parade came around the field again. It was not until then that the other cadets saw Mecham's plight. He had been forgotten in the excitement. So they took his crutches, and, putting his long arms around the shoulders of two cadets, the cripple joined in the parade, and had his fun.

Then the Color Corps encircled the field. The line of gray-coated, straight-backed youths, each clasping the hand of the next one to him, saw the colors—the huge West Point flag of gold and gray and black silk—planted in the middle of the gridiron, and then they cheered the colors and cheered the Army and cheered the team.

Rushing the Colors.

A sight followed this which New Yorkers will long remember. The great crowd of people didn't hurry away as folk usually do after a game. The throng waited and watched this unusual spectacle. At a given word the cadets rushed for the colors from every angle of the field. They ran pell mell like so many frightened things. The tails of the gray coats stood out behind them as the wild rush was made on the colors. The great sheet of silk dropped in the drizzling rain and flapped about the pole. The four cadets who were holding the colors knelt down with their backs toward the surging charge of cadets coming at them.

From all directions and at the same moment the cadets arrived at the colors. They leaped over one another's heads and tried to climb up the pole. They were back jammed about it solid and then they began to draw back. The colors finally were carried around the gridiron and the music of the band was drowned in the outburst of Army enthusiasm.

The rain was coming down fast now. Night was falling on this scene of Army triumph. The Midshipmen sat and with lumps in their throats watched their rivals boastfully shout their triumph to the world. Once they cheered the defeated Navy team, which had jogged away from the field on which it had met its downfall. The Navy colors, which during the game were a great splash of gold and blue, were waved no more. Round and round the gridiron marched the Cadets chanting their hymn of victory. They had waited long for this day, and the wait was worth the price. The Army had scored a great victory.

One of the cadets climbed hand over hand up the west goal post and there placed an Army banner. It was a hard climb, but he did it. This was too much for the Navy. A midshipman rushed down to the west goal and he, too, climbed up hand over hand, and when the last spectator had left the field through the semi-darkness he could see the two little rain-drenched silk flags, the last remaining relics of the Army's happiest day.

HOW THE GAME WAS PLAYED.

Forward Passes Lead to Touchdowns and Victory.

The Army handed out the first of the day's many surprises a few minutes before the team took the field to start the game. It was the announcement that Hodgson would not be in his position at right half back, although the coaches at the close of Friday's secret practice at the Polo Grounds had said he would play. Jouett was named for the half back position, with Capt. Hoge at left half back and Benedict at full back. This was the only change in the Army line-up. The Navy also made one change, putting in Leonard for Failing at right half back.

The spectacular parades of the cadets and middies took up so much of the crowd's attention in the last few minutes before the game began that the twenty-two husky warriors who had been picked to start the battle were practically forgotten. The start was delayed ten minutes by these parades, but the spectators refused to become restless under the conditions. The novel spectacle could have held their attention for another ten minutes. Instead of running their teams up and down the field in preliminary practice, as is customary at most big games, the quarter backs had to grab off any little space not needed by the paraders to put through their signal drills. The same was true of the kickers, who found little opportunity to practice at their specialty before the game.

The Navy boys' parade was a disappointment to the crowd, not that it lacked any of the brilliant execution of Army manoeuvres, but it was too short. It was 2 o'clock when the Navy band appeared at the centre field gate at the head of the Navy battalion, and there was no time for any such parade as the cadets had just completed. The middies entered the playing field without marching around the gridiron, and, after forming in ranks, they hurried to their seats in the north stand. The Annapolis contingent presented a prettier picture than the cadets, the combination of navy blue and old gold standing out much stronger than the almost solid gray of the West Point corps.

Navy Wins the Toss.

The last middie and several who preceded him into the newly erected north side stands were still scrambling for their seats when Referee "Bill" Langford called the Captains of the two elevens together and tossed a coin into the air. Capt. Gilchrist of the Navy team called heads, and when the nickel settled on the ground the face of Miss Liberty stood out in full view.

"We will defend the west goal," said the Navy leader, and the eleven middies ran to get in position for the kickoff, every mother's son sure that it was another Navy day. For had not the element of luck, which is potent in every branch of sport, showed at the start that it was with the future Admirals? The west goal gave two advantages to the defenders. The wind which swept across the field at the time was veering a bit from the northwest, though not strongly. The greatest advantage rested in the slope of the field at the extreme east end, thereby aiding greatly the team that might have to advance the ball by rushing.

The cheer leaders ceased their efforts, the cheering sections became stilled, and a hush of expectancy settled over the big stands as Referee Langford shouted to Capts. Gilchrist and Hoge to find if both were ready.

Army Centre Kicks Off.

With the ball poised on a small mound of dirt at the Army's 40-yard line, Referee Langford sounded his whistle, and the Army team advanced as one man, while McEwan, the big centre, lifted the ball far down into the Navy territory. It dropped into the waiting arms of Half Back Leonard, who carried it back 15 yards to the Navy's 35-yard line before he was thrown. On the first play Harrison found a hole in the Army line for 8 yards, and on the next line-up Nicholls uncovered the first of a long series of spectacular performances which the game was to develop. It was a dash around the right wing of the Army line, and the speedy quarter back was not brought to earth until he had covered 32 yards, bringing the ball to the Army's 25-yard line. From the Navy side of the field came a cheer that must have reverberated through the Broux, and the middies, answering the call of their cheer leaders, yelled long and loudly for a touchdown. McReavy tore a hole in the Army's left wing for 3 yards, and Leonard picked up 3 more on the other side. Again McReavy took the ball, and only the Army's secondary defense prevented him from making a touchdown. He went through the line like a shot, and his dash netted 9 yards and a first down at the Army's 10-yard line.

The Army team gave every appearance of being demoralized. It had failed completely while the Navy was making its advance of 50 yards down the field, not including Leonard's run-back of the kick-off. Banners fluttered gayly in the middies' cheering section over the probability of a touchdown—a feat which Annapolis had not performed against West Point since Capt. Ben Douglas pushed his stalwart form over the Army goal line at Franklin Field back in 1908. From the shouting cadets in the stands came a continuous appeal to "break it up." It was with strong misgivings that the cadets yelled to their team, and little did they realize how well that appeal would be answered.

Navy Stopped at Three-Yard Line.

There is nothing that can hold like an Army team within ten yards of its own goal line, the much vaunted pluck of Yale having nothing on the Cadets in this feature of the gridiron game. There was danger here and no none realized it more than the Cadets as they dug their toes into the yielding turf and crouched low for the assault on their line. The assault came in the person of Full Back Harrison and when the tangled mass was unwoven it was found that the plunge netted a scant yard. McReavy, the best of the Navy line plungers until an injury forced him out of the struggle, got the second chance and he tore off four yards before he was downed. Again Harrison was called upon and he could not gain. It was the final chance with five yards separating the Middies from that Army goal line and Leonard was sent into the line for a touchdown. The charging lines came together hard, they swayed a few seconds and then went down. The ball was three yards from the goal line and in possession of the Army. It was West Point's chance to cheer and the occupants of the south stands made the most of it.

From behind the goal line Jouett got off a punt of forty yards and Nicholls was thrown at the Army's twenty-yard line after running ten yards. McReavy got five yards outside Wynne, but Nicholls lost trying to skirt the end on a fake kick formation. Harrison's plunge netted five yards, with only one more down to make the distance. The ball was in front of the goal post and Brown dropped back for a goal from placement. It was the same Brown who booted the Navy to its victory over West Point a year ago. Gilchrist took Perry's accurate pass, put the pigskin in position quickly, and Brown made his kick. The leather sailed on a line over the heads of two lines of forwards and then over the crossbar. A deafening yell went up from the Navy cheering section as Referee Langford nodded acknowledgment that the goal had been kicked.

McEwan kicked off again and Nicholls fumbled the ball as he was tackled at his 35-yard line after a run of fifteen yards, Capt. Hoge recovering the ball for the Army. The penalties of five yards each for offside play by the Navy gave the Army a first down at the 25-yard line. Benedict and Jouett made fruitless assaults on the Navy line, and then Prichard tried the first forward pass of the game. It was a beautiful effort and missed being successful by inches only. Markoe and the ball got to the goal line at the same time, and the Army end jumped for the pigskin, but touched it only with his finger tips. The pass over the line gave the ball to the Navy for scrimmage at their 20-yard line.

Nicholls Punts Out of Danger.

Nicholls immediately punted and Prichard was downed at midfield after a run back of ten yards. Benedict could not gain, Jouett's long run across the field went for a loss, and Prichard's quarter back run was of the same type. Jouett punted and Leonard was downed at his 15-yard line after fumbling the ball and then recovering it. The ball was now close to the side lines and McReavy carried it out of bounds so as to get it in the centre of the field. On a kick formation Nicholls lost four yards, and on the next play Nicholls punted to Brown at midfield.

Prichard then uncovered a trick which the Cadets learned from Notre Dame a few weeks ago. He ran back to make a forward pass, but saw he would be tackled, so he threw the ball to the ground just in front of him. This made an incompleted pass, but it saved fifteen yards which a tackle would have meant, the ball going back to the point where the play began. Another forward pass was tried, and this time Prichard got the ball away in good time, but it hit the ground and was brought back again. Jouett punted and Nicholls was thrown at the 15-yard line. Benedict was hurt in this play, and he was helped to the side lines, Hobbs going in at full back for the Army. As the teams made their first scrimmage the quarter ended with the ball in the Navy's possession at their 15-yard line.

The Army had the west goal to defend when play was resumed, and the Navy defended the east goal. Nicholls got a bad pass from Perry, but made a good punt to Jouett at midfield, Jones making the tackle. Prichard tried the right wing for a quarterback run, but failed, so Jouett punted again, Nicholls getting the ball at the Navy's 15-yard line. The ball was too near the Navy goal for comfort, so Nicholls chose to punt again. Before he got the ball away Wynne was in front of him, and he blocked the kick, the ball rolling toward the Navy goal. There was a scramble for it, and Weyand, the big right tackle of the Army team, got it seven yards from the goal line. It was the Navy's turn to show a defense under its goal post, and the Middies held so well that three successive plunges by the Army backs showed a loss of one yard, making nine yards to go on the final plunge. From the Army stands of West Point substitutes a youth, who had been hidden under a blanket, began to warm up. Time was precious, and the warm-up was limited. As the teams lined up for the next play the substitute ran on to the field.

Woodruff Takes to the Field.

"It's Woodruff!" came a yell from the Cadets' cheering section. Woodruff it was, the youth with the most trustworthy kicking toe in Lieut. Charley Daly's squad of forty Cadets. Jouett walked to the side lines to make a place for the newcomer. Woodruff smoothed out a spot almost identical with the place of Brown's previous kick, and Prichard got in position for a pass. So quickly was it done that the crowd hardly realized what was going on until the ball sailed on its way over the crossbar. It was West Point's first score against Annapolis since 1908, and the game was tied, 3 to 3.

Brown kicked off to Prichard who fumbled at his 20-yard line, and Vaughan recovered the ball. Two smashes at the line gained only three yards, and then time was taken out, owing to an injury to Howe, the Navy right guard. Brown went back for a kick, but another play was decided on and it failed, so a kick was necessary. Wilfred Gilchrist holding the ball at the 30-yard line. Brown made his kick, and again his aim was true, putting the Navy in front again, this time by the score of 6 to 3.

McEwan kicked off for the Army, and Nicholls, after catching the ball at his 20-yard line, made a spectacular run of forty yards through a field of avalanche of Navy tacklers, with the Army tacklers. Prichard was all set for the tackle when Markoe brought Nicholls down with a tackle from behind. With the ball at the Army's 40-yard line, Leonard gained four yards, McReavy got one, Nicholls failed to gain, so Brown went back on a kick formation. It was a fake, as Brown made a forward pass which was incompleted, and the ball went to the Army at its own 40-yard line.

Hobbs punted back to Leonard at midfield. McReavy got two yards, Nicholls grabbed off five more, and then Merrillat blocked a punt by Nicholls falling on the ball at the Navy's 45-yard line. Hoge got one yard for the Army, Prichard ran across the field for no gain and then he tried a forward pass, again tossing the ball away when he saw he would be tackled for a loss. Hobbs punted and Markoe threw Nicholls in his tracks at the Navy's 48-yard line. On a wide run Leonard got two yards and Howe was hurt again. He was taken out, Vaughan moving to right guard and Redmond to left tackle. Nicholls punted and Prichard ran the ball back twenty-three yards to the Navy's 25-yard line. McReavy injured his left knee in making the tackle and had to be carried off the field, Bindgett, the New York boy who played last year with Commerce, taking his place.

Army Strategy Triumphs.

Prichard tried a forward pass which failed and then he got one away for twelve yards to Markoe and a first down at the Navy's 20-yard line. There remained two minutes before the half ended and the Army boys went into a conference. Strategy triumphed. Prichard took his time on another forward pass and then hurled the ball into the waiting arms of Merrillat behind the Navy goal line. McEwan failed to kick the goal after the punt out had made the touchdown. The score was now 10 to 6 in favor of the Army. Brown kicked off to Prichard, who ran back fifteen yards, and then Benedict failed to gain as the whistle ended the first half of play.

The Navy had the west goal at the beginning of the second half and the Army had the east goal. McEwan kicked to Nicholls and he ran the ball back to his 25-yard line. He immediately punted to Prichard at the Army's 38-yard line. The Navy lost five yards for offside play, and then the Army lost fifteen on tough play. Two exchanges of punts by Hobbs and Nicholls ended with the ball in the Army's possession at the Army's 35-yard line. On a kick formation Hobbs got five yards and he punted to Nicholls, who ran the ball back twenty-five yards to the Army's 42-yard line. Overesch succeeded Ingram at right end for the Middies. On another kick formation Nicholls got sixteen yards and a first down at the Army's 26-yard line. Leonard lost four yards, Nicholls got it back with four more, and then he could get only two on the third try, but the ball was brought back to the 25-yard line. Blodgett got one yard and Brown dropped back for another goal from placement. Gilchrist held the ball, Brown again showed unerring aim, and the teams were deadlocked again, 9 to 9.

McEwan kicked off and Nicholls dodged his way back twenty yards to the Navy's 38-yard line. Three punts came in quick succession, the last giving the ball to the Army at mid-field. Hustoil was hurt and the game was delayed a short time. The Army could not gain and a forward pass went out of bounds, the ball going to the Middies at the Navy's 40-yard line. Leonard lost seven yards, so Nicholls punted to Prichard at the 35-yard line. Jouett went back in place of Woodruff. Hobbs could not gain and as he went down Vaughan got the ball and raced over the Navy line, only to be called back, as the play had ended. Four punts came in quick succession, ending with Hogs getting the ball at the Army's 30-yard line.

Capt. H. Hoge Scores Touchdown.

The Army tried the rushing game and failed, so Hobbs kicked again, Leonard making a fair catch at the Navy's 40-yard line. Again the Navy had to punt and Nicholls got away a poor kick because the pass was bad, Prichard being downed at the Army's 38-yard line. A forward pass failed. Alexander succeeded Leonard at right half back for the Navy. On the next play Merrillat shot around the right wing of the Army line, and he had sixty yards before Alexander threw him, only three yards from the Navy goal line. On the third play Capt. Hoge went over for the touchdown. Prichard punted out to Hobbs and McEwan kicked an easy goal, making the score 16 to 9 in favor of West Point. Brown kicked off and threw Prichard at the 26-yard line just as the period ended.

Jouett hit the Navy line in vain, and then punted to Nicholls, who was thrown in his tracks at the Navy's 35-yard line. Blodgett brought the ball five yards nearer to the Army goal line on the first try, and then got another yard on a double pass. Alexander got only a yard, so Nicholls punted. It was a low kick, the ball travelling about shoulder high, until it nestled in the arms of Merrillat, who brought the crowd to their feet with a run of 35 line to the Navy's 20-yard line. The demoralized Navy team was in a rout, and only two more plays were needed to verify that West Point song of it being "the Army's day." On the first plunge Hoge tore a hole in the Navy line for twelve yards, and on the next scrimmage the Army boys suffered a five-yard penalty for offside play.

With fifteen yards to go for the touchdown, the Cadets held a council of war, and again decided upon a forward pass, the same as had gained them the first touchdown. From the 20-yard line Prichard took careful aim and sent the ball straight and low to Merrillat at the Navy goal line. Merrillat grasped the ball tightly, and then fell under an avalanche of Navy tacklers, with the ball over the goal line. On the punt out one of the Army forwards was guilty of illegal use of the hands as the Navy players charged to prevent a catch, and Referee Langford ruled that no kick could be made for a goal. The touchdown brought the score up to 22 to 9 in the Army's favor.

Mitchell Goes In at Quarter Back.

As the teams lined up for the kick-off Mitchell went in at quarter back for the Navy, replacing Nicholls. Mitchell got McEwan's kick at his 10-yard line and zigzagged his way through a broken field for a run of forty yards before Prichard threw him at midfield. Alexander found the Army line a stone wall, a forward pass was incompleted, and the Army was penalized another fifteen yards. Mitchell went across the field without making any gain and then he tried a forward pass to Capt. Gilchrist, but Merrillat intercepted the ball at the 40-yard line.

The West Point backs could not gain so Jouett got away a long punt which Nicholls fumbled. The ball was on the ground between his knees when Markoe struck him hard and the ball bounded away, being recovered by an Army player as Referee Langford ruled that the ball was down while in Mitchell's possession at his 20-yard line. A light rain began to fall at this time and the Cadets in the cheering section struck up a chorus entitled "Good Night, Navy." A double pass failed to gain and Kennedy was sent in to replace Ralston at left tackle for the Navy.

Blodgett and Harrison gained three yards in two assaults on the Army line, so Blodgett punted. The ball bounded away from Prichard and Howe recovered it for the Navy at the Army's fifteen-yard line. Failing replaced Alexander at right half back for the Navy. Mitchell tried a forward pass to Gilchrist, who stood beyond the goal line, but the pass was low and the ball was brought back. Again Mitchell attempted the play which had accounted for two Army touchdowns, and again it was an incompleted pass. Two failures did not shake Mitchell's courage, and he tried the same thing again, only to have the ball roll over the goal line. This gave the ball to the Army for scrimmage at the twenty-yard line, and the Navy's last hope of scoring a touchdown as a solace in defeat went a-glimmering.

The Navy team was badly beaten at this stage, but its line could still hold, as Hobbs, Hoge, and Jouett learned in three successive plunges, so Jouett punted to Mitchell, who tore the ball back 25 yards to midfield. Blodgett got a yard, and Mitchell tried a forward pass only to have the ball go direct into the waiting arms of Merrillat. Prichard went all the way across the field without making any gain, and Hoge was thrown for ten yards, and it was first down for the Army at the Navy's forty-yard line. Hobbs got three yards, and Hoge was getting up after making three more when the whistle ended the game.

With one rush the Army boys hurried from the stands while their victorious players made their way to the dressing room after giving a yell for West Point and the Navy. Then the cadets had the field to themselves to celebrate the victory. The line-up:

Army.	Position.	Navy.

SIDELIGHTS AND GOSSIP OF GAME

Many Interesting Incidents Marked the Progress of the Great Contest.

PRESIDENT PHILOSOPHICAL

Impartial as to the Outcome of the Battle—Army Mule Versus Navy Goat.

The photographers' stand at the east end of the Polo Grounds, in front of the black score board used in the baseball games, was the best vantage point from which to get an idea as to what a football crowd of 42,000 people looks like, because from that eerie one could take in the whole scene with one sweep of the eyes. The picture was totally different from what one usually sees during a baseball championship series. New Yorkers were vastly in the minority, and the regular patron of the bleachers was absent. In his place one saw thousands of prosperous-looking persons who at a baseball game would never think of occupying other than a grandstand seat. And it seemed, too, that the number of women and girls present was out of all proportion to the number that would be found at a baseball game.

That time-worn expression, "A sea of faces," has been so often used in describing a gathering of some town hall that as a description it falls far short as applied to the throng that was packed up around the oval. Here you would have to surround the sea with humanity to get an idea of what it looked like from the bulletin board, and while gray and blue and yellow, the colors used by Cadets and Middies, do not lend themselves to quite such startling contrasts as purple and crimson, the headgear of the women supplied any color that was otherwise lacking.

Thousands of persons, most of whom could not possibly have seen more than the east stand, lined the side of Edgecombe Avenue, the various levels below, and the bridge that overlooks the extreme south end of the field. Some of them were armed with field glasses. They could make out the progress of the game from the score board and hear the cheering and the echo of the singing, and this was exciting enough to hold them there until the playing was over.

While no unfavorable criticism seemed possible of the seating arrangements with respect to the grandstand, with the bleachers it was different, especially those at the east end of the field. During the greater portion of the first half of the game the aisles remained choked and persons who had seats on the higher rungs could not get to them. Some of this congestion was due to the fact that many persons reached the grounds late. They kept streaming in until nearly 3 o'clock. At the same time many of those whose tickets called for seats in that part of the grounds had to find their own way to their seats.

There didn't seem to be anybody on hand to represent the midshipmen, until the Navy team came out for practice, and a few of the West Pointers were out early distributing pennants on the seats that the cadets were to occupy. Considering that the future Generals were in the covered stand, while the embryo Admirals were on new bleachers opposite, it looked as if the military had the better of the situation.

The character of the decorations that marked the President's box and that of the Secretary of the Navy, from which the former spent the latter half of the game, came in for a great deal of adverse criticism. These consisted merely of a small flag bearing the coat of arms of the United States, supported on each side by a cheap American flag.

"Pity they couldn't have had something a little better," a woman was heard to remark to her escort.

"That shows republican simplicity," he replied.

The police arrangements were excellent in the main. Some of the city police was in the grounds, as such. There were 150 special policemen, in familiar khaki uniforms, some of whom were mistaken for army men. None of the army or navy men, except such as were on duty with the corps of cadets, wore their uniforms.

Deputy Chief John P. Howe of Fire Headquarters was on hand with fifty firemen, whose duties, it was explained, were to prevent crushing and to see that the aisles were not occupied. With the exception of the east stand, during the first half of the game, they and the special police kept the crowd moving very well.

One excellent feature in the arrangements of the grounds was the fence that surrounded the oval. It consisted of about two feet and a half of planking, surmounted by three wires, making a height of about five feet. The board seats provided for those who had the privilege of the side lines, were attached to the fence, and the latter served its purpose through the game. At the end, however, when the West Point cadets were celebrating, spectators stood on the seats, with the result that the fence topped infield, and caused many screams.

Everybody was commenting upon the number of pretty girls that the game brought together. Of course, they represented not only New York, but all parts of the country. An Army and a Navy man who happened to be real friends, were overheard contending as to whether the greatest number of pretty girls was on the Army or on the Navy side of the field. They made a tour, before the game began, just to prove the contention of each, but were still of different opinions when they reached their starting point.

Certainly so many pretty Fall costumes have not been observable anywhere this season as were seen yesterday, in spite of the fact that so many women took furs to the grounds with them. Unless the furs themselves were extremely handsome, it was the fashion to leave the escort carry them. Some went out without furs, and shivered later. There was one young girl in a suit of iridescent blue velvet, who illuminated the landscape wonderfully at her advent, but she did not seem to mind it at all. One could not help sympathizing with the richly dressed women who had completed her turnout with a pair of French shoes, white, with patent leather toes, when one discovered that by the time she reached her seat the mud had made the whiteness disappear.

While the Army won the game, it did not get the Navy's goat. The mascot of the Naval Academy made a dignified appearance upon the field early, and at no time manifested anything like enthusiasm. On one occasion one of the big cardboard signs which the cheerers used attracted his attention, but he is not the king of Capricornus domesticus that used to browse in the latitudes of the Polo Grounds in the memory of some of the dwellers thereabouts. Bill gets good food at the Academy, and at games he wears a handsome blue blanket, with "Navy" handsomely zoned upon it in big yellow letters. Bill was the only person connected with the Navy, except Secretary Daniels, who seemed to regard the issue of the game with equanimity.

Of a different stripe was the Army mule, which was brought down from West Point in sections, and put together on the grounds. This mule, which some thought a burlesque on the Navy goat, was made of two youngsters with active legs. In his bow was concealed a whistle, while the rear of him was the seat of an automobile horn. Both were active. After the close of the first half, when the Army had overtaken and passed the Navy, the mule began to jubilate, and started across the field to bray at the Navy. Unfortunately the cavorted just in the rear of the party which followed President Wilson, so that some humorous persons mistook the character of the beast, and sarcastically inquired whether that was the Democratic beast of burden.

The cheer leaders for the Navy spied the white hat of the President when it was almost upon them, and gave the command for "The Star-Spangled Banner," which was immediately sung, everybody standing up and the men baring their heads. So that the appearance of the mule at this juncture was rather awkward. He turned tail and went back.

Several youngsters in the uniforms of Navy seamen were seen on the field, rooting for the Navy. One of them whose cap showed that he was of the crew of the Reina Mercedes, said that he and another had come all the way from Annapolis to see the game.

As soon as President Wilson had crossed the field, during the intermission, the crowd, which was in the lane surrounding the oval, made a rush in that direction, and people craned their necks for a sight of the Chief Executive. Secretary of the Navy Daniels could be seen bowing and smiling. The President took a seat in the rear of the box, where he had to shake hands with many who succeeded in getting near enough to him. While the game was in progress the Secretary remarked to the President:

"Well, Mr. President, you are the only man here who can be philosophical over the result, for whether the Army or the Navy wins, you cannot lose."

"Under the circumstances, I can be philosophical from either aspect," agreed the President.

"Another day is coming," said Secretary Daniels, when asked what he thought after the game. "Next to winning with a magnificent team was the honor of being defeated by a magnificent team. I shall now have to go and put to bed four very much disappointed youngsters, my sons, who were confident the Navy would win.

"However, it is the unexpected that happens. Everybody seemed to be expecting the Navy to win, and it was the Army that did. And I guess that is about all there is to it."

The officials of the Army team took their victory modestly. H. F. Loomis, the manager, said:

"We have got something we have been fighting for four years. We had hoped for victory and knew we had something good that the Navy did not suspect we had. To say we had only hoped, but we had backed up this hope to our best ability."

Capt. Hoge said: "We have almost been surprised. We figured out that we had a fighting chance. Only eight days ago I wrote to my father, telling him that our men were all crippled and that I didn't see how we could do much. He wrote back advising me not to give up, and we came down to put up a fight."

Perhaps the man at the game who had come from the furthest distance was Adjt. Gen. William Wright of the Department of the Philippines, who arrived only four days ago on a short leave.

The yells of the Navy seemed to make more noise. There was their "siren," with its Hoo-oo-oo, (about fifteen "oo's" in crescendo that gave the effect of a liner in a fog,) ending with a "rah" on each line, the "nine rahs," and a bill of fare consisting of the "automobile," the "H 2-O," the "Hooray," the "Four N," the "Navy team," and "The Touchdown." Their song, "Oh, the Gold and the Blue of the Navy Are the Colors Triumphant Today," sung to the tune of one of the latest importations, had much success, even if it failed to inspire victory.

The cheer leaders on both sides worked just as hard as at college matches, even if tight blouses somewhat cramped their style. Every once in a while a cheer leader would hold up the blank side of a cheer card to the Navy. That meant silence for a critical play.

The Forty-second Street Station of the Sixth Avenue Elevated was jammed for hours after the game last night. Guards kept shouting for people to take the next train and get off at the Thirty-third Street Station, but the people did not want to wait. Persons who wanted to take a southbound train could not get near the platforms. It was said he had been waiting for half an hour. Two young men began shoving this way and that, in the effort to make their way through the crowd. An army officer, stationed at Governors Island, who has won fame among the Moros, immediately commanded them to stop crowding, and reached the crook of his cane in the direction of one of the young men. The latter ducked, and caught sight of the look in the officer's eyes. He did no more shoving.

RECEPTION FOR MIDDIES.

Annapolis Will Turn Out to Welcome Defeated Team Home.

Special to The New York Times.

ANNAPOLIS, Md., Nov. 29.—In spite of the defeat of the Naval Academy team by West Point to-day, friends of the eleven are planning to give the players a hearty reception when they reach Annapolis to-morrow afternoon.

However, there were few to meet the brigade of midshipmen when it reached Annapolis late to-night. The midshipmen were tired after their long and wearisome trip. Reports of each play of the game were received by the friends of the Navy team who remained in Annapolis. And it is conceded that the better team won.

From reports, the Navy played the same kind of a game that has scored victories in the last three years, but the Army team, under Coach Daly, learned to meet these tactics and offer some plays that were too much for the Navy. It is felt that the Navy relied too much on Brown's place kicking as a means of scoring.

Much sympathy is felt for Lieut. D. L. Howard, head coach, who will leave the academy with the memory of a final defeat, though he has guided the team through two victorious seasons. Sympathy is also felt for the eight members of the team and two principal substitutes who will graduate this year. It has been their ambition to say that the Navy had never bitten the dust to the Army while they were midshipmen. The team has only a scant nucleus of experienced players for next season, but even now plans are being laid for next year's team, and the Navy will be encouraged by the fact that it has often been the green teams that won the service match.

Army Aviator Did Not Fly.

Sergt. Samuel Katzman of the Field Artillery at West Point, an army aviator, was refused permission yesterday at the last moment to make a flight from Governors Island to the Polo Grounds, where he planned to circle over the stands while the Army-Navy football game was in progress. He was told by the authorities that the possibility of a fall, particularly with President Wilson among the spectators, could not be risked.

NATION'S NOTABLES WATCH THE GAME

President, Cabinet Members, Governor, Mayor, and Army and Navy Heads in Throng.

SOCIETY IS OUT IN FURS

Spectators Promenade Between Halves to Keep Warm—List of Boxholders.

At the Polo Grounds yesterday the immense throng of notables from every walk in life fairly took a humble spectator's breath away. Although the feminine element was pretty well bundled up in furs and blankets, there was a splash of color in the costumes and headdress which brightened the drabness of a chill and misty afternoon. The Army and Navy colors were most in evidence, but green, cerise, and orange abounded in the boxes.

After the first half the occupants of the boxes on the lower tier seized the opportunity to set the blood in quicker circulation by promenading. Some of the women were enveloped in leopard cat furs, others in rich seal, and a few brought box luncheons with them, nibbling at sandwiches and cake between thrills. There was no great striving for style. The people were there to see football on a raw afternoon, and the first thought was of comfort. Nobody seemed interested in their neighbors. The entire interest was centred in the gridiron, and enthusiasm reigned supreme. It was one long social roar while the game lasted.

The boxes began to fill early in both the upper and lower tiers. With President Wilson, who occupied Box 20, on the Army side, in the upper grand stand, in the first half, were Col. and Mrs. E. M. House, Miss Eleanor Wilson, his daughter; Joseph Tumulty, his Secretary, and Dr. Cary Grayson. Mrs. House was enveloped in black with furs, with a high velvet hat topped with a plume. Miss Wilson wore a costume of peacock blue chiffon velvet and a hat of blue velvet with a tall feather, both of which had touches of red. She wore a long scarf of black fox and carried a black fur muff.

In Box 19, Gen. Leonard Wood's box, was Col. Conners of the Engineer Corps and with him were Gen. Sir Alfred Coddrington, Miss Coddrington, and Miss Conners. Col. C. P. Townsley had a party in Box 25. With the Secretary of War and Mrs. Garrison in Box 28 were Dr. and Mrs. Morgan of Philadelphia; Mr. and Mrs. George Leary; Mr. and Mrs. Henry Low, William L. Hildeburn, and Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh.

With the Secretary of the Navy and Mrs. Daniels, who had Boxes 193 and 194 in the lower tier, on the Navy side, were their three younger sons, Jonathan, Worth, and Frank Daniels; Miss Cora Bagley, a cousin of Mrs. Daniels; Commander and Mrs. Jones, also Mr. and Mrs. William F. McCombs.

In the Mayor's Box.

With Mayor Kline in Box 49 were his son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. E. J. Shell, and with Senator Elihu Root were Mr. and Mrs. Elihu Root, Jr. Mr. and Mrs. Dudley Field Malone were in Gen. Thomas H. Barry's box. With Gen. A. L. Mills, in Box 39, were Mr. and Mrs. MacComb G. Foster, Gen. George Rathbone Dyer, Mrs. W. T. Alexander, Mrs. Fanning, the Misses Fanning, and Dr. and Mrs. J. H. Emerson.

Mr. and Mrs. R. A. C. Smith, in Box 50, had their daughter, Miss Margaret Smith, with them, and Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Lowisohn had Lady Henry and J. A. Watson with them in the upper grandstand. Gen. Horace Porter was in a box near by.

With Mrs. W. A. Read was Mrs. Edmund Pennington of Indianapolis, Sturges Lawler, who is manager of the Cornell football team; Miss Lawler, Robert Brooks, Duncan Bartow, and W. A. Read, Jr. With Mr. and Mrs. Henry L. Stimson were the Misses Gamble, and with Mrs. Daniel S. Lamont, in Box 58, were Miss Katharine Lamont, Miss Gretchen Damrosch, F. L. Robbins, Jr., and Henry Hopkins, Jr.

Mr. and Mrs. August Belmont and Mr. and Mrs. Payne Whitney entertained box parties in the upper tier. Among others holding boxes here and entertaining parties were:

Gen. Andrews, H. H. Landon, Gen. and Mrs. Roe, Mr. and Mrs. John D. Archbold, James B. Aleshire, Secretary McAdoo, who had his daughter, Miss Nona McAdoo, with him; Mr. and Mrs. John Bassett Moore and family, Gen. and Mrs. W. W. Wotherspoon, who had Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Graham Miles, Capt. and Mrs. T. A. Baldwin, Jr., and Miss Katherine Judge with them; Secretary of Labor Wilson and Mrs. Wilson, Postmaster General Burleson and Mrs. Burleson, former Mayor Reyburn of Philadelphia, Mr. and Mrs. Finley J. Shepard, (Miss Helen Gould,) the Assistant Secretary of Commerce and Mrs. Edwin F. Sweet, Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Sweet, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Gould, Senator Duncan W. Fletcher, Frederick Allen, Mrs. J. T. Brush, widow of the former owner of the Giants; Attorney General McReynolds, Gen. Gibson, who is General of the oldest living graduates of the Military Academy at West Point; Brig. Gen. H. G. Sharpe and Mrs. Sharpe, who had Mrs. Ira Davenport with them; Gen. William Crozier, Gen. McIntyre, Gen. Frank Kingman, Gen. Maus, Senator Luke Lea and party; Col. Appleton, Seeley Benedict and Miss Bertha Benedict, Alfred Carroll and Henry W. Terrell, who were with Mr. Benedict; Mr. and Mrs. Walter I. Wolf, and Mr. and Mrs. W. C. Wright.

SCENES OUTSIDE GROUNDS.

Police Arrangements Adequate and Record Crowd Is Easily Handled.

There was a striking contrast between the crowd outside the Polo Grounds yesterday and those that marked the recent world's series baseball games. Up to noon the streets leading to the Speedway Drive entrance and Eighth Avenue north from 155th Street to the grounds were practically deserted. The early crowd was kept far away from the gates, but the police experienced no trouble as the ticket holders showed no impatience to get to their seats. Extra precautions were taken to protect the President, but once the Chief Executive was inside the gates the crowd thinned out a bit.

President Wilson and his party, including several Secret Service men, arrived at 1:30 o'clock and he was immediately recognized and cheered by the crowd. He doffed his silk hat in acknowledgment. Eight mounted police led the way into the grounds from the Speedway entrance, and as soon as the President appeared in the inclosure the multitude shouted and cheered,

Outside the grounds 125 traffic policemen from Traffic Squads A, B, C, and E kept order under the direction of Inspectors John O'Brien and Titus. It was estimated that ten thousand automobiles had disgorged their occupants at the entrances by the time the game was called. They proceeded two abreast down Eighth Avenue from 158th Street to 153d Street, while the same regulations were observed on the Speedway.

The scene at the entrance to the grounds resolved itself into a blending of the colors of the Army—black, gold and gray—with those of the Navy—blue and gold—and the unfurling of flags and cheering of the newcomers as they arrived at their destination put cheer into the hearts of those who remained outside because of their inability to obtain tickets. Many persons unable to purchase seats lingered in the neighborhood of the grounds, although they knew that the possibility of seeing the game, for which some of them had come many miles, was not bright.

Several hundred persons waited on Coogan's Bluff, overlooking the grounds, for the game to begin. On the Speedway there were nearly 500 more, and on the bridge near the grounds stood 1,000, few of whom were able to see anything but the crowd surging through the gates or struggling to obtain their seats in the east stand bleachers.

The appearance of the West Point battalion was greeted with cheers. The gray-coated young soldiers presented a pretty spectacle marching down Eighth Avenue. Scarcely had the last company disappeared in the grounds when the Naval Brigade, each man carrying a pennant, marched down 153d Street to Eighth Avenue, where they continued four abreast, preceded by the band, up to the entrance, and they too, like the soldier boys quickly filed into the grounds.

Just before the West Pointers swung into Eighth Avenue, Mrs. Henry Brown, 33 years old, of 2,907 Eighth Avenue, was standing at Eighth Avenue and 153th Street watching the crowd streaming into the grounds. Suddenly she collapsed and fell to the ground. Policeman O'Conner of the Lenox Avenue Station summoned an ambulance from the Harlem Hospital and she was removed to that institution.

When the game was over and the Army had won the crowd poured out of the Polo Grounds and swarmed to the Subway, Elevated, and automobiles, which were in waiting to carry the multitude away. The police arrangements again were adequate and Inspector O'Brien and his Traffic Squad handled the crowd easily. There was little if any congestion, and in less than an hour after the game all that remained in the vicinity of the entrance to the grounds were innumerable scraps of paper and a few torn pennants.

TURNED AWAY AT GATES.

Many Persons Who Had Bought Invitations Could Not Enter Grounds.

Indignation was expressed yesterday by officials of the athletic associations of West Point and Annapolis because of the discovery that many persons to whom invitation tickets to the Army and Navy game were sent had sold those tickets to speculators, who in turn disposed of them at high prices, sometimes charging as high as $21 for a single ticket. The numbers of many of the tickets that were sold by those to whom West Point or Annapolis had given the tickets are known, and a record will be made of them, and in the future those persons will be lucky if they even get a ticket from a speculator later.

It was about 12:30 o'clock yesterday morning when Lieut. Philip Mathews, the West Point athletic representative, and Lieut. Arthur Fairfield, who acts in a similar capacity for the Naval Academy, were informed that speculators were offering many choice seats in both the army and the navy sections for prices that averaged between $20 and $25 a ticket. Mathews and Fairfield, after a conference, decided to get the numbers of as many as possible of these tickets and to have issue duplicates, at the same time invalidating the original tickets that were in the hands of the speculators.

This is the way it was done. Mathews, Fairfield, Lieut. Commander Berrien of the Navy, and Lieut. Ernest Graves of Army Engineers, constituted themselves a committee to do the detective work. Singly they visited various places on Broadway where the tickets were being offered for sale and opened negotiations for their purchase. Mathews operated under the assumed name of Beverly, Fairfield took the name of Jones, Graves called himself Mr. Sitgreaves, while Berrien rejoiced under the burden of the name of "Ketcham."

These officers dickered with the speculators and managed to get the numbers of most of the tickets. Of course, they refused to make a bargain, and told the speculators that if they changed their minds and were willing to be more reasonable to come to the Hotel Astor and an agreement might be reached.

Not a single speculator caught on to the scheme, and at 9 o'clock yesterday morning the Hotel Astor lobby was full of speculators looking for Mr. Beverly, Mr. Sitgreaves, Mr. Jones, or Mr. Ketcham. Within half an hour the numbers of every ticket in the possession of those speculators was known to Mathews and orders issued for their invalidation and the issuance of duplicates, the latter to be honored and the originals refused for admission when offered at the Polo Grounds gates.

The result was a score or more of men who had paid big prices for the tickets only to find them no good when offered at the gate yesterday. These persons fumed, fretted, and threatened, but it did no good, and if they saw the game they did so from Coogan's Bluff.

The numbers of the tickets sold were looked up in the records of the distribution, and it was found that several of those who had sold them were officers of the National Guard, at least three of them connected with New York City organizations.

SLUMP IN TICKET PRICES.

Speculators Fail to Reap a Harvest with Reserved Seats.

Ticket speculators did not reap the rich harvest they expected yesterday. With the clearing weather in the morning a boom in the overnight prices was looked for, but instead at noon the price had receded to $5 a ticket. In some of the leading hotels as much as $15 was paid for two good seats, but the uniform price was $10. This was due in a measure to the announcement of the New York Baseball Club that box seats could be purchased at the grounds for $25 a pair.

A few incoming visitors during the morning hours were overanxious and paid as high as $20 for a pair of seats, but speculators began to throng the corridors of the leading hotels and, despite the efforts of the house detectives, did a thriving business. Three times the lobby of the Astor Hotel was cleared, but the vendors of tickets were insistent and returned to dispose of their wares at a premium.

Most of the tickets sold before the game were those issued to the two academies. In some way these got into the hands of speculators, and as they were on the north or south stands, near the battalions of the two academies, they were eagerly sought. The total number of those sold, however, was comparatively small.

A few enterprising speculators tried to do business in the neighborhood of the Polo Grounds, but they had little success. The police were very active, and the speculators were driven away from the line every time they were caught trying to open negotiations.

ARMY OFFICERS CELEBRATE.

More Than 1,000 People at Dinner in Ball Room at Astor.

Several hundred West Point cadets and army officers celebrated the victory of the Army team at the Hotel Astor last night. More than 1,000 persons gathered in the grand ballroom, which had been turned into a restaurant. When the members of the team appeared early in the evening in the boxes which had been reserved for them they were received with cheers, followed by the yells of nearly every class which had been graduated from the Military Academy during the last twenty years, the yells coming in succession from separate tables at which the representatives of different classes were seated in groups.

Features of the musical programme were bugle calls and compositions by Prof. Enger of West Point. Several of these pieces were rendered on the organ by Prof. Leo Riggs, accompanied by his full orchestra.

The Rose and Laurel Rooms, which adjoin the grand ballroom, were used for dancing, and there was turkey-trotting in the gallery surrounding the ballroom. Some of those at the dinner were:

Col. Daniel Appleton, Col. S. R. Allen, Capt. James F. Bell, Col. E. M. Blake, Capt. L. C. Benton, Capt. W. B. Cochrane, Lieut. G. H. Bald, Col. J. M. Andrews, E. W. Bellinger, Robert Boettger, Mrs. George S. Brown, Major George K. Conovan, Major William Chamberlaine, Capt. O. Collins, Mrs. Julia Rowe Davis, Lieut. Col. C. A. F. Flagler, Mrs. Morris C. Foote, Edward E. Gold, Col. Henry J. Goldman, Mrs. W. H. Hamilton, Col. H. N. Handley, Capt. T. P. Holcombe, Lieut. Col. L. H. Holt, Lieut. Col. Odus C. Horney, Chris C. Hupfel, Charles J. W. Kelly, Capt. William McK. Hamilton, Mrs. Joseph F. Lynch, Connie Mack, Capt. James Brady Mitchell, Capt. James A. Moss, Capt. J. K. Parsons, Col. John Pitcher, Frank D. Patten, W. R. Rumsey, Capt. L. S. Ryan, George Spoor, Capt. H. L. Stoel, Mrs. Lydia Scranton Pate, Col. J. Frank Supplee, Mrs. Eleanor L. Walback, Mrs. J. B. Walker, Mrs. F. D. Waterman, Fritz Williams, C. C. Wilson, and Major Charles Wylie.

GLOOM AT NAVY'S HOTEL.

Team Goes to Theatre — Back to Annapolis To-day.

Worn and battered by the strife, the members of the Annapolis team hurried back to the Vanderbilt Hotel last evening and sought the seclusion of their rooms. The lobby of the hotel was jammed with loyal supporters, ready to cheer the Midshipmen, despite their defeat, but the players succeeded in preventing any such demonstration. In groups of two and three they made their way quietly to their headquarters, where dinner was served. When the newspaper men knocked on the door word was sent out that there was nothing to say. A few of the players who were questioned later simply shook their heads a bit sadly, and then walked away.

The crowd that thronged the lobby—and many there had lost heavily on the result of the game—soon recovered its spirits, however, and was soon busy explaining the reasons for defeat. There were half a hundred dinner parties, and then came the rush for the theatre. Most of the members of the Annapolis team attended the performance of "Adele" at the Longacre Theatre. They did not occupy a box, but sought more secluded seats in the orchestra.

At 11:30 o'clock a dinner was held, to which, among others, were invited Adv. Glynn, Secretary of the Navy Daniels, and Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo.

The reporters were informed that it would be a quiet affair—quite different from the joyous reunion which had been planned before the Army team proved its superiority. Among those on the seating list were Prof. P. J. Dashiel, Lieut. Commander A. P. Fairfield, Lieut. Commander H. Osterhaus, Surgeon R. W. McDowell, Prof. C. V. Cusachs, Lieut. Commander R. Williams, Lieut. D. W. Simpson, Ensigns W. A. Shaw and Frank Loftin; J. A. Reilly, Yale, '12, coach; J. McMaster, Midshipmen K. P. Gilchrist, Capt. W. M. Nicholls, J. R. Redman, H. R. Overesch, B. C. Woodward, B. L. Sizer, H. R. Leonard, H. L. Ingram, B. E. Ralston, J. H. Brown, R. L. Vaughn, F. C. Hall, L. R. De Roods, C. J. McReavy, R. V. A. Failing, H. H. Harrison, R. J. Mitchell, W. D. Alexander, T. R. Vinson, F. Fitzsimmons, C. R. Curr, A. C. Miles, R. W. Bates, L. R. Vail, R. N. Kennedy, Z. W. Wick, A. W. Walker, B. F. Perry, G. T. Hower, A. C. Thomas, and R. W. Hayler.

The team will return this afternoon at 4 o'clock to Annapolis.

EIGHTH REGIMENT SPORTS.

Military Organization Returns to Athletic Fold After Long Absence.

Under the guidance of Benny Mann, former track captain of the Pastimes and Glencoe A. C., athletics were revived last night at the Eighth Regiment Armory by the regimental athletes after a lapse of five years. Mann has just been elected to the position of coach and the result last night was a flattering tribute to his efforts and should bring the regiment's members back to good standing among the military athletes.

The programme comprised seven events, one of which was a special match bicycle race, the others being confined to the members of the regiment. Probably the best performance of the evening was that of Dick Reimer of the Loughlin Lyceum, representing Hospital Corps of the regiment, in the one-mile walk. He started from scratch, allowing handicaps of 1:30 to the limit men, and came from behind, winning in the good time of 7:13 4-5.

Limit men held sway for three-quarters of the distance when Reimer increased his gait and worked round on the outside, coming up to the tape two yards in front of J. Smith of the Thirty-first Company with a minute and a half start.

The special match bicycle race between Otto Brandis of the home armory and H. Lightfind, representing the Twenty-second Engineers, was a spirited contest. It was to be the best two out of three heats, but the engineer won in straight heats after close finishes. The summary:

60-Yard Dash, Handicap.—Won by L. F. Cahill, Thirty-second Company, (scratch;) H. Seney, Hospital Corps, (scratch,) second; J. Radelkin, Thirty-first Company, (7 feet,) third. Time—0:07.

600-Yard Run, Novice.—Won by G. Field, Twenty-ninth Company; J. Radskin, Thirty-first Company, second; A. T. Caniglio, Twenty-sixth Company, third. Time—1:22.

220-Yard Dash, Handicap.—Won by Leo Cahill, Thirty-second Company, (scratch;) H. Seney, Hospital Corps, (scratch,) second; H. Litchman, Twenty-sixth Company, (8 yards,) third. Time—0:24 4-5.

One-Mile Walk, Handicap.—Won by L. Reemer, Hospital Corps, (scratch;) J. Smith, Thirtieth Company, (45 seconds,) second; R. Litchman, Twenty-sixth Company, (1¼ minutes,) third. Time—7:41 4-5.

One-Mile Run, Handicap.—Won by McDonough, Twenty-eighth Company, (100 yards;) T. J. Byrnes, Thirty-second Company, (110 yards,) second; Edward Baxter, Hospital Corps, (scratch,) third. Time—4:20 4-5.

Special Bicycle Match Race; one-mile heats; between Otto Brandis, Eighth Regiment, and H. Lightfind, Twenty-second Regiment.—Won by Lightfind, in straight heats. Time—2:43 4-5; 2:40 1-5.

Running High Jump, Scratch.—Won by J. Dickinson, Hospital Corps, with a jump of 4 feet 10 inches; P. Walsh, Hospital Corps, with a jump of 4 feet 9 inches, second.

One Mile Relay.—Scratch.—Won by Thirty-first Company, team composed of Radskin, Sanford, Smith, and Barren; Twenty-sixth Company team, composed of Berkowitz, Marviglia, Demarest, and Litchman, did not finish. Time—4:21.

Stephenson In Shooting Form.

The starting of trapshooting at the Crescent Athletic Club did not have any effect on the shooting at the Marine and Field Club yesterday. The majority of the gunners who belong to both organizations shot over the Bath Beach traps and had an interesting afternoon. The Monthly Cup was taken by Frank B. Stephenson, and he also won the trophy, yesterday being the final leg on the prize. The afternoon was a cleanup for the indoor champion. In addition to the Monthly Cup he also was the winner of the weekly shoot on the President's prize, with a total of 93 out of a possible 100 targets. The Take-Home Trophy was also won by Mr. Stephenson. He had 88 out of a possible 100 targets in the Take-Home event.

LONG ISLAND LAD WINS HIGH HONORS

Sidney L. Leslie of the Long Island A. C. duplicated his junior Metropolitan A. A. victory yesterday when he carried the Cherry Diamond of his organization to a premier position in the national titular cross-country race for juniors, at Van Cortlandt Park, over the six-mile course in 0:34:46. Gaston Strobino of South Paterson, the lad who won fame in the Olympic Marathon last year at Stockholm, was a close second, being beaten by a margin of about forty yards.

Five of the runners of the New York A. C., J. O'Conner, Hugh Honahan, Maurice Hughes, Jr., W. J. Horton, and Oswald Gibbons, accounted for the team trophy and the accompanying prizes when they netted the low team score of 26 points, while the Long Island A. C. and Mohawk A. C. finished second and third, respectively, with 48 points and 51 points. The Irish-American A. C. failed to score a team, as only four of the wearers of the Winged Fist started.

Despite the miserable weather conditions, young Leslie, who has probably improved in both speed and stamina to a greater degree than any of the runners seen in the metropolitan district, covered the route in a bit faster time than he had accomplished under more favorable auspices. That his victory was pronounced was attested by his manner of finishing, which was convincing enough to have him win, when he wanted to come away, by forty yards from Strobino, who had led up to the final eighth of a mile.

Thirty-two men, the best of those available among the distance runners of this section of the country, turned out for the honors. The Irish-American A. C. team was handicapped through the non-appearance of three of the wearers of the Winged Fist, who had been delayed somewhere between Newark and the scene of the contest, Van Cortlandt Park.

There was a scramble to get away when the starting gun was fired. Each of the runners appeared anxious to get out of the ruck which usually follows the beginning of an event of the kind, with the result that the first 150 yards was the rarest sort of a sprint for an advantageous position.

Hugh Honaban of the New York A. C. was the first man to show after the field became straightened out in the race to major house and just before the railroad bridge was reached. Even at this early stage it became apparent that Leslie, the ultimate winner, was not to be denied, as the Long Island lad filled second position, with Maurice Hughes, Jr., third.

By the time the leaders had got to the top of the hill after the race up the golf links for the first time, and with a mile and a half behind them, Leslie was the pacemaker, with Gianicopolis, a Yonkers Greek, in second place. Along the old aqueduct and where the going was holding because of a top dressing of new soil Strobino, the real distancer of the outfit, worked his way up ahreast of Leslie, who was attempting to race his field into the ground.

Down the hill and back on to the golf links, but over a flat country, Leslie and Strobino raced as a team, alternating in the pacemaking work. As they came by the three-mile mark, which marked the end of the first lap of the course, Strobino led by a stride from Leslie, and even at this early stage it became apparent that it would be useless to look beyond either of this pair for the ultimate winner, as each was racing well within himself and appeared fresh.

Up the golf links the second time proved the undoing of such a tried performer as Gianicopolis, who was compelled to quit because of the severity of the contest. At that time he was racing well up with the leaders, a fine lead of which was Strobino, plodding along as well as his short legs would permit, with Leslie and Roth in close pursuit. O'Connor and Kyronen, the little Finn, who was third in the ten-mile flat race championship, were next in order, and apparently waiting for the run home.

At four and a half miles, and just before the race down the steepest part of the course at the north end of the old aqueduct, the order was the same as far as the first five men were concerned, although Leslie appeared to be going easiest. This was attested when the men dropped down on to the flat country and the better going along the links.

There was an almost imperceptible increase in the pace when the men got to within a mile of the end, with Leslie feeling the rest of the field out by short dashes which brought the others of the quintet with him. Half a mile from the end he cut loose in earnest, with the result that Strobino was the only one apparently able to keep up with the pace. The latter sailed along so well in the wake of the leader that he appeared to have a winning chance.

Beginning the final quarter, however, Leslie set sail for the finish in a manner which admitted of practically no opposition from the diminutive South Paterson lad, with the result that Leslie won by about forty yards from Strobino in 34 minutes 42 seconds, with the latter 100 yards in front of Arthur Roth, a former Metropolitan titleholder, who, in turn, beat Kyronen twenty yards for third place.

Following the homecoming of this quartet interest resolved itself in the contest for the team honors, which were quickly annexed when the New York A. C. team garnered the next four places, and the next but one, with a total of 26 points. The summary of those who finished follows:

Lafayette Wins Cross-Country.

Cross-country runners from Lafayette College defeated the hill and dale squad of the College of the City of New York yesterday over the Van Cortlandt Park course of six miles by a score of 19 to 40. The individual winner was Henry J. Otto of Lafayette, who covered the route in 36:43. Edward Frey of the City College made a capital showing when he finished second in the good time of 37:10. Lafayette started six men and the home team five. The summary:

Austrian Envoy Going Home.

Dr. Otto Herschmann, President of the Austrian Olympic Committee and representative of the Austrian Government, who has spent the last three weeks in New York and Boston, studying American athletic systems, will leave for home Tuesday on board the Kronprinzessin Cecilie. During his stay in New York he visited playgrounds, athletic fields, public gymnasiums, baths, recreation centres, public schools, high schools, universities, and athletic clubs.

To Settle Boxing Muddle To-day.

All difficulties with regard to the bringing together of Jess Willard and Carl Morris, the heavyweight boxers, at Madison Square Garden next Wednesday night will be smoothed over to-day, as Charley Murray, manager of the Queensberry A. C. of Buffalo, is coming here this morning. Upon his arrival Murray will meet Billy Gibson, manager of the Garden A. C., and Tom Jones, who looks after Willard's affairs. Murray has agreed to let Willard box in the Garden provided he signs a new contract to take on One-Round Davis at Buffalo in the near future. This will set at rest any fears of the match falling through, as the State Athletic Commission has stated that it has no wish to keep Willard from boxing provided he settles his differences with the Buffalo club.

Jack Johnson Knocks Out Wrestler.

PARIS, Nov. 29.—In a wrestling match last night with a Liberian named Spoul, Jack Johnson, the negro pugilist, lost his temper when his opponent fouled him, and, turning to boxing tactics, swung a stiff punch on his opponent's solar plexus which knocked him out.

TRAVIS VICTOR IN LAKEWOOD GOLF

Veteran Defeats Max Marston in Final Round, 3 Up and 2 to Play.

One more golf trophy was gathered in yesterday by Walter J. Travis of Garden City when he won the annual Fall golf tournament of the Country Club of Lakewood by defeating Max R. Marston of Baltusrol, 3 up and 2 to play in the final round. The veteran always had the upper hand on the youth. In fact, Marston won only two holes, the seventh and the fifteenth.

Marston might have become the leader at the first hole, where he was on the green in two fine shots, but he required three putts and had to be content with a halve. From the Marston viewpoint the contest was really a tale of lost opportunity, except after the turn, where Travis gave the youth not even half a chance. Travis won the second hole where Marston got bunkered on his second shot, and Travis became 2 up at the sixth hole under similar conditions. Travis taking three putts on the seventh cost him that, and it began to look as if Marston would steady down and get going, but he dispelled the idea on the eighth through driving into a trap and then messing the third shot. Thus Travis became 2 up at the turn. The latter looked like Marston's where he laid his man a stymie, but Travis with characteristic coolness and a niblick, jumped the ball over the obstruction into the cup and halved the hole. He was, therefore, 2 up at the turn.

After Travis had increased his advantage at the tenth the players went along like wild horses, halving the next three holes in 3, 4, 3, but Marston became 4 down at the fourteenth by missing a putt. His attempt to recover lost ground at the fifteenth was good, and although he won the hole by running down the only long putt of the match, Travis, who was merely postponing the ultimate result, halved in 5 at the sixteenth left Travis a winner.

Semi-final rounds were played early in the day and a handicap was played in the afternoon, Arden M. Robbins of Garden City, winning the gross with 75 over E. Sprague of Inwood, the net was 84—11, 73. The summary:

First Sixteen.—Semi-final Round—Max R. Marston, Baltusrol, beat S. K. D. Forest, Lakewood, 2 up and 1 to play; Walter J. Travis, Garden City, beat John F. Shanley, Deal, 2 up and 1 to play.

Final Round—Travis beat Marston, 3 up and 2 to play.

Second Sixteen.—Semi-final Round—E. O. Fraser, Deal, beat J. M. Lummis, Pawling, 2 up and 1 to play; A. W. Westney, Garden City, beat Eugene Van Schaick, Sleepy Hollow, 6 up and 5 to play.

Final Round—Westney beat Fraser, 7 up and 5 to play.

Third Sixteen.—Semi-final Round—Chester R. Gillette, Syracuse, beat J. M. Byers, Pelham, 5 up and 3 to play; W. M. Lummis, Pawling, beat F. C. Russell, Dyker Meadow, 2 up and 1 to play.

Final Round—Lummis beat Gillette, 2 up and 1 to play.

Fourth Sixteen.—Semi-final Round—J. G. Batterson, Fox Hills, beat Clarence M. Cohen, Inwood, 2 up and 1 to play; A. E. Whitney, Lakewood, beat H. F. Burkett, Inverness, 1 up, (19 holes.)

Final Round — Batterson - Whitney match postponed.

Handicap.—Arden M. Robbins, Garden City, 75, 7—68; N. E. Sprague, Inwood, 84, 11—73; H. A. Steiner, Inwood, 81, 8—76; A. P. Roth, Fox Hills, 89, 13—76; Dr. A. W. Westney, Atlantic City, 89, 11—78; A. J. McClure, Lakewood, 94, 15—79; W. R. Hochster, Deal, 95, 16—79; R. L. Redfield, Montclair, 87, 8—79; W. R. Delehanty, Deal, 93 14—81; F. F. Vanderhoef Lakewood, 97, 15—82; Clarence M. Cohen, Inwood, 98, 16—82; James C. Batterson, Fox Hills, 91, 8—83; C. T. Richardson, Lakewood, 91, 8—83; A. H. Howard, Woodland, 97, 14—83; E. L. de Forest, Garden City, 90, 6—84; T. C. Walker, Atlantic City, 94, 10—84; William S. Leeds, Fox Hills, 91, 7—84; A. S. Ridley, Lakewood, 91, 7—84; Alexander Morten, Newport, 96, 11—85; H. H. Bottome, Essex County, 93, 8—85; J. B. Reilly, Deal, 99, 13—86; George A. Taylor, Ardsley, 100, 14—86; R. A. Thompson, Lakewood, 95, 9—86; John E. Kelley, Deal, 97, 10—87; J. Lauchelmer, Inwood, 106, 18—88, and S. G. Thomas, Lakewood, 110, 18—82.

Western Indians Beat Eastern Team

Special to The New York Times.

CARLISLE, Penn., Nov. 29.—The representative Western football eleven of the Carlisle Indian School defeated the Eastern team here this afternoon, 13 to 0. This is an annual contest at the school, and excited much interest. Neither side could gain much through the line, but end runs and fake formations worked well for both. The Westerners seemed the most aggressive. So confident of victory were the Westerners that they held a party headed by a band before the game. For the Westerners Hitman seemed invincible and scored all the points, while Plenty and Eastman were good running mates. Kettle, Hill, Coons, and Dennis starred for the Easterners. The line-up:

Westerners.	Position.	Easterners.

ODD THINGS BALL PLAYERS PULL OFF

Interesting Incidents That Umpire Evans Has Seen on the Field.

By BILLY EVANS,
American League Umpire.

Baseball furnishes some of the most extraordinary alibis imaginable. Two that I recall, as originated by Ping Bodie of the White Sox and Hank Perry, for a time with Detroit, are decidedly out of the ordinary.

When Perry joined the Tigers his reputation as a slugger had preceded him. The Detroit outfield was such a strong one, however, that it was impossible for Perry to break in as a regular. Several times Jennings sent him to bat in the pinch, and each time he responded with long drives that were captured by the outfield. Knowing that Perry hit the ball hard when he connected, the outfielders played extremely deep for him. Each time after flying out Perry came back to the Detroit bench the picture of disgust.

A few days later with the bases filled and two down Jennings yanked out the pitcher and sent Perry in to bat. He urged him to take a crack at the ball and break up the game. Perry, as he stepped to the plate, noticed that the fielders backed up almost to the fence for him. Perry had an idea. He decided he would pull the unexpected. The pitcher, knowing that Perry could hit, tried to get him to go after a bad ball, but Perry refused. Finally the count stood three balls and no strikes. It was a cinch that the pitcher would try to get the next one over, for if he failed it would force in a run. It was over, but Perry let it go by. The umpire declared it a strike.

That was good enough baseball, but it was up to Perry to take a crack at the next one if it was over. The pitcher sent another one right over, but Perry stood motionless. It was declared a strike by the umpire, making the count three balls and two strikes. Jennings, on the coaching line, was raving like mad. The next ball was in the same place, but once more Perry refused to hit at it. It was declared a strike, retiring the batter and the side, and ending a rally.

Perry Did the Unexpected.

As Perry approached the bench he was roasted by every Detroit player, but instead of being perturbed, he wore a broad smile. As he took the usual drink of water, customary after striking out, he remarked:

"Well, it it wasn't for that blind umpire I would have pulled the unexpected. They felt sure I would hit the ball, but I fooled them by refusing to hit at it. Perry is no longer with Detroit.

One day last Summer Callahan sent Ping Bodie to bat in the ninth inning in place of the pitcher. The Sox were five runs behind and two were out. Naturally Ping tried his best to hit, but fanned. As he walked past the Detroit bench he remarked to me, with a smile:

"What is the use of hitting with no one on the bases and five runs behind? It would only have prolonged the game." A few weeks later Ping went to the bat with the bases filled, two out and three runs needed to tie. He tripled and the game went extra innings before Chicago finally won. Two or three innings later I referred to the way he had prolonged the game, but Ping was in no mood for me.

"I thought we only needed three runs to win, Bill, or I would have stretched that hit into a home run," was his reply. I never saw Ping run quite so fast before in my life."

Jennings Likes to Mix Them Up.

Hughey Jennings, famous leader of the Detroit Tigers, always believes in mixing up the style of play. He never wants a man to go through with a play when it appears suicidal. Often Cobb goes to the plate with the intention of bunting. He sees the infield is set for just such a play, that in all probability the pitcher will put a ball up to suit his liking, hoping that he will go through with the play. Then it is that Cobb switches things and either pulls the ball down the right-field line a mile a minute or almost knocks the third baseman's legs off.

When a new player joins the Tigers, Jennings impresses on him the importance of mixing things up, of trying to outguess the opposition by doing the unexpected. For a number of years, while studying law at Cornell, Jennings also coached the "Varsity baseball team. Naturally, he always tried to make the collegians play the same style of ball that he demanded of the professionals. Incidentally, the collegian can offer just as many alibis as the professional.

"When you see the first baseman or third baseman creeping in on you to get the bunt, switch your play and hit it out," was the bit of advice often handed out by Jennings to the collegians.

Collegian Had Some Alibi.

In a game down South Hughey signaled for the squeeze play, a man being on third. Of course, the runner dashed in as the pitcher delivered the ball, and in so doing almost hit the runner on the head with the bat. The batter connected safely, driving the ball over the right fielder's head for a home run. Jennings didn't enthuse a bit. On the contrary, he was very much peeved.

No one was looking for the squeeze, and had the batter bunted he would have had the infield flat footed. He called the collegian down in good style. He almost keeled over in a faint, however, when the collegian, on being asked why he had ever switched, replied:

"Didn't you see the right fielder creeping in on me?"

A few years ago the Chicago Americans secured a pitcher from one of the small minor leagues. In batting practice the recruit showed a lot of stuff and pitted against the regulars. It looked very much as if the White Sox had picked up a real find in the youngster. Lack of experience and ability to field his position was the only thing that kept Manager Callahan from starting him in a game. In order to get the recruit accustomed to big league ways, also to acquire confidence, he was sent in to pitch after several games were hopelessly lost. In each instance the young pitcher came through in the most approved style. In one game, which I umpired back of the plate, I remember that he allowed only one hit in the last five innings of the play. He showed me a sweeping curve ball that caused five of the opposition to go out on strikes in as many innings. His other appearances were just about as successful, the youngster began to feel that he was being discriminated against by being allowed to finish only games that were lost. Before the start of one of the games with the Athletics he was sitting on the bench next to me, complimenting him on his work of the day previous. It was late in the season and he had yet to start his first game.

Wanted to Show the Natives.

"I'm getting tired of this big league stuff," remarked the youngster in response to my words of praise. "I would rather be back in the bushes, where you get a chance to display your ability."

"Many of the present stars held down the bench for a couple of years before getting a chance," I replied.

"That may be all right for some of them, but I'm ready to go the route in the big league now. I'm a whole lot better than a bunch of those fellows who get knocked out only to have me finish the game. Instead of starting a game I warm up for five innings and then finish it."

The youngster was very much discouraged.

The great success he had met with on each appearance made him feel confident of his ability was swelling. I told him that his chance to make good would come in due time, if he was but patient. Strangely enough, it came the next afternoon. Crippled condition of the pitching staff practically made it necessary that he be used to start the game. Naturally he was nervous. The sensation of starting a game was entirely different from finishing a contest that was lost. In his effort to puzzle the opposition he tried to get too much on the ball, was wild, and, being constantly in the hole, was forced to put the ball over and trust to luck. In such cases the Athletics hopped on the cripple and in three innings had piled up a seven-run lead. That marked the exit of the recruit. As he walked past me on the way to the bench I whispered:

"It is a trifle different—starting from finishing."

"I'm so used to pitching four or five innings before getting a chance to pitch that ten minutes' workout failed to get me properly warmed up," was his response. "The next time they intend using me I'm going to insist on knowing at least an hour before game time." The trimming handed the youth had not destroyed his confidence in the least. He will probably be a star in a couple of years.

YALE'S DISASTROUS YEAR.

Eli's Lament Almost Total Absence of Winning Major Sport Teams.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW HAVEN, Conn., Nov. 29.—In spite of the fact that Yale has nothing to show for the past year in athletics in any branch of major sport, with the exception of baseball and track victories over Princeton, the general athletic situation at the university will not be taken up for examination and possible revision till the reorganization of the General Athletic Committee in January.

At that time the committee will be reformed, new graduate members and new officers will be chosen, and the planning of the athletic campaign of 1914 will be undertaken. The present Chairman and Treasurer of the committee is the general Yale athletic adviser, Walter Camp, and the Secretary is Manager Bryan of the Track Athletic Association.

Although no undergraduate or alumni clamor for reform in Yale athletics is heard, the committee that will be named to take general charge of Yale's athletic affairs feels keenly the condition of the teams that have been launched, and some changes in method of conducting athletics during the coming year are likely to be ordered.

The fact that Yale athletics are generally in a losing state will cause no reorganization at the top. A new athletic system, involving the choice of a new athletic committee, and the creation of separate committees, or cabinets, in all of the four branches of major sport, football, rowing, baseball and track athletics, went into effect a year ago, and the point that expected results have not yet been secured in any of these sports is not regarded as a criticism of the methods of management.

In general, however, Yale's athletics disclose the most unsatisfactory showing, in periods of consecutive defeat, since the dawn of intercollegiate sport. In rowing the last race was won from Harvard in 1907, in baseball in 1909, in football in 1908, and in track athletics Yale has not made a clean-up from her big university rivals for a decade. In football Capt. Ketcham is the only member of the eleven who will be graduated in June who has ever played in a winning game against either Harvard or Princeton. When a sophomore he took part in the 5 to 3 match against Princeton, the last, by the way, for Yale to win from either the Crimson or the Tiger.

Unless the Yale nine, crew or track team wins its matches next Spring the Class of 1914 will be graduated without scoring a championship won by a major sport team in any branch of athletics. No other class has been similarly afflicted.

Yale has lost all its important series in the four major branches of sport the past season, except the track and baseball series with Princeton, but the upset has been attributed in every case to simple lack of material, except in baseball, which for two seasons has shown Yale with the largest amount of playing timber of any years in the history of the nine. In this sport the coaches, Frank Quimby and Bernie Tommers, have been re-appointed, and, with another lot of splendid material, the alumni believe that this season they will turn the trick and capture the series from Harvard and Princeton.

Confidence was expressed on every side in the ultimate hope of the football system adopted last year. Although it is not certain who the new Captain will be it is known that two resident coaches who will be present all of next season will be Howard Jones, as chief of the coaching staff, and Dr. "Billy" Bull, coach of the punting and drop-kicking squad. It is certain that Capt. Henry Ketcham will be strongly urged to return next Fall, and it is hoped that his plans will allow him to be here.

Talbott is expected to receive the captaincy, and he will go to work immediately to outline the campaign. He loses practically all of the rush line of this season, and he has an uphill task to win from either Harvard or Princeton. The coaching staff of the last Fall has generally been regarded as modern in tieing Princeton, and holding down Harvard till the final period with an eleven which could do no better than tie Maine and Washington and Jefferson and give Colgate a losing battle, 15 to 8.

There is no disposition to relax Yale's rigid eligibility rules, which are said to be the most stringent regarding athletic exemptions and privileges of those in vogue at any university in the East. It is felt, however, that these are largely responsible for Yale's inability to secure athletic stars. Even the undergraduates are not disposed to grumble at the failure of the faculty to offer attractive inducements to remarkable athletes and there seems no change likely in Yale's policy in this respect.

The coming sessions of the Athletic Committee give promise, however, of important changes in the methods of campaigns in the four branches of major sport rather than of injecting radical reforms into the coaching methods in vogue in any of them. It is likely, however, that some changes will be made in the graduate membership of the Alumni Committee, with undergraduate Captain naming one member annually.

PICKEREL FISHING GOOD.

Big Catch Reported from Shalo Creek on Thanksgiving Day.

With the brook trout season closed and black bass hibernating, the pickerel is now the fresh-water fish to seek. New York and New Jersey have many ponds where the pickerel may be taken. A sample catch, as it were, is that of W. F. Eye, Mayor of Culver's Lake, who, with Asher Snook, on Thanksgiving Day, in Shalo Creek, N. J., took 55 pickerel, the largest of which weighed 5½ pounds.

Lakes near New York City are Mombasha, Round, Glenmore, and Long Lake, near Monroe; also the Ramapo River, and near Monticello the Wallkill River, Monhagen Lake, Kettle Kill, Bashas Kill, and Swanwangunk Kill, all report fair catches of pickerel and pike. Martin's Lake at Port Jervis, and at Highland Mills the lakes of Cromwell, Twin, and Summit, are all good streams.

Long Island, which has more pickerel than pike, reports excellent fishing in Great Pond, near Riverhead. These are the places to go for pickerel and pike.

In New York all pike must be ten inches long in order to be retained, and in New Jersey they must be a foot long, measuring from snout to caudal fin.

Pike are caught in much the same manner as pickerel—trolling, skittering, or by bait casting. Incidentally they like a bright lure, and they will take an extremely large bait. In using a minnow, pike have the fashion of taking it at the side first. This is not the time to strike. The moment the fish takes the minnow head first, that is the time to strike. The fish when it feels the hook immediately strikes for the weeds, just as the blackfish in salt water seeks the crevices of rocks.

Loyola Schoolboy Wins on Ice.

W. Collins of Loyola School, an aspirant for speed skating honors, won the quarter-mile schoolboy race yesterday at the St. Nicholas Rink. He had a handicap of 105 yards on Midget Gershel of Public School 166, who started from scratch. The latter, however, did not have his racing blades tuned up to the speed limit, for he failed to get into his stride at any time. Collins kept his lead to the end, chased home by little Arthur Healey, also of Loyola School. Gershel was third, some distance behind.

TIGERS TALK OF FOOTBALL IN 1914

Change in Policy and New Coaches Among Things to be Accomplished.

PRINCETON, N. J., Nov. 29.—Two distinct factors, the result of the past season in football at Princeton, will combine to give the Tigers an eleven next season which is likely to be radically different from the teams of the last ten years. One of these factors is the abundance of weight and experience which, barring the losses by ineligibility rules, will be available for the team next season, and the other is the change in policy which is likely to come, even though in a slight degree. The Board of Control of Athletics at Princeton disclaims any intention of changing the coaching system which has had so many defects in the eyes of the students, but it is known that several of the coaches of the past season will not be on the Graduate Advisory Committee again because of a lapse of their term, and with the incoming new men it is certain that the board will take steps to impress upon them the necessity of playing something besides a defensive game. Just who the new coaches will be is not known, and it will not be decided for several weeks, when the board holds its meeting to select the coaches and make alterations in the general policy. The aim will be to get a policy which will combine the open and the close styles of football next season, and the coaches will probably be selected with this idea in mind. "Heff" Herring, who has played the English game as well as the American, is regarded by some as a logical choice for the big coach, but this could not be verified at any official source.

The Alumni Weekly has taken up the question of changing the coaching system, and, commenting on the past season, says:

"There was ground for the expectation of something better than a defeat and a tie in our big games this Fall, in the wealth of material at University Field, which was pronounced the best in years, and in a coaching organization so elastic as to bring to bear upon the development of the material the best of our football traditions, knowledge, and skill. But at the end of the season we have nothing better to look back upon than a mediocre record. It is not very bad, but it certainly is not good. It is merely indifferent. Once again Princeton had a sturdy defense, but once again Princeton had almost no attack. * * * A strong defense is, of course, vitally essential to success in football. But where is the nine that can win without hits and where the eleven that can win without an attack? By a strong defense you may pick up a football victory about once in a decade on the other fellows' blunders, but until Princeton learns to match its strong defense with a constructive offense we shall have to be content to harvest somewhat less than our share of victories."

The editor pleads for the open game in no uncertain terms. He says:

"Princeton has everything to gain and nothing to lose by breaking away from the sterile conservatism which has characterized our football programme and by giving a full and fair trial to the type of game the revised rules are designed to encourage. We earnestly hope that our conservatism may be knocked into a cocked hat before another football season opens."

An open letter to the editor of The Weekly from a graduate of the class of '90 makes the same plea, and argues for a permanent football coach, recommending for the position Logan Cunningham, '10, who was field coach for two seasons, 1910 and 1912, or "Eddie" Hart, who assisted in the coaching toward the end of the season this year. The big objection raised to a resident and permanent coach is that it smacks of professionalism, and it is only the natural desire of the permanent coach to "win games," because his position virtually depends on his success at winning them.

The other factor which promises to give Princeton a new sort of team is the quantity and the quality of veterans who will be on hand for the team next season. Only two regulars this year—Capt. Hobey Baker and George Felter Phillips at right half back and left tackle, respectively—are to be lost by graduation, and one very prominent substitute—Thornton Emmons at quarter back. There are men for every position except these two. Law has proved himself a capable punter, and with one more year of active service the coaches can count on work from him equal to that of Mahan of Harvard. In addition, Gile, who did some punting until he was injured this season, will be eligible again, and there will come from the freshman eleven which trimmed Yale freshmen 30 to 0 Briggs and Dickerman, both of whom have done excellent work. The freshmen played an ultra open game against the Yale cubs with a maze of forward passes, and this will probably have some influence on the coaches in adopting more of an open style for the 'Varsity next year, because these members of the freshman eleven will not have to learn it all over again.

There are five 'Varsity ends who will be back next season—Hammond, Shea, Chamberton, J. S. Baker, and Brown—all of whom have had experience in the big games with Harvard and Yale. Capt. Charles, an ineligible this year, did some good work against the 'Varsity this season and will be a big addition to the eleven next year. Eddy, Highley, Eberstadt, and Brown from the freshmen will be eligible. Phillips's place at left tackle will be hard to fill but Ballin strengthens the corresponding side of the line. Love and Carson from the scrubs will be on hand again, and from the freshmen two men—Rigler and McLean, both very strong players—will be eligible, while Hogg, the big freshman guard who was former Andover man, might well be moved over to tackle in case of necessity. Nourse, an ineligible this past season, will also be a strong contender for the position.

W. Swart and Semmens are both strong guards, and with another year of coaching ought to turn out as good as any in the big teams. They will probably have a hard fight for their places, however, with the re-eligibility of Schronk, a 1912 All-American guard, and the presence on the squad of Gile, Longstreth, Bringer, and Pope for guards. E. Trenkmann is a centre who developed very rapidly this season from a late start, and the coaches have confidence in more improvement in him, especially at his passing. There will be seven candidates for centre than for any other place next season, Trenkmann's only opponents so far being Haviland and I. L. Swart of the scrubs and Gowan from the 1917 eleven.

At quarter "Mike" Boland will likely be eligible next season, but with Glick back again the question of what the coaches will do with the pair of steels looms up as a big one. Glick's running of the eleven this season was excellent from a Princeton standpoint, and Boland, with all of his record, will have to show his real ability. There may be a shift necessitated on account of both of these men being eligible, Glick possibly returning to the back field. In addition to both these men, there are Adams, one of the surest tacklers on the scrub this past season, and Ames and Rogers from the freshman eleven.

For half backs, Greve is one choice, of course, with possibly Glick for the other. If not Glick, then the freshman players stand out as the strongest candidates. For full back, Streit will have to hustle for the position because of the presence on the squad of F. Trenkmann, who has pushed him for all season, and several others, chiefly Merrill, and Payne from the scrubs and Driggs from the freshman team.

Any change in the system of play may alter the relative strength of these candidates so much that the least likely now may prove the ultimate choices.

Carlisle Elects Football Captain.

CARLISLE, Penn., Nov. 29.—The Carlisle Indians chose their 1914 Captain by the unanimous election of Elmer E. Busch, right guard, on the team's homeward trip from the Indian victory over Brown University at Providence Thanksgiving Day morning. Thirteen redskins who participated in the election included those who had won "C's." No suggestion is ever made by the school authorities here as to the manner of selection or personality of the Indians' football leader, and it is a remarkable fact that almost without exception the Indian youths select the man best fitted for leadership each season. Capt. Busch is a copper-colored Indian of the Pomo tribe and hails from California, where his home is in the Potter Valley.

COLLEGE WATERMEN READY.

Swimming Season Opens with Meet at Yale Next Friday.

The first meet of the championship tournament of the Intercollegiate Swimming Association will be held at New Haven next Friday with Yale and the City College of New York as the opening teams. This meet will launch a season which promises to be featured by keen competition and frequent record breaking for the league squads are closely matched in several of the regulation events, and the material, as a whole, is better than ever before.

Managers have just completed their schedules and the following dates have been set, teams first mentioned being the home ones: Dec. 12, City College against Pennsylvania; Dec. 19, City College against Princeton; Jan. 9, City College against Columbia; Jan. 14, Pennsylvania against Columbia; Feb. 13, Pennsylvania against Princeton; Feb. 20, Yale against Pennsylvania and Princeton against Columbia; Feb. 27, Princeton against Yale; March 6, individual league championships in the pool of City College.

Judging by reports from training quarters Yale and Princeton have the best chance at the team pennant in swimming, with Pennsylvania next and Columbia and City College close behind.

Yale's array of talent looks formidable. Capt. Roberts, Hoadley, Mayer, Marr, and Summers will be hard to beat in the relay race, which is the highest scoring event, and should also do well in the 50 and 100-yard sprints. Roberts, Howe, and Gould are less likely to tally heavily in the furlong swim, and Smith and Braden have no more than even odds against some of their rivals in the plunge, but McAleenan and McGregor may be counted upon to take the lion's share of fancy diving honors.

Princeton's strength in the relay race is problematic, owing to the strictness of the home eligibility rules, which may deprive the quartet of two of the fastest dash men. However, if Capt. Cross, O'Sullivan, Smith, and Delacey toe the mark even Yale will have to look to her laurels. In the 50 and 100-yard swims Cross, O'Sullivan, and Delacey are good bets and Cross looks invincible at 220 yards. The Tigers are weak in fancy diving, though, with Meyers, Bereton, and Friessell, and far from sure of victory in the plunge with Pope and Robinson.

Pennsylvania's best event is the plunge. If Shoemaker and Angeny live up to their past form they should finish one, two in all meets. For the sprints and relay Capt. Overbacher, Douglas, Shryock, and Lawrence are a trifle slower than the Yale and Princeton men, but Coach Kistler has hope of bringing them to scratch and thinks also that a couple of the new freshmen may be used to advantage. In fancy diving only Coons has shown championship calibre, but for the furlong there are a good pair of point winners in Shryock and Creamer.

Columbia has no brilliant stars in swimming; Osgood, Coone, Agramonte, Cleveland, Richotz, and Smith appear to be no match for some of the speedy opponents. On the other hand, Barrett and Dunn are a couple of dangerous fancy divers, and Kotteck is a plunger who may bid for supremacy if he gains reliability; on and off he does remarkably fine work.

The City College team is well balanced, and only lacks a fast relay team to be in the running; McGrath, Neussbaum, Shaner, and Riemer do not class with some of their antagonists. McGrath, however, is a likely candidate for the hundred, Riemer can travel both the hundred and furlong in most company, Capt. Berman ranks with the leading fancy divers, and Schwarz, the interscholastic plunger, is likely to place among the best in this event.

With the talent so well apportioned, an unusually interesting season should result.

TEN EYCK FOR SYRACUSE.

Rowing Coach Declines Offer to Go to Yale.

Special to The New York Times.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., Nov. 29.—Declining flattering offers from Yale and other colleges, James Ten Eyck, coach of the Syracuse University crews, today signed a contract which will insure continuance in his present position for the next five years.

Yale, dissatisfied with the English rowing system, is known to have been trying to engage the Syracuse coach. He was expected to go to New Haven, for it was known that a strong inducement was offered him. Offers received by Coach Ten Eyck since the 'Varsity crew of Syracuse won at Poughkeepsie in June last greatly exceeded the salary he has been receiving at the Syracuse institution.

The rowing style taught by Ten Eyck is distinctive, and is now known the country over. The stroke has been called "the get-there stroke." It is less graceful and finished than the long, sweeping Cornell stroke, but it is exceedingly effective, especially in smooth water.

Mohegan Eleven's Good Season.

Mohegan Lake School ended its football season with the traditional game between North and South Halls, which was won by the former 7 to 6. The school's 'Varsity eleven ended the season a few days before with the game against Dr. Holbrook's School of Ossining, Mohegan's ancient foe. It is doubtful whether there are often better developed elevens than Mohegan's team of this year.

In offensive strength, in defense, and in the open game its play was marked by a power and precision seldom seen. It is unfortunate that the strength of the team was so rarely tested in the course of the season. In the game with Hackley School by a brilliant rush Hackley placed the ball in the middle of Mohegan's five-yard line. After Hackley had tried four times to find a weak spot in the Mohegan line, the ball went to Mohegan on the ten-yard line, Hackley having been thrown back six yards. In the Irving School game, Irving secured the ball inside of Mohegan's ten-yard line. After the third down it had made but two yards when time for the period was called. After resuming play Irving placed the ball over the line for the only score against Mohegan this season. This shows Mohegan's strong defense. The score of the offensive strength is best told by the total number of points for the year: Mohegan, 353; Opponents, 6. The scores of the games follow:

	Mohegan.
Drum Hill High School	0	90
Riverview Academy	0	49
Ossining High School	0	33
Hackley School	0	26
Irving School (Tarrytown)	0	28
Washington Irving High	0	76
Dr. Holbrook's School	0	45

The open field running, the forward passing, and defensive playing of Quarter Back Wray, the line plunging and defensive work of Capt. Asprey, and the fast and brilliant playing of Garrison and Blume on the ends of the line are worthy of special mention.

McCaa to Leave Lafayette.

EASTON, Penn., Nov. 29.—It became known here to-day that George McCaa, for several years coach of the Lafayette football team, is not expected to return next Fall, and that his place will be taken probably by W. G. Crowell of Philadelphia. The latter was graduated from Swarthmore in 1902, and during his college days was considered a great quarter back. He has acted as an official in many important games. McCaa, the retiring coach, it is understood, has received an offer to take charge of a football squad in another college. His contract with Lafayette expires next December.

Fencing at West Side Y. M. C. A.

Men who enjoy fencing or who would like to learn the art are invited to visit the special fencing room in the physical department at the West Side Young Men's Christian Association, Eighth Avenue and Fifty-seventh Street. Fencing has become so popular at the West Side Branch that a special room, with a full assortment of foils, has been given over to the sport, but there is still room for more.

Pitcher Cates Loses Right Hand.

GREENSFORK, Ind., Nov. 29.—Eli Cates, pitcher of the Indianapolis Federal League team, had his right hand torn off in a corn shredder yesterday. The accident happened on the farm of Cates's uncle near here. Cates, who pitched with his right hand, was one of the mainstays of the Indianapolis Club last season.

Everett Schoolboys Win.

EVERETT, Mass., Nov. 29.—The Everett High School eleven outplayed the Lafayetta High School of Buffalo, N. Y., on a muddy field to-day, making five touchdowns from which four goals were kicked, with a total score of 34 to 0.

The visitors were unable to fathom Everett's varied attacks. Their offense took them once to the home team's twenty-two-yard line, where the ball was lost on downs.

OUIMET IS PLACED AT HEAD OF LIST

Youthful Amateur, Who Beat All Comers in Golf Championship, Outranks All.

That oft-repeated question heard at the end of every season: "Who is the leading amateur golfer of the year?" was answered, as far as 1913 is concerned, one day last September when Francis Ouimet, the former Brookline caddie, defeated the Englishmen, Vardon and Ray, in that memorable play-off for the national open title. Even if he had done nothing else worth while, Ouimet's feat of showing the way to the former British champions merited his being placed at the head of the list.

In a way, however, the task of classifying the leading players is far from being an enviable one when it is remembered that the placing of Ouimet at No. 1 means the deposing of Jerome D. Travers, the Upper Montclair expert, who, a few months ago successfully defended his title at Garden City as national amateur champion. In the past, the winning of the amateur title stood for the best possible in golf, but this year the open, with its galaxy of stars including the professionals, Vardon, Ray, Tellier, and Reid, to say nothing of such amateurs as Travers and Ouimet, completely changed the complexion of things. So, notwithstanding the fact that Travers defeated Ouimet during the amateur meeting at Garden City, this must, in a measure, be forgotten in the recollection of Ouimet's more sensational performance.

Never before on this side of the Atlantic had an amateur succeeded in defeating the "pros" in a national open championship. It may be a long while before it happens again, so, for the present, at least, all hats off to young Ouimet. Besides the open, the Woodland golfer won the Massachusetts championship; gathered in several low score medals in one day tournaments, and defeated Travers when they met during the Massachusetts-New York match for the Lesley Cup.

Unquestionably, Ouimet is a steadier medal player than Travers, but the latter possesses the ideal match play temperament. Ouimet has never before been given a place among the first sixteen golfers. He has played well in past seasons, though his game lacked that aggressiveness and determination which marked most of his experiences this year.

In Travers, who takes second place, after having occupied the premier position on several occasions, there is every evidence of nerve, for it was this quality that carried the Upper Montclair golfer successfully through many hard fought matches. Travers always had to contend with unruly clubs. It is generally conceded that he has managed to win without being at the top of his game. Usually it was his driver which bothered him, and sometimes his mashie went wrong, but, despite these drawbacks, he won the New Jersey championship shortly after the metropolitan. Between then and the national amateur he gathered in occasional minor honors, including the invitation tournament at Apawamis.

It was a matter of gameness that permitted Travers to qualify in the national after getting in a tie for last place, and again it was gameness which beat Ouimet in that tournament. To force the driving iron to take the place of wood requires an exceptional golfer, and it will probably take another season to satisfactorily answer the question of lasting supremacy between Travers and Ouimet.

Charles Evans, Jr., of Edgewater, easily takes third place. Harry Vardon has stamped him the best American amateur. It would be hard to call to mind a more spectacular finish than the one he made in the qualifying round of the national, by means of which he won the medal with 148. At that time he defeated such men as W. C. Fownes, Jr.; Walter J. Travis, and Eben M. Byers. It was his old weakness in putting that was mainly responsible for his defeat at the hands of John G. Anderson. He was the medalist in the Western amateur, and was on the team which won the Olympic Cup. Visiting the Pacific Coast with the Middle Western team, Evans played brilliantly and broke a number of course records.

Warren K. Wood of Homewood has done enough to warrant his being ranked fourth, for he won the Western title after having tried for a number of years. He was one stroke behind Evans in the qualifying round, and was a member of the team which won the Olympic Cup.

John C. Anderson of Brae Burn is placed fifth. He has had a successful season, getting down to the final round of the national against Travers and beating Evans on the way. He qualified in the open at Brookline with a score of 160, but withdrew after the first day. He was beaten in the third round of the Massachusetts amateur after qualifying with a 78. Greater steadiness is largely responsible for Anderson's improvement.

Walter J. Travis of Garden City drops from third to sixth place as the result of a season of indifferent success as compared with other years. Although he won the Lakewood tournament in the Spring and showed some of his old-time form at Tuxedo, where he took the chief cup and defeated Travers in one of the rounds, he failed to qualify in the metropolitan, and was put out of the national by Evans. Considering how long he has been in the front rank, there is little wonder that younger men have caused him to drop back somewhat.

The remainder may be considered more briefly. Fred Herreshoff won at Oakland, Ekwanok, and Atlantic City. Warren Corkran was successful in several invitation tournaments and has displayed such ability that there can no longer be doubt about his place among the best. Oswald Kirkby, Paul Hunter, and Mason Phelps have not played much this season. Heinrich Schmidt has done nothing since he carried Hilton to the nineteenth hole in the Garden City championship. P. W. Whittemore and Max Marston, the former a veteran, and the latter a newcomer, complete the list, which is as follows:

National League Bulletin.

The National League of Professional Baseball Clubs announced yesterday that contracts and releases were made and terminated with the following players:

Contracts—With Chicago: Edward Matt, 1914; Frank M. Schulte, 1914; Elmer Kostenber, probationary and regular contract.

Releases—By Brooklyn, unconditionally, William F. Dahlen; by Brooklyn to Newark, I. L., Fred M. Walker; by Brooklyn to Toronto, I. L., R. T. Fisher; by Philadelphia to Montreal, I. L., Roy Miller; by Pittsburgh to Toronto, I. L., William J. Kelly.

Phil Cross to Box Kid Alberts.

One of the best bouts on next week's calendar is that which will bring Phil Cross and Johnny (Kid) Alberts together at the Atlantic Garden A. C. on Tuesday night. The pair fought a slashing ten-round battle at the same club five weeks ago. Both boys have been training hard for Tuesday's bout. Cross is boxing in his best form, as was proven the night he boxed Frankie Madden. Alberts, too, is in excellent condition, and a bout which will be a duplicate of their last hurricane exhibition is expected.

Dundee to Box Rivers.

NEW ORLEANS, Nov. 29.—It was announced to-day that Johnnie Dundee of New York and Joe Rivers of Los Angeles had been matched for a ten-round fight here Christmas Day at Pelican Park. It was also announced that "Wildcat" Ferns of Kansas City and Mike Gibbons of St. Paul, welterweights, would fight ten rounds here Dec. 10.

ENGLISH SOCCER RESULTS.

Blackburn Rovers Strike Snag in Bolton Wanderers.

LONDON, Nov. 29.—Blackburn Rovers, the leaders in the first division of the English Association Football League, had a stiff game to play to-day against Bolton Wanderers at Bolton, and found the local team too good for them, losing by 1 to 0. The runners up, Manchester United, advance a point nearer to the top by drawing their home game with Derby County, 3 to 3. The best win of the day was achieved by Manchester City, which beat Oldham Athletic away from home by 3 to 1.

Chelsea entertained Bradford City before a huge crowd, and won a splendid game by 2 to 1, but Tottenham Hotspur lost by the same score at Liverpool. The scores:

West Bromwich Albion 1, Everton 1; Sheffield Wednesday 2, Sunderland 1; Bolton Wanderers 1, Blackburn Rovers 0; Chelsea 2, Bradford City 1; Oldham Athletic 1, Manchester City, 3; Manchester United, 3, Derby County 3; Burnley 0, Sheffield United 0; Preston North End 4, Middlesborough 1; Newcastle United 2, Aston Villa 2; Liverpool 2, Tottenham Hotspur 1.

Woolwich Arsenal further strengthened their team with the inclusion of Benson, the international back, transferred to them from Sheffield United for $7,500, and managed to share the points with Bristol City on the latter's ground, drawing, 1 to 1. Bradford received Budy, and by winning, 3 to 1, have secured a strong second place in the second division, while the leaders, Notts County, won by the same score, beating Barnsley at Nottingham. Clapton Orient jumped to seventh place by their fine win over Blackpool, 2 to 0, but London's other team, Fulham, went down at Wolverhampton by 1 to 0.

Leeds City made no mistake with Notts Forest, severely beating them by 8 to 0. The scores:

Birmingham 1, Grimsby Town 2; Bristol City 1, Woolwich Arsenal 0; Leeds City 8, Notts Forest 0; Clapton Orient 2, Blackpool 0; Bradford 3, Budy 1; Notts County 3, Barnsley 1; Leicester Fosse 0, Hull City 4; Wolverhampton W. 1, Fulham 0.

Only four games were played to-day in the Southern League, all the other teams being engaged in the fourth round qualifying competition of the English Cup. Swindon Town had the hardest game to play with Portsmouth on the latter's ground, but after a hard game drew 1 to 1. Queen's Park Rangers visited Exeter and also drew and picked up a useful point. Brighton and Hove, keeping up their good form, beat Bristol Rovers at home by 2 to 1 and now occupy third place in the table. The scores:

Exeter City 0, Queens Park Rangers 0; Portsmouth 1, Swindon 1; Northampton 0, West Ham United 0; Brighton and Hove 2, Bristol Rovers 1.

BERNARD SHAW SNUBS ENGLAND AND AMUSES GERMANY

He Forbids the Production of "Pygmalion" in London, But Permits Berlin to See It So Playgoers There May Not Be Prejudiced by Unfavorable English Criticism—A Characteristic Comedy on Phonetics.

A NEW way to make your play successful—refuse to sell it. This is what George Bernard Shaw has done in the instance of his latest comedy, "Pygmalion."

Instead of giving his premiers into the hands of the London producers he tucked the manuscript in his pocket and crossed the Channel with it. As a result "Pygmalion" received its first performance on any stage on Thursday, Oct. 16, at the Hofburgtheater in Vienna. From there it moved on to the Lessingtheater in Berlin, and it bids fair to be the most popular success in Germany for the coming Winter. It has been published in German by the Berlin house of S. Fischer, and fairly bristles with copyright forbidding production or publication in English.

Asked why he did it, Mr. Shaw has said that when he opened a new play in London the critics promptly branded it as dull, as blasphemous, as unpopular. The news was promptly flashed to Germany and France, and the chances of its being a success there quite ruined. If Germany, always a good friend of his, should have the chance to judge this latest play on its merits, without any precedent rumors of criticism, he felt sure Germany would like it.

The ruse, as well as the play, has tickled Germany. "Europe's best jester," the press headlines remarked. "The Hofburgtheater has dealt itself a trump card," declared the Vienna Neue Freie Presse, commenting on the opening night. And it may just be that Mr. Shaw will bring "Pygmalion" to the United States before permitting London even so much as a glimpse of it.

"Pygmalion" is the story of a professor who made a Duchess out of a little Cockney flower girl simply by careful attention to her vowels and consonants, the assumption being that not what we do but what we say makes us what we are and establishes our rank in society. And not only does Mr. Shaw's Galatea, whom he calls Eliza Doolittle, change outwardly, but she develops a soul, something which the professor had not counted on.

Entrance of Eliza.

Eliza makes her first appearance among a little knot of people who have gathered late one Summer evening under the porch of St. Paul's in Covent Garden to escape a driving rain. The suspicions of the crowd in general and Eliza, selling flowers, in particular, have been aroused by a mysterious person who stands in the background and takes notes on the conversation. The fact that the mysterious person, who is Henry Higgins, specialist in phonetics and hero, can tell what district each one of the company hails from, increases the mystery, until he explains that phonetics is his vocation, a fact which makes little impression on Eliza except to assure her that he is not a detective.

HIGGINS—The science of speech. That is my business. It is also my hobby. Fortunate the man who can live by his hobby! You can recognize a Scotchman or an Irishman by his accent easily enough. I can ascertain within eight kilometers the place from which a person comes. If he is from London, I can fix the place of his birth within three kilometers—in fact, I can often guess the very street.

ELIZA—'E oughter be ashimed of 'imself, the snivellin' coward!

A MAN—But can one live on that?

HIGGINS—Oh, yes, very well indeed. In this age of parvenus! People start in Kent with eighty pounds a year and end in Park Lane with a hundred thousand. They want to forget Kent, but as soon as they open their mouths they betray themselves. Now, I educate—

ELIZA—'E oughter mind 'is own bizness and let a poor goil—

HIGGINS (bursting out)—Woman, stop this fearful racket for one minute or find another church to stand under.

ELIZA (weakly defiant)—I c'n stand 'ere just as good as you if I want to.

HIGGINS—Any female that projects into the atmosphere such horrible and such disgusting tones has no right to be anywhere—has no right to exist! Remember that you are a human being with a soul and with the God-given gift of an articulate speech; that your mother tongue is the tongue of Shakespeare and Milton and the Bible, and don't cackle like a barnyard.

ELIZA (looking at him, taken aback, and yet pleading, without daring to lift her head)—Ah-ah-au-au-uh!

HIGGINS (whips out his note book)—Merciful heavens, what a tone! (He writes, then he holds the book off from him, while he imitates her vowels exactly.) Ah-ah-au-au-uh!

ELIZA (amused at this performance, laughs in spite of herself)—Quatsch!

HIGGINS—Observe this creature with her sewer dialect, a dialect which will keep her in the gutter to the end of her days. A position as a chamber maid is as unattainable for her as the Crown of Russia is for you or me. Now, in three months I could palm this girl off at an Ambassador's garden party as a Duchess. I could even get her a place as a chamber maid or a shop girl, for which better language is needed. I manage such things for our self-made millionaires.

A MAN—I myself am a student of the Indian dialects—

HIGGINS—Indeed? Do you perchance know Col. Pickering, the compiler of "Spoken Sanskrit?"

THE MAN—I am Col. Pickering. Who are you?

HIGGINS—Henry Higgins, the author of "Higgins's Universal Alphabet."

PICKERING—I have come all the way from India to know you.

HIGGINS—I was in India to meet you.

PICKERING—I am staying at the Carlton. Come along with me and we'll have a bite to eat and chat.

HIGGINS—Agreed.

ELIZA (to Pickering, as she sees both leaving)—Please, Sir, buy a flower, I carn't pay m' rent.

HIGGINS—Liar. You just said you could change half a crown.

ELIZA (in a rage)—S'welp me, 'e oughter 'ave nails drove in 'is rotten body. (She throws the basket at his feet.) There—tike the 'ole damn basket fr sixpence! (Pickering throws a half crown in the basket and goes out.)

HIGGINS—For remembrance. (He throws a handful of coins in the basket and follows Pickering.)

ELIZA (picks up the half crown)—Aaah-au-uuh! (She picks up more coins.) Aaaaaaaaah-au-uh! (She picks up half a pound.) Aaaaaaaaah-au-uh!

Advance via Dictionary.

Eliza does not forget this new and amazing fact that she has learned; she ponders the idea that one can better one's social position by merely changing one's vocabulary, and that there are people to teach such changes. And the next morning she arrives at the laboratory where Higgins and his new-found friend, Pickering, are sitting in the midst of laryngnscopes, phonographs, pitch-pipes, respirators, and all the paraphernalia which Mr. Shaw could devise for the use of the professor of phonetics and the distraction of the property man.

Eliza has arrived in a taxi, as a result of last night's haul, and announces her intention of taking lessons in conversation in order to be able to keep a flower shop instead of standing on the corner of Tottenham Road to sell her flowers. To the horror of Mrs. Pearce, the prim housekeeper, the idea appeals to Higgins and Pickering.

PICKERING—Higgins, the thing interests me. How about the Ambassador's garden party? I'd publish you abroad as the greatest teacher of the day, if you could bring that about. I'll lay you the cost of the experiment you can't do it. And I'll stand for the expenses of instruction.

HIGGINS (entranced, regards him)—I can scarcely withstand it—she is so entrancingly vulgar—so deliciously dirty—

ELIZA (protesting vehemently)—Ah-ah-ah-ah-au-au-au - au - uhu! I washed m' fice an' m' 'ands before I come 'ere—I did that—

HIGGINS—I will make a Duchess out of this dirty little gutter snipe!

LIZA (protesting vehemently at this sudden turn of affairs)—Ah-ah-ah-uhu!

HIGGINS—Yes, in six months—in three, if you have a good ear and an adaptable tongue. I will take you everywhere and make of you whatever you wish. We will begin here—now—to-day—this very minute. Take the girl out, Mrs. Pearce, and wash her, polish her of with sandsoap if there's nothing else. Is there a good fire in the kitchen?

Mrs. PEARCE (expostulating)—Yes, but—

HIGGINS (continues madly)—Take all her clothes and burn them to the last shred. Telephone to Whiteley or some one else and tell him to send an outfit, ready-made for the first ones. Meanwhile wrap her up in brown paper.

ELIZA—You ain't no gentleman, you ain't! To s'y such things! I'm a good goil, I am, an' I knows your kind, I do—

HIGGINS—Listen, Eliza. I believe you said you came here in a taxi?

ELIZA—An' wot of that? I got as much right to tike a taxi as anybody.

HIGGINS—Yes, Eliza, you certainly have. And in the future you shall take as many taxis as you like. Every day you shall ride all around this city in a taxi. Think of all that, Eliza!

MRS. PEARCE—But Professor, you are urging the girl into a place where she won't belong. She should think of the future.

HIGGINS—At her age, nonsense! There is time enough to think of the future when one no longer has any future. No, Eliza, think of the future of other people, but never of your own. Think of chocolate, of taxis, of gold and diamonds.

ELIZA—Not much—I don't want no gold an' diamonds—I'm a good goil, I am—

HIGGINS—Yes, Eliza, you shall keep on being one. • • • Now, you shall live here for the next six months and learn to speak beautifully like a lady in a flower shop. If you are good and do everything you are told to do you shall sleep in a pretty little bedroom and have a lot to eat and money to buy pralines and take taxis with. When six months are up you shall drive in a carriage in wonderful clothes to Buckingham Palace. If the King sees that you are no lady, the police will put you in jail, where your head will be cut off as a warning to other presumptuous flower girls. But if you're not recognized, you shall have a present of seven and sixpence, in order to be set up as a lady in a shop. Now, Mrs. Pearce, off with her into the bathroom!

ELIZA—You brute, you! You big bully! I won't etay 'ere if I don't want to. • • • I never wanted to go to Buckingham—never. I don't want to go to the King, if I 'as me 'ead cut hoff. If I'd a-knowed wot I was lettin' myself in for, I'd never a-come. I was always a good goil—I never wanted to s'y a word to 'im—• • • an' I won't be ordered around so—I got feelings as good as anybody else—

Doolittle Holds Forth.

But in spite of protests, Eliza's education is begun. A slight difficulty offers in the appearance of the father of the embryo Duchess, Doolittle, garbage collector. Besides collecting garbage Doolittle has come to collect a little money on this arrangement of Higgins and Pickering. It is in a fine burst of Shavian topsy-turvy logic that he captures five pounds for the privilege of experimenting on his daughter, whom he evidently has not seen for several years.

DOOLITTLE—Wot am I? Gentlemen, I ask you, wot am I? I am one of the hundeserving poor, that's wot I am. Just think wot that means. It means that you're always comin' up against middle class morality. Wherever there's summat bein' given aw'y, and I try to get a bit for m'self, it's always the sime story. You ain't worthy, so you don't get nothin'. But my need is just as great as the most deservin' widow, who on account of the death of one and only one husband in one week gets money from six different charities.

I don't need less than a deserving man. I needs more. I don't eat less than 'e and I drinks a lot more. I needs a little diversion, because I am a hard thinking man. I needs cheer and light and music when I feels gloomy. Yes, and I got to pay for all that just like deserving people. Wot is this middle class morality? Only another way of saying that nobody ever gives me anything.

Therefore I ask you as gentlemen not to play the sime game. I deal you the top of the pack. I am hundeservin' and I intend to keep on bein' hundeservin'. Would you impose on a man because of 'is peculiar temperament and deprive 'im even of the price of 'is own daughter that 'e brought up and clothed and nourished by the sweat of 'is brow until she was big enough to be of interest to you? Is five pounds dear? I arsk you in all honor, decide for yourselves.

HIGGINS—Pickering, if we kept this man with us for three months he could choose between a seat in Parliament and the pulpit of a popular preacher. • • • I think we must give him the five pounds.

PICKERING—I am afraid he will put it to a bad use.

DOOLITTLE—Oh, no, Sir! S'elp me Gawd, no! Don't be afraid that I'll put that money by and sive it and then lead a lizy life. Monday there won't be a penny of it left. I'll 'ave to work again as 'ard as if I'd never 'ad no money. Only a blowout for myself and the madam, in which we'll 'ave pleasure and you content in thinkin' that your money ain't squandered. You couldn't invest it better, Sir.

HIGGINS—That is irresistible. We will give him ten pounds.

DOOLITTLE—No, thank you, Sir, kindly. The madam wouldn't 'ave the 'eart to give up so much as ten pounds. I neither. Ten pounds is a lot of money. It mikes one stop to think, and then, good-by 'appiness! Give me only wot I arsk, Sir; not a penny more nor a penny less.

She Makes Progress.

By Act III. the experiment is well under way. Eliza has made marvelous strides upward from the gutter. The two experimenters are wildly enthusiastic over her progress, which they report to Mrs. Higgins, a cultured and tolerant soul, who allows her fanatic professor son to teach his pupil the first steps in the society of her home. Not even her sceptical doubts about Eliza's future check their enthusiasm.

PICKERING (shoves a chair nearer to Mrs. Higgins and addresses himself to her eagerly)—Yes, it's unspeakably interesting. Believe me, Mrs. Higgins, we take Eliza very seriously. Every week, every day something new. (Still nearer.) We note each stage she goes through. Dozens of phonograph records and photographs—

HIGGINS (besieging her other ear)—Yes, by gad, it's the most thrilling experiment I ever made! She fills our whole life, doesn't she, Pick?

PICKERING—We talk of nothing but Eliza.

HIGGINS—We teach Eliza.

PICKERING—We clothe Eliza.

MRS. HIGGINS—What!

HIGGINS—We discover new Elizas. (They both speak together.)

HIGGINS—You know, she has an extraordinarily sensitive ear—

PICKERING—I assure you, my dear Mrs. Higgins, this girl—

HIGGINS—Like a parrot—I try everything on her—

PICKERING—Is a genius, she can play the piano wonderfully.

HIGGINS—Every sort of tone which a human being can bring forth—

PICKERING—We have taken her to hear classical music and vaudeville.

HIGGINS—Continental dialects, African dialects, Hottentot—

PICKERING—And all equally well—she imitates all of them.

HIGGINS—Things which normally take years to grasp and—

PICKERING—And when she comes back home she plays everything over by ear—

HIGGINS—She grasps everything as quickly as lightning, just as if—

PICKERING—Beethoven and Brahms or Lehar and Lionel Moncton.

HIGGINS—She had never been doing anything else her whole life.

PICKERING—Although six months before she had never dreamed of such a thing.

Now for the Debut.

Eliza makes her début at Mrs. Higgins's at-home. Well dressed, graceful, elegant, she is assuredly a changed Eliza. She has a languid tone, and as long as the conversation clings close to the weather she is safe. But embarked on a story of how her aunt died of influenza, or, rather, was "abgemurkst," whatever its Shavian equivalent may be!—the old gutter lingo returns, to the great discomfiture of Higgins and Pickering, and the amusement of a young thing called Freddy Eynsford-Hill, who subsequently falls in love with this lively Galatea. The rest of the company regard Eliza as a most advanced young lady, however, and accept her piquant grammar as the very latest and smartest thing in conversation.

This is the second stage in the metamorphosis. It is several months later when the curtain rises on Act IV. Eliza has blossomed according to the agreement, she has made a successful entrance at the garden party, followed by dinner and opera, and no one suspected that she was not a Duchess. The only person who was deceived was Higgins, who knew she wasn't, when she really was.

For during this metamorphosis business Eliza has developed a soul. Clad in a gorgeous evening gown, wearing borrowed jewels, and carrying a huge armful of flowers, she returns after her triumph, humiliated and ashamed. She stands listening to Higgins and Pickering discussing the success of the day before going to bed, giving no thought whatever to her.

HIGGINS—All the same, it's all over with now, and I can at last go to bed without looking forward with terror to to-morrow.

PICKERING—I'll go to bed now, too. It was in every way a great achievement, a great triumph for you. Good night.

HIGGINS (following him)—Good night. (Over his shoulder at the door.) Put out the light, Eliza, and tell Mrs. Pearce she needn't make any coffee for breakfast. I'll have tea. (He goes out, leaving the door open.)

Eliza looks after him with inarticulate passion. Then she throws herself on the divan and rages.

HIGGINS (outside)—Where the devil have I left my slippers? (He appears on the threshold.)

ELIZA (grabs the slippers, which are just within her reach, and flings them with all her strength, one after the other, at his head)—There are your slippers! There! There! Take your slippers and may you never have a happy day in them!

HIGGINS—For heaven's sake! What's the matter with you? Stand up! Do you want something?

ELIZA—Nothing—that concerns you. I have won your wager, that is enough for you. I myself come in for no consideration, it seems.

HIGGINS—You—you have won my wager? You? An educated worm! I have won my wager. What did you throw these slippers at me for?

ELIZA—Because I should have liked better than anything else to smash your face. I should like to do for you, you unfeeling egoist! Why didn't you leave me where you found me—in the gutter? You thank God that everything is over and you can shove me back into it, don't you? (She lifts her clenched hands.) • • • What is to become of me?

HIGGINS—How the devil do I know what is to become of you? How does it concern me what becomes of you?

ELIZA—It doesn't concern you at all. I know that. It doesn't concern you at all. It wouldn't concern you if I were dead. I'm not as much to you as them slippers.

HIGGINS (thundering)—Those slippers!

LIZA.—Those slippers.

Perplexities of Higgins.

For the first time, Higgins is forced to give thought to what shall become of this creation of his who has suddenly developed such an amazing independence. He shoves his hands in his pockets and suggests that his mother might find some one for her to marry, or that the original plan of a flower shop be adopted. Eliza's refusal is scorching. As she is passing through all the stages of development, she sinks her head in her arms and wishes to God she were dead. For the first time in her life, all the horrors of introspection have come upon her.

In fact, Henry Higgins has wrought considerable havoc in the Doolittle family by lifting them out of their comfortable gutter. By way of a joke, he wrote to Ezra D. Wannafeller, United States, that he had discovered the original English moralist of the time, Alfred Doolittle, garbage collector. Mr. Wannafeller, dying, left Mr. Doolittle an income of three thousand pounds, and happiness flew out at the back door.

The audience scarcely recognizes the erstwhile garbage collector when he steps into the fifth act, wearing frock coat, white vest and gray trousers, a flower in his buttonhole, patent leather shoes upon his feet and a silk hat twirling in his hand. Withal he is miserable.

DOOLITTLE.—What I'm complaining of is that he has made a gentleman out of me. Who ever asked him to do that? I was happy. I was a free man. I have gotten money out of pretty nearly every one, just as I got it out of you, Henry Higgins, when I needed it. Now I'm hedged in, bound hand and foot, and every one gets money out of me. You ought to congratulate yourself, says my lawyer. You mean that you ought to congratulate yourself, I tell him.

When I was a poor man and needed a lawyer because somebody found a baby carriage in my cart, he argued my case for nothing and then saw to it that he was free of me as soon as possible. The same way with the doctors. They used to shove me out of the hospital before I could stand, without making me pay a penny. Now they have discovered that I'm not healthy and can't live if they don't examine me twice a day. I don't dare lift a finger in my own house, but somebody else must do it for the good money I have to pay him. I'm only allowed to live for others—instead of for myself.

That is middle-class morality for you. A year ago I didn't have a single relative in the whole world outside of two or three people who wouldn't have a thing to do with me. Now I have fifty. And not one of them has a decent salary. • • •

FRAU HIGGINS—But my dear Mr. Doolittle, you don't need to endure all that if you are really in earnest. No one can compel you to accept this bequest. You can refuse the money.

DOOLITTLE—That's the tragic part of the whole story, my dear madam. Away with it—that's easy to say, but I lack the courage. Who of us has it? We are all cowards. Cowards, my dear madam, that's what it is.

Who would take me if I refused the money? The poorhouse for my last days. If I had belonged to the deserving poor and had laid by something, then I could have refused the bequest. And I should probably have done so, for the deserving poor live very much like millionaires—they don't know what happiness is. But between me, the undeserving poor, and the poorhouse there stands nothing but this accursed bequest. • • •

I haven't the courage to choose the poorhouse. A coward, that's what I've become. Broken down, sold. Happier than I are making a living off my ash cart and I look on, helpless, and envy them. I have your son to thank for that.

Meanwhile Eliza has a glimmer into Higgins's real state of mind toward her, and accordingly runs away to Mrs. Higgins. Much upset, the bewildered Professor follows her, just as she thought he would. From that time on it is nip and tuck as to who shall have the upper hand, for something more than new feelings of independence have been aroused during the course of Eliza's instruction.

She tries the ruse of ignoring him and giving to Pickering the credit for her education.

ELIZA—You are the man, Col. Pickering, from whom I have really learned gentle manners. And it is such, in truth, who make ladies. And you can imagine how hard it was for me with the example of Professor Higgins always before my eyes! I was brought up to be just as he is, incapable of controlling myself and storming about at the slightest provocation. And I should never have learned that gentlemen and ladies behaved otherwise toward each other if you had not been there. • • • Do you know when my real education began?

PICKERING—When?

ELIZA—On the day when I first came to Wimpole Street and you called me Miss Doolittle. That was the beginning of my self-respect. And then a hundred little things followed which you did not notice because they were perfectly natural to you. Your manner of rising, of lifting your hat, of opening the door, things which showed that I was in your estimation better than a scullery maid. • • • You never took off your shoes in the dining room in my presence.

MRS. HIGGINS—I beg of you, Henry, don't grit your teeth that way.

After all, it is not because Henry took off his shoes in the dining room that Eliza feels so insulted, she tells him.

ELIZA—It doesn't matter to me how you treat me, it makes no difference to me if you insult me, but I will not stand having you ride over me!

HIGGINS—Then get out of my way, for I have no intention of standing still on your account. You talk as if I were an autobus.

ELIZA—So you are. Up and down, only straight on ahead with never a glance at anybody. But I can get along without you. Don't think that I can't.

HIGGINS—I know that you can. I've told you so myself.

ELIZA—I know well enough that you told me that, you brutal bully! You're glad to get rid of me.

HIGGINS—I am.

ELIZA—Thanks.

HIGGINS—In your unbounded and stupid selfishness, I suppose you've never inquired if I could get along without you.

ELIZA—Don't try to get around me that way. You'll have to get along without me.

HIGGINS (haughtily)—I don't need anybody. I have my own soul, my own spark of the divine fire. But, (with sudden humility) you would leave a hole in my life, I have learned something from the mere blind contemplation of you. I understand that, humbly and gratefully, and I have become accustomed to your voice and your presence. They please me greatly.

For a moment the audience thinks it is going to have a truly romantic love scene, as Henry sits meekly down upon the sofa beside his Galatea. But Galatea's answer destroys that hope.

ELIZA—Very good, then. You have both of them in your phonograph records and your photograph album. If you long for me, all you have to do is to set going the machine which has no feelings to disturb you.

Then to excite him a little further she tells him she will marry young Freddy Eynsford-Hill. He rises to that quite excitedly, and she tells him she won't. Then she goes too far in the other direction and tells him that she really has a friendly feeling toward him.

ELIZA—I know that I am a common, ignorant girl and that you are a fine and learned gentleman. But I am not the lowest of the low. What I done—what I did, I did not because of clothes and taxis. I did it because—we pleased each other, and because I—because I—well, I could tolerate you. Not because I wanted you to fall in love with me and forget the great difference between us,—but in a more—a more friendly manner—

HIGGINS—Of course, that's how I felt, too. That's how Pickering felt. Eliza, you're a fool.

ELIZA (weeping)—That's not the right answer, not the one I expected.

Her Final Surprise.

And just as Higgins feels sure of her, sure that she is going to return to Wimpole Street, she springs one last surprise and announces that she will herself turn teacher and give away all his secrets of instruction in phonetics, becoming the assistant of his rival in the business. Never, never, on any account, will she ever come near him again. And at that moment Mrs. Higgins arrives on this boisterous scene to carry Eliza off to her father's wedding, for the sixth Doolittle stepmother has also become a coward as a result of the £3,000 and is offering sacrifice on the altar of middle class morality.

MRS. HIGGINS—The carriage is waiting, Eliza, are you ready?

ELIZA (becomes at once cool and elegant)—Quite. Is the professor coming?

MRS. HIGGINS—Certainly not. He can't behave himself decently in church. He continually makes remarks about the pronunciation of the sermons.

ELIZA—Then I shall not see you again, professor. Good-bye. (She goes to the door.)

MRS. HIGGINS (goes up to Higgins)—Good-bye, my love.

HIGGINS—Good-bye, Mamma. (He is about to kiss her when something occurs to him.) Oh, by the way, Eliza, will you be so good as to get me a ham and a bit of cheese. And get me a pair of driving gloves No. 8. And a necktie that will go with my new suit. You can pick out the color yourself.

ELIZA (scornfully)—Buy your things yourself. (She rushes out.)

MRS. HIGGINS—I am afraid you have offended the girl, Henry, but never mind about it, I'll get you the gloves and the necktie.

And on this the final curtain descends, leaving some of the audience a little bit puzzled, but most of it agreeing with Henry that Eliza will buy them all right.

THE PRESIDENT AND MEXICO, BY COL. GEORGE HARVEY

Frank Discussion of the Wilson Policy by the Editor of The North American Review, Who Also Comments on Recent Election Result.

By special arrangement The New York Times is enabled to present here Col. George Harvey's discussion of men and affairs which will appear in the forthcoming North American Review for December.

TO obtain a clear understanding of the present Mexican situation it is necessary to recall in sequence the chief events which have given rise to the predicament in which, as a nation, we now find ourselves.

On Feb. 18 of the present year, after nine days of fighting in the City of Mexico, President Madero and Vice President Suarez were compelled to resign by Gens. Blanquet and Huerta upon the ground that "the time has come when some drastic means must be taken to stop a conflict in which father is killing son and brother is fighting against brother; where noncombatants are sharing the fate of war—and all this because of the caprice of one man."

Piedro Lascurian, Minister of Foreign Affairs, thereupon became Provisional President and appointed Gen. Huerta Minister of the Interior. A few days later Lascurian resigned, and, his resignation having been accepted by the Congress, Huerta became Provisional President. All this was done by prearrangement and in strict conformity with provisions of the written Constitution. Gen. Huerta immediately telegraphed to President Taft:

I have the honor to inform you that I have overthrown the Government. The forces are with me, and from now on peace and prosperity will reign.

On Feb. 23 Madero and Suarez were shot to death while being taken in an automobile from the National Palace to the penitentiary. According to an official statement put forth by authority of Huerta, they were killed in a scrimmage resulting from an attempted rescue. The American Ambassador, Mr. Henry Lane Wilson, "accepted" this version of the tragedy "in the absence of other reliable information," and expressed a feeling of certainty that the deaths were "without Government approval."

This was the situation when President Wilson was inaugurated.

President Huerta immediately sought official recognition from the various powers. Great Britain was the first to accede. Speaking in the Guildhall on Nov. 10, Prime Minister Asquith said:

On March 31 of this year, before the present Administration of the United States had made or had even had an opportunity of making any declaration of policy, his Majesty's Government recognized Huerta as President ad interim. We did so because we were bound to deal with him as we should in the case of any Central or South American State, whatsoever was at the time the de facto government, and according to information then in our possession there appeared to be no element except Huerta and his supporters which offered any prospect for the restoration of stability and order.

That was on March 31. Very shortly afterward, in answer to our inquiries, we were informed by the Government of the United States that as regards the recognition of Huerta no definite answer could be given except that they would wait some time longer before recognizing him.

Practically all of the European powers, including Germany, France, Spain, and Austria, followed England's example, and Ambassador Henry Lane Wilson strongly urged our Administration to do likewise. The Huerta Government, too, was most insistent, urging as a special reason that it could not obtain funds requisite to the pacifying of the country while the United States withheld official recognition.

President Wilson, however, declined to comply, for reasons which, though never set forth officially, were clearly indicated in a statement issued within a fortnight after he assumed office, to the effect that "we can have no sympathy with those who seek to seize the power of Government to advance their own personal interest and ambition," and subsequently in a speech at Swarthmore, Penn., when he declared that "nowhere can any Government long endure which is stained by blood or supported by anything but the consent of the governed."

John Lind's Mission.

Early in August, impelled by complaints of Americans and the restiveness of foreign Governments concerning the destruction of properties, the President dispatched Mr. John Lind, a former Governor of Minnesota, to Mexico as his personal spokesman and representative with proposals of friendly mediation. Mr. Lind's instructions were to "press very earnestly upon those who are now exercising authority or wielding influence" that "the Government of the United States does not feel at liberty any longer to stand inactively by while no real progress is being made toward the establishment of a Government in the City of Mexico which the country will obey and respect." The President continued:

A satisfactory settlement seems to us to be conditioned on:

(a) An immediate cessation of fighting throughout Mexico, a definite armistice solemnly entered into and scrupulously observed;

(b) Security given for an early and free election in which all agree to take part;

(c) The consent of Gen. Huerta to bind himself not to be a candidate for election as President of the republic at this election, and

(d) The agreement of all parties to abide by the results of the election and co-operate in the most loyal way in organizing and supporting the new Administration.

He added:

If Mexico can suggest any better way in which to show our friendship, serve the people of Mexico and meet our international obligations, we are more than willing to consider the suggestion.

The Huerta Government was disposed to resent the appearance of an "unofficial confidential agent" from the United States when all other nations were represented by authorized Ministers, and Señor Gamboa, Secretary for Foreign Affairs, did not hesitate to pronounce the proposals "unusual and humiliating." Nevertheless, evincing appreciation of the spirit which prompted the interposition, he replied courteously that his Government could hardly be expected to cease warring upon, or to enter into "a definite armistice" with unorganized bandits; that free elections were already assured; but that, naturally, his Government could not guarantee "the agreement of all parties to abide by the results." He was constrained, therefore, to reject the proposals, and, in response to the President's invitations, suggested "the following equally decorous arrangement":

(1) That our Ambassador be received in Washington.

(2) That the United States of America send us a new Ambassador without previous conditions.

The one really vital condition of mediation imposed by President Wilson, namely, that Gen. Huerta "bind himself not to be a candidate for election as President," was disposed of politely but firmly in these words:

The request that Gen. Victoriano Huerta should agree not to appear as a candidate for the Presidency of the republic in the coming elections cannot be taken into consideration, because, aside from its strange and unwarranted character, there is a risk that the same might be interpreted as a matter of personal dislike. This point can only be decided by Mexican public opinion when it may be expressed at the polls.

Two Vital Questions.

Subsequent events, including the arbitrary dissolution of the recalcitrant Madero Congress, the dismissal of Diaz, and the so-called election which may or may not be considered valid, and the constantly reiterated declarations from the White House that "Huerta must go" are too recent to require recital.

The whole matter resolves to this:

What legal or moral right has a President of the United States to say who shall or shall not be President of Mexico? and

Did not President Wilson imbed himself in a practically inextricable position when he demanded the retirement of Huerta?

To the first question there can be but one answer from a technical standpoint. Mr. Asquith gave it when he said that his Majesty's Government was "bound to deal with him (Huerta) as with any other Central or South American State, whatsoever was at the time the de facto Government." Germany, France, Spain, Austria, and Russia gave it when they accredited Ministers to the new administration. President Franklin Pierce gave it when he declared in his message to Congress on May 15, 1856:

It is the established policy of the United States to recognize Governments without question of their source of organization or of the means by which the governing persons attain their power, provided there be a Government de facto accepted by the people of the country. * * * It is the more imperatively necessary to apply this rule to the Spanish-American peoples in consideration of the frequent and not seldom anomalous changes of organization or administration which they undergo and the revolutionary character of most of the changes.

Whether or not President Huerta would have been able to restore order throughout Mexico if he had possessed the means of which he was deprived by President Wilson's refusal to accord with the action of other nations and with what President Pierce pronounced "the established policy of the United States" is a matter of conjecture. That it would have been the part of wisdom to give him a chance to try is, we believe, in the light of subsequent events, the consensus of opinion in our own country at the present time.

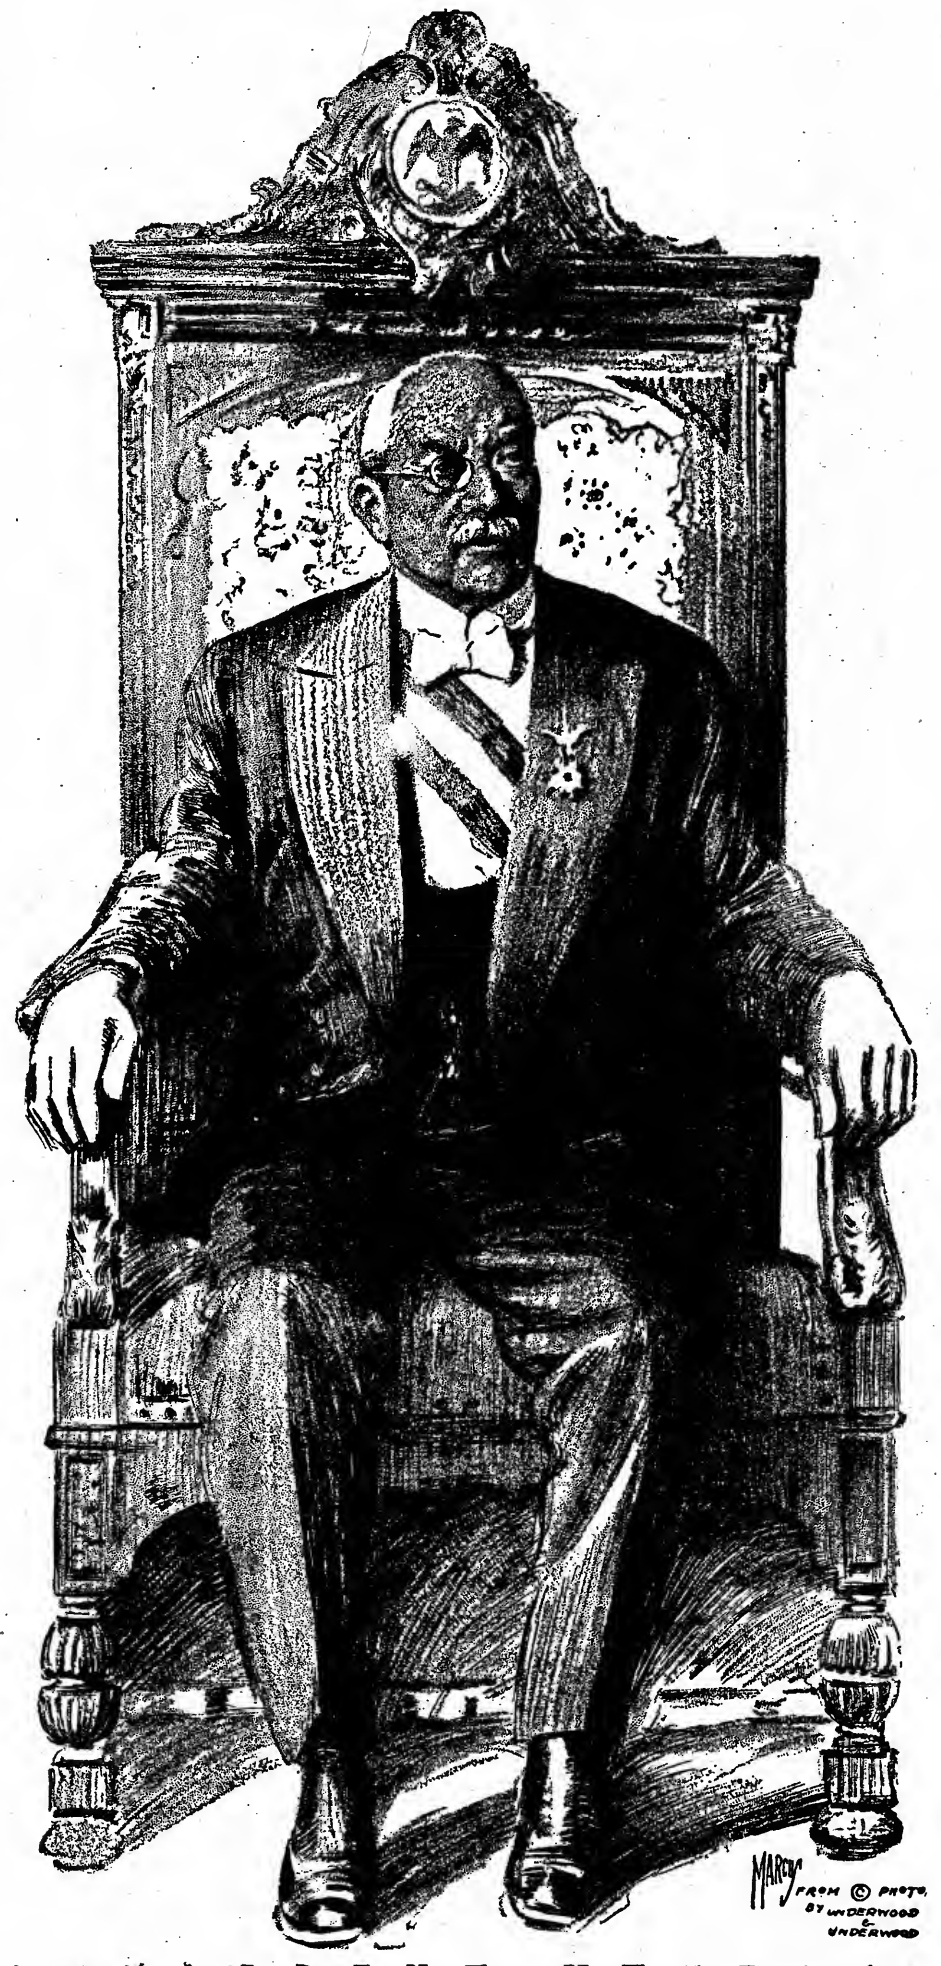
To the second question we suspect the correct answer would be that the President's predicament is one from which satisfactory extrication is at the least difficult. What amazes us is that he should ever have gotten into it.

Surely there could have been no doubt of the consequence of his demand that Huerta relinquish authority upon the ground, clearly implied, that he was directly concerned in the assassination of Madero. If innocent he would not, and if guilty he could not, comply with such a request. Acquiescence would have spelt confession in either case.

Nothing could be plainer than that President Wilson's method frustrated his own intent and could not possibly have operated otherwise. Instead of eliminating Huerta from power, he riveted him in his place, there to remain, in all probability, until he shall be expelled by force of arms.

It is proverbially easy to criticize, especially after the event. Probably President Wilson himself now realizes that it would have been better to accord recognition to the de facto Government, in compliance with the unanimous recommendation of the diplomatic corps in Mexico, upon the grounds set forth by Mr. Asquith.

But, having once assumed a wider responsibility by attempting to dictate to the Dictator, in pursuance of a policy which was ethical rather than practical, he was forbidden by regard for the nation's dignity, no less than by his own obduracy, to recede from the position which he had taken. It followed inevitably that his original and wholly admirable purposes, which comprehended real assistance to a distracted neighbor and avoidance of war on our own part, should narrow to a single definite aim, namely, the deposition of Huerta.



PRESIDENT HUERTA

To this end the President has directed all his energies, chiefly, after the failure of moral suasion, by way of menace. But all semi-official threatenings, first of lifting the embargo upon the delivery of arms to the insurgents, then of inaugurating a "peaceful blockade" of the Mexican ports, then of seeking to starve the Government, through the co-operation of foreign powers, and, finally, of severing diplomatic relations entirely, have so far been in vain. Huerta, at this writing, seems to be more stubborn and determined than at any previous time; has crushed out all opposition in his Cabinet and Congress, holds the army apparently under perfect control; is not destitute of funds, and, oddly enough, has been strengthened immeasurably with the Mexican people by report of the peremptory refusal of Carranza to accept mediatory proposals of any kind from Washington.

Meanwhile, the wretched country is being devastated from the Rio Grande to the Southern Gulf; prisoners taken in battle are being slaughtered ruthlessly; helpless non-combatants are become the prey of savage bandits; railways are being torn up; mining and other properties to the value of unreckoned millions have already been destroyed, and American and European residents are fleeing for their lives. The gravity of the situation from the standpoint of Mexico, of our own country, or of humanity cannot be exaggerated. We are confronted by a condition of anarchy, not by a theory of government, and the condition has become intolerable.

What is to be done?

"We admit," says The London Spectator, "that it might be possible for Mr. Wilson's half-and-half Mexican policy to succeed in very small and weak countries—countries which could never raise their hand in revolt and had to put up with whatever treatment they got as contentedly as might be. But no one will say that Mexico is a country of that description.

"No one could foretell the character and length of the resistance that Mexico would be able to offer if an invasion of the country became necessary. It would certainly be harassing and enthusiastic, and would involve the United States in incalculable expense.

"Mexico is peopled by independent and pugnacious men, apt at guerrilla warfare, and is a country which lends itself to the arts of wearing out an enemy by the expedients of ambuscade and elusiveness. We sincerely hope that the necessity for war may be avoided, but we cannot honestly see how the present American policy can end except in war and an eventual protectorate, or in a reversal of the attempt at dictation by means of an unworkable Imperialism."

War Looms Ahead.

We are unable to see how any thinking man can fail to concur in this judgment. Grateful as we are to President Wilson for withstanding the temptation to which another of less scrupulous ambition might have yielded, to intervene by force of arms, we cannot escape the conclusion that persistence in his present course is virtually certain to drive our country into a war as hateful to ourselves as it would be to the neighbors whom we are anxious to serve. The only alternative, apparently, is that indicated above, namely, "a reversal of the attempt at dictation by means of an unworkable Imperialism."

Is not that possible?

Nobody here or abroad and nobody in Mexico who need be considered questions the high purpose which has actuated President Wilson. Nobody suspects his good faith, the purity of his motives, or the pacificatory nature of his methods. Nobody doubts that he has done his best, and nobody can demonstrate that another could have done better.

But the policy which the President sincerely believed to be the wisest has failed. Why could and why should he not now address the de facto Government of Mexico substantially as follows:

"We have exerted our best endeavors, according to our best judgment, to aid in restoring peace and prosperity to you, our neighbors and our friends. We have been disinterested, as you know, but our suggestions, having failed to meet with the approval of either the provisional Government or of the commander of the insurrectionary forces, have necessarily proved unavailing.

"Deeply as we regret this circumstance, we frankly admit it to be a fact. But it is the accomplishment, not the method, that we still regard as vital.

"We have tried our way in vain. Now we stand ready to try yours.

"Your Ambassador will be received in Washington. We will accredit a new Ambassador to you 'without previous conditions.'

"We shall hold your Government responsible for the lives and properties of all foreign residents, and shall notify other nations to that effect. All of our dealings with your Administration will be in the open, in good faith, and in sincere hope that a truly representative and stable Government may soon be established, to the end that, within a reasonable time, peace and prosperity may be regained in all parts of your distracted land."

We hear the objections to this new policy. It would be unfair to the Constitutionalists and rebels. But, since their leader has repulsed our attempts at mediation, what further claim have they upon our consideration?

It would strengthen Huerta, or Blanquet or Moheno, or whoever may be in control when these words reach the public ear and mind. That cannot be helped. We must strengthen somebody, and apparently there is little room for choice.

It would be inconsistent with our declared attitude, would be a recession on the part of the President, would humiliate us as a nation in the eyes of the world. Perhaps, yes; and for that very reason it would live forever as a performance and an example, as the noblest act ever done by a great and powerful nation in the interest of a weak and suffering people.

And it would avert war—at least for time sufficient to allow for adjustment and mutual understanding. That is the overpowering consideration which should, and, we hope, may influence a President who surely must realize that he is not merely the tribune of a people, but is also the head of a nation which should set the pace for all the world in works of self-abnegation tending to universal peace.

WOMEN'S MEETINGS AND MAN'S INDIFFERENCE

IT was 11:45 P. M. The man and his wife had just come home. They did not come home together. They had not been to the same place. She had been to a meeting for women only, he to one for men.

Said the woman: "There was a man at our meeting to-night."

Said the man: "There were about a hundred women tried to push their way into ours."

"That one man," said she, "looked awfully scared."

"Those hundred women," said he, "didn't look a bit scared."

"I think," said she, "the man got into our hall by mistake. Anyhow, he got away as soon as he could."

"There was no mistake about those women being there," said the man, "and they didn't leave until they were shooed away."

There was a short silence. Said the man presently:

"It is this difference in the attitude of the sexes toward the meetings for women only and for men only that makes me feel morally superior. It makes me proud of my sex. I haven't the slightest desire—no man has the slightest desire—to butt into a feminine confab, but the woman never breathed who wasn't on edge with curiosity in regard to what takes place when a bunch of men hold a secret conference. I have known women who admitted that they would willingly sacrifice a year's normal pleasures for the privilege of being smuggled into a Masonic initiation or some other masculine rite. Contrast that prying spirit with the modesty of men. On your own showing, when a man is accidentally trapped in a hall where a beauty congress or a dressmakers' convention is in progress, he is so miserable that the fly in the spider's web had a picnic compared with his martyrdom. That, to my mind, is a pungent commentary on the disposition of man and woman. Can you explain it?"

The woman admitted that she could not explain it—furthermore that she did not intend to try.

[illegible]

Said the woman after a little: "What happened at your meeting to-night?"

"Oh, nothing much," said the man. "What happened at yours?"

"Everything," said the woman. Then she proceeded to tell him what "everything" comprised. It took more than half an hour to tell it. Every now and then the man, for consistency's sake, tried to look bored, but the air of indifference was ill assumed. The narrative really interested him, and he was sorry when it was finished. The story being ended, there was another silence. Suddenly the woman said:

"I can answer your question now."

"What question?"

"Why women are crazy to go to men's meetings, while men wouldn't give a fig to go to women's meetings. It is because the women come home and tell the men everything that happened, so they don't need to go, whereas the men never tell the women anything."

"By George," said the man, "I don't [illegible]

EVERYBODY SATISFIED.

THE results of the November elections proved gratifying to all parties and all politicians directly concerned. The President lost no time in commending the wisdom of the people in upholding his Administration, and both Secretary Bryan and Secretary Josephus shyly but firmly acquiesced in his judgment that this is what happened. It is a reasonably safe assumption that Secretary Redfield would have done likewise if he had been within hearing distance. In fact, the common understanding is that all members of the Cabinet were, as usual, of one mind upon the subject.

The President was particularly pleased with the returns from New Jersey and had a right to be. True, his personally designated candidate for Governor did not poll a majority of the votes, but neither did he in the national election; so nothing was lost; in fact, Mr. Fielder's percentage of the total was slightly larger than Mr. Wilson's.

Despite the refusal of the Massachusetts Democrats to indorse the Administration, Mr. Walsh's handsome victory was heralded as a testimonial of approval, if not of affection, and warm congratulations were passed promptly over the wires. The overwhelming triumph of the Fusion candidate over the regular organization in New York City impelled some reflection, but at the expiration of forty-eight hours Mr. Mitchel, too, became the grateful recipient of cordial and sincere felicitations.

The three lieutenants of the Administration whose eloquence contributed largely to the happy results and to whom, we have no doubt, the President expressed due appreciation, were the Secretary of State, the Senator from Illinois, and the Third Assistant Public Servant. Mr. Bryan spoke without pay in New Jersey, and Mr. Dudley Field Malone defiantly ignored the wishes of his distinguished and personally helpful father-in-law in New York. So, at least, 'twas said, and we know naught to the contrary; in any case, the Collectorship is his reward.

But the chief glory goes to Senator James Hamilton Lewis, who carried Massachusetts. When that impassioned orator descended upon the field of action only State and personal issues were involved. Mr. Bird and Mr. Gardner were descanting somewhat vehemently upon their respective demerits, and Mr. Walsh was emulating canny Br'er Rabbit. Senator Lewis perceived with the eye of an eagle the danger which lurked in this situation and proceeded forthwith to impart the requisite thrill to enthralled multitudes.

"Just now," he declared, impressively, "before the nations of the world, tremble two serious problems."

The orator paused, the audience shivered, the building shook. But presently the voice continued:

One is the effort of President Wilson and his Administration to maintain before the Orient, particularly Japan, that doctrine of home rule which our fathers in Massachusetts established as the fundamental theory of the American democracy—the right of the States to regulate and control their home affairs, their schools, their lands, the manner and kinds of people who should mingle in their citizenship to increase or dilute it.

This question, as to whether this privilege shall continue as against the Oriental theory of government, or whether our National Government shall attempt to override merely at the demands of a foreign nation, is the great problem at Washington which President Wilson is seeking to solve.

Again, in Mexico, as is well known to all, we have a most delicate situation. The public press brings us the information that England and Germany—doubtless misunderstanding the issue—have been about to join with Mexico against us. The President has asked these Governments to wait until they can be fully informed on the situation in Mexico, and thus be advised as to our policy known as the Monroe Doctrine.

England, Germany, and Spain, misunderstanding the issues, would at once conclude that President Wilson's Mexican policy had been repudiated; that he had been condemned and the Administration overthrown. Mexico will go further; she will preach to her people that this condemnation was because he had not recognized Huerta. Is the conclusion too far fetched that war might be precipitated with all its horrors?

It Was Flawless Logic.

The argument was convincing; the plea irresistible. In the opinion of those present the conclusion was not fetched too far. Sobered and thoughtful, thousands of Democrats returned to their homes and informed their anxious families that, under no circumstances and for no ordinary considerations, would they vote for the precipitation of a war which was likely to be accompanied by all its horrors. From that moment the result ceased to be in doubt, and a noble victory was won for Mr. Fitzgerald and his co-laborers in the cause of anti-bossism.

But Democratic elation over the results was not exclusive. Republicans, too, rejoiced with exceeding great joy. Nearly a hundred thousand wanderers had returned to the fold in New Jersey alone, and they had actually carried the great State of New York. Clearly, the Progressive organization was disintegrating with amazing rapidity and—the Democratic host was still a distinctly minority party.

And then the redoubtable Colonel! From far-off Argentina came the exultant shout, "It is too glorious for words." Which, if any, particular happening he referred to can only be surmised. It may have been the election of Democrats in New York, Massachusetts, and New Jersey, or of a Barnes-ridden Legislature or of the Hon. William Sulzer as a candidate of the Progressive Party. Who can tell? And what boots it? The overpowering fact is that the Colonel, too, was glad, thus making the vote of joy unanimous.

The only net deduction, of course, is that the Democrats are likely to retain power so long as Mr. Roosevelt continues to render the patriotic service which contributes to that desirable end.

AMERICAN WOMAN'S EXPERIENCES WITH ROYALTY IN SPAIN

Mrs. Tryphosa Bates Batcheller Tells of Motoring with the Infanta Eulalia Incognito, and Pleasant Meetings with the Then King and Queen of Spain, and Gives a Delightful Picture of Spanish Life.

IF Tommy loves a lord, as they say he does, then "Tommy" must be the unacknowledged middle name of a good many plain Americans. Even republican hearts, especially of the female variety, generally thrill at an encounter with royalty.

Any lady from Oshkosh or Kalamazoo, not to mention New York City, would be stirred by unusual emotions if, while having afternoon tea with her husband, there should come a knock at the door and, in response to her "Come in," a real live king should present himself to her astonished vision.

This, with many other interesting things, is what happened to Mrs. Tryphosa Bates Batcheller. Their chronicle fills more than 600 pages and is published by Longmans, Green & Co. under the title, "Royal Spain of To-day." There is much historical and descriptive matter in the book that is interesting. But it is safe to say that the "Tommy" lurking in us all will find the personal experiences with royalty and nobility the most absorbing parts.

To take a long motor trip in Spain with a Royal Infanta of that fascinating country would appeal to even a jaded fancy. And if her Royal Highness chose to go incognito, thereby making possible all sorts of extraordinary adventures, the excursion would begin to seem like a modern "Arabian Nights." Lucky Mr. and Mrs. Bates Batcheller! For in their limousine the Infanta Eulalia did indeed go a-motoring with them under the disguise of the "Countess of Alvia."

The Infanta is not unknown to Americans, as she represented Spain at the World's Fair at Chicago. And after reading the account of this remarkable journey one feels that one would rather like to take a pilgrimage oneself with the royal lady. She seems to have all the qualities necessary for a good traveling companion. At the risk of committing lèse-majesté one might go further and say that the Infanta deserves to be enrolled in the noble but somewhat limited army of those who are genuine "good pals."

When occasion arose she did not balk at riding on a tram; even on the top of one of those plebeian vehicles. When the party landed at night in a town where the only available rooms were four flights up in an elevatorless inn, the royal feet unhesitatingly climbed the stairs and the royal voice, somewhat breathless but still cheerful, made but one comment at the top:

"Well, anyhow we have a beautiful view from the window! And how fine the ramparts and the river look from here!"

Her good humor persisted even the next morning at 4 o'clock, at which hour it was necessary to rise in order to catch a train; for this incident was part of the Portuguese excursion which followed the motor trip in Spain. It was in Portugal too that the King knocked at the door of the Batchellers' sitting room and announced that he had come to tea. (That was three years ago, before Manuel had been obliged to abandon the throne.) It was not his first appearance before the eyes of the astonished Mr. and Mrs. Bates Batcheller, as they had lunched with him at the palace the day before.

Manuel Was Agreeable.

"Having placed the Infanta at his right," says Mrs. Batcheller, in describing this occasion, "to say that I was surprised when his Majesty graciously asked me to sit on his left, does not adequately express my feelings. King Manuel's personality is charming. He is an exceptionally fine pianist and his Majesty told me that twice or three times a week he plays with a trio of excellent musicians, who come to the palace, delighted to have their talents not only appreciated, but given royal patronage as well. The table decorations were masses of wonderful white lilacs, without the green, arranged in large but most exquisite silver tankards.

"If would-be great people, with their airs and graces, affectations, and stupidities, could see how charmingly graceful, natural and free from all that is affected or pompous really great people are, they would blush at their own fancied imitation."

Certainly there is no sign of pomposity or affectation in the picture Mrs. Batcheller gives of the Infanta as they wandered about on this interesting journey. The trip began at Paris, where the Infanta declared to her friends her determination of maintaining her incognito until Granada was reached. Everybody there said this would be impossible. But the feat was accomplished, although there was a narrow escape from discovery in Barcelona.

This, of all places, was the one where Mrs. Batcheller most dreaded having the identity of her royal companion become known. Barcelona is a hotbed of Republicanism, and the Americans were on pins and needles all the time they were there.

"Naturally, I am very nervous, and shall be until we have left this town," writes Mrs. Batcheller. "I have provided the Infanta with a very heavily embroidered white veil, and she has promised she will not step outside her door without wearing it." Later she says: "After luncheon the Infanta went into the writing room, and, to my horror, put up her veil to write a letter. There were few people in the room, and I hope nobody saw her, but I can not help feeling a bit anxious."

A former Cabinet Minister did, in fact, recognize the royal visitor, and said as much to Fusi, the chauffeur. But that quick-witted individual saved the day by a little timely prevarication, and the party finally got away without difficulty.

It Was a Novelty.

The journey, avowedly undertaken so that the Infanta could "show off" Spain to the two Americans, was remarkable in that it took the Spanish Princess herself to some regions quite new to her. She had never before visited even Granada, and it was en route to that place that one of their most exciting adventures took place.

The motor had run for miles and miles through a desolate country where the only vegetation was stunted cacti, and where the picnic luncheon, which they had fondly hoped to eat in some pleasant, shady spot, had been prosaically consumed in the car, to escape the broiling sun. Night came on, and a small village was reached. But the streets were filled with excited people; and the woman at the only inn shook her head at their request for food and lodging.

"I advise you to leave this town," she said. "I will not be responsible for your safety in my house this night."

So, without penetrating the mystery, the party sped away into the country again, to bring up finally in another little village, where they had "The Adventure with the Alcalde."

The Alcalde was a masterful person, who rescued them from the earth-floored rooms of the inn, where in Biblical fashion the ox, the ass, the donkey, pigs, and chickens shared the main apartment with the human guests. Of course, he was far from suspecting the identity of the Infanta, and he proved himself more than a match for her in his capacity for ruling. He never removed his hat, not even at the table. He took his visitors to the circus in the evening, though they politely pleaded for bed.

The Great Hall in the Royal Palace at Cintra.

Still, he saw to it that they came to no harm. For wherever they went they were conscious of an escorting brigade—two silent dusky figures in front, two at the side, and two in the rear. All six of these guards smoked cigars as they marched, and these wavering tips of light were beacons in the darkness that spoke of safety. The Alcalde also insured the protection of the motor by calmly threatening to shoot the first man that touched it.

When Mrs. Batcheller appeared alone before dinner, having told the Infanta to rest, the Alcalde summarily demanded that "the other lady" come out of her retreat. And, having an audience, he proceeded to give his views about politics, the priests, the Government, and the royal family with refreshing frankness. Fortunately, although his references to the royal family were sometimes lacking in respectfulness, he seemed highly appreciative of their value to the country. Even "The Brigand," a collarless, unshaven individual, who stalked in and out at will, had a good word for King Alfonso.

"He is a fine, brave fellow," declared this person. "He fears no one. That is one good thing. But he has a hard time to do for us with the priests always hindering him."

T ryphosa Bates Batcheller.

"The confessional is at the root of much evil in Spain," said the Alcalde. "I never allow my women to confess, for the priests use it for information against us who have money."

The Alcalde was extremely proud of the fact that he was well to do. The only way Mrs. Batcheller was able to persuade him to let them continue their journey the next day was by telling him, as to a financier who would understand, that her husband was expecting important dispatches at Granada and that it would mean a great money loss to him if he did not reach there promptly. That settled the Alcalde. He said that he could not consider himself a hospitable host if he caused his guests to lose money by interfering with their plans. When the parting came this amiable individual took from his pocket a huge pistol and presented it to his American guest with the remark:

"I don't wish you to leave Chiribel without a souvenir of its ruler. This is the pistol of a famous bandit whom only three weeks ago I myself killed. And here is my picture that you may not forget the Alcalde of Chiribel."

Mrs. Batcheller intimates that the picture was quite superfluous as a reviver of recollections of that particular night. But she adds that "the Infanta was in the best of spirits; highly delighted, she said, to have had the experience, though I think she is not at all displeased to have it ended." There is no question about it, the Infanta Eulalia must be a trump.

At Granada the incognito was laid aside, and Mrs. Batcheller entered on another equally interesting, if somewhat less exciting, experience—that of traveling with an acknowledged royal companion. The book is composed of extracts from letters, although the narrative is so continuous and so full that one suspects these epistles of having profited by subsequent rewriting. But at any rate the form makes possible a daily account which puts one abreast of events as they occur. For instance:

"I have just received for her Royal Highness twelve priests headed by a Bishop, and have duly ushered them, I hope with proper ceremonies, into the Infanta's presence. She says I must act as a sort of make-believe or substitute lady in waiting. This, of course, would not be possible were she officially to drop her incognito, but she will not review the troops and will outwardly maintain her incognito as the Countess of Alvia, one of her many titles.

"The sentry box, omnipresent wherever royalty sleeps, is already before the door of the hotel and great is the commotion downstairs. I think her journey without the responsibilities of royal state has been immensely good for her, as she is looking as fresh as a rose." Later she adds: "I have just had my first experience making excuses for the Infanta. She is very tired; so down I had to go and explain to two very eager persons that her Royal Highness had given all the audiences possible to-day and that she could not see the gentlemen, who were to give their message to me. They did not like it at all, but one of them left a package and a letter with me.

Told Her His Troubles.

"What do you think it was? A little, rather pretty, ten-cent trinket which this gentleman proposed to present to the Infanta, and a four-page closely written letter with a detailed account of his family's woes, with the hope that her Royal Highness would generously endow him. Ours is not the only country, it would seem, where begging letters are the order of the day."

Then follows a detailed and interesting account of Granada and of their experiences there under the guidance of the Governor General. With him they went to the theatre, where "no sooner did the orchestra discover the fair hair and blue eyes of the Infanta than they struck up the national hymn and the whole audience rose and cheered like mad for at least ten minutes.

"It was really very touching because it was so evidently sincere, and the Infanta received it with that graceful dignity which is so a part of herself, and which proves her to be a worthy daughter of a great and royal house. As she is sweet and natural and simple in her tastes and in her intimate companionship with me, so to-night she was really splendid in her royal dignity, and yet her smile was as gracious as ever, but with it was something that I have not had occasion to see before. She was indeed, to-night, a Bourbon Princess receiving the homage and welcome of a people over which her nephew rules and for whom she feels a sincere and profound interest and affection."

From now on the Americans were treated to a succession of experiences of the magical effect of the word "royal." Great doors opened that had not creaked on their hinges for years; the casket, said to have held the jewels Queen Isabella sold to send Columbus on his voyage of discovery, was opened for them; so was the coffin in which all that remains of King Ferdinand lies in his gorgeous robes. And wine—but that is a story in itself. It was in Jerez, the name from which our "sherry" is corrupted, and the centre of its production.

"Millions of gallons are stored away in the 'bodegas' of its wealthy wine merchants, and to-day the rarest bottles and the rarest casks were opened in honor of her Royal Highness. For many years it has been the custom of the Gonzalez house to put aside the finest wines of the year when a royal Prince or Princess is born in Spain. These casks are never opened except for the Prince or Princess whose name they bear, and to-day as the 'vin de resistance,' we were given golden liquid from the cask of her Royal Highness, Doña Infanta Eulalia, and of the wine called Solera del Rey, or other rare vintages like Leoville Barton, 1875, and some wonderful Gonzalez old Portugal.

"After luncheon we went once more in the carriages to visit these celebrated 'bodegas,' and to see for ourselves the process of the manufacture of the wonderful brands of sherry and cognac. It was exeremely interesting to see, but rather terrifying to continually taste. Curious little silver cups fitted with very long handles were dipped into these great casks, and handed to us to sample, but I thought it rather wise to let my sample not exceed two drops, for if I had really done justice to these extraordinary wines on each occasion I might well have feared for my condition at the end of the day. It was especially trying for her Royal Highness, who never takes any kind of wine or liquor whatsoever."

At Seville, where the party spent the festival, the days were crowded with interesting experiences. The description of the Prado de San Sebastian on a day of that tumultuous week is worth recording here. The Prado is the centre of the city life.

"I doubt," writes the American woman, "if a more picturesque avenue is to be found anywhere. True, we arrived, as we always seem to, by the clever planning of her Royal Highness, at exactly the right minute. The bullfight, (and there is one every day during the Feria,) was just over, and the whole "prado" which extends considerably over a mile, was lined with gayly liveried carriages, in which rode the beauty and wealth of Seville; for it is the fashion during the Feria, after the bullfight, for the ladies, who all wear the picturesque and charming lace mantilla, either in white or black, to throw their wonderfully embroidered Manila silk shawls over the back of their victorias, and ride up and down this parkway, greeting their friends with graceful waves of their omnipresent fans.

"The noted bull-fighters come in their own special grandeur, generally in little, what we would call, russet beach wagons, hung rather low, with the seats facing, the canopy of which is decorated with a bright chenille fringe; and true to their profession, these carriages are drawn by a four-in-hand of finely groomed mules, with harnesses, usually of russet leather, decorated with elaborate chenille balls and fringes, sometimes in two shades of green, sometimes in the Spanish red and yellow, and sometimes all in scarlet. The 'torero' himself has the seat of honor, that to the right, looking forward, and is usually dressed in black velvet knee breeches, a black velvet embroidered bolero, with a much bepleated white shirt, and a carefully ironed silk beaver hat of especial shape, worn only by those of the profession.

Beauty and Gayety.

"Everybody is in good humor, everybody is gay, the whole world seems to smile, and certainly the whole air is perfumed with the fragrant odors of the orange blossom, jasmine, countless roses, and the spicy flavor of the 'clavilles.' Along one side of this prado have been erected at intervals long platforms over which have been placed airy open tents, and running at right angles with the prado is a long avenue of little 'casetas,' which are a sort of temporary little houses, built and owned by Sevillians of the upper class. The doors are all open, the little verandas decked with flowers, and it seems that it is the custom for the Sevillian ladies to go to the 'caseta' every afternoon, there to receive their friends.

"At the very end of this avenue are erected the tents of the farmers, who bring some 80,000 head of cattle here from surrounding parts of Spain, and there are also many gypsies, who encamp here during the whole fair. Outside the gypsy tents we could see numerous traveling cook stoves, and one pretty girl was most importunate that if we would not have our fortunes told, at least we should buy some of the sugar-dusted Spanish cakes, 'buñuelos,' which rather resemble the German 'croetler' and our American doughnut. At the various large inclosures there was dancing to the constant sound of the guitar, mandolin, and many other instruments of music, and, in a word, the whole scene was a most animated, gay, and brilliant picture of color and merry making, which seemed to be enjoyed by rich and poor, high and low, with equal zest."

"WORLD'S CHURCHES MUST BECOME PRACTICAL"—BOOTH

Head of Salvation Army Declares That Christianity Has Lost Ground and That Church Organizations Must Adopt the Army Idea of Being a Force in Everyday Life.

IF Christianity throughout the world, Protestant and Roman Catholic alike, is to progress and not to retrograde, it must adopt methods largely akin to those in use by the Salvation Army. It must become more of an economic and sociological force. It must give mankind "practical" Christianity.

This is the opinion of Gen. Bramwell Booth, head of the Salvation Army, as expressed in an interview at Army headquarters in New York in an interview with a TIMES reporter last week, just before the General sailed for his home in England.

Gen. Booth, who has studied religious conditions in all parts of the world, the Army now being established in fifty-eight nations and colonies, was asked his views on the declaration often made that the Christian Church is not retaining its hold on civilization's men and women as it should.

"Nothing which I am to say," replied the General, whose eyes shine with an uncommon light when he becomes interested in a topic, "should be construed as a criticism of or reflection upon the splendid churches of Christ, which have done such a wondrous work for humanity. Yet an admission of facts and a suggestion of action will not, I am sure, be construed as criticism.

"It must be admitted, then, that the churches, and I speak both of Protestant and Roman Catholic, have lost ground. They certainly have not swept forward as they should in the conquest of the souls of men. The churches have not got control of the young people of the world as they should.

"There is a spirit of change abroad over all the nations. In this great land of the United States the element of change is particularly marked, because of the huge, incessant influx of foreign peoples who pour into your broad States. And it is a cause of intense thankfulness to find, as I have found from my American tour, that the churches of America are at least holding their ground quite as well as are the churches of other countries.

Relative Church Strength.

"The Church in some of the British colonies is probably stronger than in any other part of the earth, but, with the exception of these colonies, the Church in America is as strong a force in the national life as in any other country of the globe. And this may be regarded as somewhat remarkable, because of the very element of constant change to which I refer in regard to the influx of the foreign tide year by year."

"You do not believe, then, as do some of the extremists, that Christianity is doomed sooner or later to pass away as a vital force in the life of mankind?" asked the interviewer.

"No, Christianity is assuredly not doomed, despite the losing of ground which must be admitted. The very need for the Christian religion in the souls and in the daily lives of men means its continued existence. But the problem the Church throughout the earth now has to face is the recovery of lost ground and the placing of itself in a position where it will not hereafter lose any more ground, but will constantly gain. Great hope that the churches will soon begin to move forward for the recovery of their ground is found in the fact that wise, far-seeing, good men the world over are acknowledging frankly that the Christian Church is losing. This acknowledgment means the application of a remedy."

"What is the remedy?" asked THE TIMES man.

"I hope I won't be misunderstood when I say that the churches will have to go along Salvation Army lines to some extent. I say this because we have experience in many nations behind us. We have the results to which to point. And what are those results? That the Salvation Army has gone forward, has increased, has become a greater and greater force, has won more and more ground, while the churches have been losing ground.

Why Army Has Succeeded.

"Of course, I don't mean that the churches should adopt Salvation Army methods and ideas throughout. What I do mean is that the churches must come sooner or later to the establishment of themselves as a social uplifting power, an economic power, a power which will be practically felt in the everyday machinery of society.

"It is because the Salvation Army has been a lever, and is a lever, in social uplift that it has been and is a success. I think that the Army will have a part in the rehabilitation of the churches, which must come to the use of a more practical Christianity. They must particularly look out for and save their young. In this regard I believe that the Students' Mission Union is going to aid materially. This union is a combination of students of every denomination, with both national and international organizations, and I expect that it is to have a very beneficial influence in helping the Church to win back lost territory."

"Should the churches enter politics in this rehabilitation movement?" questioned the interviewer.

"No, they should do as we do—keep away from politics."

"Will you describe generally the Salvation Army lines along which you think the churches might work?"

"Well," said Gen. Booth, "I have not, of course, drawn up any plan, but there are some general Salvation Army ideas which I might suggest to you in answer to your question. Let me, in the first place, refer to my charge of this year to the Army."

The General then quoted to the interviewer the following "charge:"

Remember that you are at war with evil and misery. You know what that means. War is the most intensely concentrated expression of human energy. Your war is all that, with an abundant addition of energy divine. I beseech you, attack—In Christ's name, attack! Awaken men in their sins, their selfishness, their littleness. Do not trouble about their opinions of you. The wise surgeon has little regard for his patient's feelings toward him.

Do not trouble about propriety. Good taste and good form get little attention from soldiers in hand-to-hand conflicts. In the name of God, I say again, attack the evils around you, the rage for sensual gratification, the love of money, the extravagance and selfishness of the people, the unbelief and neglect of righteous dealing. God is the remedy. He will help you.

"As expressing the spirit of the work of the Army, which has meant gains instead of losses," continued the General, "and as indicating some of the kinds of ideas which I believe the churches all over the world will have to adopt in their battle for the lost ground, I would like to cite some passages from my book 'Social Reparation.'"

General Booth offered the following quotations, among others, to indicate the nature of the spirit which he thinks must be embraced by the Church:

Now, here is one of the foundation principles of our social work. From the beginning we have said openly that our love and labor are for all. It is not necessary to have a good character to secure our compassion and help. We do not make it a condition of being blest and comforted that a man should go to church or join the Salvation Army. We make, as far as we can, our sun like our Father's, to shine on the "undeserving," the "worthless" poor as well as on the others, and our rain to descend on the bad and idle and rebellious and thankless, as well as on the good and thankful and Christian.

Why? Because it is not those who are well, but those who are sick, that need the physician. Because, if we can only make them see that we care, and that Christ cares, about their poor, broken lives and bodies and wretched homes and darkened future, some, at least, will wake up to care for themselves. Because Christ has redeemed them, body as well as soul, and, as in His own day on the earth, some will only be made free in body by being set free in soul, just so some will only be set free in soul by being set free in body.

And when I see the poor, shivering creatures gathered in the warmth and comfort of our shelters, and the famished ones in the food depot, and the lost and lonely in the bright hopefulness of the rescue homes, and the prisoners set in happy families in our harbors of refuge, my heart sings for joy, and I say, is not this Christ come again?

If He came now to London and Paris and New York and Melbourne, as He came to Jerusalem and Caesarea, would He not want to do exactly this? I believe he would.

Some of our good friends think it is a mistake to pick up the wretched outcasts who have got among modern thieves, unless, first, we get them to a church, or a sacrament, or the penitent form. Even then some would wait till they had been tested a little, lest they should seem to run after the loaves and fishes! * * *

But the Army is striving to find and feed and shelter the least, the weakest, and the wickedest of those lost and ruined images of God. Nothing shall turn us aside from seeking them. It is our proper work, because it was and is our Master's. And just as He died for all, so in its works of mercy and charity the Army does all it can for all who suffer, without stopping to inquire whether they are good or bad, and without insisting that they should make a profession of religion, or promise to join our ranks. Our business is to do good to all men.

The results of this policy are to be seen around us. The debauched and degraded man becomes a godly citizen; the idle loafer ceases his loafing and, whereas he hated, above all things, hard work, now he loves it; the thief steals no more, and his heart runs over with gratitude to find that he is trusted once again by honest men; the daughter of shame is clothed again in the sweet garments of love and service.

The interviewer then asked Gen. Booth his views on woman suffrage.

"We have had a wonderful experience with women in the Army," was the reply, "and largely because of that experience I think women are able to take their place in the government of civilized countries and should so take their place. I deeply deplore the militant methods of some of the English suffragettes, but their actions do not affect the broader question.

"We have found, as the result of the most practical kind of tests in the Army, that women are excellent administrators, have good judgment, and are admirable as commanders even of men. Women have done much in the great work of the Army, and they have done it well. We have found women splendid—splendid in their ability, energy, devotion, insight and fervor.

"Of course, I am arguing from a small stone in the arch of humankind—I am arguing from the experience of the Army. But from that experience I say by all means give women the ballot."

The territorial Commissioner of the United States, in command of all the Army's activities in this country, is a woman, Commander Eva Booth; a woman is in command of the Army in the Hawaiian Islands; a woman was the pioneer commander in Scandinavia; a woman is in charge of the women's rescue work in all States east of Chicago, and women are in command of numerous posts throughout the United States and the whole world.

Gen. Booth then turned to the question of eugenics. Based on his personal experience among the delinquents and defectives of the London slums, his views are not entirely in accord with those of some of the theorists on this subject.

Lessons of the Slums.

"While there is no doubt," said Gen. Booth, "that there is much truth in some of the modern theories of eugenics, I personally do not believe that heredity plays so overwhelming a part as to prevent children from coming out right if they are given a fair chance. The problem is one of economics rather than of eugenics.

"London has the greatest slum population in the world. We do much work in those slums. We don't find that as a rule the children of the slums are the offspring of parents who in their turn were themselves children of the slums. We find that the slums are inhabited largely by those who have come down to the slums from higher grades of society. They have come down through shiftlessness, inefficiency, and vice. If their children were given a fair chance in the world the vast majority of these children would turn out right.

"Of the thousands of male down-and-outers to whom we minister in the course of a year, we find that 80 per cent. are the sons of good parents, not the sons of the vicious. Give the children of society a decent chance, and the question of eugenics will largely take care of itself.

The Toll of Childhood.

"As far as the children are concerned, there is one thing that certainly should be stopped, and that is child labor. It is particularly important for the United States to put an end to labor by children, because of the constant influx of foreign people to your shores. These children of foreigners should be given an opportunity to become thoroughly Americanized, to get an education, to get started as a generation of healthy, efficient people, and they should not be permitted when mere children to enter the factories and the workshops. It is very important for the United States as a nation that the children should be given every chance. You are wealthy enough to stop child labor, and you should stop it."

Gen. Booth then touched on socialism for a moment.

"Socialism would be splendid if we were all angels," he said. "I believe, nevertheless, that socialism is going to play an important part in modifying conditions. It will hardly prove a savior for mankind, but it will prove of benefit. Where socialism is not anti-God it will be found to permeate society much more readily than where it is. Socialism in England and Scandinavia is more moderate than in some other parts of Europe, and therefore has a deeper effect on the roots of society, whatever may be the apparent effects on top."

Gen. Booth is making arrangements for an extensive Salvationist crusade in the Orient. He plans to send 1,000 officers there, of whom he wishes to have at least 50 Americans.

"I think that the Christian nations," he said, "should go very much further than they have done in the East. The Salvation Army should play a far greater part there than in the past. There must be a great outpouring of treasure and blood by the Occident into the abyss of human anguish of the Orient. The degradation of women, the crushing conditions for children—these must be remedied. There is work for Europe and America to do in Central Africa, India, Japan and China."

The following statistics show the present status of Gen. Booth's organization:

SCOPE OF THE SALVATION ARMY.

Countries and colonies occupied	58
Languages in which services are held	34
Corps and outposts	9,130
Social institutions	1,048
Day schools	559
Naval and military homes	10
Officers and cadets	15,875
Local officers	63,742
Persons without rank wholly employed in S. A. work	4,965
Bandsmen	25,537
Periodicals published	82
Total copies per issue	1,017,404

Gen. Booth expressed himself as tremendously impressed with the evidences of prosperity he saw during his four weeks' stay in the United States and Canada. It was his first visit here.

FINE POINTS FOR THE WOULD-BE EXPERT IN AUCTION BRIDGE

It Is a Mistake to Imagine That Nullos Are Too Hard for the Average Player—Two Interesting Hands Discussed.

By Florence Irwin.

I DO not believe that any player, any several players, or any group of players could hold up nullos now. The public has shown a clear eye and a level head in its quick appreciation of the new suit. The army of nullo players numbers thousands, is growing daily, and is spread all over the country.

Here is a sample of what occurs to me every day: I am joined on the morning train by a man who is well known in the business world, and as a player of skat, Boston, pinochle, &c. He tells me that nullo-auction is "the best thing out," and that it has put an entirely new life into the game. In town I meet half a dozen acquaintances who repeat this testimony. On the train home, a member of several well-known clubs tells me that he has had his first try at nullos, and is going to adopt them at once. At home, I find a pile of letters that begin about like this: "Like all the rest of the world, I am nullo crazy." And, during the evening, a man calls up on the telephone to say he has "been out on so-and-so's yacht, and the fellows never went to bed at all—thanks to nullos!"

It has been said that if a horse realized its own power no man could master it. So the public, if it realizes its own power to establish, or kill, a new development, need never accept dictation from any one. If players want a thing, they can have it; if they don't, they needn't. Instead of asking "Is this going to be played?" their query should be, "do we want to play this?" And, if they do, who can hinder?

I am never impressed with the importance of the decision of any one, or any several, individuals. I am always tremendously impressed with the latent force that lies in the thousands of individuals who constitute the great public.

Let me share with you a nullo letter which reached me this week from an unknown correspondent:

I must express my admiration of the stand you have taken regarding nullos. For many years I have been a follower of whist, duplicate whist, bridge, and now the final perfected auction with nullos. I had practically dropped the game of auction, as it had ceased to interest me, owing to a something lacking in its bidding. The utter hopelessness of one's position when in the face of a strong no-trumper always seemed eminently unfair. You could do nothing but throw up your hand to the "hold-up." But now how different! It is a battle royal—no longer between one strong and one weak force, but between two equally strong forces fighting simply with different equipment.

I find in playing that nullo hands do not frequently culminate, but that there is scarcely a hand where nullos do not enter the bidding. That is what makes it so interesting; you are always in the picture one way or another. And what a wonderful "little irritant" that nullo bid is! How it makes the bigger fellows sit up and take notice! No more cheap contracts. Nullos make the bidder bid the full value of his hand, and then work hard to make good.

Long live nullos! They are the final touch that perfects one of the best card games in the world.

This is signed, "One who had practically abandoned the game, but who returns to it because of nullos."

I was asked this week if I did not think high cards ought to win. They ought not to win too easily; it is no sort of a game where all contracts go at one or two odd because the good cards lie together and there is no way to bid against them. Skill and judgment enter when there is a contest, when each player is "put to it" to decide just how far he dares go on his line, and which way his losses will be less—by playing or yielding. There is no skill in getting the bid at two-odd on a hand that is worth six-odd on its face.

The big cards will win if they are big enough and if they are handled skillfully enough; they will win because nullos are lower than any of the three big suits, and that is precisely why I put them there.

But the more you count on skill and the less you count on luck, the higher you make the grade of your game! Failing nullos, the veriest beginner can take the stakes from the best player on earth—provided he holds all the aces and kings. But that isn't playing!

I heard a funny thing the other day. It was the theory that the successful landing of a high nullo bid was always due to the adversaries' stupidity. I need hardly tell you that this is no more true of nullos than of any other suit.

To the question whether nullos are too hard for the average player, I answer emphatically: No! I have seen dozens of average players pick them up with extreme cleverness. It is only their novelty that lends them fictitious terror. I remember we went over all that ground when auction superseded b r i d g e—"the average player could never grasp auction." Well, he did, didn't he?

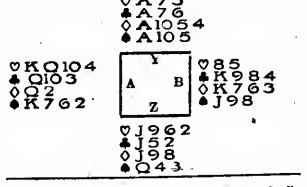
I know a big strong man, and a corking good player, who was taking his auction with laughable laboriousness this time three years ago. It was literally by the sweat of his brow; he confided to me, in all seriousness, that he "wouldn't care to play it oftener than two or three times a week." He takes it now as lightly as he once took bridge. Nullos will work just so, as soon as we are used to them.

A great lawyer once said that "everything in life was reducible to arithmetic;" I add: "and common sense." Nullos stand triumphantly this double test—test of arithmetic and common sense. I therefore predict their universal reign.

Leaving them for a moment, (a difficult feat, because of the stir they have made,) I want to touch a point on which I have been hammering for two years. That is, that dummy should be privileged to call attention to a revoke. The reason is this: No one may claim a revoke till the close of the hand. Now, the moment the hand is over, as soon as the fifty-second card is played, dummy ceases to be dummy and resumes all his former privileges. He, therefore, as well as any other, should be able to claim a revoke.

They have said to me: "It would be a very stupid dummy who sat there doing nothing and failed to see a revoke!" And I have answered, "why should the declarant be put at the double disadvantage of playing two hands and watching two adversaries, when both those adversaries have but to watch him?"

The test hand of Nov. 16 was this, (score 8 all, rubber game:)



Actual bidding ran: Z, "a spade"; A, "by"; Y, "a no-trump"; set, but gets 100 aces.

"Prospero," who sent the hand, adds: "If Z bid 'a nullo,' Y must overcall with 'a no-trump,' or have 100 aces against him. If A say 'hearts'—set. If A say 'a no-trump,' he finds 100 aces against him."

It is certainly a freak hand. It was sent me by a correspondent who has furnished some of the most interesting hands I have ever published; and all who have sent solutions agree that it is properly named "the hoodoo."

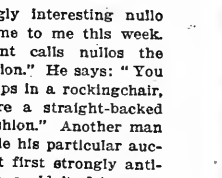
It is a wonderful exposition of the subtlety of making the aces count inversely as nullo honors. Failing that fact, Y would not face such difficulties; he could bid "a nullo," although he does not hold a good one, but his hundred aces would not deter him. Under the inverse ace rule, he simply cannot afford to bestow those aces on the adversary; yet he holds a wretched no-trumper.

The idea of making the deuces the nullo honors is absurd. By adopting that scheme you would have negative tricks and positive honors, minus tricks and actual honors—a nice kind of a hodge-podge! For Heaven's sake, let us be logical and consistent! If tricks count when you don't take them, honors must certainly count when you don't hold them. Don't try to combine positive honors with negative tricks.

This hand is well bid by "A. L. P. D.," who opens with "a spade," and has Y overcall with "a no-trump," (just what I should advise;) by "C. D.," who opens with what he admits is a very weak nullo, and has Y overcall with his no-trump; and by "X. X.," "Y. R. L.," "N. F.," and "O. K."

Some exceedingly interesting nullo tributes have come to me this week. One correspondent calls nullos the "cayenne of auction." He says: "You can play no-trumps in a rockingchair, but nullos require a straight-backed stool with no cushion." Another man tells me that while his particular auction circle was at first strongly anti-nullo, "you now couldn't drive any of them from nullos with a club."

Here is a tremendously interesting hand from Northampton; it is the first deal on a new rubber:



There is one of the prettiest situations I have asked you to handle in a long time.

It should be noted that the proper nullo value is eight a trick; that is, where nullos place themselves.

Ten is too high; it hurts hearts and royals, and causes a preponderance of no-trumpers—positive, or negative.

Eleven is obviously absurd. Low cards should be biddable, but they certainly should not be more valuable than high ones! Don't put the bottom on top; don't use the floor for a ceiling. Eleven also kills the time-honored no-trump precedence.

Eight is ideal; it allows beautiful forcing, permits a frequent "game in the hand," and possesses not one flaw.

A suit without honors would be a ridiculous anomaly. A combination of negative tricks and positive honors would be an illogical hodge-podge. The nullo-honors are the aces and count inversely.

These rules are the result of the longest nullo-auction practice on record.

MUSINGS OF THE GENTLE CYNIC

It takes considerable diplomacy to distinguish between polite applause and an encore.

Many a man is a good husband simply because he hasn't the nerve to be anything else.

Some men are so constituted that they have to be provided with either a pacemaker or a peacemaker.

No man should put up a bluff unless he feels he has the strength to surmount it, if necessary.

There wouldn't be so many sinners if people would struggle to get into Heaven as they do to get into society.

We are all ruled by precedent, in spite of which all the horrible examples in the world won't prevent people from getting married.

Nature is sometimes unkind. Many a paté de foie gras appetite and milk toast stomach are combined in the same man.

Many a woman has lost a good friend by marrying him.

Many a man's religion is based on the fact that a silver dollar will make more noise when dropped in the collection plate than a $5 bill.

Many a man would rather climb upward than be on the level.

Too many people view life through the wrong end of the telescope.

Clothes may not make the man, but they help a lot in classifying him.

We are apt to lose sight of the fact that the man who sues for a girl's hand may live to sue for his freedom.

When we say of a man that he won't listen to reason we merely mean that he won't listen to us.

Some people are naturally so pugnacious that they would mistake the dove of peace for a clay pigeon.

No matter how ambitious a woman is, she can never run things until she has had a husband to practice on.

There is no hatred like that which one man feels for another who has grasped an opportunity he didn't see.

An optimist is a person who polishes up the dark side of life.

The social climber is naturally looking for a family tree.

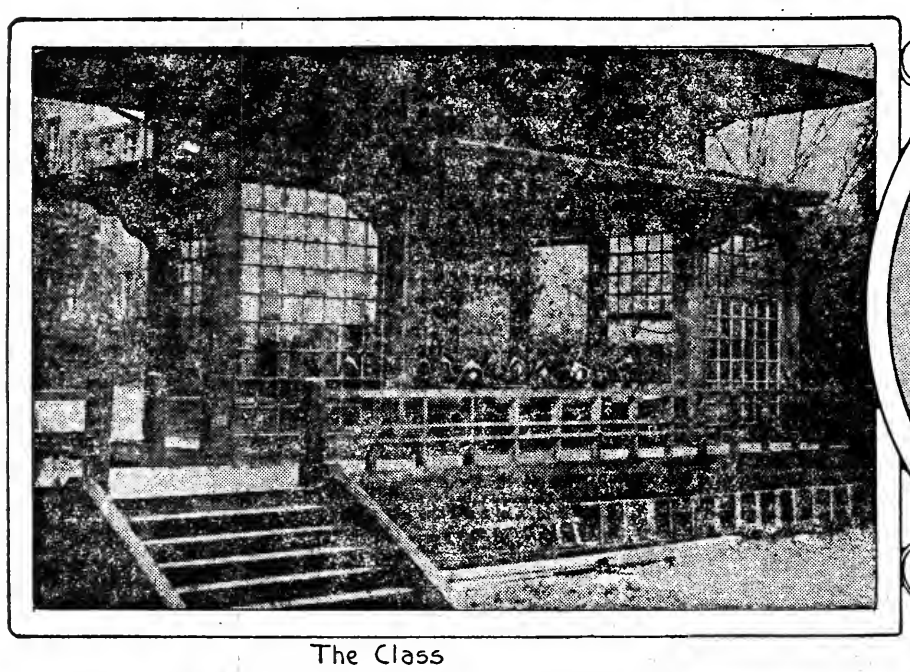
OPEN-AIR MODEL SCHOOL TO TRAIN GIRLS FOR COLLEGE



The Class

The Class Room, Phebe Anna Thorne Model School

At Bryn Mawr They Have Undertaken an Educational Experiment Designed to Produce the Highest Degree of Efficiency Among Girl Students.

By Davis Edwards.

DOWN in Pennsylvania, not far from Philadelphia, in the grounds of Bryn Mawr College for Women, stands a small building whose sides are made up principally of windows. In fine weather it is a mere pavilion. In foul weather only those windows through which the storm would beat are closed.

Fifteen ten-year-old girls, who, a few weeks ago, were started upon one of the most interesting educational experiments which the world has ever known, sit within this airy structure during certain hours of every school day. On cold days they are wrapped like little Eskimos.

They are rosy-cheeked, bright-eyed, fascinating in their fine American girl childhood. Education in the open air has not been adopted in their cases as a means of healing them of ailments, but, rather, as a means of placing them beyond the reach of ailments.

At ten they have entered on a course of educational training which is planned to carry them in seven consecutive years straight to the college door and through it; and to deliver them in the halls of higher learning, mentally and physically, equipped as no group of girls ever has been, or will be, until their course in the Phebe Anna Thorne Model School is completed.

These little girls, whom some think are the most fortunate little girls in all the world, were not selected for the privilege of being the first pupils of this most remarkable of schools because they were physically unusually strong or unusually weak, because tests showed them to be mentally unusually well or unusually ill equipped.

They were chosen after careful examination of many little girls whose parents very much wished them to be members of this class, because they are as nearly absolutely normal little American girls as it is possible to find.

Civilization Watches.

That gives a perfectly fair start to this experiment, which may revolutionize the world's educational system.

In all parts of the world educators are watching and will for seven years watch this experiment with the very keenest interest. Everywhere the press has joyously announced that the promoters of the school plan to produce in it the "superwoman."

Really they do not plan that. They plan to produce normal graduates of a consecutive, well-ordered and comprehensive whole-school-life training, who will have taken full advantage of it through the orderly development without waste of their normal American girl abilities.

If the plan succeeds it may very materially influence, indeed it may almost revolutionize, the future education of both sexes.

Briefly stated, the system which has been inaugurated in this new school aims directly at educational efficiency through careful correlation of allied studies from the very start—always without waste. The fortunate little girls who are the first pupils of the school will have, according to the ideas of the school's originators, the very first really wasteless education which has ever been offered to any one in the United States or elsewhere.

That the institution is known as the "Phebe Anna Thorne Open-Air Model School" indicates that it is to include physical as well as mental training, and that this physical training will include study and recitations out of doors, or practically in the open air—a privilege which, but during only a few years, has been accorded to youngsters suffering from diseases of the lungs, more especially tuberculosis.

In a nutshell the argument of the school's founders in this matter was: "If an open-air school is a good thing for ailing children, then school in the open air would be a good thing for well children."

I went recently to Bryn Mawr to get information at first hand about this novel educational idea, and there spent an evening with the Recording Dean and Assistant to the President of the college, Miss Isabel Maddison.

An interesting fact is that the new school had its inception rather in the effort to find a means of training teachers than in the effort to find a means of training children. In other words, the establishment of a model school at Bryn Mawr was primarily for the object of affording teachers an ideal training experience.

But inasmuch as a prerequisite of a model school is, of course, model pupils, the school was opened with one class, made up of fifteen lucky, normal little girls.

The fact that all the pupils are girls is due to Bryn Mawr's organization as a woman's college. The fact that they are all little girls is due to the fact that the school is based upon an entirely new idea and that pupils for the upper classes which will be established later can only be fitted for the work which they will get in them by continuous passage through lower classes operated in exact accordance with the new principles.

Had an attempt been made to start with pupils in all the seven years of instruction considered necessary to preparation for Bryn Mawr, the girls in the upper classes would have been unevenly and probably unsatisfactorily prepared.

Next year a new class of fifteen to twenty children, all ten years of age, will be admitted, while this year's entrants will be advanced to the second year's work under the new educational system, and so on every year for the seven years, so that till the time of their admission into college this year's lucky group of fifteen girls will remain pioneer adventurers along new educational paths. In seven years the school will be running with the full seven classes.

There was no lack of applicants for admission to this first class. The announcement of the plan was given wide publicity in the educational and newspaper press, and parents in all parts of the country expressed an eager desire to put their little daughters into the first experimental class.

Indeed, so great was the number of applications that the director found it necessary to postpone the opening of the school for a week, so that she might have time to see and choose among the would-be pupils.

Another and even more striking evidence of the force with which the new idea has impressed parents lies in the fact that three families have moved to Bryn Mawr from distant cities so that their little daughtere may share in the advantages of the new school.

The heads of the new school feel sure that it will be so full of attractions that no ordinary child will consent to leave it until her course has been completed; they feel sure that it will be so hygienic that neither illness nor death from any ordinary cause will close the educational career of any of the girls who progress through it toward that educational and physical development which, immediately after the plans for the school were first announced, the newspapers of the country, almost with one voice, prophesied would be "Byrn Mawr's superwomanhood."

"Superwoman" Possible.

"If," said an official of the school, "a school course of seven years and a college course of four years, each as good as it is possible, with human imperfections, to make them, will transform into 'superwomen' the best and most carefully selected feminine human material in the United States, then the newspapers may be right."

Whether or not the graduates of the school and college will be such as to justify the designation, "superwomen," the school course, as planned, will turn out girls of 17 who will be able to read easy Latin and ordinary French and German at sight, who will have a good knowledge of mathematics, history and some science, who will be able to write and speak clear and correct English, and who will, moreover, have many accomplishments not ordinarily included in an educational curriculum.

It is planned to develop girls who will be able to draw, to model, to appreciate pictures and sculpture, to sing at sight, to interpret music by rhythmic movements and to analyze and remember it, as well as to express their own musical impressions by plastic dancing or by simple musical compositions.

It has been the claim of and the complaint of many teachers that in the time available it is impossible to prepare their pupils even in those studies only which are demanded by the college entrance examinations.

It is the belief of the founders and workers in the Phebe Anna Thorne Model School that improved methods of teaching will not only make preparation for college in the allotted time an easy matter, but that they will save time enough from the school studies so that students will find it comparatively easy to become proficient in various additional accomplishments, and will have an opportunity to devote more hours to pleasure and to leisure than the students of the past ever have had.

The plan provides for what may be denominated interlocking training, although the prospectus does not call it that. For example, English, history and geography will be taught together as closely related parts of the same subject. Begining with the study of life in the English Middle Ages, as pictured in the mediaeval epics, students will be taught to read correctly and enunciate distinctly, as a part of this study, or, at least, as a study closely correlated to it, and not as an entirely separate line of effort.

In some of the more advanced German schools mathematics and drawing are taught in a manner which makes each subject supplement and explain the other, and this method will be used in the model school. The principles of design will include the properties of the geometrical circle and angle, fractions and percentage.

The work in science will begin with the study of air, earth and water, with illustration of various points by means of the many scientific toys that have been designed abroad to make clear to children the fundamental conception of physics.

French will be taught by a combination of the Montessori and phonetic methods, with reading, writing and speaking at the same time. In the second year Latin will be begun by similar methods and Greek or German will be begun in the fourth year.

The first teacher to come to the United States from the Jacques Delcroze School of Rhythmic Gymnastics, at Hellerau, near Dresden, will teach gymnastics, singing and dancing to these lucky little girls.

According to this system children are first taught time by movements of the arms, and time-values, or note-duration, by movements of the feet and body.

After a few years of training, students thus instructed are said to be able to express rhythmically, by dancing and gesture, music played on the piano, and to sing from notes with astonishing accuracy of pitch. A few subsequent years of training are said to enable them to themselves improvise and compose the music of songs and dances.

It is reported from the German school that children trained by this method for seven years have been musically developed to an extraordinary degree.

Athletic training will include daily instruction in out-of-door games, such as folk-dancing, tennis, basketball, hockey, cricket and baseball. Instruction in swimming and skating will be regular details of the school course.

The very attractive open-air schoolroom, built somewhat after the fashion of a Japanese pagoda, which houses the first and present class, will be supplemented each year until the seven-year course is finished by the construction of another similar schoolroom, so that each class, as it enters, will have its separate quarters.

The "Eskimo suits" worn by the pupils in Winter are provided by the school, and caps and gloves are furnished to keep the students warm in the coldest weather. I forgot to ask the nature of the Summer costume, but it will undoubtedly be especially adapted to the unique needs of this school.

As out-of-door life will make for hunger, the children, after breakfasting, presumably at home, will be served with light luncheons at 10:30 and 2:30, and with a substantial, hot luncheon, consisting of meat, vegetables and dessert, at 12:30. In the middle of the morning session they will all lie down on cots in the open air to sleep for half an hour.

An important detail of the school plan is that all preparation of lessons is to be done in school, so that there will be no home work for the children.

An equally interesting detail of the gymnastic work will be the fact that the children will dance and exercise with bare feet upon an especially laid floor. They will wear Delcroze gymnasium suits.

Perhaps as surprising as any other detail of this surprising school is the small price at which all this unique instruction is offered—to the accepted few. The fees include payment for everything, even luncheons and gymnasium suits, and begin at $100 a year, rising at the rate of $10 annually, so that the fee for the final year will be $170.

Moreover, the best graduate of the school will, through the fact of her high standing, automatically win a scholarship of $2,100—enough to practically pay her way through college.

A principle kept constantly in mind in the planning of this unique school's course of instruction is that there must be no educational shocks, no surprises, no mental jumps. Each day of every week will lead logically into the next day's work, and each year will prepare for smooth transition into the following year's course.

Equipped for Living.

It is believed that these girls, without being bookworms or grinds, will be unusually well prepared for college life, and that coincidentally they will be so educated in the art of right enjoyment, without waste of time on either work or play—that is, without unsuccessful effort in either direction—that they will achieve an unusual capacity and resource for enjoying life.

It is believed that they will be given rather unusual opportunities to achieve all the impulses toward cultured development, imparted in such a way that it will be of far more than ornamental value, so that those girls who decide to go in for professional life will find themselves well prepared for it, and so that none of the girls will be overtrained in any way, despite the really exceptional measure of their attainments.

Although all the pupils were selected especially because they met all the tests of normal children, being neither dunces nor geniuses, good teaching here, as elsewhere, will make allowances for temperament. Careful training in psychology afforded teachers who work in this school will help them toward effectiveness in dealing with different temperaments.

The authorities of Byrn Mawr, while thoroughly appreciating the importance of the school to the fifteen fortunate little pupils and the other pupils who are to join them and succeed them, believe it likely to be even more important to the teachers who are trained in it.

One of the faculty said to me: "I think the training of teachers has been given too little thought not only in America but generally. By this I do not mean to deny the existence here and elsewhere of good training schools for teachers—of meritorious teachers' colleges, normal schools, &c.; but it has not been absolutely easy for ambitious women to get good training as teachers.

"Bryn Mawr is not, as many people seem to think, an exclusive, dilettante institution. About one-third of our graduates take up teaching as a profession. This school will give some of them the opportunity of remaining an additional year at Bryn Mawr, taking the master's degree in education. Very thorough courses in psychology are being offered in connection with the new school, which will also enable us to offer our graduates excellent training in teaching.

"A student who has specialized, say, in science or mathematics, will be able to come back for a year, after taking her bachelor's degree, and spend part of that year in doing advanced work in mathematics, science, languages or whatever she may elect, while spending the balance of her year in learning how to teach her specialty.

"The plan of the new school is by no means revolutionary. It is rather the result of a very careful effort to make the best possible use of known methods, with the hope that possibly we may later on devise some new and more effective ones.

Aid from Open Air.

"Careful physical training beginning at the early age of 10 will produce girls capable of standing with little wear and tear the strain of acquiring higher education when their time comes for it; girls trained in the open air will be more teachable and more retentive and investigative than girls who spend their schoolroom lives in impure, indoors air and surroundings which are generally unhygienic."

I inquired if any one was planning a similar outdoor school for boys and was informed that no one at Bryn Mawr had heard of such a movement.

I asked about other out-of-doors schools and was informed that there are many for the unfit and ill, that there are many outdoor schools for children of all sorts abroad, and that in this country most of the expensive preparatory schools have out-of-doors classrooms, which are used upon occasion.

"America is doing well in education for women," my informant continued. "There are not enormous changes from year to year, but now and then a new woman's college opens and continually the capacity of the existing institutions is increased. Fifteen or twenty years ago the woman who went to college was unusual, now the woman who seeks the higher education is following almost the usual course.

"Seventy or eighty schools send girls to Bryn Mawr; public and private schools in all parts of the country are giving girls good preliminary training; there is an evident eagerness upon the part of the general public to have its daughters well educated; the widespread and to us astonishing interest in this model school shows that the nation as a whole is intelligently thinking about women's education."

I asked what effect all this had had on women's happiness.

"Potentially or actually, do you mean? Are you inquiring about the women who now are being educated, or asking me to predict the future? I have spent my life among women who were being educated and find it difficult to generalize.

"But education adds much interest to women's lives. The educated woman has resources. The community life of college years is very useful. Students here and in women's colleges generally are very happy; there are no dull moments in their lives."

LITTLE STORIES OF FACT AND FANCY

Edifying a Mule.

BEFORE returning from my first trip to Cuba I improved my Spanish by diligent study in order to inform a mule in his own language just what I thought of him without any confusing equivocation," said a traveling tobacco man.

"This mule was one that I rode on a tour of some tobacco plantations. The people from whom I borrowed the mule said that it was an animal of tireless energy, tenacious disposition, and marvelous speed.

"I had no sooner mounted the beast than it showed a disposition to canter far in advance of my party over hills and through fields until I realized suddenly that I had practically lost the others.

"I spoke sharply to the mule and tried to rein it in. Instead of slacking pace the animal went faster.

"I spoke more sharply still and reined harder. Same result.

"Faster and faster went the mule. It galloped on through forests, open country and startled villages. I might have been going yet, a kind of permanent John Gilpin, had I not uttered, wholly by chance, a word of Spanish while trying to think of some native profanity that the mule might understand.

"What I yelled was the Spanish for 'Whoa!' It stopped the mule like magic. Throughout the trip I had been yelling 'Get up' without knowing it while sawing at the reins.

"But that mule heard a lot of unintelligible Spanish from me before I left Cuba."

Graft in Rescue Work.

THE next time I get tangled up in my own car I don't know whether I want anybody to pull me out or not," was the complaint of an ardent automobilist. "Of course, I want somebody to if I am in danger of losing life or limb; but even then I'd like a written agreement from my rescuer that he won't soak me for damages as soon as he finds my neck is safe. That is what a man did to me last week—soak me for damages.

"It was the queerest case of graft I know of. My machine broke down and I got mixed up in the remains. A witness of the accident helped to extricate me. I thanked him and offered to give him something for his trouble, but he refused to accept anything. Three days later, however, I heard from him. He claimed that in the excitement of putting me to rights somebody had extracted from his pocket a $100 watch, and since it was in my interest the watch had been lost, he thought it only fair that I should buy him another watch or give him $100.

"Judging by the whole make-up of the man, I cannot whip myself into a belief that he lost a $100 watch; I cannot believe that he had one to lose. Still, there is a possibility that he did—so what can I do but give him $100? Anyhow, this is what I have done, but if I break down again I trust the fellow who saves my life will be considerate enough at least to carry a cheaper watch."

Dining with Friends.

NOT until boarding houses cease to exist will all their romances be written. Shabby romances, most of them are, like that of the young woman who got so tired of being called "poor thing" because she received no invitations and had to eat all her meals at the boarding house table that she took to eating alone once in a while at a cheap restaurant, and then brazenly lying about the friends who had invited her to dinner.

There was a young man in that house who never went anywhere either. The first night the girl stayed out life's desolation nearly overpowered him.

"Even that poor little white-faced soul has made friends who want her," he said. "Nobody wants me. I'm no good on earth."

Then on rare occasions his place at the table was vacant.

"New friends?" asked the landlady.

"Yes," the young man lied.

One night the man and the girl met at a 25-cent restaurant. They blushed, they fenced, they finally confessed.

"We're a pair of frauds," said the girl. "It is awful to think that tonight when we go home we will have to swear that wa have been dining with friends."

"Well," said the young man softly, "ain't we?"

An Unreliable Doctor.

MR. SEABURY came home from the office one night and told his wife he had been to see the doctor.

"He said I was all tired out," said Seabury, "and he thinks I ought to go away on a fishing trip."

"But, of course, you don't believe him," responded the wife.

"Why not?" queried Seabury, in surprise.

"Well," said Mrs. Seabury, "you didn't have any confidence in him when he told me I ought to go to Europe."

The Unattainable.

OLD Mr. Dinsmore had a great habit of lecturing to young men of his acquaintance. One evening, Wilbur Moore, a young man from the city, was calling at the Dinsmore home.

"Have an ideal, young man," said the old gentleman, enthusiastically. "Always have an ideal, I say, and hug it to your bosom at all times and places."

"I believe that, too, Sir," agreed the young man, "but she won't let me."

Tribute to Ma's Prowess.

"My pa can lick your pa."

"That may be, but he can't lick my ma."

The Idea!

Madge—Did he try to flatter you?

Marjorie—Why, no, dear. He merely said I was the prettiest girl he'd ever met.

REAL ESTATE OWNERS SUFFER FROM CITY'S BOOKKEEPING

Desire to Carry Out Big Municipal Improvements Has Assessed Valuation of Property to a Fictitious Height, Says John D. Crimmins, and Is Working a Grave Injustice to Property Holders.

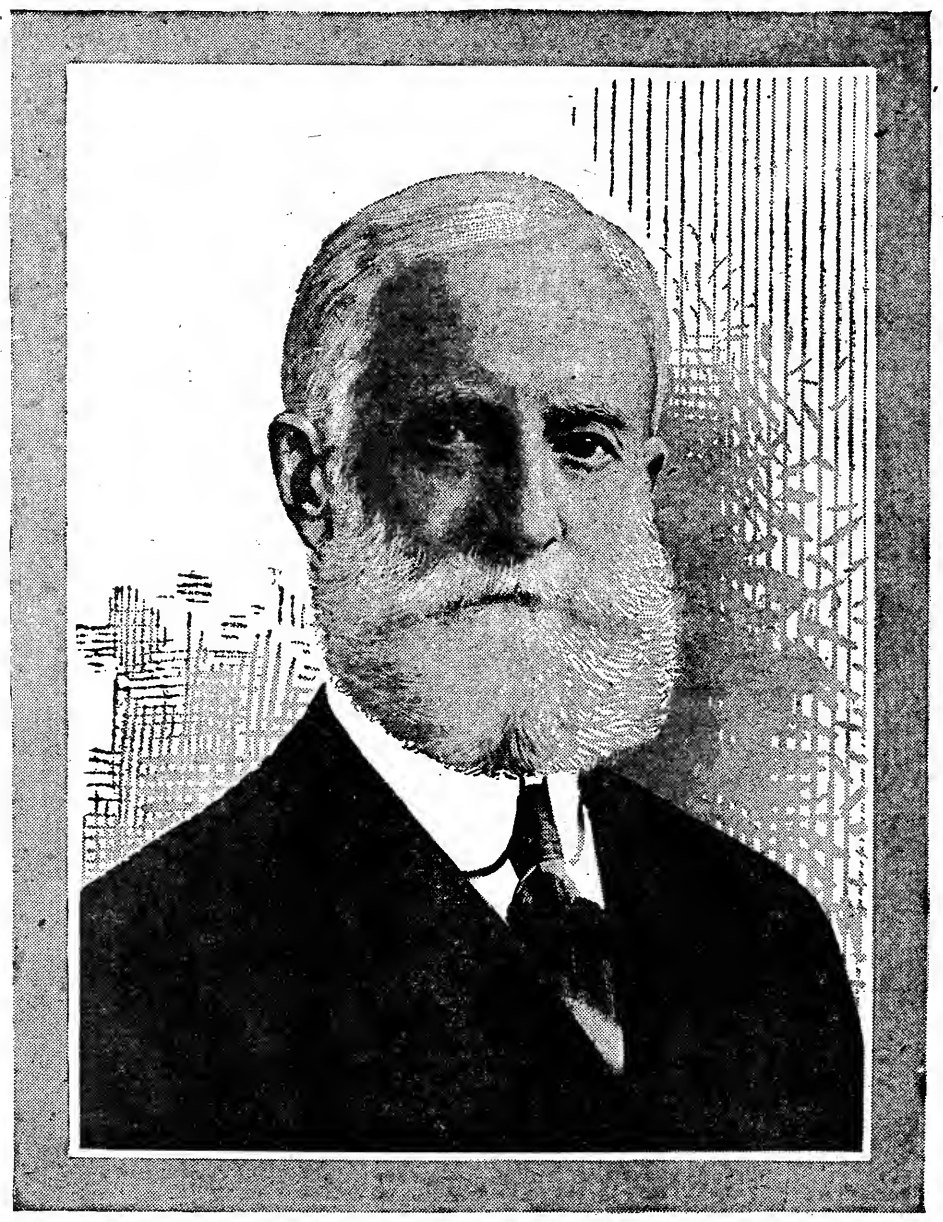
THAT what may be described as a dishonest system of municipal bookkeeping is working a grave injustice to the vast army of people who own real estate in Greater New York was the assertion made yesterday by John D. Crimmins to a reporter of THE TIMES.

As is well known, the city's bookkeeping for all improvements that require the issuance of bonds is based upon the assessed valuation of real estate in Greater New York—the bonded indebtedness of the city can only be increased in a constitutionally prescribed ratio with the increase in the assessed valuation in its real estate.

Now Mr. Crimmins calls attention with considerable emphasis to the fact that in a desire to carry through an ambitious programme of improvements the city authorities have raised the assessed valuation to a fictitious height with a consequent injustice to all property owners. This and a number of other present-day conditions, Mr. Crimmins asserts, "are draining real estate to the limit."

"The publicity of sales under foreclosure and under orders of the courts for the settlement of estates since the early Spring of this year to the present time," says Mr. Cummins, "gives evidence that real estate is assessed beyond its actual value. Many properties sold under foreclosure have been purchased by the holders of the mortgages. We now hear many people asking, How long will this condition last? Will there be a revival?

"Before the passage of the law requiring the taxation of property at its full value improved property was assessed from 60 to 70 per cent. of its actual value and unimproved property about 50 per cent. Then came the time when conditions required increased borrowing capacity for the city to enable it to carry on subway building. To meet this Mayor Gaynor directed his Tax Commissioners to revise real estate valuations and increase them practically to the highest limit they, the Tax Commissioners, could justify.



John D. Crimmins.

Valuations Were High.

"It has always seemed to me that this was a forced order, an example where the purpose was used to justify the means.

"Keeping in mind this desire to increase the city's borrowing capacity, we may assume that the appraisers for the Tax Commissioners set higher values on properties than they should have. Hence it is hardly fair to say that the sales mentioned show that there has been an actual depreciation in real estate values. We can only say this if we are prepared to sustain the statement by the assertion that the appraisers were competent and the Tax Commissioners had a knowledge and acquaintance with values of properties sufficient to justify them in confirming the acts of their appraisers.

"We should bear in mind in this situation that we of this day and generation are paying largely and assuming responsibilities for benefits which will fall to another generation. Our new subways and new water supply system, both involving expenditures larger than that incurred in building the Panama Canal, are provisions for the future to a much greater extent than they are for this decade.

"That these projects are wise is beyond question when we see the growth of our population and realize what it will be in the next decade. While we are but a small part of the country, there's no section of the country growth of which does not to a more or less extent benefit us. We may say that this city is the port and gateway of the commerce of the United States.

"Fluctuations in the value of property at periods to which my memory runs back were not primarily caused by speculation, although speculation had a considerable part in them. The panic of 1857 was partly due to over-speculation in real estate. At that period it was practically the principal field offered to speculation. Railroads were in their infancy and not much money was invested in them, though great expectations were placed in what they were ultimately to do for the country. We had no oil fields at that time, of any consequence, as oil had been discovered but a short time before. As a field of operations it did not figure until later. Electricity, with all that electricity has produced and created, was unknown. Merchants and others with surplus funds placed them in real estate, commerce, shipping and fire and marine insurance.

"In the panic of 1857 industry stopped; the city was required to feed the unemployed to the extent of thousands; but the recovery was fairly prompt. In the latter part of 1858 and in 1859 land again became active. Estates were then being divided and the land prepared for building. Extensive operations were under way when the war broke out in 1861 and building was practically abandoned. If the records of the soldiers who entered the army at that time were looked into it would be found that many of the master builders became officers in regiments.

"Large profits came to those who were engaged in supplying the army; and after the war money was in great abundance and speculation became rife. Property increased in value rapidly and fictitiously. This continued from 1867 to the panic of 1873. Property was as marketable at that period as stocks and bonds on the Exchange and was sold on the Curb. On Pine Street, which was the real estate centre, possibly as much money passed in real estate transactions as in Wall Street for stocks and bonds. Property was traded in on margins, 75 per cent. remaining on bond and mortgage and not more than 25 per cent. being paid on a sale

"In the long panic which began in 1873 there was a great depreciation in property values. In 1878 and 1879 lots could be bought for one-third the prices they once brought. As an instance, lots on the west side, between what is now Columbus Avenue and Central Park West, that had been bought for $6,500 each, sold at auction five years later for from $1,900 to $2,000 each. On the east side lots that had brought from $2,500 to $3,000 sold for $800, and in many instances less than the cost of the street improvements. Property I sold for $15,000 on Lenox Hill five years later I purchased for less than $10,000. Lots between Madison and Fifth Avenues brought less than $10,000, and lots on Fifth Avenue $15,000. On the Boulevard, now known as Broadway, in the vicinity of Ninety-sixth Street, lots sold for $900. These were forced sales.

"In considering the situation at that period we must not overlook the currency question as it then was. For some period after the war gold was at a premium, and for quite a time was from 50 to 60 per cent. above par.

"When building activity was renewed the currency had been arranged and there was a more substantial basis to determine values, the greenback being equivalent to gold. The supply of tenements at that time was not equal to the demand and much activity took place in tenement building, large profits being made.

They Made Money.

"Those people who had been able to hold on to their properties during the panic saw them not only recover from depreciation in value, but register a distinct advance. The Astor estate, whose executors I knew, retained its holdings and largely added to them during the panic. The same was true with the Goelet estate.

"I mention these two estates as they were the most extensive at that time, but there were many others of the generation following the period of which I speak who became wealthy by holding real estate which they were not forced to sell.

"There has come into our business life in the last decade a new element composed of men who did not have much experience in real estate but who are keen observers and who became active in building operations. This class have erected many of our finest apartment houses which are scattered all over Manhattan Island. Of late years they have taken up loft buildings. A majority of the apartment houses erected on Park Avenue and the neighboring section were erected by these men.

"Money has been abundant and this has encouraged builders to go forward with operations. The result has been that the market has been overdone for the moment and the supply is beyond the demand. The check in building will soon overcome this and there will be renewed activity. In my judgment we are not 'overbuilt,' except for the moment, either in our city or our suburban locations.

"There is a movement that at times has a depressing effect on property owners, the change of centres. The most serious question is: what is to become of the former centres of the wholesale and retail trade that were located below Twenty-third Street?

"It is my judgment that in the next ten years all the available situations between Twenty-third Street and Fifty-ninth Street will be occupied. With the country growing, and our city growing more rapidly, it is my belief that there will be a movement back to the old centres between Twenty-third Street and what we speak of as the City Hall section. The cause that has led many of the wholesale merchants to change their locations has been the advantages offered by modern buildings with up-to-date appointments. If the old section below Twenty-third Street is to come into its own again, new buildings will have to be erected there which will have to surpass in type those of to-day.

"The question is: what are owners of property there to do until this period arrives? They certainly will be embarrassed in holding their properties if expenditures are made for municipal purposes in the manner and the extent of the last few years.

"Real estate is now drained to the limit to meet the charges not only of excessive taxation but also of exacting conditions required in the building of tenements and buildings for business and manufacturing purposes. There has been an increase in the cost of erecting buildings of from 30 to 40 per cent.; the cost of labor and materials has increased to that extent in the past twenty-five years.

"But in spite of all these obstacles which owners of real estate have to deal with, it is yet difficult to find anything of more substantial value and character than real estate. It is true more patience is required, and that in emergencies money cannot be as readily obtained by borrowing or by sale as with stocks and bonds, but there are times when there are more violent fluctuations in the latter securities than with real estate under forced sale.

"At this period we find a conservative feeling among people having ready money, and money is not readily obtained except by short time loans. This is largely due to the unsettled conditions of our currency laws which we hope soon to have arranged. The conservative merchant and the conservative business man have larger balances to their credit to-day than they need. Banks, as a whole, have larger reserves. All our moneyed institutions are maintaining larger reserves, dreading an emergency call or demand upon them for which they prudently wish to be prepared. These situations will adjust themselves.

Conditions Are Good.

"Our people as a whole are very hopeful; the working classes are well employed. Wages were never more regular and are now at the highest rates. The best method of keeping money in circulation is through the employment of the working people. Their money is circulated and distributed through many fields. They are great consumers of the products of the earth, the products of machinery, and the products of the hand. The demand for labor is so great that without immigration, it would be impossible to meet it. Even with immigration, judging from reports from various parts of the country, the demand for labor is greater than the supply.

"In speaking to the President and manager of a large construction company in one of the States in the West, within the last few days, he gave the exact average wage paid to their men, whose numbers run to the thousands, and who grade from the skilled mechanic to the laborer. The average wage is $3.04 a day. Even with that wage, if we judge from the appearance of the laborer and his family, possibly not one-quarter of that is hoarded but goes into circulation.

A General Survey.

"While conditions such as these exist, there can be no general disturbance. To say that this condition is general, it would be impossible to prove. But conditions generally are above the average, in my judgment. The poor we have had and always will have, just as we have those who are industrious and those who are not industrious. There is no part of the country where conditions are intolerable or a menace. There are parts of the country where conditions are bad, but the people have lived among these conditions for years and do not seem to move out of them. What I refer to is the general whole rather than to instances. In New York this has a relation to real estate. Labor must be employed to enable the laborer to pay his rent and the owner to pay his taxes and have an earning on his investment.

"There is another condition of thrift which can be observed: the thousands and thousands of our people who are acquiring homesteads. These we find scattered over Brooklyn, Queens and Richmond and to an extent in the Bronx.

"This evidence of thrift is a healthful sign, insuring better conditions and better results for the bringing up of the family. The home a man owns, no matter how mean or how small, is his castle and his family will be better safeguarded there in the individual castle than in the conglomeration and mixture we find in the larger tenements.

"Loans made on these holdings on bond and mortgage, from my experience, are most satisfactory security. In many instances an option is given to reduce the principal of the mortgage and thus the property becomes a savings bank and in time the small owner is able to pay all and clear it.

"This class of property covers much territory in Queens and much of the land we see improved with one and two-family houses in Brooklyn and the cottages and smaller dwellings in the Borough of Richmond.

"The man who owns his own home is likely to be a very good citizen; he comes nearer to the tax gatherer and watches the expenditure of city money, and when election comes he generally expresses himself by his vote as to how he feels in regard to municipal administration. The intelligence of the voter is manifested by the number of split tickets cast.

"At a period not long ago most men voted the party ticket but they are now able to discriminate, and do discriminate. No better illustration of the influence of the home owner can be given than the result of the recent election in the Borough of Queens where the small property owner is very numerous. The administration of President Connolly had been most satisfactory and his election by a large vote while the head of his party ticket went down to defeat affords a striking example of the rare discrimination exercised by this class of small property owners."

BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY REVIVES THE SIMPLE STORY OF MARY AND HER LAMB

The Real Mary Lived in Somerville, Mass.--Difference of Opinion as to Authorship of Famous Verses.

RICHARD K. POWERS of Lancaster, Mass., was 103 years old last Sunday. And Richard K. Powers's cousin Mary had a little lamb.

Now, when a respectful world was informed of Mr. Powers's birthday, it was informed also of a certain fact concerning his cousin's famous pet. "Mary," said Mr. Powers, "was my cousin. Her full name was Mary Sawyer. Her lamb was one of twins, born on the Sawyer farm in 1814."

It was good of Mr. Powers to make this important contribution to literary and natural history. There were many who then learned for the first time that Mary's lamb was not unique. But, as a matter of fact, the story of that amiable beast was told twenty-four years ago, and by Mary herself.

For in the year 1889 Mary E. Tyler, whose maiden name had been Mary Sawyer, wrote for a Vermont newspaper the following narrative. She was then 83 years old and lived at 29 Central Street in the pleasant town of Somerville, Mass."

"One cold, bleak March morning I went out with father to the barn, and after the cows had been fed we went to the sheep pen and found two lambs there which had been born in the night. One of them had been forsaken by its mother and through neglect was about dead from the cold and for want of food. I saw it had a little life and wanted to take it into the house, but father said it was about dead any way, and at could live but for a short time. I could not bear to see the poor little thing suffer so, and I teased until I got it into the house, and then I worked upon mother's sympathy.

"It couldn't at first swallow, and the catnip tea I had mother make it could not take for a long time. I got the lamb warm the first thing, which was done by wrapping her in an old garment and holding her in my arms beside the fireplace. All night long I nursed the lamb, and at night it could swallow just a little. Oh, how pleased I was. But I was not then satisfied it would live, and I sat up all night with it, fearing it wouldn't be warm enough unless there was some one there to look out for its comfort.

"In the morning, much to my girlish delight, it could stand; then it improved rapidly, soon learned to drink milk, and from the time it could walk about it would follow me anywhere if I called it. It was a fast grower, as symmetrical a sheep as ever walked, and its fleece was of the finest and whitest. Why, I used to take as much care of it as a mother would of a child. I used to wash it regularly, keep the burdocks picked out of its feet, comb and trim with bright colored ribbons the wool on its forehead, and when that was being done the lamb would hold down its head, shut its eyes, and stand patiently as could be. * * *

"The day the lamb went to school I hadn't seen her previous to starting off, and not wanting to go without seeing her I called. She readily recognized my voice, and soon I heard a faint bleating way down the field. More and more distinctly I heard it, and I knew my pet was coming to me. My brother Nate said, 'Let's take the lamb to school with us.'

"I thought it would be a good plan and I consented, and she followed right along behind me. When the school house was reached the teacher had not arrived and but few scholars were there. Then I began to think what I should do with the lamb while the school was in session. I took her down to my seat—you know we had old-fashioned, high-boarded-up seats then. Well, I put the lamb under the seat, put on her blanket and she lay down just as quietly as could be.

"By and by I had to get up and recite and left the lamb all right, but in a minute there was a clatter, clatter on the floor, and I knew it was the pattering of the hooves of my lamb. Oh, how mortified I felt! The teacher was Miss Polly Kimball, who was the mother of Loring, the circulating librayman of Boston. She laughed outright, and of course all the children giggled. It was rare sport for them, but I couldn't find anything mirthful in the situation. I was too embarrassed and ashamed to laugh or even to smile at the unlooked for appearance of the lamb out on the floor. I took the lamb out and put it in the shed until I was ready to go home at noon, when it followed me back."

So far so good; a clear, consistent narrative thoroughly in accordance with the verses. But now comes the important question, Who wrote the verses? Here is what "Mary" says: "Visiting the school that forenoon was a young man named John Roulstone. The young man was very much pleased at the school incident, and the next day he rode across the fields on horseback, came to the little, old school-house, and handed me a slip of paper which had written on it three verses, which are the original lines, but since then there have been two verses added by a Mrs. Townsend. The verses were written together when I got them:

Mary had a little lamb,
Its fleece was white as snow,
And everywhere that Mary went
The lamb was sure to go.

It followed her to schol one day,
Which was against the rule.
It made the children laugh and play
To see the lamb at school.

And so the teacher turned it out,
But still it lingered near,
And waited patiently about
'Till Mary did appear.

Evidently there was no doubt in Mrs. Tyler's mind that she was the Mary of the poem, and that the romantic John Roulstone wrote it. She was generally accepted as the original "Mary"—even now her cousin basks in reflected glory. And yet the poem is claimed for an author other than John Roulstone, by a woman, an early "feminist" writer formidably named Sarah Josepha Buell Hale.

In 1827, according to an article contributed by Anne Hollingsworth Wharton to THE NEW YORK TIMES REVIEW OF BOOKS nearly eleven years ago, Dr. Lowell Mason introduced singing into the public schools of Boston. He asked Mrs. Sarah Hale and other writers to furnish verses suitable for children. Mrs. Hale, writes Mrs. Wharton, "composed a series of little poems for children, which were set to music, and sung in the schools of Boston, and afterward throughout the country. Among these were the well-known

If ever I see, on bush or tree,
Young birds in their pretty nest, and the world-famous 'Mary's Lamb.' Even if this latter and best known poem were not founded upon an incident in the writer's own childish experience, it was unquestionably inspired by her familiarity with and her affection for domestic animals."

Sara Josepha Buell Hale.

Now, Mrs. Hale was an accomplished lady—of this there can be no doubt. She wrote, among other things, "The Ladies' Book of Cookery," "Liberia, or Mr. Peyton's Experiment," "Manners, or Happy Homes and Good Society All the Year Round," "Northwood, or Life North and South," "Sketches of American Character," and "Woman's Record, or Sketches of All Distinguished Women from Creation to 1854." Also she edited Godey's Lady's Book, and was prominent in the "women's rights" agitation.

What is more important, she was influential in bringing about the establishment of our Thanksgiving Day as a national institution.

But Mary herself gives the credit not to Mrs. Hale, but to John Roulstone, who was, it has been discovered, a nephew of the Rev. Lemuel Capen of Sterling, Mass. In her interesting "The True Story of the Real Mary and the Real Lamb," published by Frederick A. Stokes, Fannie M. Dickinson supports this theory, and adds: "In 1829, in a book of poems for children, published by Mrs. Sarah Joseph, three stanzas were added to these." Now, "Mrs. Sarah Joseph" is probably "Mrs. Sarah Josepha Hale."

It is possible that Mrs. Hale included verses by other authors in her "Songs for Our Children." No copy of the book is available, but it may be that she acknowledges in it, or did acknowledge elsewhere at some time, that the first three stanzas were by John Roulstone.

At any rate, Richard K. Powers is 103 years old. And he says that the Mary who had a little lamb was his cousin.

OLD-FASHIONED BUT EFFECTIVE

"ONE reason I didn't get engaged last Summer," said the girl in the deepest chair, "was because I couldn't think of any really novel way to announce the engagement."

"A-a-ahem!" coughed the girl in the wabbly rocker.

"I said," continued the occupant of the capacious chair with spirit, "that was one reason. There may have been others. But that was a good one.

"There is no use in being engaged nowadays if you can't electrify the community with an announcement. Time was when all an engaged girl had to do was to stay all night with another girl and snuggle up close and whisper the sweet secret into her ear and trust to her to circulate the report. That method may be innocent and romantic, but it is hopelessly old-fashioned. A girl might as well not be engaged as to spread the news that way.

"The last announcement party I attended was a luncheon. It was unique. For dessert they served some kind of chocolate concoction that looked like a miniature cannon ball. When those balls were cut open we found inside them slips of paper on which was written a notice of the engagement. I thought that rather a neat plan."

"It was," said the girl in the rocker. "It was almost as good as the surprise sprung on her friends by a White Plains girl that I know.

"She invited us to her home to a vaudeville entertainment. For the final act we were promised an original phonographic selection. We expected some kind of a musical turn, but instead the machine bawled out three times, 'Attention!' and then proceeded to announce the girl's engagement."

"That was neat, too," said the girl in the deep chair. "It reminds me of the scheme of another girl I know. She rigged up a fortune-telling device for the entertainment of her friends. Each guest drew a slip of paper, but instead of finding his or her own fortune written thereon, they found that of the hostess. She was engaged, and that was her way of making it known."

"All those freakish ideas may be very clever," remarked the girl on the hassock, "but I consider them in poor taste. For my part, when I get ready to announce my engagement, I shall bring all you girls together, just as you are now, and tell you, in as few words as possible, that I—that he—that we—that I am—am"—

She stopped and blushed. The girl in the deep chair sat up.

"Good gracious," she exclaimed. "You don't mean that you are—really"—

The girl on the hassock nodded.

CARUSO DISCUSSES SOME OF THE SECRETS OF HIS ART

His Method of Studying a New Role—He Says the Public Wants Loud, High Notes, and Is Prone "to Measure Music With a Yardstick."

ENRICO CARUSO sat one evening early last week in the studio of his hotel apartment overlooking Broadway and talked on matters musical. The great tenor was a prisoner there. He said so himself or no one would ever have imagined it.

"If I go on the street," he said, with mock plaintiveness, "they say, 'Hello, Caruso!' They point to me as I go past and say, 'There goes Caruso,' and the boys run along and shout 'Caruso! Caruso!'" (It is a pity the mimicry that accompanied this was lost to larger audiences than the solitary interviewer.) "If I go to the theatre it is the same, and when I step into a cinema the papers say next day Caruso was there. So I pass all my time between my hotel and the opera house. I cannot go for walks, and I will not go for rides, so what is left? And then they say a singer has a pleasant life!"

There are not a great many people who would object to being a prisoner in the green-carpeted, white-walled apartment with its tasteful decorations and art objects. Especially since innumerable doors and hallways suggest that if one room becomes tiresome there is easy escape into another sanctuary. The interviewer suggested something like this, as well as concern over the question of exercise, but Caruso waved it all aside with a large gesture, and the talk turned to the question of operatic rôles, how the singer learned them, their difficulties, their number, and his preferences.

"In beginning to study a rôle," said the tenor, "the first thing I take up is the words. I go over and over them until I know them by heart. Then I begin to divide the phrases up with reference to the music that goes with them, prolonging syllables that are set to long notes, phrasing words according to the way the composer has bound them together in his music, and saying them rapidly or slowly according to the tempos they call for.

"All this has been done without any direct attempt to learn the music, but of course I have unconsciously absorbed a good deal of the melody. After I have learned the text thoroughly, I begin at the piano with my accompanist. Here I learn the melodies completely as they are set down in the score.

His Method as to Acting.

"I never sit down to make a conscious effort at building up the dramatic interpretation of the rôle. This has come to me gradually as I have been studying the text and the music. By the time I go to the first stage rehearsal I have determined what I want to do with regard to the acting. The details are of course later worked out with the stage director when the other artists come on the scene."

The questioner asked whether the tenor had any favorite rôle, any one which he would rather sing than the others or that had a particular appeal to him in any way. He was very positive that he had not.

"One part may happen to suit my voice better than another and there may be parts that the public would rather hear me in," he said, "but I would not allow myself to have any preference. No serious artist would. A singer must concentrate every bit of nervous force he has on the rôle he is appearing in. If he allowed any personal preferences to have an effect, he would introduce an element foreign to those which alone can be counted on for success. If the singer founds his work on sentimental considerations, he will never find himself called a great artist. He must guard against personal likes and dislikes more than anything else, because these are what obscure the vision and work against pure art.

"But the public always insists on its preferences and its dislikes. Very often, especially in this country, the public measures its music with a yardstick. When I sang 'Armide,' for instance, some people told me they had heard it said this was no opera to hear Caruso in because he only sang three times; that it would be better to wait for something else where he was on the stage longer!

"Yet these same people did not know that this old music, written in the days when voices were higher, when falsetto was cultivated and allowable, was very difficult for modern singers. We cannot use falsetto on its high notes, we must sing with the pure voice. This rôle really represented far more effort than any other they might hear me in. When the opening night came, these people did not know that I had been feeling for two days, and all the rest of us also, as if it would be more than I could do to go before the curtain and say, 'I cannot sing. Good night, ladies and gentlemen!'

Public Wants Noise.

"When I was in Germany last month a friend of mine, to whom I always give tickets for my performances, sat in front of two old ladies at each performance. They heard me sing Rhadames in 'Aida' one night and in 'L'Elisir d'Amore' the next night. In one I am a great captain with ideas of empire in his head, and in the other just a young country boy with no experience of the world.

"When these old ladies heard me the second night they said: 'What, is this Caruso? Why, he sings softly and doesn't let his voice out. He is no good. He must be indisposed.' My friend made up his mind that if they talked that way during the second act, he would have to do something at the end. And they did. So when the act was over and they went out, my friend reached back and kicked their umbrella until he broke it.

"That is the trouble with the public. They want high notes and loud ones from a singer. Let him satisfy them there, and they all want to hear him. They think that is enough to make him a good artist, and that seems to be all a great part of the public wants."

The talk then came back again to the matter of the study of operatic rôles, and Caruso made the observation that it might be more difficult for him to learn a rôle quickly than for some other singers, because he "was not a musician." That remark, coming from a man who is probably the most famous living operatic singer, might surprise the average person by its apparent paradox. Yet to a person who understands musical conditions, it would surprise only because a singer said it of himself. Musical history is full of singers who were in occupations not in the faintest way related to the art until it was discovered that they had a voice. Then their training was all in the mechanics of voice production, with no time, and sometimes no inclination, to develop a general knowledge of the art on its more theoretic side. But such singers generally do all they can to hide their deficiency, even though it be a case of the ostrich putting his head in a sand hole.

Caruso does not. And it is this unaffectedness carried through all his dealings that makes him regarded, as one of the clerks in a department of the Metropolitan put it, "the nicest man in the opera house." Any one familiar with the institution knows that the same verdict would have been given by almost any one of whom the question was asked.

After he had given this description of himself the tenor went on to prove unconsciously that he had been too modest.

"I sang in a church," he continued, "from the age of 10 to the age of 20. During that time lots of music went through my head; something new every Sunday. So I began to have practice in reading music. It may be harder for a singer who is not a trained musician to learn a rôle, but often he is better off than the singer who is a good musician. That is because the latter people rely too much on their power of reading. They look at a thing and say, 'Ah, that is easy for me! It goes so'—and then they do not learn it thoroughly, so that when they are performing they may suddenly forget in the places they have slipped over.

"Once I have learned a rôle I never have any trouble remembering it. Take my part in 'Ballo in Maschero,' which we sang last week. I had learned that rôle in 1898. Yet when I went over it this season in preparation for the rehearsals I found that it all came back perfectly without any trouble. All except one little spot, and there is a story about that which shows how the mind works.

"At the dress rehearsal I sang a word wrong. Right there I slapped myself in the face and said: 'Now, Caruso, when you come to that part in the performance you remember this and get it right.' Well, on the day of the performance, last Saturday afternoon, I had that troublesome place in my mind all the time. When I came to it the effort to think that I must not make a mistake made me take my full attention off the phrase, and, sure enough, I made the same mistake. Then what do you think I did? I slapped myself in the face just the same way I had done before, without thinking, and right there on the stage in full view of the audience!

Banishes Own Personality.

"That was because I could not forget myself entirely. A lyric artist must forget that he exists in his proper person. He must not be conscious of anything but the character he is supposed to be. It is only when you know a rôle perfectly that you can do this. If the artist has been hurried in the preparation of a rôle it will be shown in his performance. He will be conscious of himself, and it will spoil his highest effectiveness, and this feeling will continue as long as he sings the rôle, for he will always unconsciously think of his first difficulties with it and that will bring constraint.

"A composer may start on his first opera and write it very rapidly, because it comes straight from the heart. Then he may go on and write more operas until he comes to his sixth or seventh. In the meantime he has learned more all the time, and when the last is done it will be a much more scientifically correct product than the first. That represents my full powers, he will say; that is the work I love the most.

"But the lyric artist cannot feel this way. He cannot take any more interest in the last rôle he has created than in the first, because the very next night after he has sung the last he may be called upon to sing the first. And this must be on the same level of excellence as the other, or else it is a sign that his powers are deteriorating.

"I never think more of one part than of another. It may be, of course, that on one night for some reason over which I cannot seem to have any control my spirit will not be as good as on another. Then that night I will not give as good a performance. My rule is to leave absolutely nothing undone that I can work out to make the mechanical side perfect—and then leave the remaining touch to my spirit. So that when I go on the stage to sing any rôle I am keyed up to the same tension of nervous power—the most I have to give.

"Of course the Caruso of to-day is not the same Caruso he was fifteen years ago. Then I used to sing like anything in nature sings. I would pour out all my voice with no thought of anything but that I was singing and having a good time, then take my 10 francs and be happy.

"Now it is work for me to sing. That is what happens when we become conscious that we are using art and not nature. Now I control myself in every way. I use less voice than I did and I manage it entirely differently. I am conscious of it and of how I use it, spending hours every day in thinking how to use it where before I never gave that a thought.

"There is another thing to think of in connection with operatic rôles. On the stage we can have a costume and scenery and entire liberty of action to help us. That is not so on the concert platform. There you are facing the audience fully and you cannot get away from them. All your effect must be obtained by making your face a mask to suit the emotion portrayed. Nothing you do escapes them. I hate concerts. I used to sing at a Bagby Musical Morning once a year, and I would be miserable for a week before it. They would watch me like hawks and study how I used my throat and how I 'respired.'" (The expression of contempt that went with this was worth coming miles to see.)

"So I said the last time: 'No more of this. It is terrible. I will not do it any more.' And I won't.

An Admirable Part.

"I have created many new rôles out of about sixty that are in my repertoire, and that is the greatest joy. The newest one—in Charpentier's 'Julien'—is the finest part I have ever had, I think. When Gatti first brought it to me and I looked it over I said 'No; I will not sing this.' Then I began to study it, and I went to him and said, 'This is Caruso.' It seems to fit my voice exactly. I got it in June and was ready with it late in August. Charpentier came to see me when I was singing in Berlin in October because I wanted the composer to hear my version of it and get his ideas. He said I had embodied his ideas entirely, so that is all over. Now we will see."

This seemed to end the tenor's desire to talk on operatic rôles. It was suggested that he make one of his cartoons on a subject suggested by the conversation, and he said with a smile that he had just been busy with his pen, and his portfolio contained sketches of several of the people whose names had figured in the talk. He got them out and consented to the use of several by the interviewer, although he would not part with several caricatures of himself in various rôles, because, he said, he had talked seriously on his art and did not want people to feel that he was always making fun.

Then the interviewer left him seated alone at his big library desk. Although it was then past dinner time he wearily took up the portfolio full of the day's unanswered mail, from whose hundred appeals for aid he had read the interviewer extracts in the beginning, and went back to the question of what he should do for an old Italian. This man had written him for a "letter of recommendation" because he had "paid the union $200 for dues and was still without a job at the end of eight weeks." The only suggestion of a clue as to what kind of a recommendation the old man wanted was a picture of himself in the uniform of an Italian carabiniero. Our combined wisdom had not been enough to solve the problem, and now the world's greatest tenor was wrestling alone with it again after his dinner hour. As he had said, it was another Caruso than the one of fifteen years ago.

POEMS BOTH GRAVE AND GAY BY T. A. DALY

Een Court.

I WAS een court wan day las' week,
An' eet was strange to me,
I like eet not; steell, I would speak
Of som'theeng dere I see.
To you, dat know da court so wal,
I s'pose eet's notheeng new,
But you are kind, so lat me tel
Dees leetla theeng to you:

Da "Judge"—I theenk dey call heem so—
Da bossa for da place,
He's fine, beeg, han'som' man, an' O!
Sooch kindness een da face.
Wal, soon dey breeng a pris'ner dere,
A leetla boy; so small
Dat teell dey stand heem on a chair
I deed not see at all!
Poor leetla keed, I s'pose he might
Be tan year old or less;
I nevva see sooch sorry sight,
Sooch peecture of deestress.
"Dees ees a verra badda child."
Ees say da bigga cop
Dat hold hees arm, "he's runna wild,
An' so I tak' heem up."
You theenk so smalla keed like dat
Would cry, for be so scare;
But, no, he tweest hees ragged hat
An' justa nevva care.
Den speaks da Judge, an' O! so sweet,
Like music, ees hees voice.
He tals heem how da ceety stret
Ees notta place for boys.

At first da boy looks roun' da place,
So like he nevva heard,
But soon he watch da Judge's face
An' dreenks een evra word.
"My child, would you not like to go
Where dere ees always food
An' light an' warmth, where you may grow
For be da man you should?"
Da boy mak's swallers een hees throat
As eef he try to speak,
But no wan near could hear a note,
Hees voice eet was so weak.
"Eh? w'at was dat?" da Judge he said,
"W'at deed you say, my dear?"
An' den he leaned hees han'some head
Down close to heem to hear.
I s'pose da boy's so strange, so wild,
He deed not ondrastand;
He only knew dat Judge so mild
Was sure to be hees frand.
An' so hees skeenny arms reached out—
He deed not try to speak—
But, leeftin' up hees leetla mout',
He keessed heem on da cheek!

O! hal, my frand, don't be ashame'
For w'at ees een your eye!
Weeth me, weeth all, eet was da same,
We could not halp but cry;
Not tears for dat we was so sad,
But for da joy to find
A leetla boy dat was so glad,
A man dat was so kind!

Dame Pankhurst.

O! saw ye not Dame Pankhurst,
Bound homeward from the West?
She's sailing back to London town
To rob her world of rest;
She took our dollars with her,
The dollars we love best,
Yet she hath left behind her here
Relief in many a breast.

Turn not again, Dame Pankhurst;
Turn not again to vex.
Our quiet shore with British woes
We wish not to annex.
We have our own small troubles
That worry and perplex—
But thou art gone, and now we'll hear
A little less of Sex!

We watched thee, Mrs. Pankhurst,
Descend along the shore
With male and femele followers
And banners waved before;
The gentle men, the maidens bold,
They often try us sore,
But O! there are some other pests
That aggravate us more!

Alas, alas! Dame Pankhurst!
That when thou wentst away
Thou didst not take with thee those pests
Who deal with Sex for pay,
Who serve it in the lurid tale
And in the sexful play;
We would have sung thy praises then
And double-blessed the day!

Farewell, farewell, Dame Pankhurst;
That vessel never bore
Such freight of trouble from our midst,
Nor danced so light before!
Deep be thy peace upon the sea
As ours upon the shore!
Yet, though thou tak'st one plague from us,
Thou might'st have taken more!

Little Polly's Pome.

TIMELY ADVICE.

PERHAPS I may surprise you
With what Im going to say
And yet I would advise you
To listen to my lay.

For mark my words, dear reader,
Youll thank me very much
If you are but a heeder
Unto the truth I touch.

We all find to our sorrow
It is a foolish way
To put off till tomorrow
What we can do Today.

And trouble too for others
In such a course may lurk
For fathers and for mothers
Who have to do our work.

And then for those who serve us
It is not kind or right
It makes salesladies nervous
To have to work at night.

So without further stopping
My good advice Ill state:
Begin your Christmas shopping
Before it is too late!

Nonsense Rhymes From the Mexican.

THE MISSING WORD.

"Caramba!" cried Huerta, the Mexican.
"Nobody can talk like your Prexy can,
But he may as well cease
All this gas about 'Peace'—
Why, they ain't no such word in our lexicon!"

THE TOURIST FROM MEXICO.

Don't ask me to look at the scenery!
I don't car for mountains or greenery.
Revolutions, you see,
Are what interest me—
Lemme stand here and watch the machinery.

THE KETTLE OF FISH.

On top of Popocatepetl
The poor Dove of Peace stopped to settle.
"Gosh!" he murmured, "I fear
If I hover too near
I'll be one with those fish in the kettle."

HOW THE $4,000,000 OF THE Y. M. C. A. CAMPAIGN WILL BE SPENT

The Women's Association Will Get Three-Fourths of It and Will Use $800,000 for the National Board Building---Bowery Branch Gets a Big Share of the Men's Portion.

$800,000 Headquarters Y.W.C.A. given by Five women Miss Grace Dodge, Helen Gould Mrs Willard D Straight, Mrs Clarence Hyde, Mrs John French.

IF every penny of the $4,000,000 raised in the Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. campaign which closed last week had been twins there wouldn't have been enough even then to satisfy all the needs of the two organizations.

The exact way in which every dollar was to be used was settled in advance. This wasn't the easiest bit of figuring done by those in charge either. It was like trying to feed half a dozen hungry birds with one worm.

To the average outsider $4,000,000 seems a large enough worm for a whole nestful of birds. But inasmuch as the Y. M. C. A. alone needed $2,500,000 and the Y. W. C. A needed three times as much, and needed it three times as badly, it can be seen that $4,000,000 isn't so fat a worm as it might at first appear to those who don't know the facts.

Even the men admitted that the lion's share of the big fund ought to go to the Y. W. C. A. Therefore three of the four millions were apportioned to the women, while the men, having cut out big sums and shaved off little ones, finally reached what they felt was the irreducible minimum of a single million for themselves.

By this time everybody knows how the money was raised. At noon on Tuesday, when the nerve-racked and muscle-weary workers were listening to the reports, which showed them they still had about $350,000 to raise inside of a few hours, somebody got up and said that if it was done it would be a long time before New York would be beaten.

"Well," said George W. Perkins, chairman of the Executive Committee, it has been a long time since New York has been beaten as it has been during the past two weeks! Undergrush is nothing to it."

As the result of this "beating" of the city there are more people in New York to-day who know and care about the work of the Y. M. C. A. and the Y. W. C. A. than there ever were before. In the first place more than 35,000 persons contributed to the fund. They gave all the way from 50 cents to $500,000 apiece. Every one of these donors, as well as hundreds of other people, will be glad to know just how the money is to be spent. Here is the list:

YOUNG WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.
Central Building	$600,000
Harlem Building	500,000
Boarding Home	350,000
Central Club for Nurses	400,000
West Side Branch	50,000
Colored Women's Branch	100,000
Current expenses (2 years)	150,000
Equipment and Adjustment Fund	50,000
National Board Building (Special)	800,000
Total	$3,000,000
YOUNG MEN'S ASSOCIATION.
Bowery Branch	$390,000
Union Branch (Bronx)	360,000
Colored Men's Branch	150,000
Williamsbridge Branch	40,000
Intercollegiate Branch	20,000
Contingent and Adjustment Fund	40,000
Total	$1,000,000

Given by Five Women.

The largest item in the women's budget is $800,000 for the National Board Building and the site on which it stands. This great sum was contributed by five women—Miss Grace Dodge, Mrs. Finley Shepard, Mrs. Willard D. Straight, Mrs. Clarence Hyde, and Mrs. John French. The land was bought by Mrs. Shepard.

This campaign, which has just finished in whirlwind fashion, was begun more than a year ago. It was then that the $800,000 was given; and that explains why the National Board Building is already completed. It stands at the corner of Lexington Avenue and Fifty-second Street—a splendid eleven-story structure of fireproof construction.

It contains all the offices of the National Board, as well as the Training School for the Y. W. C. A. secretaries. These young women live as well as study in the building. There are dining rooms and a cafeteria on the top floor. There are reception rooms, board rooms, a library, classrooms, in fact, it is a thoroughly equipped and architecturally beautiful building.

With this exception, the $3,000,000 of the women will be devoted to the local work of the Y. W. C. A. in New York City. The next item in size and probably in importance is $600,000 for a new Central Branch. The present one, at 7 East Fifteenth Street, was outgrown long ago. It has a general membership of about 3,000; more than 2,700 students are enrolled in its classes; it has an employment bureau which places about 1,500 women a year.

Yet even for this work every facility of the place is overtaxed. As for enlarging the activities in the present quarters, it is impossible. The building in Fifteenth Street, moreover, is about twenty-five years old. In that time the conditions have changed. The girls for whom that branch was intended now live several miles distant. There isn't a single branch of the Y. W. C. A. east of Fifth Avenue between Fifteenth Street and the Harlem River, except the Studio Club, which is for a special class.

Girls Will Get "Gym."

The girls, in fact, seem to have been making the best of several bad bargains. For instance, there hasn't been in this great city a good gymnasium for the use of working girls. There hasn't been a swimming pool open to them except those in the public baths. All the physical development seemed destined for the boys and men. Classes in gymnastics were organized for the girls, but no real provision was made for the development of their bodies.

The campaign which has just closed has changed this state of affairs so decidedly that the working girls of this city are asking themselves whether they are really awake or only dreaming. The new Central Branch Building, which will be erected as a result of the campaign just closed, will really be a great up-to-date clubhouse for girls. It will have the longed-for gymnasium and swimming pool, and, in addition, it will have improved class rooms for all kinds of courses, from millinery to multiplication tables.

When Helen Gould—as she then was—bought the site for the new National Board Building she purchased an additional lot to insure plenty of light and air. The new Central Branch is to build next to the National Board, and the two structures can thus divide this valuable supply of light and air between them. They will have the entire frontage of the block on Lexington Avenue, with a depth of 100 feet on the side streets. It is planned to make this one of the greatest centres for working girls in America. The employment department is to be given a chance to grow into a really big thing in modern vocational analysis. Wholesome recreation in great big allopathic doses is to be furnished the girls. In short, the New York working girl is going to have a real clubhouse with special improvements adapted to her case.

The Harlem Branch, now at 72 and 74 West 124th Street, is also overcrowded in all its departments. This branch has already outgrown two successive homes and is absolutely panting for more room. It is to have a $500,000 building as near Lenox Avenue and 125th Street as a proper site can be obtained. The present building has a boarding department where forty girls can be accommodated, board and room costing from $5 to $6 a week. In the new building this number will be increased. And the Harlem girls, too, will get a good gymnasium, although their dream of a swimming pool may not be realized.

To many of the 15,000 persons who have just given their good money to this Y. W. C. A. fund the proposed Boarding Home will seem almost the best of the uses to which the money will be put. There are no less than 500,000 working girls and women in New York City and it is estimated that at least 100,000 of them have no homes of their own. They must board somewhere, somehow. And generally the where and the how are not calculated to stir anybody to envy.

Altogether, in this city, there are about thirty special boarding houses for women. These are carried on by various organizations. But even in the aggregate they can accommodate only about two thousand. One of the most pressing needs of working girls, therefore, is a place to live.

Of this army of 100,000 girls, exposed to temptation and danger, earning as a rule so little that they cannot afford the comforts or even the real necessities of proper existence, the Y. W. C. A. has been able to accommodate only about three hundred. Of this number twenty are in the Colored Women's Branch, twenty-two in the West Side Branch, and forty in the Harlem Branch. The rest are in the Studio Club, the Central Club for Nurses, and the Margaret Louisa Home.

But the Studio Club is for girls who are studying one of the arts. The Nurses' Club takes only women practicing that profession, while the Margaret Louisa Home is really for transients, as no one can remain there more than a few months at a time. So that at present only eighty-two out of the vast throng of New York's real working girls can find a home under a Y. W. C. A. roof.

The organization proposes therefore to use $350,000 of its share of the campaign fund to build and equip a home for 250 girls, where they can live for from $4 to $6 a week. The institution is expected to be self-supporting after it is fairly established. It will be on the east side, north of Twenty-third Street.

When it came to the individual objects for which the campaign funds were intended, probably the two which brought out the most ardent personal work were the Central Club for Nurses and the Colored Women's Branch. If hard work had counted, the nurses and the colored women would have earned about a million dollars a minute. One nurse, who was on night duty, said on the last day of the campaign that she had slept just five hours out of the previous seventy-two. She had spent her time off duty working for the fund.

The present Nurses' Club is at 54 East Thirty-fourth Street. Only thirty-six can be accommodated in the sleeping quarters. The social rooms, the dining and reading rooms are taxed to the limit of their capacity. The purpose of the club is to provide a central headquarters for the thousands of nurses who are practicing in New York City. It was opened only three years ago, and the sixteen bedrooms have been filled ever since, while more than 400 nurses have been turned away.

With $400,000 of its fund the Y. W. C. A. intends to buy a site and to erect a new clubhouse where 400 or 450 nurses can live when "off" a case. There will be a restaurant, library, reception rooms, infirmary, lecture room, and other facilities. The County Association of Graduate Nurses will have its registry and directory there. Meetings of professional organizations of nurses will be held there and the club will be made a central headquarters for the nurses of the city. The site has not yet been definitely chosen, but it will probably be on the west side, between Fortieth and Eightieth Streets. When the fund was successfully completed last week it was the happiest day the nurses of this town have known in a long, long while.

As for East 135th Street, it was jubilant when it found that a brand-new building, costing $100,000, would be erected in that neighborhood for the colored women's branch. In 1905 this branch was started in a rented house at 143 West Fifty-third Street, but the move to Harlem follows the colored population.

Julius Rosenwald of Chicago has made a standing offer to give any town that would raise $100,000 for a Y. M. C. A. $25,000 of that amount. So when the women here set out to get that hundred thousand for the girls they asked Mr. Rosenwald whether he was going to discriminate against the sex. And Mr. Rosenwald didn't.

The new building will contain sleeping rooms, dining room, social and recreation rooms, a gymnasium, class rooms, and an employment bureau. In the case of many colored girls it will be their only chance to find a decent place to live. And for many others of the general membership it will be the only place where they can meet their friends in proper surroundings.

Colored People Helped.

The colored people themselves have been almost feverishly interested in the progress of the money campaign. They worked like Trojans, bringing in each day $2,000 or $3,000, which they had collected in small sums. Mrs. Ransome, the President of the women's branch, is the wife of a colored Baptist minister and a wonderful speaker herself. When the campaign first started several conferences were held at the homes of prominent women, and Mrs. Ransome was one of those who told of the needs of the different phases of the work.

One afternoon one of the officers of the association, while listening to Mrs. Ransome, noticed that the drawing room door was cautiously opened a crack and remained ajar till the end of the conference. After it was over the surprise of the women in charge was great when the old colored butler came up and deferentially asked for a pledge blank. It was given to him. When he handed it back they almost doubted their eyes when they read the amount on it. The old butler had subscribed $1,000. They appealed to the mistress of the house. Did she suppose he had so much money as that? Ought they to take it, even if he had it to give?

"Yes," said his employer, "he probably has it. He has been in our family thirty years, and he has saved his money. If he wants to give that amount for the benefit of his own people let him do it. It is a great thing for them and for him."

The West Side Branch, now occupying a reconstructed residence at 460 West Forty-fourth Street, will benefit from the $3,000,000 fund to the extent of $50,000, which will be spent in enlarging and improving the building. A gymnasium will be added to the present facilities which are entirely inadequate to the needs of the neighbohorod.

The next item is the sum of $150,000, which is to be set apart to help pay, during the first two years, the increased current expenses due to the great enlargement of the scope of the work. Some of it will become self-supporting by that time. The Equipment and Adjustment Fund item on both lists is to cover the expenses of the collection of the $4,000,000 and to adjust any estimates which may not come out just right.

In the Y. M. C. A. the chief interest is in the Bowery Branch, which is to get an entirely new building on a new site. The present one, at 153 Bowery, has been helping the temporarily down and out for over forty years. The comparatively small three-story building is overcrowded, insanitary and even unsafe. For years it has been used to its utmost capacity, the average attendance being almost 1,200 daily.

Over 300,000 meals a year are served, most of them at a cost of only 5 cents. Sometimes a man hasn't even the nickel to pay for his meal or the 15 cents to pay for a bed. In that case, he can work for it if there is work to be done. Even if there is no work around the place, he can eat and sleep, for his bill is charged against him and he is told that when he is able to pay he will be expected to do so. In very many cases these accounts are squared in time. Some of the men are college graduates. All of them must give references. It is not a haven for hoboes, but a temporary refuge for men who are in hard luck of one sort or another.

The new building will be a great stride in advance of the present one. The land has been bought and construction will be commenced in the Spring. The site is at 8 East Third Street, just back of the Dry Dock Savings bank. It is 75 by 100 feet and, thanks to the unusual construction of the bank building and to the fact that there is an old cemetery in the rear, it will have light and air on all sides.

The building will be six stories in height, of fireproof construction, but also provided with two fire-escape towers of the latest type. The four upper floors will be devoted to sleeping quarters; one of them as an open dormitory accommodating 150 men; the other three divided into small separate rooms, about 50 to a floor. There will be plenty of shower baths on each floor.

On the two main floors there will be a reading room and correspondence room, 30 by 50 feet; an assembly room, 45 by 55 feet; a recreation room, 58 by 32 feet; a game room, 23 by 45 feet; a general gathering room, 45 by 32 feet, and the offices of the management. In the basement, which will be high and well lighted, are the two restaurants, (one for 5 cent meals, the other for the 10 and 15 cent varieties,) the kitchen and the heating, lighting, and fumigating plants. The building will be of brick with terra cotta trim and will cost about $250,000, the rest of the money going to the purchase of the site and to other incidental expenses. The Bowery Branch specializes on three things: its free employment bureau, its cheap dormitories, and its religious meetings. These three aims can be carried out in the new building as they never have been up to this time.

The Union Branch, which now occupies a queer, rambling old wooden structure that was once a piano factory, is to have a new $360,000 building at Washington Avenue and 161st Street in the Bronx. One of the interesting features of this branch is the course in piano and player-piano construction. There are so many piano factories in that section that this special course is provided for young men.

The Colored Men's Branch, now in Fifty-third Street, is to move to a new $150,000 home which the campaign fund will provide for them in the neighborhood of 135th Street and Seventh Avenue. The Williamsbridge Branch, which occupies unique quarters in a made-over church and parsonage, will get $40,000 to pay off an old debt on the building. The Intercollegiate Branch also receives $20,000 to pay off a loan and mortgage on the P. & S. Clubhouse at 346 West Fifty-seventh Street. The contingent and adjustment fund of $40,000 will be disposed of for campaign expenses and the adjustment of discrepancies in estimates.

Progress in Three Years.

This accounts for all of the $4,000,000 which was raised. It will be seen that, with the exception of $240,000, the entire amount goes into permanent investments in buildings and equipment. Two years ago it was stated that the value of the property held by the Y. W. C. A. in this city was only $250,000. Other cities not to be compared with New York in size and importance were better provided with buildings. But the work here was not united until about three years ago. The men's association covered the entire city as a single organization working through branches, and this gave it great strength and effectiveness. A provisional committee, of which Mrs. James S. Cushman was Chairman, finally brought about the same system in the women's work, and the fruits are already apparent. While the management of the Y. W. C. A. and the Y. M. C. A. is Protestant there are no sectarian lines among the members. All creeds, nationalities, and races are represented. And with the bigger and broader work which the unprecedented campaign just closed will make possible the Directors of the two associations expect to make them a vital influence in the lives of thousands of New York's young men and women.

ANECDOTES ABOUT ELLEN TERRY

NO actress has had better friends among women of all ages and degrees than Ellen Terry," says one of the women who are devoted to her. She is a prominent London novelist.

"Many a young woman in the profession has some pretty anecdote to tell of the great actress's kindness to her. One young woman who had acted with her said to me, 'The beautiful part about Ellen Terry's kindness is that she makes a personage of the one who has received the kindness however humble she may be!

"'She always watched over us girls of the company, always noticed if we looked tired. She never forgets any one. A very young and insignificant actress who had had a tiny part with her, but who had been out of the company for a long while, sent her a photograph asking for her autograph upon it. The picture came back signed, and written over the signature ran the words in Terry's clear hand—"I remember you perfectly."

"'Ellen Terry never refused to see any one wishing her aid. I never bothered her, but I can tell you it kept up my spirit more often than I can tell to know that I could do so if I wanted to.'

"An actress I know who played in the Irving-Terry company has told me that once she and another girl in the company were delayed in Ellen Terry's dressing room for some reason and were late for rehearsal. Irving was thoroughly annoyed with the girls and was about to express his displeasure when Terry stepped between him and them, saying, 'It was quite my fault. I detained them.' The girls were saved.

"The same woman has told me of the kind scolding that Ellen Terry gave to a girl in the company who had had a bad fit of the blues and had written home to tell how she was suffering.

"'Never write to people your love of your down times,' said Terry. 'Depression wears off. By the time that your family will get your sad letter you will probably be in the seventh heaven of bliss over something!'

"Miss Maude Forster, the young actress who was playing the small part of Francisca the nun in 'Measure for Measure' at the Adelphi Theatre in London at the time of Terry's jubilee celebration some years ago, tells of how Terry, who took the small part from her for one performance to celebrate her appearance in Shakespeare at that theatre fifty years before, remarked to her in passing her at rehearsal, 'You see, Miss Forster, I am your understudy!' The company took up the pleasantry and Miss Forster got it from all sides. 'Miss Forster is indisposed. The understudy, Miss Terry, will take her part,' was dinned into her ears.

"I was once Ellen Terry's guest before I met her. It happened this way. She had sent a goodly sum of money to a woman friend of hers who was in poor health, lonely, far away from home, bidding her do as she pleased with it only so long as she spent it on 'a spree to cheer and strengthen.' The friend wrote to me to come to share 'Ellen's treat.' A trip to the mountains, the companionship of a friend worked a perfect miracle of a cure.

"'Have you some white heather?' I asked a little girl clerk at a florist shop. She said no, that they were out of it. 'But I must have some, I want to send some to Miss Terry for her opening night.'

"'For Miss Terry?' cried the girl. 'Indeed you shall have some.' She without hesitation despoiled an elaborate floral decoration on the counter. 'That can wait till we get some more, but Miss Terry must have her heather. It means good luck, doesn't it? May she have that every time. You can't think how sweet she is to me when she comes in here. I simply love to wait upon her.'

"Her infectious gayety, her absolutely unaffected interest in all that interests them make children her delighted slaves. She loves to draw a number of children up close about her and chat and laugh with them. Often she used to come to see me with her grandchildren huddled about her in her carriage. 'Are we too many?' would come her laughing query at my drawing room door.

"A reporter who went to interview her in one of her country homes was amused at the sight of a huge doll seated in one of her drawing room chairs. 'It is always there ready to play with my grandchildren when they make me a visit.'

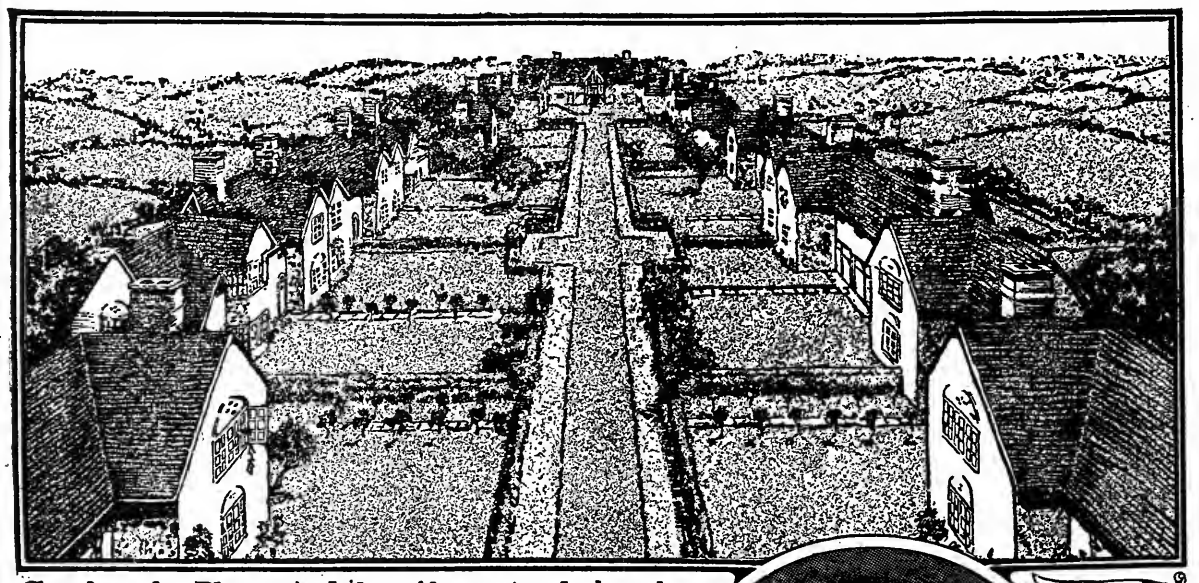
"Ellen Terry's motto taken early in stage life from the lips of Beatrice in 'Much Ado About Nothing' is 'There was a star danced and under that I was born.'

"Ellen Terry has often been asked which is her favorite rôle. 'I have no favorite,' is her answer. 'The one I'm acting at the time is always my favorite. If it were not, I could not throw myself into it.'

"When asked to sum up the qualities necessary for a great actor she gave these: 'First, a good heart, and then three I's—Imagination, Individuality, and Industry.'"

TO BUILD AMERICA'S FIRST MUNICIPAL MODEL SUBURB

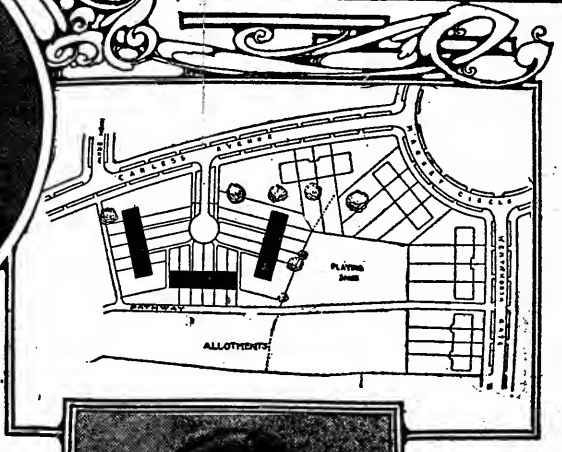
The City of Cleveland Is to Try an Experiment in Modified Communism, and to Provide for a "Deliberate, Conscious, and Orderly City Growth."



Cleveland's Plan is Like Hampstead, London

Mayor Newton D. Baker

Paul Feiss.



Dr. J. E. Cutler.

Cleveland's Plan is to Arrange Dwellings in groups Around a Series of Small Centers

THE City of Cleveland, Ohio, plans the development of a model suburb of 500 houses, on a municipal allotment of ninety-three acres, a project which stands alone in the history of American cities.

It is to be more than the orthodox suburb of model dwellings as developed by real estate speculators. Cleveland's model suburb is to institute a modified communism, upon basic ideas which violate the most hoary traditions of American town plats. It is to be a municipal experiment in "deliberate, conscious, and orderly city growth."

It is to provide enough land to allow full play to every legitimate impulse of its tenant families; a fixed percentage of the land is to be devoted to frontyard and backyard gardens and another percentage to playgrounds, including small children's grounds, tennis courts, croquet grounds, baseball diamonds, and so forth.

It is to group dwellings into units, and by the arrangement of these dwelling units it is to seek a complete and harmonious expression of its organized community life.

It is to establish a positive community control over every square foot of its land.

It is to fix a new size and shape of lot, to adapt street widths to building heights, to seek a maximum of narrow streets, and to hold improvement costs as low as is consistent with durability, for economy's sake.

It is to inject a definite and suggestive meaning into the vague and uncertain term "model suburb." And this is to be the term's new significance, as it was described to THE TIMES correspondent by Mayor Newton D. Baker:

"City growth, under the individual operations of rival real estate dealers, has necessarily been haphazard. The city, as it stands to-day, obviously cannot be redistricted into a new and orderly city scheme, however great the need. But our unbuilt suburbs can be taken firmly in hand; the development of our outlying lands can be directed into a conscious and orderly expansion.

"Cleveland has now an ordinance requiring the submission to city authorities of all allotment plats within four miles of the city limits. But the measure is inadequate to control completely our suburban development; for isolated private allotments, which necessarily are platted with a view to a maximum of profit, prolong the old haphazard way of growth, which gives rise to those housing and traffic problems which, in turn, increase in acuteness as a city grows.

"Cleveland hopes to make its model suburb, a belated effort by the city itself, to begin on its outlying lands, a deliberate, conscious, and orderly city growth."

Description of the Land.

And there you have the spirit of keen, radical far-sightedness with which the city approaches its municipal experiment on ninety-three acres lying within the city limits, where the houses and the pastures meet. Along 116th Street and Union Avenue the land lies, overlooking, from a low bluff, the big Newburgh mills of the American Steel and Wire Company. Down along the slopes thousands of steel workers are housed. Local conditions have thus far prevented serious overcrowding, but out of the mills settlements the city plans to draw into its first model suburb the Americanized foremen and the skilled laborers of the Newburgh mills. The city's allotment is close to the business centre of Newburgh, now an annexed village, and a prolongation of the Union Avenue car line from Ninety-third Street to 116th Street is to connect it with downtown Cleveland, seven miles away.

The project arose as a by-product of Cleveland's park plans. A boulevard system, which encircles the city, required for its completion a narrow strip of land between Woodland Hills Park and Garfield Park. To supply the missing link, two farms were purchased for $125,000 early in 1912. After the boulevard strip had been staked off, city officials faced the problem presented by the remaining ninety-three acres.

It was the conviction of Mayor Baker tha township of land within its own borders not only enables a city to retain much of the increment of wealth which its own growth creates, but also to control its own growth. Mr. Baker cited German municipal practices, which openly control land movements by a large ownership of land, the City of Ulm carrying its control of land speculation so far as to reserve the right to buy back land within 100 years at the price at which it was sold.

Mr. Baker further cited the example of Minnesota, which, by its refusal to sell any of its school lands, now reaps, without appropriations, an abundant maintenance for its State University.

English Ideas Helped.

With Mayor Baker insisting on city ownership of the land, the problem of its disposition was placed before the City Committee on Parks and the Housing Committee of the Chamber of Commerce. Here entered Dr. J. E. Cutler, Professor of Sociology of Western Reserve University, the Housing Committee's expert. And with Dr. Cutler entered the idea of the copartnership plan of a dozen English suburbs under private auspices; out of his first-hand acquaintance with these Dr. Cutler has formulated the plan which is to be followed in Cleveland's municipal suburb.

Architects who, it is expected, will soon be asked to enter a plans competition, are to face the following requirements under Dr. Cutler's proposal:

1—The land total is to be divided into a percentage for street purposes, a percentage for building purposes, a percentage for gardens, and a percentage for playgrounds. The English suburbs, which build four-room houses in groups of eight or ten, limit the number to ten for every acre, and prescribe that one acre shall be open for every ten built upon. The City of Ulm, Germany, in which the percentages are drawn to fit the character of the building zones, enforces this percentage for its zone of villa residences—20 per cent. of land for buildings, 17 per cent. for streets, 13 per cent. for backyard gardens, and 50 per cent. for front-yard gardens. Cleveland's percentages are to be fixed in consultation with Flavel Shurdless of Philadelphia and Adolph Schmidtlap of Cincinnati, town-planning experts.

2—Streets are to be narrow, with the exception of necessary main thoroughfares. It is not expected that the city's tenants will own either automobiles or horses, and neither land nor money is to be wasted in anticipation of them.

3—No lots are to be of a deep, narrow shape. Dr. Cutler blames the long, narrow lot for the most acute evils of overcrowding which accompany a city's growth. He cites the "dumb-bell" tenements of New York City, which were invented in 1900 to house as many families as possible on lots which measure 25 by 100 feet. These tenements, built in a solid series on contiguous lots, furnish airshafts about 60 feet long, five, six, or seven stories deep, and only 5 feet wide, as the sole source of natural light and air for ten out of fourteen rooms on each floor.

4—No lots are to extend to the middle of the block. There is to be space left in which to provide for future adjustments of playgrounds, buildings, and gardens, or for changes in the character of the suburb.

To Confer on Streets.

The arrangement of streets remains to be taken up with Mr. Shurdless and Mr. Schmidtlap at a series of conferences. The thoroughfares may follow the usual gridiron plan, or they may be modeled around the dwelling units within the blocks. There are members of the Housing Committee of the Chamber of Commerce who insist that the organized life of the community can be made better to express its communal economy and convenience by paying no heed to the regularities of traditional town plats. The erection of grouped dwellings for widows and aged persons who live alone and for other classes of tenants of peculiar wants, is to be discussed with the experts, and the decision of the conferrees will play a part in deciding the question of street regularities. English suburbs, plans of which are being followed as closely as possible, have deliberately given up street regularities and are using the streets, in common with every other item in the architecture of the suburb, to bring into bold relief the dwelling units.

Dr. Cutler does not hope to produce a City Beautiful, but restrictions will be placed on the manner of building in order to avoid conspicuous blemishes in the landscape. These restrictions also remain to be determined during conferences.

The houses are to contain from five to eight rooms, and are to be built with a southern aspect, as far as practicable, in order to insure a maximum of Winter sunshine. By co-operative construction, the City of Cleveland plans to give steel workers the simple luxuries that have heretofore been denied them—shower baths, broad porches, plenty of trees, sleeping porches, and so forth. House plans are also to be decided upon in conference.

The rental method which Dr. Cutler proposes is also a copy of the English scheme. The tenant is to pay from $4 to $12 a month for space which rents at present in the Newburgh district for $12 and up. The difference in rental is to pay, of course, for houses of different size and is to assure a social variety in the municipal suburb. The tenant must subscribe for stock. In the English suburbs, a minimum is fixed at £50, non-resident investors securing a £20 minimum. To prevent any perversion of the communal principle, the amount of stock which can be held by one person is to be limited as in the English suburbs, where the maximum is £200. Interest is to be paid on the amounts paid on stock, withdrawable in cash after it has reached a fixed point. In England this point is £50. The English suburbs also pay interest on loan stock and on loans at short call.

Under this plan of operation the Hampstead suburb near London has reached a valuation of about £125,000. Its first sod was broken in May, 1907, and two years later the suburb had 203 houses completed, and 44 in course of construction.

The immediate method of launching Cleveland's municipal suburb is being studied by the Housing Committee of the Chamber of Commerce, headed by Paul Feiss. Present indications are that the city will be asked to grant a long lease on its ninety-three acres to a Board of Trustees, the general scheme of development which the city desires to be written as a set of restrictions into the lease. In this manner it is thought the present plan can be followed without the enactment of special legislation.

The Board of Trustees, thus incorporated, is to begin actual development of the municipal allotment by the sale of stock to non-tenants, but Mr. Feiss foresees that when the allotment is sufficiently developed tenants themselves can obtain a majority of the stock, and Cleveland's municipal suburb will be a self-governing community.

May Be Banished.

In the event of an impossible tenant-neighbor, says Mr. Feiss, the Board of Trustees, by vote of the stockholders, will, after a trial has been held, either acquit the trial defendant or give him notice to quit the suburb, refunding his entire investment. With neighbors responsible each to each, under a common bond of mutual financial interest, Mr. Feiss sees possibilities of a community made admirable by the absence of civic stagnation.

Mr. Feiss quotes Councillor Nettlefold of the Hampstead suburb, near London: "No man can say, 'This is my house.' But all can say, 'These are our houses.'"

While Mr. Feiss's Housing Committee is meeting every Friday to complete the plans for the launching of Cleveland's municipal suburb and to finish a list of requirements to be sent out in an architects' competition, 500 Cleveland real estate dealers are waiting, very keenly interested.

"The city will find that the successful development of an allotment requires more real estate experience than the politicians have had," said S. M. McMichael, Secretary of the Cleveland Real Estate Board. "Model walks, model gardens, and model bathrooms are so expensive that the whole city will have to pay the deficit. That isn't a proper burden for a municipality. Street car lines, water mains, and gas pipes are natural monopolies, and their control is a proper municipal function. But a small, out-of-the-way real estate allotment—"

Mr. McMichael paused. Then he went on:

"If a municipality is to take away legitimate profit from real estate dealers, what private business is there which is to be safe from ruinous municipal competition?"

IRISH PILGRIMAGE BY AMERICAN POET IN QUEST OF A DEITY

By Eleanor Rogers Cox.

The Seeker Visits Valley of the Boyne, Where, Says Tradition, Was the Dwelling Place of Aengus Og, the Gaelic God of Love and Beauty.

THE dreamer who doubts his dream is not worthy of it." To hear this pronounced by a modern newspaper editor in a modern newspaper office, surrounded by the piled-up evidences of his professional calling, was almost worth a trip to Ireland in itself. But then the newspaper editor in this particular instance was George Russell, ("AE,") the office was that of The Irish Homestead, the agricultural paper through which he is teaching the farmers of Ireland the most up-to-date methods of running their farms, and the listener was a poet who, after pursuing a dream across the Atlantic, was woefully relinquishing it, because of the discouragement heaped upon the pursuit by other poets. Yet these being Irish and poets might have understood the dream—even though it meant nothing less extravagant than the hope of seeing a god!

Out in the Valley of the Boyne there are several most wonderful things—for there pagan and Christian Ireland meet as they meet in no other place in the entire country. There is the great stone cross of Monasterboice, there the French Cistercian Abbey of Mellefonte, there the tomb of the pagan kings; and less than a mile from the tombs a grassy mound that covers what men say was once the dwelling place of Aengus Og, the great Gaelic god of love and beauty, of immortal youth, also. That is why, perhaps, for some of us with that singing Celtic blood in us, he, whom no great sculptor has yet helped us to visualize, is a living, radiant idea, calling us back to that grassy mound of Brugh, to that site of his palace of golden dreams, for a renewal of our own dreams, for a rekindling of our own poet flames.

So it was that a poet to whom that idea had been beckoning two years at last arose and followed its calling straight across the Atlantic.

What Apollo stood for in Greek mythology, Aengus stands for in that of the Gael. He lacks, however, the cruelty sometimes characterizing the Greek god, and he has one high attribute of Beauty and Wonder not possessed by Apollo. This was his accompaniment of singing birds. "Four bright birds that ever hovered about his head were supposed to be his kisses taking shape in this lovely form, and at their singing love came springing up in the hearts of youths and maidens. His palace was supposed to be at New Grange on the Boyne" (Rolleston's "Myths and Legends of the Celtic Race.")

But just as in the days of Greek ascendency, there undoubtedly lived in the neighborhood of the Delphic Oracle Greeks who cast aspersion on the genuineness of its revelations, so in Dublin, which is but a few hours' journey from Brugh, as train and car conduct you, this Pilgrim-poet met a few other poets who threw the cold water of a cautious reserve on the ardor of her pilgrimage. One who is something of a Mystic himself, and belongs to the Hermetic Society of Dublin, said there was no slightest use in her putting herself to the trouble of a journey to Brugh unless she had read George O'Coffey's book about the archaeological remains there. Another Poet—the most decided Realist of the younger school—had never even visited "New Grange"—giving it its modern name! A third—but by the time she had talked with the third she had decided that, as her time in Dublin was so limited, anyhow, it was scarcely worth while shortening it by going to Brugh.

And then, securing an introduction from the efficient Secretary of the Gaelic League, Phaidrig O'Daillie, she called on "AE" at the office of The Irish Homestead.

Now to those who associate mysticism with long hair, misty eyes and hollow cheeks, nothing could be a better corrective for that notion than the whole personality of this truly great man and poet; for if there is one thing more than another that links itself with the thought of George William Russell it is the impression of a luminous human sanity. He is a tall, well-built man, of perhaps forty-five or six; so busily occupied that he has not time even to read the complimentary things written of him by distinguished admirers, bringing to the editorship of that agricultural newspaper the same thoroughness of purpose and workmanship that he brings to his poetry and painting, for he is a painter also. A knightly Irishman, too, never so immersed in his aesthetic or journalistic enterprise that he has not time to say his word where his country's larger interests are concerned. It was he who replied on Ireland's behalf to Kipling's ballad on "Ulster" in words of a chivalric disdain that gained greater point from the fact that he himself is of that Ulster birth and Protestant upbringing that is supposed to be arrayed in sympathetic phalanx behind the figure of Sir Edward Carson.

The day before that Wednesday on which the poet-errant had the honor of speaking with him he had been addressing the American Agricultural Commission, and as his newspaper goes to press on Friday, this was a very busy morning for "AE." He was not so busy, however, but that he would make time to give patient and interested hearing even to a thing so airy and unsubstantial as the telling of a dream. And now that three months and three thousand miles of ocean intervene between that morning and this, one of the most wonderful things about that interview was the perfect confidence with which the transatlantic pilgrim poured out the dream-story of her calling by Aengus of the Birds; a story so irreconcilable with her own very sane conception of things that hitherto even to her poet friends she had mentioned it with discretion.

Even now, talking to Ireland's poet of mysticism, her spirit of cautious doubt asserted itself.

"And really," she ended, "after all, I wonder if it is anything beyond the merest dreaming, born of imagination and much reading of Gaelic mythology. And why should Aengus send to me such a dream away over there in New York when there are so many poets here better fitted to sing his praises—if that's what he desired?"

Then said the editor of The Irish Homestead:

"Remember, the dreamer who doubts his dream is not worthy of it. Do not leave Ireland without visiting Brugh."

Then in words of great beauty, but spoken as one might speak of an occurrence not at all unlikely to human experience, he told of "One who had gone to Brugh" whom he himself knew and had there seen a figure, splendid in its youth, golden-plumed, the birds singing around his head. In a word, Aengus Og, as we know him through old poetic chronicle. "And," he added, "I know others who have seen that figure, too."

So spoke Ireland's true poet and editor.

And on a day sunny enough to have called Aengus back from his place of dreams the dreamer went out to the Boyne valley, traveling by side-car from the railroad station at Drogheda. And there in the heart of it lay the tomb of the prehistoric Kings, with their strange carvings, their solar disks, their ship of dead men conducted by the sun, their four great guarding sentinels of gray Druid stones. But no shining vision of immortal youth. No flash of golden wings piercing the leafy greenness. But—who knows?—perhaps it was only that the mists lay too closely on her eyes. Perhaps she should not have told her dream.

THIS WOMAN NEVER, NEVER HAS ANY CARFARE

A WOMAN of about 50 has been working the "no carfare" game in New York for at least three years, a dweller in one of the residential hotels having been approached by her five times in that period.

The woman, who is tall, spare, poorly dressed, and usually wears a scarf over her head, comes up to a pedestrian, holding a crumpled bit of paper in her hand. This she extends, saying helplessly:

"Where is this place? Where is this place, please?"

When the pedestrian takes the paper he finds penciled on it an address miles away. If the woman is then on Forty-second Street, the address will be on 200th Street. If she is on 181st Street, for she operates in widely separated localities, the address on the paper will be Park Row.

After reading the address the pedestrian is likely to direct the apparently lost woman. When she hears that she has far to travel, she seems dazed:

"Oh! I have no money for car fare! How can I get there?" she cries.

Then, in many instances, issues 5 or 10 cents from the pedestrian's purse. Whereupon the woman is ready to show her bit of paper to the next wayfarer of philanthropic appearance.

Go Race with the Rain!

Go race with the rain as it swashes amain,
And gather the cool for your hot, clouded brain!
You'll never return with the same bitter pain
Of the thought that you took with you into the rain.

MAKES SIX OCEAN TRIPS TO STUDY STEERAGE REFORM

Ernest C. Cotterill Reports on the Bad State of Affairs Among the Immigrants on Some Ships and Offers Recommendations for the Improvement of Conditions.

By Edward Marshall.

HERE are the recommendations of a man who for several years has been frequently crossing the ocean in an effort to discover what would remedy conditions which he has come to think intolerable in the steerage of steamships.

His name is Ernest C. Cotterill; he is a resident of Philadelphia, where he is in business and acts as Secretary of the Manufacturers and Traders Association. We talked the matter over at his place of business.

In his investigations of steamship steerage conditions he has been backed by Lord Northcliffe, (Alfred Harmsworth,) the famous English journalist; the celebrated English Cadbury family of cocoa fame, and a group of rich and prominent Philadelphians, who are convinced that something should be done to better things in the great vessels which act as feeders to the melting pot of which Miss Jane Wald spoke so intelligently two weeks ago in this section of THE SUNDAY TIMES.

At the very start I must declare that no steamships will be named in this article, nor will any lines be designated, although, for some reasons, this course seems unjust.

It apparently lays all lines and ships open to suspicion. But it should be carefully explained that Mr. Cotterill had little to say in criticism of the greater lines; he had far more praise than blame to offer of the great German and English companies and ships.

His chief definite recommendation for the betterment of conditions concerns the establishment of an additional class in steamship travel.

On the larger liners there are now first, second, and third classes, the third being generally known as "steerage." He believes a fourth class should be established.

While that is his most important definite recommendation, the arguments which lead up to it, and this wholesale traveler's personal experiences during his quest for information, will be found to include several other, if minor, suggestions.

Individual morals first, individual health second, the welfare of this nation third, might, he believes, be safeguarded by changes in the existing system.

He prefaced his talk with the remark: "Those steamship companies which are most at fault will vigorously deny that the conditions which I charge exist; nevertheless, they do.

"For various reasons I shall not enter into details of the worst things I have found. There always is a chance that by presenting what seems to him to be the worst side of a situation an individual observer may be magnifying some unusual, non-characteristic thing. I am anxious not to seem to do that.

"In order to secure the data for the report which I have recently completed and submitted to my principals," said he, "I have made six trips. During one of these I traveled as a steerage passenger, straight; during the other five I traveled as a first cabin passenger, but with prearranged privileges of spending in the steerage as much time as I liked, and being, to the steerage passengers, myself a steerage passenger.

"The problem of reform in steerage travel is one for which I am not yet prepared to offer a definite solution, planned to embrace all existing evils; but I have made some suggestions which I hope will be valuable.

"I am certain of the great importance to the public of reforms which will protect young and old steerage passengers from the wiles of money sharks, the swindles of traveling gamblers, and, above all, which will protect the morals of girl travelers.

"Moral conditions on the steamships are better than they once were, but it is probably true that definitely organized agencies, planned for the especial purpose of preying on the ignorant, are doing more harm to-day than they ever did before.

"There is real necessity for public investigation—investigation more complete and searching than is possible to an individual—and for amelioration of certain existent evil conditions. Public-spirited people on both sides of the Atlantic, without delay, should press for such legislation as may be found to be most likely to bring about reforms.

"It seems to me obvious that such an investigation as this would be likely to bear fruit far more important than could possibly result from the average local investigation of scandalous conditions ashore. True, even a slow steamship voyage lasts but a few days, but they may be made very dangerous, very harmful days.

"We are corrupting youth in steamship steerages and thus infecting our whole country with a moral plague; we are tolerating in steamship steerages the operations of financial sharks, who there prey unrestricted on the often ignorant, and therefore often helpless, horde who start toward us from their old homes in search of a square deal.

"That this and other Governments, as well as the progressive influence at work within the shipping trade itself, have done much to ameliorate the physical discomforts of steamship travel cannot be denied.

"Food is comparatively good, quarters are comparatively comfortable, medical inspection now guards us to a remarkable degree against the importation of contagious and infectious diseases—are very hopeful signs.

Evils Still Exist.

"The recent announcement of the most progressive German line that the single men's and single women's quarters on their boats are now absolutely isolated speaks well for that line, and is an evidence of praiseworthy progress, but this voluntary improvement on the part of that and other individual lines does not protect us against uncorrected evils upon other less progressive lines which dump upon our shores by thousands the corrupted product of their heedless practices.

"The public has done almost nothing to cleanse ocean travel of its moral evils. What has been done has come automatically within the companies and ships themselves, through the increase in the size of vessels, the shortening of the voyage, and a general improvement, along efficiency lines, in steamship management.

"All these influences are impersonal, and it is unsafe to leave entirely to them anything of such paramount importance as is included in this matter of the voyage of newcomers from their old to their new homes.

"The sea has always been neglected as an arena of reform. Reasonable protection of the workingman upon the sea—the sailor—came long after much had been done for workingmen on land. The Captain is still the king of every ship, his word is its supreme law to-day, as in the days of old.

"And, while this may be necessary, an evil has grown out of it, for conditions have changed greatly.

"The duties of a modern steamship's Captain are extremely complicated. He must be far more than an old-time sailor—he must be a scientist. And, in a way, he must also be a social leader in the cabins.

"Welfare Captain" Needed.

"It is asking far too much of him to demand that he shall also be a sociologist. Men capable of such a threefold combination must, of necessity, be rare. Yet there is need of what might be called a Welfare Captain, or might be called a Captain of the ship's police, upon the mammoth immigrant ships now plying the Atlantic.

"Two points have especially impressed me in the course of my investigations. One is the necessity for some provision upon transatlantic ships for the protection of girl travelers. On some ships conditions remain absolutely lax; on nearly all is shown a lack of proper management.

"The second point is the necessity—and this is very great—for the establishment of a fourth class, especially upon crowded, westbound voyages.

"Let us first consider this second necessity as being less unpleasant to discuss.

"With conditions as they used to be three classes were enough. The first class then was what the second class is now; the second class was what the third is now. But the first has gone away above old standards in both luxury and price; the second has risen correspondingly. The cost of ocean traveling has risen 50 per cent. in fifteen years.

"This leaves a large number, even of Americans, native and naturalized, who are by no means poverty stricken, but who must travel in the third class or steerage quarters even when they are eastward bound.

"It leaves a much larger number of fine, self-respecting foreigners traveling in our direction and compelled to herd, en route, with a new class of travelers—the very low, uncouth, unmannered, practically uncivilized.

"To-day we find in the steerage quarters of our ocean steamships, especially in those westward bound, very numerous travelers of a class to whom the impulse of emigration never reached in the old days.

"The 'submerged tenth' of the European slums, to whose depths the news of the promised land at first did not percolate, is in these days coming to us in a multitude; the long oppressed and socially undeveloped Far Eastern European and Far Western Asiatic peoples are now trending with a great impetus in our direction; especially (because of intolerable home conditions) is this true of the semi-barbarous natives of the Balkan States.

"The unfortunate effect of even seven days of close association with these people is notable, especially upon the young of the far better class, which the freedom of our country long has tempted and happily still tempts.

"While they are traveling to the United States, children of comparatively careful European homes are compelled to the companionship of semi-savages, are forced at the common table to watch such spectacles of gluttony and animalism, are subjected in the sleeping quarters and even on the open decks to revelations such as fortunately forever remain undreamed of by the average native-born American.

"To immigrants in general class, and, as I have said, especially to young immigrants, the journey to America by some ships must be either an intolerable or a very dangerous experience.

"A voyage in the steerage of many a ship is now seven days or more in an unspeakable slum, in a den wherein are herded human beasts. And this enforced visit to the slum is not made as a sightseer, but as an integral part of the vile group, a resident in the slum, for the association of life in a steamship steerage is necessarily exceedingly close.

"This surely does great harm. It means that potentially good material for citizenship in the United States, even among the mature, may very well suffer the shattering of such ideals as may have hitherto existed and prompted emigration; it means that youngsters, on the way to the United States, become imbued before they land with the idea that in America the uncouth, the vulgar, the obscene will be the usual, become convinced upon their way to us that, once upon our shores, liberty will mean license.

"Such disillusionment of foreigners, mistaken though it may be, is not good for the United States. That the more decent and developed traveler, even though he or she be traveling in a steerage, should be compelled to such associations, is deplorable.

"The establishment of a fourth class might save this situation. This could certainly be done upon the larger boats; and even on the liners operated by the more progressive German and English lines there is much immigration which would be glad to take advantage of the cheaper rates at which such travel would be offered, while on these boats especially is much travel which, if such a class existed, would be saved, by entrance into that above it, from seven days of horrifying and harmful intimacy with the barbaric.

"Setting entirely aside the unfortunate moral effect of a week spent in company with the human animals who form so large a proportion of some steerage crowds, and considering the ethical effect alone, it must still be admitted that America surely suffers through conditions as they are.

"It must be remembered that it is the worst and not the best who make the atmosphere on shipboard. Among them will be found the more aggressive travelers. Their own unworthiness is sure to make them inconsiderate of others' comfort, and this will make them dominant.

"They should be isolated. If a difference in price is made—and perhaps a slight increase in the third-class rate might be used as an offset to the slight decrease in the fourth-class rate—they would isolate themselves.

There Should Be Reforms.

"It would be contrary to the spirit of American institutions or, at least, it would be contrary to the law at present on our statute books, to exclude from entrance to this country the uncouth, the ill-mannered, even the practically uncivilized. It is contrary, however, to the interests of good citizenship to force the best among our third-class immigration to a week of association with the large number of undeveloped human beings who would naturally gravitate, in traveling, to the fourth class, if one existed.

"During one of my voyages upon a certain very high-class ship of one of the best lines an experiment was tried. At my request the Captain, the chief steward, and the doctor were present at steerage meals.

"The result was that for that voyage at least something was done. Those steerage passengers who actually ate with their hands were placed at separate tables, where their savagery in feeding neither offended nor influenced for evil those passengers who had advanced beyond that point in their development.

"If nothing else were done, this, at least, should be arranged at every steerage table. Those who feed like animals should be herded by themselves. In my report I have classified these people as 'eaters with their hands.' They are common among the Poles, Russians, Hungarians, and, as I have said, among the natives of the Balkan States.

"In the course of my six trips it became apparent to me that the frequently decried impression that we are definitely and intentionally made the dumping ground for immoral characters from practically every part of Europe must be continually confirmed. It is a fact which certainly is susceptible of proof that at least many and probably practically all English cities devote certain sums to deportation of undesirables, many being impelled in our direction.

"The funds thus used are very largely furnished by private charity; city charities, more or less, unofficially contribute to them; they are veiled under the guise of funds to 'assist stranded emigrants,' rather than admitted to be funds to be devoted to making possible the deportation of the undesirable.

"Undoubtedly we are getting a considerable quantity of very definitely bad citizenship material from exactly such sources, although this will be vigorously denied. We are getting immoral persons and criminals of both sexes in this way; in this way we are constantly receiving probable paupers.

"Landing with a sum of money satisfactory to our laws, the fact that, throughout the period of their sojourn elsewhere, they have proved themselves incapable of self-support is quite unknown to us, and, by our present methods, undiscoverable.

"But were an American official at hand on shipboard to observe suspicious travelers and try to learn the truth about them, it usually would be revealed.

"In speaking of shipboard conditions it is impossible to avoid mention of the peril of recent years discussed so widely as the 'white slave problem.'

"As things at present stand, promoters of this traffic are practically free to do their worst on ships which carry, in a year, an immense aggregate of passengers. On many vessels moral supervision is either lax or altogether wanting. On one ship I watched the manoeuvres of two men who certainly belonged to this despicable class.

"Their method was to get acquainted with young girls by helping them, if they were ill; by entertaining them if they were left lonely and unattended, through the fact that they were traveling alone, or because of the neglect of those who properly should have watched over them.

"Such neglect is common, even on the part of parents, and may be accounted for in several ways. The attention of the parents may be monopolized by the needs of younger members of their families, often infants; they may have no knowledge of the perils threatening their daughters, and therefore be wholly off their guard; they often are such sufferers from seasickness that they are unable to give attention to their girls.

"The girls, ignorant, unsuspecting, filled by the very fact of emigration—an epochal matter to most of them—with an excitation which amounts to an intoxication and puts them off their guard, unprovided with any harmless amusement to occupy the long, tedious days of the voyage, greet with gratitude the attractive and attentive male stranger.

Dangers for Girls.

"I have seen two steerage passenger girls quarrel with violent jealousy over the attentions of a man whom they had met for the first time on shipboard, and who, I was morally certain, but could not prove, was cleverly working toward the downfall of them both.

"Such men, definitely agents of vice promoters and, I am told, frequently spending most of their time at sea, are found on most of the less-guarded immigrant ships. They are usually young, good-looking after their own fashion, well dressed and well supplied with money. They understand their vicious trade in its last detail. They are sympathetically helpful to the sick girl, they are entertaining to the girl who is thrown on her own resources for amusement.

"I have no doubt that on the boats of some of the smaller lines, which, although they may be reckoned as 'small' lines yet bring us many thousands of immigrants, the petty officers of the vessels and more especially the steerage stewards are in league with these agents of the dive.

"Nor is this vicious work wholly in the hands of men. I am informed by petty officers and stewards who, while they feel the certainty are unable to prove their assertions, that unscrupulous women travel regularly, girl hunting, in steerages of certain vessels.

"The unguarded condition of ships' decks at night, the non-separation of the sexes, or their imperfect separation due to a lack of sufficient stairways or passages, which makes it necessary, for example, for the unmarried men, on certain occasions, to traverse the quarters presumably reserved for the unmarried women, contribute on many vessels to a deplorable state of affairs.

"Usually one lonely seaman is assigned at night to watch a large section of the steerage deck. Were such a man ever so conscientious he could not properly perform the task to which he is allotted; if he be not conscientious, but, instead, is open to the bribes of the unscrupulous, infinite evil may result in the space of an ocean voyage.

"On more than one vessel upon which I have traveled men were permitted to wander where they listed, even to pass through the unmarried women's quarters at any hour of day or night.

"In Summertime, upon certain vessels, in which effective ventilating appliances have not been installed, men and women, boys and girls, throng the unlighted decks at night, with results which cannot be described.

"Nor is the steerage free from gamblers' operations or the presence of other swindlers—boarding house runners, even land sharks. The public is familiar with stories of card sharpers in the first cabin smoking rooms of the great liners; the stories of the gamblers who start their 'little games' down in the steerage do not get into print. But there are many swindlers of the sort, and they often find 'rich pickings' among thrifty immigrants.

"In the first and second class travelers are provided with libraries, deck games, rooms for card playing, smoking, &c., but for the steerage passenger no entertainment whatsoever is furnished. The card party in the little cabin in which the traveler who promotes the game occupies a berth is therefore a welcome episode for the bored emigrant.

"Use of the tiny steerage cabins for such purposes is practically unrestricted on some of the minor lines, and occurs frequently on more than one of the greater ships.

"If a steerage passenger asked an officer's permission to have such a card party in his room he probably would be refused; if he proceeds without consulting any officer the chances are against official interference.

"Such card parties, because of their very privacy, their semi-secret nature, are most undesirable. They may result in heavy losses to the swindler, they may merely be used by him as means of learning who among the steerage passengers is well supplied with money, the knowledge being utilized as a guide to future operations after both have landed. In either case the immigrant may suffer very heavily. The chance of this would be very largely decreased if some public place for card playing were provided in the steerage.

"Upon the vessels of some companies—upon those of one of the principal German lines, especially—a real effort has been made to guard against such mulcting of the steerage traveler. But until a recreation room is furnished in the steerage for each sex even the best meaning companies can scarcely stop this evil.

"They are confronted by a ship's population speaking so many languages, crowded into such amazingly close quarters, that much dependence for information as to the behavior of individuals must be placed by the officer upon stewards or their assistants. These men are not highly paid, and are amenable to tips; they are sometimes callous and not swayed by sense of duty.

"Nowhere else, perhaps, is the potentiality of a tip so terrible. In the steerage of an ocean steamship it may bring blindness to a steward's eyes when his blindness means the ruin of a woman's life or the loss of a man's little fortune on which he and his family are depending for their start in the new world.

"I believe that if some recreation room were furnished for steamship steerage passengers such evils would thereby be notably decreased.

"There is probably less drunkenness in the steerage of the average ocean liner than there is in its first cabin. No frequent ocean traveler by the first class has failed to see in the smoking room sights which filled him with regret.

"But the first cabin passenger, presumably, is better able to afford his gaming losses, better qualified to cope with card sharps.

"And girls and women of the first class are not subjected to the sight or influence of gambling, nor sufferers from the license of such men as promote it. I am, however, less cognizant of gambling evils in the steerage than I shall be before my investigation is completed.

"Sanitary conditions on the newer ships are good; upon the larger ships, again particularly of the German lines, they are very good, indeed.

"On some of the older, smaller vessels of the minor lines devoted principally or wholly to steerage traffic, rats, roaches and other vermin abound.

"Conditions likely to unfavorably affect physical health are generally good, for the ships' doctors are held accountable for the condition of each passenger, and those who are refused admission by our immigration authorities because of diseases or physical infirmities may be deported from the United States at the expense of the steamship companies upon whose vessels they arrive. The presence of contagious disease on board ship, too, results in quarantine, and that means immense loss to the companies. Therefors, the safeguards against it are elaborate.

"I have not made the southern trip; that is, the journey on any of the ships which bring us immigrants from the Mediterranean ports, and therefore I am not personally familiar with the worst which happens upon immigrant ships or with the worst filth conditions.

"Here, recapitulated, are the remedies which I believe to be essential to the moral health of the vast hordes incoming to America. Once let them be applied with anything approaching the minute care shown concerning physical health and great evils will be extensively eradicated in this country.

Segregation Is Advised.

"A separation of the unmarried sexes, which is really a segregation, is essential. This might entail some rebuilding of steamship interiors, the construction of some new stairways, and give rise to some bulkhead complications, but it would work a greater good than any one unfamiliar with conditions as they are can accurately imagine.

"Careful and continual supervision of all steerage quarters and passengers, a supervision amounting to an unremitting night-and-day police vigilance, is a definite necessity. This would entail additional expense upon the operating companies, but it would not be large.

"Some provision should be made for the amusement of the steerage passengers; at least something should be provided to healthily occupy the minds of the young folk among them.

"At least as careful a search for and supervision over professional gamblers and swindlers should be common to the steerage as is now exercised over men of like class but different degree who sail in the first cabins of our ocean liners.

"Last but by no means least, a demand exists for the establishment of an additional—a fourth—class in ocean travel, for some arrangement whereby those who have progressed in cleanliness, in public decency, in moral development beyond the crudely brutish state peculiar to thousands of westbound Atlantic travelers may be separated from them and relieved of the horror and contamination of intimately sharing traveling quarters with them."

THE THANKSGIVING OF THE VILLAGE LOAFER

HE WAS the village loafer, and he went Unconscious of a care, and all content
Along his way in poverty and rags—
Such is the outcome of his daily jags.

Where did he come from? No one stopped to ask,
So long as he went well about his task
It did not matter what he might have been Long years ago among the run of men.

Thanksgiving morning brings a tip to him
That pricks his appetite, and sends a vim
Through ev'ry nerve that's sodden by the drink
Poor chaps like him put in, and never think.

Five dollars! what a wealth of riches lie
Beneath the surface—bubbling with old rye.
"Kind Lord, You're good!" he murmurs low and soft
While struggling with the hay up in the loft.

The morning work is over, and he slips
Along the main street for the sundry sips
Awaiting him in places where he drinks;
The price? Yes, in his overalls it clinks.

Before a market, hanging from a peg
A turkey with attenuated leg
Invites his sight; a little girl and chap
Beneath it stand with childish lips agap.

The village loafer pauses on his way
For beverage to list what they may say.

"I wish," the little girl, she softly said,
"We had it"; and the boy, he bobbed his head.

It may have been a tear, perhaps 'twas not,
That laid upon the loafer's cheek a dot
That glistened in the wrinkles like a gem
Dropped from some passing angel's diadem.

He takes the hungry little tots in tow
Into the shop; he fills to overflow
A basket with the best that can be had;
He sends them homeward—and his heart is glad.

What does he have for dinner? Nothing much—
Some scraps; ah! ev'ry morsel has the touch
Of something that is tasteful, and is nice
To the poor loafer in his paradise.

But, somewhere in the town a table's spread
With good things; and a widow's prayer is said
For some unknown who fed her babes.
That's all,
For the poor loafer dreaming in his stall.

A Novel Egg Chef

THERE was no gas, the lamp was empty, the stove wouldn't draw, the fire wouldn't burn, the water wouldn't boil, and there was no way to boil the eggs for which the sick woman in the bed was famishing.

"I'll get 'em cooked," said the small boy. "Just give 'em here."

The visitor "gave 'em here," and the lad was off like a shot. In less than five minutes he was back like another shot, with two piping hot eggs.

"The frankfurter man on the corner cooked 'em for me," he said. "He always keeps a pot of bilin' water to cook frankfurters in, so he just chucked the aigs in and biled them at the same time. He often biles aigs for people that can't get hot water any [illegible]."

THE BIG WORK THAT IS DONE BY A SMALL COLLEGE

"MAY- DAY PAGEANT"

President Main of Grinnell in Iowa Explains Why Courses of Large Institutions Cannot Take the Place of Those of Smaller.

IF the members of the Senior Class of Grinnell College ever defied President John Hanson Thomas Main, he would spank them. He is not a particularly irascible person, nor did he impress THE TIMES reporter who called on him during his recent visit to New York City as an oversevere disciplinarian. But he is a man of muscle as well as of intellect; vigor radiates from every inch of his six-foot frame and he has the face of a refined and benevolent heavyweight champion. Perhaps he would not spank the Senior Class, but he could if he desired to.

Grinnell College is in Iowa. It is a small college—small, that is, in the number of its students, but large in ideas and potentialities. President Main calls it "a school of citizenship"—and no one can hear him without believing him.

Grinnell is a college, and unlike most colleges, it has no desire to develop into a university. President Main told the reporter why.

"A college," he said "is a unified group of people. A university is a composite institution, consisting of a College of the Liberal Arts, a School of Medicine, and various other technical schools. Size is not the important thing in the difference between a college and a unviersity. One hundred persons might be diversified in their interests and purposes, and one thousand might constitute a college group.

"Now, the College of Liberal Arts in a university can never take the place of the independent college. The professors in the college of a university use intensive methods; their purpose is to keep the minds of their students concentrated on especial lines of their instruction. The spirit of the university is not such as to develop unity.

Unification Results.

"On the other hand, the traditions and ideals of such a college as Grinnell unify the students. Every student is a member of the college; inevitably he acquires a social consciousness. And this marks the chief difference between the college and the university.

"For instance, no university—no one of our State universities in the West, at any rate—provides an assemblage of its students. The universities do not group their students together. In some of the great universities the students do not get together as one body once in a year."

"How do you make the students come together at Grinnell?" President Main was asked.

"We do not make them come together," he answered; "we merely give them an opportunity to do so. Nearly every day at Grinnell at least seventy-five per cent. of the entire student body meet for the voluntary chapel service. I call it a service, but it is really a meeting with the definite purpose of cultivating the group spirit.

"Of course, this chapel service is not compulsory. That would be contrary to the whole idea of it. But we aim to make this assembly hour so vital, so significant, that even the freshman sees that if he misses it he loses something important.

"The student accumulates from these assemblages a certain attitude toward life. That is what the college should give—the power to gain a proper attitude toward life. Life—that is what the student comes in touch with day after day in these assemblages in our chapel at Grinnell.

Deal With Topics of the Day.

"For our chapel service does not consist of a hymn, a prayer and a reading from the Scriptures. There is a place for religion in the service, of course. But the main thing is the discussion of some current problem—political, economic—whatever may be attracting the attention of the world at the moment. Perhaps the Volturno disaster may call for a careful consideration, or perhaps some one who is thoroughly informed on the subject will deliver a brief and thoughtful analysis of the situation existing between the Giants and the Athletics. Any topic that is displayed prominently in the columns of THE TIMES may be taken for discussion at one of our assemblages. Famous people who are passing through the State make addresses to us—Senators, Governors, prominent men in various walks of life.

"I read recently of a service in the magnificent chapel at Columbia University. There were one hundred and fifty persons present. Only one hundred and fifty students—in spite of that beautiful building, that splendid service with its wonderful music! You see, the total momentum of the university does not work through the chapel service as it does at Grinnell.

"At Grinnell," said President Main, "we try to give our students a knowledge of music without their knowing that they are getting it. And as an instrument to this end we use the chapel service. We give song recitals, organ recitals and piano recitals in the chapel.

Does Not Know Programme.

"These things are not announced beforehand. The student comes to chapel with no idea of what is before him and he may hear 'Anitra's Dance' or 'In the Halls of the Elfin King' from Peer Gynt, or the Troisième Ballade of Chopin or some other selection of the world's great music, vocal or instrumental. So after four years he accumulates a consciousness of classical music. He finds, perhaps, that classical music is all that he enjoys hearing, even if he disliked it heartily at first.

"At some of the universities they are making much of folk dances and pageants and similar exercises. We have had folk dancing and things of the sort at Grinnell for many years. Here is a picture of some of the performers in a pageant we gave recently."

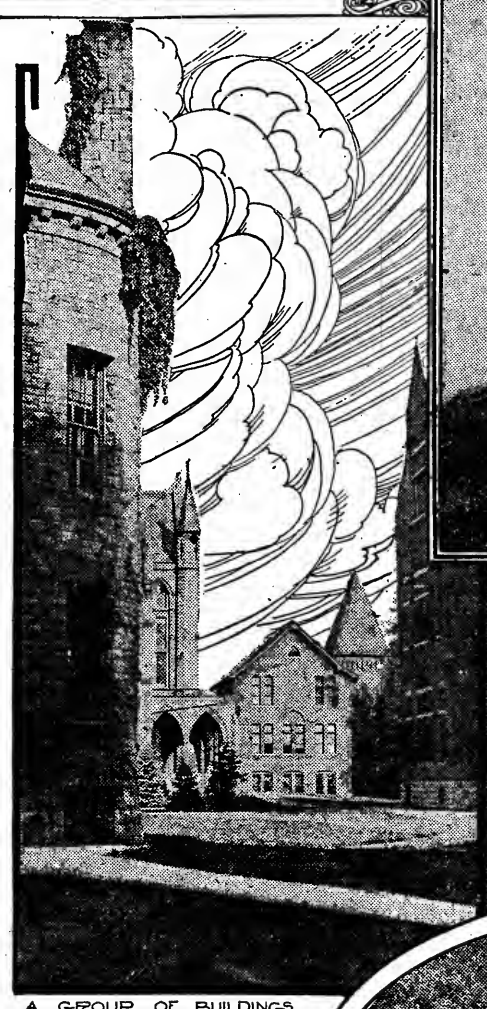
He took a photograph from a portfolio. It showed the reporter that Grinnell is a co-educational college—and convinced him that co-education is desirable.

Thinking of certain problems that have recently perplexed Eastern educators, the reporter asked: "Have you any fraternities at Grinnell?"

"No," answered President Main, "we have no fraternities. Fraternities do not contribute to the spirit of democracy.

"At some of the famous New England colleges, Williams, Amherst and others, in spite of their vaunted democracy, the finest buildings on their campuses are fraternity houses. This certainly is an anti-democratic development. They can preach democracy in such institutions, but evidently they can't practice it.

"Grinnell cultivates among its students the fraternal spirit, which is a very different thing from the 'frat' spirit. Some of the best of the intercollegiate fraternities have, from time to time, approached Grinnell with the idea of establishing chapters. And, occasionally, a little company of students has started a campaign for the establishment of a fraternity chapter. But always the idea was frowned upon by the students themselves. Fraternities could not live in the Grinnell atmosphere."



A GROUP OF BUILDINGS, GRINNELL COLLEGE.

"What do you have as substitutes for fraternities?" was the next question.

"Well," answered President Main, "we have nothing that approaches the fraternity idea. We have literary societies, which are supported with enthusiasm, which play an important part in our college life, and we have eating clubs. But our social groups are democratic, they are not self-perpetuating. The student is at liberty to join whatever literary society or eating club he may select. In a word, the student selects the society, not the society the student."

"You mentioned eating clubs," said the reporter. "Then I suppose you have no college commons?"

"No," answered President Main, "we have no commons. The students eat at their boarding houses and some of them have formed eating clubs. We are planning to have a commons soon and also to build a dormitory for men. We have a dormitory now for women, accommodating fifty. It is to be enlarged to hold a hundred. You see, when we began in 1854 Iowa was just emerging from the wilderness. Since then there has been a steady, irresistible growth, requiring a constant physical effort on our part to keep up with it. Now we have between six and seven hundred students."

President Main returned to the topic of the university and the college. "The university graduate," he said, "gets as a rule from his four years' training no particular attitude toward life. But at Grinnell we give to our students a broad outlook. Our aim is to inject a spirit of culture into professional life.

J. H. T. MAIN, PH. D., LL.D., PRESIDENT.

"We have in our curriculum the grouping system, which is widely different from the group system. A man may choose two subjects to be the nucleus of his college course. With these he must associate certain other studies, language, philosophy and the rest. Then the rest of the course he may select for himself.

"These two subjects which form the nucleus of the course, the majors, as they are called, make up 33 1-3 per cent. of the course, the fundamental studies associated with these constitute another 33 1-3 per cent. and the balance is made up of three electives. So when a student finishes his college course he can enter any professional school.

It Makes Good Citizens.

"The fundamental purpose of Grinnell College, as I said, is to give a cultural basis to professional life. This, I think, is a distinctive thing. We don't believe that you can drill a man into religion, but you can develop an atmosphere of that kind of culture which we call religious. Life is the fundamental thing; we are concerned chiefly with attitudes toward life. We have at Grinnell a school of citizenship."

President Main talked, with pardonable pride, of the triumph of his college. Of the seven Rhoades scholars appointed from the State of Iowa three were students of Grinnell College. And Grinnell is not without its distinction in athletics. Its baseball and football teams rank high in intercollegiate sports in the West.

"We have compulsory gymnasium work for men and women for two years of the course," he said. "And the students enjoy this training so much that they seldom abandon it. Most of them are regular in their gymnasium work during all four years. We do not let athletics interfere with other academic work—one 'condition' keeps a student from representing Grinnell on a team.

"And, on the other hand, we do not neglect the importance of athletics as a regular and important part of the curriculum. For example, recently one of our most brilliant students was, as he thought, ready for his degree. But it was discovered that he had not completed one semester of his required gymnasium work. So he was obliged to take that work and pass his examination in it before he could graduate. Our object in all our gymnasium work is to give the student health consciousness, just as by means of our music and other exercises in the arts we try to give them aesthetic consciousness."

Grinnell College has grown to be a leader among American institutions of learning, particularly in regard to its work in the political, economic, and social sciences. President Main told a little of its pioneer work in this direction.

"Back in the seventies," he said, "when the political sciences were just beginning to receive recognition, Prof. Jesse Macy, who has just retired from active work after forty years of service to Grinnell, was teaching history and giving it political and social interpretation. Grinnell became one of the first colleges in the country to give systematic and practical attention to the teaching of political science.

"Prof. Macy was in the course of time made Professor of Political Science. His work gained recognition at home and abroad, and at present four men are giving full time to the teaching of subjects naturally associated under the same general head. In addition there are four lecturers on business, commercial, and corporation law.

Has Written Much.

"Prof. Macy is a recognized authority on both sides of the Atlantic on problems of government, international relations, peace and arbitration, and party systems. His textbooks, which have been widely used for thirty years, have contributed notably to the better understanding of problems of government, local, national, and international.

"Prof. Steiner is generally considered a leading American authority on problems of emigration and the numerous social and political problems arising from it. His books, especially 'On the Trail of the Immigrant,' have done valuable work in shaping public opinion and in directing attention to problems arising from race movements and national and international relationships. Prof. Wyckoff is a student of industrial problems, social economics, business organizations, finance, transportation, trusts and corporations, and their relation to public welfare. Assistant Prof. Gannoway has given special attention to legislative methods, political organization, administrative systems and the relation of politics and the press.

"These men are actually conducting a department of public affairs, a school of citizenship. I think that this work done in Grinnell, in an independent institution supported by the voluntary contributions of interested friends, is unique in American colleges."

President Main spoke with considerable enthusiasm, for he was dealing with a subject evidently very near his heart. "A distinct function for the college student," he said, "should be to teach citizenship. At Grinnell we think that good citizenship is no more an accident than is good engineering or good professional capacity in any line of action. Good citizenship has a historical, an economic, a social, a political basis. Every day it is having wider application, and it is coming to include world relationships. That no college has recognized this fact in a practical and organized way is an educational oversight that should have speedy correction.

"There are recognized groupings of subjects in nearly all colleges of good standing that relate more or less directly, in the way of general preparation, to the technical and learned professions, but there are few or none relating to citizenship.

What Grinnell Seeks.

"There may easily be an oversupply of schools and courses leading to the various technical and professional callings. There is no danger that there will be an overemphasis on courses leading to a clear understanding of problems of government and public affairs. Every college man, whatever may be his plans for his life work, has a right to claim an introduction to such subjects, for he is to be not merely a citizen of a country, but a citizen of the world. And that is our chief aim at Grinnell, to make our students in the fullest sense citizens of the United States and citizens of the world."

"I suppose you have not many foreign-born students at Grinnell?" asked the reporter.

"No," answered President Main. "Our students are American born for the most part. But they are not all from Iowa. Twenty-three States were represented last year.

"No student," he said in answer to a question, "spends more than $500 a year for tuition, food, lodging, clothing, everything. In his senior year a student who is well to do may spend $600, perhaps, but the average yearly expenditure is about $500.

"Grinnell College is a democratic institution. If the student is not democratic when he enters we give him democracy. What higher purpose can a college have than to be a school of citizenship?"

RAND GYMNASIUM FOR WOMEN.

FARCE, COMEDY, AND MELODRAMA IN THE CHIROPODIST'S OFFICE

How One Would-Be Swindler Lost a Foot—Women Better Patients Than Men.

NOW that chiropodists have attained the dignity of a society that gives banquets with Bishops for guests, anything that a member of the society says deserves respect. Therefore, when one taper-finger expert declares that he knows as much about human nature as he knows about feet—nearly—it does not become the layman to contradict him, but to seek for further particulars. These the expert furnishes, prefacing them with the cheerful statement that business is going with a whoop.

"It always is brisk in the Autumn and Winter seasons," he says. "As a rule we are not very busy in the Summer, but when the town season opens and people get on their dancing togs and raise a crop of chilblains by standing around on cold curbs for ten or fifteen minutes at a stretch waiting for cars and motors, with nothing but a thin layer of silk and paper between the foot and the stone, then our harvest begins.

"The majority of our customers in the Winter time are women. In the Summer men are our best patrons. The cold months, therefore, are not only most profitable financially, but they are most pleasant, for no matter what carping, pessimistic critics may say, I have always found women enough sight more tractable as patients than men. It is true that they are nervous and flighty at times while under treatment, and given to crying out before they are hurt, but men are always doing that from the time they take the chair until they get up.

"Why, all the funny, odd incidents that have come up in my experience illustrating peculiar twists of character have had a man for the central figure.

"It was a man that was at the bottom of that Armstrong case that came so near to working my utter ruin four or five years ago. Orin Armstrong was his name. He was a funny duck. I remember as well as if it were yesterday the day he first came into my office. He was a thin, pale, little fellow, all a-quiver with nervousness, which was caused, he said, by the intense pain he was suffering from pedal infirmities.

"'My foot is in a terrible condition,' he said, 'and it will take a tip-top chiropodist to treat it. Do you think you are competent to undertake the case?'

"'If I wasn't,' said I, 'I wouldn't be here.'

"That settled him for a while, and I set to work. I exercised extreme care in the operation, and after an hour or so I had him all trimmed, anointed, and bandaged. 'Now,' said I, 'I think you'd better come in day after to-morrow and let me know how you are getting along.'

"Before he went away I gave him a simple, harmless lotion, with instructions to apply it to the disabled foot in case he should suffer pain from the wounds I had inflicted. When the day of the appointment came round I looked for Mr. Armstrong, according to agreement, but he did not come. The next day he failed to put in an appearance, but on the third morning I received a telephone message asking me to call at his house without delay. I went over in post haste and found Armstrong in bed, surrounded by half a dozen doctors and nurses, and a host of weeping relatives. Armstrong was weak, but he was not incapacitated for speech.

"'You infernal rascal,' he said, 'you've done me up in good shape. You've finished me, that's what you've done.'

"I turned white to my finger tips. 'What's the matter?' I gasped.

"'Blood poison,' said one of the doctors.

"'It was that stuff you gave me to put on my foot that did the business,' said Armstrong. 'It was rank poison and rushed all through my system like a flame of fire in a can of oil.'

"I was already quaking like a leaf, and when the doctor said, 'It is still barely possible that his life may be saved, but amputation will be necessary as a means thereto,' I thought I should expire with dread. But even in the throes of agony I retained sufficient presence of mind to defend my medicine.

"'It may be,' I said, 'that this gentleman is suffering from blood poison, but I am in no way responsible for it, as the lotion I gave him is absolutely pure. If you doubt my word, give it to an expert chemist and have it tested.'

"'There isn't any left,' Armstrong put in. 'I used it all on my feet.'

"'But I have plenty at my office,' I said, 'and I insist upon the test.'

"'I am afraid,' said the doctor, 'that the substitution wouldn't be accepted by a jury. We couldn't prove, you know, but that there had been some mistake in the mixing of the lotion, whereby some poisonous element was introduced into the liquid you gave Mr. Armstrong. At any rate, he has been poisoned, and that through the foot, which must be cut off immediately in order to save the rest of his body.'

"All in vain did I protest and argue and explain. Armstrong's foot was amputated, and as soon as he was able to be about again he brought suit against me for $5,000.

"Of course I fought the case, but the jury decided in his favor, and every stick of property I had in the world was about to be attached to settle the indebtedness when his wife flew into a tantrum and gave the whole show away. Armstrong, it seems, was a loafer and a schemer from the word go. He had deliberately rubbed poison into the lacerated portions of his foot, with the malicious intention of recovering damages. He was actually so lazy and good-for-nothing that he preferred losing a leg to working and earning an honest living, and I was the victim whom he had selected to furnish him with the income which he argued the world owed him.

"That was the worst scrape I have ever been in since I became a chiropodist," the expert went on, "but I have had other experiences with one-footed people that are worth mentioning.

"Take that man Parker, for instance. He is my most reliable customer. He comes in every Tuesday afternoon at 3 o'clock, rain or shine, just as regularly as clockwork.

"I've learned to know the man pretty well, and I think a heap of him now, but on the occasion of his first visit, more than a year ago, he scared me into a duck fit. I thought sure he was crazy. He came thumping into the office one day as big as Pompey and plumped himself down into that chair without saying aye, yea, or no to anybody.

"'Left foot,' said he. 'Will you get to work?'

"His feet were encased in silk gaiters and silk hose, which peeled off easily, and before I realized what had happened to me I was sitting here on the floor with his shoes and stockings in my hand, looking at a foot that made me feel as if I had run up against a ghost.

"'Heavens and earth, man,' I said, 'you don't want me to treat that foot, do you? Why, that's papier mache.'

"'Of course,' said he. 'Don't you suppose I know that as well as you do? I want it treated, anyway, That foot gives me more trouble than ten ordinary feet. I haven't had a minute's peace since I got it.

"'It is every bit as bad as the one I lost six months ago. That one always gave me no end of trouble, and I had spent so much money on it and had suffered so much in the operations that I really felt relieved when a mowing machine came along one day close to where I was lying under a tree and shaved it off.

"'I thought that at last I should enjoy a respite from torture. But it was not to be so. All during the time of my convalescence I endured intense agony from strange, shooting pains which it was impossible to locate. But the minute I put on that artificial limb it was easy enough to give the misery a local habitation and a name. The infirmities that had been peculiar to my lost foot straightway reappeared in this, and I can gain relief only by resorting to the same old treatment.'

"The foot looked all right, but he described its imaginary excrescences in detail, and as soon as I recovered my wind I began to peel. I have been peeling every Tuesday since. I have already whittled away two feet, which the old gentleman has had to replace at a cost of $50, but he says he doesn't mind that so long as the weekly operation affords relief."

FIRST INDUSTRIAL SURVEY OF NEW YORK IS NOW ON

The Merchants' Association Is Directing a Remarkable Collection of Data Which Will Aid in Bringing Factories to New York City and in Bettering Facilities of Factories Now Here.

THE Merchants' Association of New York has undertaken to make a survey of New York City. This is not to be the surveying of streets or building lots, the making of drawings or blueprints. This survey is to be an economic survey—a survey of the industrial and economic features of Greater New York.

The survey is being made for the purpose of finding out exactly what New York's situation is regarding industrial advantages and disadvantages. After this is found out The Merchants' Association proposes to take steps to eliminate the disadvantages wherever feasible and to give publicity to the advantages for the purpose of developing the industries of the city.

The impression seems to have gone out that New York is handicapped as to its industrial facilities in comparison with other cities, usually smaller and farther West. This impression is the result of ignorance. Experts declare that for every factory which moves away from New York, ten new factories come into existence, and five factories from somewhere else move in.

The facts about the industries of New York are notable. The public usually thinks of Chicago and Philadelphia as great manufacturing centres. But of New York it is often said: "New York is not a manufacturing city; it is commercial; trade is the breath of life to New York."

Has Commanding Lead.

The fact is that New York City is the greatest manufacturing centre in the world. New York's manufactured products—products actually made here, and not including those of nearby New Jersey—are greater than the products of Chicago and Philadelphia put together. Pittsburgh's products are but a drop in the bucket compared to those of New York. This city produces almost one-sixteenth of the manufactured goods in the United States.

New York produces one-quarter of all the country's printed goods, and this includes newspaper and job printing, which is carried on at every four corners throughout the land.

New York produces more than one-half of the clothing of the United States.

There are over 700,000 men and women working in the factories of New York; this is considerably more than the combined factory populations of Philadelphia and Chicago.

There are more workers in factories in New York City than in Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Cincinnati, St. Louis, Detroit, Boston, Rochester, and Buffalo combined.

In the past, New York has made no special effort to develop its industries and manufactures. They have been allowed to take care of themselves. As a result many factories have moved away from here, not because conditions elsewhere are better, but because the manufacturers have not fully understood all the facts and their significance in regard to conditions in New York and other cities. New York is so large that it is quite possible to have a poor location in one section while an admirable one in another section may be unoccupied and unheard of.

New York is declared to need a sentinel to stand guard over its industries and protect them from enemies within and without. Marauders from other cities are constantly coming in and inducing industries to move away. Their soft words are often backed up by such hard facts as free sites, bonuses and remission of taxes.

Cities all over the country are clamoring for new industries. Every town of sufficient importance to appear on the map—and some of not so much importance—are bidding for factories. Many of these cities aid their claims with cold cash. Ignorant of what constitutes an industrial city, without knowledge as to the requisites of successful manufacturing, some of these towns have plunged ahead. They have raised big bonuses and presented them to designing promoters who erect flimsy factory buildings—sometimes only promise to erect them—and then, after a few weeks or months, depart for new fields, leaving behind them empty factories, empty pocketbooks, but heads wise and full of experience.

HENRY R. TOWNE

INDUSTRIES IN WHICH NEW YORK CITY LEADS.

New York stands first among the cities of the United States in the following industries:

Artificial Flowers, Feathers	$21,098,000	Gas Illuminating and Heating	$84,117,000
Blacking and Polishing Preparations	1,898,000	Gold and Silver, Leaf and Foil	833,000
Bread and Other Bakery Products	61,904,000	Hair Work	7,817,000
Boxes, Cigar	1,843,000	Ink, Printing	3,965,000
Boxes, Fancy and Paper	9,450,000	Jewelry	20,350,000
Buttons	5,235,000	Leather Goods	17,775,000
Chemicals	12,945,000	Liquors, Malt	53,400,000
Clothing, Men's	218,411,000	Marble and Stone Work	12,205,000
Clothing, Women's	266,477,000	Millinery, Lace Goods	51,230,000
Coffins, Undertakers' Goods	2,102,000	Musical Instruments, Pianos, Organs	25,516,000
Confectionery	20,092,000	Paint, Varnish	20,664,000
Cooperage	8,446,000	Paper Goods	8,838,000
Copper, Tin, Sheet-Iron Products	23,303,000	Patent Medicines, Druggist Preparations	24,984,000
Cordage, Twine, Jute, Linen Goods	7,874,000	Pens, Fountain	3,219,000
Engravers' Materials	828,000	Photo-Engraving	2,517,000
Fancy Articles	6,987,000	Pipes, Tobacco	3,137,000
Flags, Regalia, Society Emblems	1,347,000	Printing and Publishing	183,509,000
Food Preparations	8,046,000	Smelting and Refining	8,417,000
Furnishing Goods, Men's	25,498,000	Tobacco Manufactures	62,488,000
Furs and Fur Skins, Dressed	41,033,000	Toys, Novelties	1,634,000
Gas and Electric Fixtures, Lamps, Reflectors	10,750,000	Umbrella Canes	6,374,000
		Stereotyping, Electrotyping	1,961,000
		Window Shades, Fixtures	4,125,000

A city needs an industrial survey for the same reason.

A city, industrially speaking, has a certain stock in trade—a stock in trade like no other city. This stock is always changing; inroads are made upon it from this direction and from that; it is being added to, now in this way, now in that. This industrial stock in trade consists of the market, its variety or its richness in certain lines; of the labor supply, its quantity or its special ability; of the railroads and terminal facilities; of the navigable waterways, the rivers, bays, piers, and docks; of the industries, their greatness in numbers or their greatness in reputation; of the availability and cheapness of new industrial sites; of the accessibility of raw materials for this or that line of manufacture; of the nearness or cheapness of fuel; of the economy of power; of the health and happiness of the community and of all that goes to make it. The big city as well as the small city can make good use of the survey.

Experts say that no policy could be more futile than for a city to attempt, without due consideration of its own resources, to attract factories and industries. It may be that such manufactures, attracted by free sites or exemption from taxes or bonuses, are entirely unsuited to the locality. A keen analysis of a city's resources will point out what industries can, with advantage to all concerned, be encouraged.

On the other hand an industrial survey may, and probably will, reveal in industrial conditions serious defects which can be improved. The improvements, when made, will not only very much assist the industrial interests already located, but will also, in themselves, attract other industries.

The first and most important facts to be gathered in an industrial survey are those general ones which are already known and need only to be collected and put into usable form. Such are the facts concerning population, industries, health, geographical location, and physical characteristics of the locality. Here also will be included the number of railroads, statistics on the route and terminal facilities, data on the water-frontage, docks and piers, on the amount of traffic, the commerce, exports and imports.

Important Features.

The next most important set of facts might be included under the term "market." These are the facts which make one town a centre for the printing industry, another a centre for the glove industry, still another a centre for the automobile industry. These are the facts which cannot always be stated in figures, and it is often not easy to explain why this city predominates in a certain industry and that city in another.

But, having acquired such prestige, it is a decided advantage for the manufacturer to be located near the recognized market. Therefore, all the facts about the localization of industry, the various lines of related products, specialized machinery, and the whole arrangement of resources with special regard to such an industry are of special importance.

No group of facts is more important and more difficult to investigate successfully than the labor supply. The labor supply is usually the first and last concern of the employer. Yet the public knows little or nothing of the labor supply and what are thought to be facts are probably more inaccurate and unreliable than in the case of any other group of industrial statistics.

The complexity of the labor market is illustrated by the great variety of factors entering into it. It has to be ascertained what nationalities are predominant and whether they are literate or illiterate. Are skilled workers plentiful or is this a great market for the unskilled and untrained? Among these workers are qualities of leadership found which may be developed into foremanship? Are the workers efficient or inefficient and at what lines of work? Long training in a single group of industries may have fitted or unfitted them for some other industry.

The employer with a bigger vision looks—or will look—for the other elements. The housing facilities—are they adequate or inadequate, good or bad? Can workers be expected to retain reasonably good health while living there? Are there wholesome facilities for recreation and amusement? Are the standards of the community high or low? Is the cost of living such that happy, normal, healthy family life will be encouraged? All these things are in addition to such pertinent facts as wages, hours, and unorganized labor.

Still another group of facts which should play an important part in an industrial survey are what might be included under the term "natural resources" of the city, such items as the accessibility of raw materials, the supply of fuel and power, and the availability of sites suitable for manufacturing.

The result above all others that will follow from an industrial survey will be a body of data for a comprehensive plan of industrial development. It will give:

First, the actual state of existing industrial conditions.

Second, the strong industrial points of the city.

Third, the weak points of the city from an industrial point of view.

To the city which is developing a city plan, the industrial survey is of prime importance. For the things fundamental to a city's growth are its commerce and industries. Its commerce is determined mainly by its transportation facilities, water, and rail. Its industries are determined by a complexity of causes which are fundamental in a city's growth—transportation facilities, proximity to power and fuel, the probable market, the supply of labor.

The industrial survey further exerts an influence which it is hard to measure in any tangible way. This lies in the growth of public spirit. To each citizen is brought home just what his city stands for, what it has done, what it is doing, and what it hopes to do. He sees its virtues and its faults. A civic awakening occurs—as it did in Pittsburgh, Birmingham, and other cities.

To carry out this industrial survey the Merchants' Association has established an Industrial Bureau, under the direction of the Industrial Committee, one of the most active of the association's committees. This committee is composed of Henry Morgenthau, Chairman; F. H. Bethell, John F. Calderwood, Clair Foster, John F. Galvin, Frank Hedley, W. H. Milnor, and C. G. M. Thomas.

The formation of the Industrial Bureau is due to the fact all over the country there has come into existence in the last few years a new form of community organization—co-operative action on the part of the business community to build up the home town and the local neighborhood. The business men of many communities have realized that they prosper as the city prospers, that their success depends upon the progress of the city in which they live, depends on the growth of commerce, trade, manufactures, and population.

One of the most important of the various activities of these commercial organizations has been the encouragement and development of new industries.

New York City as a whole has never carried on any work looking to the establishment of new industries. So her industries became the prey of every crossroads commercial organization in the country. They all had the same story—cheap land, cheap rents, cheap taxes, cheap labor, and cheap everything. It looked attractive and many a manufacturer took the bait and swallowed it whole. Many a New York manufacturer has furnished thunder for local commercial organizations and has paid dearly for this privilege.

Advantages vs. Drawbacks.

The argument always brought into play by other cities when seeking a New York manufacturer is "the heavy cost of manufacturing in New York." And experts admit that it does cost more to manufacture in New York than to run the same plant in Utica, or Alliance, Ohio; or Streator, Ill., or Baton Rouge, La. Land in any of these can be bought at a much less figure than in New York City. Taxes, insurance, power and even some of the labor might be cheaper.

The manufacturer's paper and in- accounting may thus show him cost- items of expense in New York City but fail to show him the great ad- vantages he derives from this metro- polis of trade, commerce, and manu- facturing. A financial statement shows only what is paid out and not what is saved in transportation charges, not what is saved on in- coming water consignments, not why a large volume of business has come into existence because of a location at its great market, not how a skilled and inexhaustible labor supply has been at hand to meet every emergency. The financial statement does not even show the ease of securing capital to carry business over the periods of heavy buying.

The Industrial Bureau has thus found many functions to perform. It seeks to offset the advances and blandishments of other cities, and to show the manufacturers now located in other cities that they can economically locate in New York. It is not sufficient, however, for an Industrial Bureau in New York to talk in vague and glittering generalities.

The Industrial Bureau has another function, besides that of getting in new factories. This is the improving of local conditions, so that the city will afford better facilities for industrial development. The officers say that in no department of its work can the Industrial Bureau be more useful, nor can it utilize to such good advantage the material and information collected by the industrial survey, because it is more to any city to have the industries already located therein succeed than to bring in new enterprises comparatively unknown and untried.

SHE BETS AND SHRIEKS AND PITCHES AWAY HER MUFF---THE FOOTBALL GIRL

Girls Frivolous and Sedate, Girls Artistic and Practical, Girls Pretty and Not So Pretty, Girls Witty and Dull--- All Get the Grip of the Game.

A DAINTY tea gown, and on it spatters a very small drop of tea.

"Oh, I beg pardon, Elise."

A flinty stare.

"Bob, you're very careless. You know, dear boy, tea stains. And papa doesn't buy my gowns by the dozen."

A drenching rain descending upon the football crowd.

"Elise, you're getting soaked. Hadn't we better go in?"

"Go in?" Her look is drippingly scornful. "Why, I wouldn't for the world."

Can Münsterberg explain her? Does James tell ue why? Yet isn't it so? Isn't the football girl a different species, a new variety of the ever-changing type, Woman?

Football to her is an end; everything else a means. She hoards pennies, she borrows clothes, she travels hours, she braves weather, she endures hardships, she outs exams, she eludes chaperons, she breaks rules, she catches grippe—she does anything and everything for the sake of a football game.

Meek little girls who don't know a forward pass from a Highland fling shriek ecstatically at the first ten yards, and at a touchdown throw their muffs away for very joy. Sedate girls, all unconscious of form, clutch their escorts' arms, squeeze their hands, and pound their knees. Precise girls revert to the vernacular: "Swat him, oh, oh, go it! Eat 'em up, old boy!" Frivolous girls forget their red noses and blue chins and blowing tresses, and sing blithely on, regardless of dishevelment. Artistic girls wear orange streamers on red coats and glory in their daring. Schoolmarms beat the air, sigh, groan, howl. Ugly girls glow and sparkle. Vivacious girls stiffen and grow tragic. Sensible girls sob and laugh. And they all adore it from the depths of their souls and care not whether the rest of the world survive.

What is it? Why is it football takes such a hold on them, makes them new people, turns the rules upside down, and complicates the woman problem a hundredfold? It's a chapter the psychologists have yet to write.

It might be technical appreciation if they knew anything about the game, but they usually don't. A few with brothers can follow the plays, and a very rare one may really understand. But most of them can only appreciate the stack-up, and know that a touchdown means 2. Playing on the boarding school basket ball team does help, but it cannot give the fine points.

It might be the old primitive instinct for fight and blood, the love for warfare and combat. The cave woman watched her man cleave his axe into the head of the animal, and yowled and howled with all the satisfaction of an appetite appeased. The Roman lady leaned far over her box railing to watch the sharp, deadly struggle of the gladiators. The Spanish señorita claps her hands in delight at the onward rush of the bull.

But the football girl is not so bloodthirsty. She shudders and sighs at the entanglement of legs and arms, and at the slightest accident there is a gentle wailing all over the grandstand.

"Oh, what's the matter?"

"Poor chap!"

"Do you think he's hurt badly?"

"The brutes, they all jumped on him at once!"

"Oh, is that a doctor?"

"There, now he's up again."

"Oh, I'm so glad!"

"See how he limps."

"I don't see how he can play."

"Isn't he brave?"

Surely, the tender-hearted football girl does not hunger for human life.

What is it, then? The gaming, gambling love of chance? The conjecture of outcome, the flirting with odds, the wooing of the little god, Fortune?

For they pore over sporting sheets in the college library and wonder and guess and—bet as to the results. While their brothers are staking their fortunes and reputations, the little sisters are not idle.

"I'm betting on Princeton this week, Sally Jane. I have three boxes of fudge up now."

"Well, of course, you know you're going to lose those bets, for Yale is the boy this week."

"Want to bet?"

"Yes. What?"

"Oh—a crepe de chine tie. I'm dying for one, and if I lose I can borrow yours."

Yes, there is something of a gambler there.

Is it loyalty to a cause that moves the football girl, the heroic spirit of Boadicea, Joan of Arc, Emmeline Pankhurst? For they are loyal to the bitter end. In the face of victory they smile proudly and triumph openly. In the teeth of defeat and ignominy they boast, they vaunt, they defend. Dear old Whatever-It-May-Be forever! Down with opponents! Take that and that and that!

The football girl's reason for loyalty is not always so obvious as the fact. Often it is because some "bright particular" graces the halls of the favored university, a brother or otherwise. Brothers are safer, for then the allegiance does not swerve. But it is awkward for a girl to root for Harvard for two years, and then because she doesn't speak to the man any more to be calling for the blood of fair Harvard the next. Awkward and disconcerting.

"Why, Betty Lou, I thought you were strong for Harvard."

"No more, my dear; he's a horrid man. And Billy goes to Cornell, you know."

One little girl has no brothers, no Billies, but she does have her football shrine.

"I picked out Princeton, because it's in New Jersey, and my uncle lives in New Jersey, you know. And I thought tiger furs would be becoming to me, and I'm crazy about Woodrow Wilson."

West Point and Annapolis have their fiercely faithful constituents. Uniforms and gold buttons, military hops and officerships are strong appeals.

The football girl molds her life to the season. Saturday classes are absolutely tabooed; week-end invitations are politely declined until after Thanksgiving, and the wardrobe is planned accordingly.

"I'm going to pamper myself and buy a white chinchilla coat, girls. I must have it for the Yale-Harvard game, and I saw a beauty in the window. Yes, I know I need a suit, but I've got to have that coat for the game, that's all. It's just the thing to wear violets on."

"It's much easier to dress in the Winter than it is in the Summer, don't you think? I remember last Spring when I went up to the boat races, I fussed about dresses and waists and ribbons and ruches until I was nearly crazy. But for a football game, put on a big coat, a smashy little hat, your room-mate's furs, and your toilet is complete. The chrysanthemums will do the rest."

"Oh, isn't it corking that we're all going? I can scarcely wait until Saturday. Don't you wish the football season lasted forever?"

"Forever!"

Adorable, but can you explain her?

Goethals' Job

Is there any job to fill
That requires the utmost skill?
Who's the chap to fill the bill?
Goethals.

Is a city on the blink?
Who's the man of whom they think?
Offer quicker than a wink?
Goethals.

When New York would fain bestir
A Police Commissioner,
Who's the man for whom they spur?
Goethals.

Any one without a cook,
With a wild appealing look
Offers all if they can book
Goethals.

McLANDBURGH WILSON.

At Fourscore

THE hours glide tranquilly away;
I mourn not the unfinished task;
I watch the placid close of day,
Nor answer give nor question ask.

I grieve not for the counsel spurned,
The broken will, the conscience stilled,
The long, hard lesson yet unlearned,
The purpose unfulfilled.

No Spring can wake the old desires;
No sadness greets the fallen leaf;
In ashes of the ancient fires
Relives no spark, however brief.

I reck not now the battle's stress,
The distant cries, the trampled plain;
Ah, respite after weariness!
Quiescence after pain!

POLITICS AND ECONOMICS OF WATER POWER CONSERVATION

A New Conflict Between State and Federal Interests and Powers—Conservation for the Future Versus Utilization in the Present.

THE National Conservation Congress was founded as a Western body five years ago. It held its fifth meeting in Washington in the latter part of November, and was captured by the element which the Western contingent calls the Eastern "dream book conservationists." The result was a split which has the capacity of playing an important part in the next and near Presidential campaign, for which the pipes are already being laid.

The alleged "dream book" chief showed a high degree of practicality in the manner in which he captured the organization and reversed the programme devised against him when it was upon the verge of realization. A meeting of the Forest Association was called for the day preceding the Conservation Congress, and it was no more than natural that those who attended the association meeting should also attend the congress.

Among them were 162 accredited from the District of Columbia, and mostly members of the Government Forest and other services. The District of Columbia counted for sixteen times the State of Washington, where the congress was born. New York had sixty-eight votes, and Oregon seven. In the words of one of the founders of the congress, Albert Johnson, the Representative in Congress from the State of Washington:

> When a vote was taken without a roll call, the voice of the East sounded like the voice of Niagara; while the voice of the West sounded like the chirp of a canary bird; on a vote by States the Eastern States found themselves with twenty votes and the Western States with but ten. Most of the Southern States had ten delegates along with the West, and no Western idea of outline was given the slightest consideration. The men who had founded, financed and kept alive the Conservation Congress found themselves neither welcomed nor wanted.
> The whole thing was a sample of what may be expected under increased Federal bureaucracy.

Pinchot for Senator.

The politics played in the congress had reflex action outside. It had hardly adjourned before it was announced that Gifford Pinchot was a candidate for Senator from Pennsylvania, where he has a home at Milford. In the same week with the congress was published the autobiography of the arch conservationist, Mr. Roosevelt, wherein he propounds theories regarding his eligibility as a third-term candidate which make it impossible to doubt his ambition to be the first President for a third term. Apart from these two candidacies, which cannot be said to be substantial at present, is the certainty that wherever there are Progressive candidates conservation is part of their platform. For this reason it is important to know what conservation means since the congress, which defined it anew and differently from ever before.

Proceedings of the Congress.

The Water Powers Committee unanimously reported a declaration of principles which was approved by a vote of 434 to 154. The report was in favor of Federal control, and was supported by President Taft's Secretary of the Interior, Walter L. Fisher; Gifford Pinchot, President Roosevelt's Forester; James R. Garfield, President Roosevelt's Secretary of the Interior; President Taft's Secretary of War, Henry L. Stimson of New York, and others as well known in politics as in conservation. The Arkansas and Washington delegations left the congress in a body, alleging that it had been packed in the manner already described. In the words of a Vice President of the Congress, Walker Powell of Little Rock:

> We have discovered that the brand of conservationists attempting to run the National Conservation Congress are in the game from selfish reasons, and we have decided to withdraw from the organization.

C. L. Watts, one of the Alabama delegates, startled the convention by charging that the Vice President of the Alabama Water Power Company was a member of the delegation to the congress from that State, and that there was "a dark plot laid to defeat the will of the majority in this congress."

As a result the irrigation and water power interests called a meeting to form a permanent organization, which will be entirely divorced from the National Conservation Congress.

The next day the Federal conservationists pressed their advantage. The declaration of principles was only favorable to them by interpretation and by construction of the incidents of the day. There had been an unmistakable State rights majority resolution, and an unmistakable minority Federal control resolution. The rules were suspended for the discussion of water power conservation on the open floor.

Steam Roller Was Working.

Scores protested that the proceedings were irregular, and that the congress really preferred a mingling of State and Federal control, but the steam roller was under excellent control and Federal control won another victory. The State rights majority report by two to one had condemned the present policy, and had urged development as rapid as consistent with public interests. This reflected upon the deviser and promoter of that policy, Gifford Pinchot, and he secured from the congress the adoption of the minority report.

There was no love lost between the opposing camps. Ambition and selfish personal reasons were motives attributed to the Federalists. The Federalists declared that the States' rights faction were reactionaries who sought to make it appear that conservation spells reservation to future generations of what is needed for the present. The Congress closed with a condemnation of monopolistic control of water powers. During the proceedings Charles L. Pack, President of the Congress, took occasion to exclaim to Mr. Pinchot:

> "Oh, Gifford, Gifford! We have been friends for years. For ten years I have stood by you in everything that you have urged. But we have reached the parting of the ways. I cannot follow you in a course that seems to me destined to disrupt and nullify every bit of good that the Conservation Association has done. I am through."

The Kansas, New Mexico, and Wyoming delegations walked out, following the lead of Arkansas; the Colorado and New York delegations split.

The argument upon which Mr. Pinchot carried his case was that concentration in water power control has doubled in ten years. The ten leading groups control now twice as much as the leading ten controlled ten years ago. The ten leading interests to-day control 65 per cent. of all the developed water powers in the United States. Concentration increases faster than development because "high risks and low returns keep capital away." And yet the fact is that water power investments are safer than other industrial ventures.

That they are attractive to capital is not open to doubt, for there is an exact official statement on record, made when President Roosevelt first raised this issue. The Bureau of Corporations then reported that inventions and discoveries had made electric transmission of power commercially possible over a 200-mile radius, opening 120,000 square miles of area to the sale of power from a single plant. The result was a strong impetus to concentration of the business in the hands of those leaders in the industry most aware of the opportunities opened. Strictly judicial proof of community of interests between undertakings apparently independent was not obtainable, but evidential facts and obvious deductions were reported by Commissioner Smith.

He lists the water power enterprises controlled by the General Electric and Westinghouse concerns and individuals associated with them in details not suitable for reproduction here, but which are accessible in the official report.

In summary the General Electric controlled then, at the beginning of the tendency toward concentration, 252,000 horse power, the Westinghouse 180,000 horse power, other large companies 875,000 horse power. Adding the horse powers of affiliated interests, thirteen selected companies control 1,827,000 horse power.

According to the census, the total installation is 5,300,000 horse power, so that these thirteen companies control one-third of the horse power, and probably one-half of the strategic sites whose control restrains the development of those less excellent from fear of potential competition. The control of the power carries control of the industries dependent upon the power and marks a tendency regarding water power resembling that regarding oil, coal and iron resources, which are mostly in the hands of owners who use or refrain from use according to their individual judgment of their individual interests.

The conservationists' plea is that this tendency should be checked before it is too late, and before the water power passes from public control. The opponents of this view take the ground that the public needs development rather than control. They assert that since the original Federal legislation in 1906 only seven plants have been built, and only two are of considerable size. Investors cannot be induced, they argue, to furnish capital for developments under permits subject to revocation at the discretion of an official.

Alaskan Possibilities.

The specific argument regarding water power is strengthened by reference to the experience regarding Alaska, which has fallen under the influence of similar ideas of public control. After visiting Alaska Mr. Roosevelt said that it was capable of supporting a population as great as that of the Scandinavian peninsula, or nearly 8,000,000. In 1900 the population of Alaska was 63,592, and in 1910 it had gained 764.

So complete is the stagnation that it is recognized no progress can be made without Governmental intervention, and proposals are pending for the expenditure of a score or two of millions of taxpayers' funds in the construction of a Government railway. That undoubtedly would attract population, and make accessible the buried coal and copper and other natural resources which are conserved by natural difficulties even more effectually than by statutes. With millions of acres of forests and coal deposits Alaska imports timber and fuel.

The Government has accepted $800,000 from would-be coal miners, some of the money being paid a decade ago. But not an acre has been granted, nor a dollar returned. British Columbia affords an example of a contrary policy. It is being developed rather than conserved, and by Americans rather than Canadians, who mine and sell coal to Alaska and transport it over roads which conservation prevents being built in Alaska.

Theory Against Practice.

The reason why the Conservation Congress split into Eastern and Western fragments seems to be explained by the fact that the East knows conservation only as a theory for political use, while the West suffers from it as a practical matter. In the United States there are conserved 190,328,733 acres of forest. The total area of forest reservation east of the Mississippi is under one million acres. It was the West which seceded from the Conservation Congress in which the minority report was adopted by methods already described.

It is unwilling to suffer regarding its power development as it is suffering regarding its forests, agriculture, and mines. In the two States, Oregon and Washington, there is a potentiality of 5,000,000 horse power, and there is a development of 300,000. It may not be premature to begin a policy of conservation, but it might be moderate until the progress of development is further along.

A beginning might be made in the utilization of the 1,400,000 horse power running to waste over Government dams, or one-quarter of the total horse power in use. There is a theoretical capacity of water power development to replace every mechanical power now in use, including all the uses of power for manufacturing, transportation, and lighting. But it would be folly to pour millions into water powers for the purpose of making valueless investments in mines. Because running water costs nothing it does not follow either that it is worth nothing or that it can be made of priceless worth. Unharnessed water is like unmined metals.

It is worth nothing until investment has made it valuable, and its value then depends upon questions of competitive substitutes. The theory of conservation is subject to economic limitations which defy universal application either by inflexible statutes or by official discretion which opens the way to many abuses. Each water power is essentially local in its uses and individual in its conditions.

Government many miles distant is not qualified to judge regarding matters about which it is hardly possible to be right without separate inquiry. Here lies the root of the split of the Congress into State rights and Federal wings. Even if the treaty is right the practice of conservation in the Washington style is not liked by those who have experienced it.

Do the water powers belong to the States, as they own the public lands within their boundaries? If the States own the water powers ought the nation to control their development on the ground that the States lack the power?

It was over these questions that President Roosevelt first ran athwart the Supreme Court and announced his theories of nation supremacy, regardless of the constitutional source of the power he sought to exercise.

The Arkansas River rises in the mountains of Colorado, near Leadville, flows through Colorado about 357 miles, about the same distance through Kansas, and thence southeasterly through Oklahoma and Arkansas to the Mississippi River. Settlers in Western Kansas dug ditches to irrigate lands adjacent to the stream with capacity to absorb the flow of the river. Citizens of Colorado later did the same, with the result that the river runs dry at the time the Kansans want the water of which they first made use. Litigation followed.

Kansas asserted a claim to have the river run to it from Colorado, although Kansas proposed to act toward Oklahoma as Colorado acted toward Kansas. The United States intervened, claiming that the river was interstate in its character, and that the right of the nation was superior to the right of the respective States.

Hoyt Sent to Talk.

It was a novel case, for the Arkansas River is not navigable in those regions. There was no written law governing the question which the Supreme Court was asked to adjudicate. Neither was there any precedent for the Government's intervention. At the same time the National Irrigation act was threatened, with destruction of all the public and private investments under it. Under these conditions President Roosevelt sent Solicitor General Hoyt to make an argument in support of national regulation from necessity of the case. The argument for Federal control was thus stated by Justice Brewer:

> Counsel for the Government relies upon the doctrine of sovereign and inherent power, adding: "I am aware that in advancing this doctrine I seem to challenge the great decisions of this court, and I speak with deference." His argument runs substantially along this line: All legislative power must be vested either in the State or the National Government; no legislative powers belong to a State Government other than those which affect solely the internal affairs of that State; consequently all powers which are national in their scope must be found vested in the Congress of the United States.
> It was a far-reaching claim, and made not regarding water alone. President Roosevelt previously had personally propounded the theory that the nation was supreme in the twilight zone where otherwise there would be a failure of either State or Federal jurisdiction. Where the States lacked power the nation should take it rather than that there should be failure of power to act in the public interest. The nation was not truly a nation unless it had a nation's power. The test of the possession of the power was not the Constitution, but the exercise of similar powers by other nations. It was the corporations and the trusts which quoted the constitution in limitation of such beneficial powers. The wealthy malefactors urged the Constitution in defense of corporations and trusts, and in limitation of the régime of social justice. Therefore, he sought the aid of the Supreme Court in support of extra constitutional powers, if not unconstitutional.
> The decision of the court was as broad as the application, and will stand regarding water powers and all other purposes until overruled as part of the campaign now preparing as well as in Mr. Roosevelt's South American tour as in the proceedings of the Conservation Congress. The principle of this decision is too much a part of our times to be epitomized, and is worth expression in the words of the court. It quoted the words of the Constitution:
>
> "The powers are not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the states respectively, or to the people."

The People Not Considered.

And then proceeded with reference to the plea by Mr. Roosevelt's Solicitor General.

> The argument of counsel ignores the principal factor of this article, to wit "the people." Its principal purpose was not the distribution of power between the United States and the States, but a reservation to the people of all powers not granted. The preamble of the Constitution declares who framed it, 'we the people of the United States,' not the people of one State, but the people of all the States, and article X reserves to the people of all the States the powers not delegated to the United States. The powers affecting the internal affairs of the States not granted to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, and all powers of a national character which are not delegated to the national Government by the constitution are reserved to the people of the United States. The people who adopted the constitution knew that in the nature of things they could not foresee all the questions which might arise in the future, all the circumstances which might call for the exercise of further national powers than those granted to the United States, and after making provision for an amendment to the constitution by which any needed additional powers would be granted they reserved to themselves all powers not so delegated.
> Upon this basis of principle the court ruled that the United States had no standing to intervene; that the only control of the waters of an interstate stream by Congress is in respect to the question of navigation; that the land belonging to the national Government within the States is subject to the laws of those States; that the national Government cannot override the State laws in respect to the general subject of the reclamation of arid land, in other words that the State law is supreme within the State; that a State has full jurisdiction over all the lands and non-navigable streams within its borders, and that it may determine what laws shall govern with respect to such land and water. It is idle to think that a decision regarding the reclamation of arid lands is not applicable to water powers. The decision is not regarding the exercise of the power, but regarding its possession. Mr. Roosevelt's argument is that, in the words of his Osawatomie speech,
> The complete change in economic conditions means that Governmental methods never yet resorted to may have to be employed in order to deal with them.
> But, again, to quote the words of the Supreme Court:
> Constitutional provisions do not change, but their operations may extend to new matters, as the modes of business and habits of life of the people vary with each succeeding generation. The law of the common carrier is the same to-day as when transportation on land was by coach and wagon, and on water by canal boat and sailing vessel, yet in its actual operation it touches and regulates transportation by methods then unknown, the railroad trains and steamships. Just so it is with grant to the national Government of power over interstate commerce. The Constitution has not changed. The power is the same. But it operates to-day upon modes of interstate commerce unknown to the fathers, and will operate with equal force upon any new modes of such commerce which the future may develop.

States Must Legislate.

It makes no difference whether water is used by or for irrigation or navigation or power. It makes no difference whether transmission is electrical or by belt and pulley. Regulation within the States must be by the States, except that the nation may regulate the navigation of interstate waters. If the people wish it otherwise they have only to express their will. The power is the people's, not the Government's, it must be sought from the people and not from the courts, not usurped even for good objects.

The effect of this decision is not so adverse to conservation as it may at first appear. It is sure that if the nation should exercise this duty it would lessen the activity of the States, and the interest of the States together is greater than that of the nation as defined by the Supreme Court. If it be desired that the nation should act together with the States a constitutional amendment would enable it. Even without a constitutional amendment the States could co-operate with each other by agreement between them, according to strong opinions expressed at President Roosevelt's conference of Governors held after the decision quoted above. On that occasion Senator Root said in part:

> Forty-four sovereign States are represented here to-day. All are sovereigns. No one can overestimate the importance of maintaining each and every one of the sovereignties of the States, and no one can overestimate the importance of maintaining the sovereignty of the United States. The nations cannot perform the functions of the States' sovereignties. If it were to undertake to perform these functions it would break down—the machinery would not be able to perform that duty. I feel deeply impressed with the idea that the forty-six sovereign States in the performance of their duties are lagging behind the stage of development which other sovereignties of the earth have reached. I regard this meeting as marking a new departure, the beginning of an era in which the States of the union will exercise their reserved powers upon a higher plane of patriotism than has ever existed before.

The significance of this speech is great, for it reversed an earlier expression upon the subject in which he had agreed with President Roosevelt's views about national control of natural resources, as embodied in the triumph of the Pinchot faction in the Conservation Congress. President Roosevelt in an oration on the occasion of the dedication of the Pennsylvania Capitol Building had said:

> We need through executive action, through legislation, and through judicial interpretation and construction of law, to increase the power of the Federal Government. If we fail thus to increase it we show our impotence.

On this text Senator Root had said publicly:

> It may be that such control could better be exercised in particular instances by the Governments of the States, but the people will have the control they need either from the States or from the National Government, and if the States fail to furnish it in due measure sooner or later constructions of the Constitution will be found to vest the power where it will be exercised—in the National Government.

The issue raised by the split in the Conservation Congress is whether the States shall exercise their powers as interpreted by the Supreme Court, or whether they shall be allowed to fall into disuse, and be absorbed by the National Government. In principle it amounts to recasting the frame of our Government. In specific application to waterpower the secession of the State rights element expresses the opinion that the Washington Government does not know local needs, and that conservation suffers by the exemplification of national control to which objection is taken. The middle course is that suggested by Senator Root's reconsidered views, the practice of conservation by agreement between the States. As he said at the

THE largest Jewish hospital in the world will be dedicated at 2:30 o'clock this afternoon at the annual meeting of the Montefiore Home, a hospital for chronic invalids and country sanitarium, at its new buildings in the still open country at Gun Hill Road and 210th Street. It will be the third and by far the finest and most splendidly equipped home that the institution, long the pet of Jewish philanthropy in this city, has had since it began its great career of service in a modest frame building at Avenue A and Eighty-fourth Street in 1884, with thirty beds that were filled almost as soon as its doors opened, and with a long waiting list day by day thereafter, a tired waiting list of worn and hopeless invalids who came for a home to die in and never dreamed of cure.

Since then, things have changed at Montefiore Home, in its policy as well as in its physical plant; and to-day, in the fine new home of nine modern hospital buildings and pavilions, the steady stream of pale and cheerless invalids who come there are treated not as incurables whose hope is for shelter and whose horizon is the grave, but as invalids to be cared for tenderly and wisely with the best care medical science can give, and, wherever possible, to be cured.

The First Home Outgrown.

The first home on Second Avenue was soon overcrowded, and the Jewish community, realizing this, contributed liberally to a building fund for a new home at 138th Street and Broadway, then on the green and houseless outskirts of the city. Here nearly 300 patients were accommodated, and in 1899 the Country Sanitarium of the home, at Bedford Hills, in Westchester County, was opened with accommodations for 180 more patients in the early stages of tuberculosis. The opening of the Broadway Subway, however, soon turned 138th Street and Broadway from a suburban to a very much built-up urban district, brought the city around and to the doors of Montefiore Home in ever-increasing numbers. And so it had to move and grow again.

Its new home, which is to be dedicated this afternoon, is located almost within a stone's throw—two blocks, to be exact—of the 210th Street station of the new subway now being built. But in the construction of the institution's buildings and the laying out of its grounds this time ample provision has been made both to prevent congestion from the upspringing of the future city roundabout and to permit of comfortable and extensive growth in the future upon the present site, without moving again to new and subwayless parts of the city.

The new home consists of nine fine buildings in colonial style, of reinforced concrete, with tapestry brick facing and white limestone ornamentation, each constructed so as to permit of easy extension upward on the present strong foundations and with the present power plant and provisioning and supply facilities. The buildings are provided with ample grounds, a 60-foot wide parkway surrounding the outer fringe of the eight-acre site, with two additional parks, each 125 feet square, in the midst of the pavilions, and with white cement walks cutting the green lawns and circling the flower beds.

Cost $2,000,000.

The new home, including the site and the equipment of the buildings, cost $2,000,000. The necessary funds were raised by popular contributions and by the sale of the old site of the home, together with the use of part of the institution's existing funds.

The new buildings were less than two years in construction. And when, on Nov. 12, in the short space of three hours, the 300 patients of the old home were transferred to the new, they found a hospital and home with a staff and medical and surgical equipment awaiting them surpassed by no institution in the world. An hour later they were dining in the main dining room as if they had lived there all their lives.

The new home consists of nine buildings—an administration building, a service building, a synagogue, a dormitory, four pavilions, and the medical director's home. All are fireproof and of the most modern construction and equipment. All are connected by corridors one-story high, to enable easy transit from one to another without subjecting patients to the dangers of inclement weather or of changing climate that might ensue in transit between isolated pavilions. There is a central power plant and service building, a central kitchen and dining room and laundry for all except the tubercular patients, and a refrigerating system for all the buildings.

The five-story administration building is devoted half to quarters for the sixty nurses and an equal number of orderlies, and half to offices, staff quarters, and board and meeting rooms. The nurses' quarters are furnished with study rooms, recreation rooms, and a little laundry and mending room. The offices are arranged logically, being adapted to the institution's mode of admitting patients. There is an ambulance entrance, although the home will conduct only a limited emergency service.

It is in the service building, which contains the power house, kitchen, laundry, and dining rooms, that the distinctive features of the institution as a Jewish home are first encountered. There, for example, are to be found two kitchens—one for meat foods and another for foods containing milk or butter; the Mosaic dietary laws, with their strict prohibition of "seething the kid in the mother's milk," are strictly observed in this, as well as in all other particulars. There are double sets of dishes and linens—"milchig" and "fleischig"—for the dining room also for the same separative purpose.

The main dining room is much larger than in other general hospitals, seating 250 patients. There is a separate dining room for the tuberculosis patients in another building. In the service building also is the refrigerating plant and bakery and a receiving station for supplies, large enough to permit of housing a supply of stores for many months, with resultant economy in escaping the seasonal fluctuations of the market.

Beautiful Synagogue.

The religious needs of the patients of the home, however, are not met only with the observance of orthodox ceremonials. There is a beautiful synagogue on the grounds, with simple but impressive interior furnishings of mahogany amid walls of white and yellow, seating about 300 persons. It is there, too, that the annual meeting will be held by the Directors of the institution to-day, and the dedication exercises, with an address by the President, Jacob H. Schiff, will take place.

Rabbi Dushkess, the resident chaplain, will have charge of the religious services here, together with Rabbi Victor Freitag, the former chief rabbi of the home, who has been connected with it for more than twenty-five years, though not a resident rabbi. The services will be conducted according to orthodox ritual, without the musical services and organ found in reform temples.

Between the synagogue and the Administration Building there runs a long white corridor, which is to be known as Memorial Hall, and the walls of which are to be covered with marble tablets bearing the names of large donors to the institution and founders of beds there.

The dormitory building is five stories high, with 160 beds, two in each room. It will be devoted entirely to sleeping quarters for the attendants and help, exclusive of the nurses. The building has separate entrances for men and women help, and is divided into two isolated sections, the northern part for the men, the southern for the women.

At present, as in the past, Montefiore Home is a home for free patients only. None of the patients in the four pavilions pay for their care or keep. The largest of the pavilions is the five-story central pavilion, where such patients are accommodated as need most nursing, sufferers from paralysis, locomotor ataxia, and the like.

In this T-shaped building there are 225 beds. On each floor are three large wards and several small ones, and the day rooms and balconies are specially large, with all doors leading without thresholds to balconies, so that patients can easily be wheeled out from their rooms to the fresh air and sunlight. There is a special room for patients suffering from locomotor ataxia, with inlaid footprints upon the floor, whereby the patients may be taught to walk again.

In this Central Pavilion also there is a special playroom for children—for the home is a home for children, too, by no means merely a home for the aged and infirm. Above this playroom on the ground floor the children have a special schoolroom, with a special and very patient and tender teacher. There is in this pavilion also a workroom and occupation room for adults, where they can engage in basket-weaving, caning, needlework, and a little light metal work and the weaving of small rugs—occupations that help the invalid's heavy day to pass more cheerfully and yet do not tire or wear out the worker. There is also a pharmacy in the central pavilion.

The main synagogue is used only for Saturday or holiday services and special occasions, but many of the orthodox patients of the institution have been wont to address themselves to thrice-daily prayer to offer thanks for the morning light and for the joy of the midday and for the eventide, "nightly standing as servants in the house of the Lord." The wants of these is also met, by means of a smaller service room in the central pavilion, devoted to daily prayer, whenever "minyan," or a faithful ten are present.

The West Pavilion of the home is the medical pavilion, devoted to the treatment of acute cases. Here is a fully equipped X-ray department and laboratories with complete scientific apparatus. The X-ray department was the gift of Samuel Sachs, Chairman of the Building Committee of the home.

There is also a special cancer department in this building, the gift of Mrs. Louis S. Wolff, and here treatment is conducted in connection with the Crocker Cancer Fund at Columbia University. The laboratories are twofold, a chemical laboratory and a pathological laboratory, the latter endowed by the Directors of the home several years ago at a farewell dinner given in honor of Jacob H. Schiff, President of Montefiore Home, just before Mr. Schiff's trip to Japan.

For Surgical and Drugless Cases.

The East Pavilion, a four-story building, is devoted exclusively to surgical cases and drugless treatments. It is one of the best-equipped of the kind in the world. On the ground floor are physical treatment rooms, including a Zander room, or medico-mechanical gymnasium, the equipment of which was imported from Germany by Mortimer Schiff and which is devoted to the cure of joint diseases through exercises on mechanical apparatus.

On the same floor, also the gift of Mortimer Schiff, is a Tyrnauer electrical baking apparatus like that used in Karlsbad to loosen stiff joints. There is a complete hydriatic department, with douches, showers, tub baths, Nauheim baths, and sweat boxes, and there is a room devoted to electro-therapy.

A novel feature of the bathrooms here and in all the wards is that they are built a foot above the floor, so as to permit of better cleaning of the floor beneath and more convenient treatment by nurses and attendants. The water, moreover, is turned on from faucets completely out of reach of the patients. It has been found that many patients, after turning on the hot water and allowing it to run freely, have, through anaesthesia, been unable to stop the flow, and been scalded.

In the new buildings the bathtubs are placed in the centre of the rooms and the flow of water is regulated from the walls by nurses or attendants. There is, moreover, hanging over each tub an electric bell, whereby the patient or the nurses can summon a physician in any emergency, and the patient need never be left an instant alone.

The second and third floors of the East Pavilion are taken up with wards for men and women patients, respectively. The fourth floor contains operating rooms for general surgery, neural surgery, and orthopedic and dental surgery, and a large medical meeting room and a medical library donated by the grandchildren of the late Joseph Liebmann, a Brooklyn brewer, in memory of their grandfather.

For Tuberculosis Patients.

It is in the South Pavilion that all the tubercular patients are treated. This consists of two floors, each containing sixty-two beds and large outer balconies built on the Sarasohn plan, the upper set several feet further in than the lower, so as not to cut off the light of the balcony below. Patients who can walk about are housed on the ground floor, and bed patients on the second floor. For all there are steamer chairs and rest chairs. The requirements of the Board of Health as to floor space and cubic air space are more than satisfied. The patients in this pavilion have their own dining room and two resident physicians ever within a moment's call.

Just across 210th Street from the hospital grounds is the home of the Medical Director and General Superintendent, Dr. Siegfried Wachsmann, who has been connected with Montefiore Home for twelve years. The Director's home is a pretty three-story dwelling built in the same Colonial style as the buildings across the street, with bright white trimmings and a portico. All the buildings were constructed by the architects, Arnold W. Brunner and Buchmann & Fox, along lines suggested by Dr. Wachsmann as a result of his experience at Montefiore Home and studies abroad, and in constant consultation with Dr. S. S. Goldwasser, Superintendent of Mt. Sinai Hospital.

Plans have already been completed for a private pavilion for patients who are in a position to pay for their treatment and care, and a building will be started for this purpose next Spring. Already $50,000 has been contributed by each of the following men for this pavilion: Jacob H. Schiff, Samuel Sachs, Solomon R. Guggenheim, and Ferdinand Sulzberger.

The patients that come to Montefiore Home from all sections of the city are not only Jewish patients, although the majority of the contributors and inmates are of that faith. The institution is non-sectarian. Those who come to it range from 1 to almost 100 years—sufferers from chronic nervous diseases, diseases of the circulatory system, of the lungs and joints, and metabolic diseases like diabetes and gout; and sufferers from malignant growths, cancer, and the like. But patients with mental diseases are barred.

It is not only with its sick, however, that Montefiore Home concerns itself. It has established a social service department with a special fund to look after the welfare of the families of its inmates—hungry and helpless ones whose wage-earner has been temporarily removed. The institution also has a special fund to assist its discharged patients for a few weeks after leaving the hospital. Sometimes this assistance takes the form of paying for their board and lodging until they find suitable work; sometimes the patient is started in a modest little way in business.

Since its beginning, Montefiore Home has spent about $3,000,000 on its maintenance. Next year, for the first time, owing to the greatly increased cost of maintenance of the new buildings, it expects to get aid from the city. The number of beds alone has been increased by 160. In all, it now has some 500 beds, 300 in the city and 200 in the country, and when the private pavilion is opened the total number will reach 700.

In the old city home, at 138th Street and Broadway, 500 patients were accommodated each year, and 400 more were taken in each year at the country sanitarium at Bedford Hills, where the patients in earlier stages of consumption are treated under a medical staff headed by the medical director, Dr. L. Rosenberg.

The length of the stay of patients varied widely. Some cancer patients died within a few days, coming as they did to the institution at an extremely advanced stage of their disease. On the other hand, some half-side paralysis patients have enjoyed the hospitality of the home from ten to twenty years.

Perhaps the chief and certainly one of the most ardent supporters of Montefiore Home ever since its inception has been Jacob H. Schiff. Regularly every Sunday Mr. Schiff has called at the home and gone through it with watchful eyes and kindly words, until the patients there have come to know him well and to welcome him eagerly. The hope was expressed there by many of them that he would still continue his weekly visits now that the home has been moved further away, and the hope seems very likely of fulfillment. Mr. Schiff, from the beginning, has emphasized the essential difference between Montefiore Home and most other institutions for the care of chronic invalids.

"If any of the general hospitals were suddenly to be put out of commission," explained Dr. Wachsmann, the medical director of Montefiore Home, yesterday, "their patients could be taken care of by the other hospitals. If Montefiore Home were to be put out of commission, however, a new home of the sort would have to be built immediately, for there is no other hospital established for the treatment of chronic invalids with the idea of bringing about a cure wherever cure is possible. The treatment of chronic invalids has not received sufficient scientific attention until now."

On Wednesdays, Saturdays and Sundays friends and relatives of patients may call at the home to visit them. On those days there is always a steady stream of cheerfully smiling folk winding its way up to the doors of the home to bring to the sick within a cheerfulness and comforting they do not feel themselves. At the new home a special entrance and waiting room has been provided for such visitors as come from far parts of the city and reach the institution too early.

The thought of the relatives of patients had also a large influence on determining the nature of the furnishings of the hospital wards and pavilions in the new home. It is noteworthy that although all the buildings have been constructed substantially with a view of attaining perfection as regards the comfort of patients, as well as regards durability, there is not to be seen any extravagance or lavishness.

As one of the Directors expressed himself, the lesson has been learned by those who built the new Montefiore Home that lavish display is harmful in many ways.

Most of the unfortunate patients come from sordid quarters and have to return to the same environments after their discharge from the institution. The patients are also visited by their relatives and friends, who do not live in extravagant homes, and the remark has often been heard in other institutions that the rich first neglect their workmen and when the latter finally break down with illness and infirmity, extravagant institutions are provided for them.

No Unnecessary Display.

Moreover, the Board of Directors, being after all only trustees of funds contributed by many of their coreligionists in this city, showed here that they have been very careful in spending it and have not lavished it on unnecessary display.

Dr. Siegfried Wachsmann, the medical director and Superintendent of Montefiore Home, is the head of its medical staff. He is assisted by Assistant Supt. M. D. Goodman and Assistant Medical Director Dr. V. Lowenstein, and a house and laboratory staff of ten. The Medical Board of the hospital includes consultant and visiting physicians of prominence under the presidency this year of Dr. Wolf Freudenthal.

Jacob H. Schiff is President of the home. Its Vice Presidents are Henry Solomon and Leopold Stern; its Treasurer B. J. Greenhut, and its honorary Secretary Arthur D. Wolf. Its Directors are George B. Berheim, Martin Erdmann, Supreme Court Justice Mitchell L. Erlanger, Aaron Garfunkle, Benedict J. Greenhut, Solomon R. Guggenheim, Berthold Hochschild, Bendet Isaacs, Samuel Kridel, Harold M. Lehman, Adolf Liebmann, Herbert S. Martin, Walter E. Meyer, Joseph Obermeyer, Supreme Court Justice M. Warley Platzek, Julius Robinson, Jacob Rossbach, Samuel Sachs, Jacob H. Schiff, Dudley E. Sicher, Henry Solomon, Fred M. Stein, Leopold Stern, Ferdinand Sulzberger, Louis Tim, I. Unterberg, and Arthur D. Wolf.

Experience

HARRY had just proposed to Ada and been accepted.

"Tell me, Harry," said the girl. "Did you ever say anything like this to any girl before?"

"Well, my dear," replied Harry, in an outburst of honesty, "do you think it could be done like this the first time?"

Notable Collection of Drawings by Old Masters to be Shown at the Ederheimer Gallery---Splendid Italian and Flemish Works of the Fifteenth Century.

THERE are two ways of getting pleasure out of a drawing. One is based on its intrinsic interest, which nearly always is very great if it is the work of an artist of any degree of imagination. The other is based on its relation to a completed work for which it has been made as a preparation for such.

Seen just for themselves, the drawings of the masters give any educated observer an immense and most gratifying sense of power within himself. They are like the ink pictures of the ancient Chinese artists who abjured colors and the statement of particulars, so that the imagination of the observer might be stimulated, so that he might really share in the work of creation and recreation which is so great a joy to the artist, so that he need not feel himself cribbed, cabined, and confined by the tightly defined limits of things known, but might feel himself free to get out of the synthetic black lines before him all the significance they were capable of holding. From this point of view the most inspiring are those that leave us with most work to do, the ragged first thoughts that dash across the paper intent on their mission. What fun one gets from some such mad race with an artist like Rembrandt, whose idea is wholly an artistic idea and who works with pen and ink so swiftly and so delicately that all our sluggish energies react to his fervor. On the other hand, patient drawings, as faithful and minute as Menzel's, often have an opposite charm, and convey by their slow elaboration of detail a pleasure in the thing seen that is restful to the mind.

A remarkably fine collection of drawings by the old masters is to be placed on public view to-morrow at the Ederheimer Gallery, 100 cautiously selected examples from a group of double that number, those chosen for exhibition being the top cream of excellence, and authenticated with the help of thoroughly trained experts, where this is possible, and where it is not possible, displayed without recourse to uncertain attribution, on their own rare merits.

In the section containing Italian and Flemish works of the fifteenth century are several pearls of price. The finest is given with reservation to Memling, and justifies such an attribution by the extraordinary simplicity and tenderness of the feeling and by the fine delicacy of the workmanship. The Virgin is shown in half figure, the Child at her breast. In the background is green foliage, a gentle landscape and a little winding stream. The evidence of the mental power of the old Italians, however, that the energy remained in their line and the freshness in their manner of presentation, in spite of the minute execution and richly developed style. With the Dutch masters we have many of these elaborated drawings, a number of them made for the engravers who flourished in the seventeenth censtain of color touching the figure here and there and lending charm to the background appears to have been applied at the time the drawing was made. The whole effect is of serenity and pure sentiment, not the adoring Virgin but the adoring mother with her hungry little child. In very different vein is the "Roman Warrior," by Mantegna perhaps, or, as Mr. Ederheimer thinks, by Jacopo de Barbari, a stalwart figure carefully considered from the anatomical standpoint. From the School of Bruges at the end of the fifteenth century we get an amusing and competent drawing in two parts, representing the two groups of the wise and foolish virgins. The line is bold and clear, and the significance accentuated by little labels attached to the individual figures. Thus among the ladies whose virtue was prudence we find such thoroughgoing manslayers as Judith holding the severed head of Holofernes and Jahel with her victim. Among the foolish are Delilah, Semiramis, and Bathsheba.

Among the Germans the great name of Duerer is represented by a sheet of sketches made for the translation of "The Hieroglyphica of Horappollon," made by Pirckheimer, the friend of Duerer. One of the sketches is of Duerer's dog, who also appears in the "Melancholia" and in the "Knight, Death, and the Devil."

Hans Joerg Breu gives us a superb courtyard scene with knights and ladies feasting and playing on musical instruments, and in the foreground women bathing, a composition resembling those "Fountain of Youth" designs which were such favorites with the early Germans and in which elderly ladies emerged from their reviving plunge in the best of spirits and prepared for revel. There is a small and carefully executed circular drawing heightened with color ascribed to Hans Brosamer, illustrating the "Dream of Paris," the several figures vivacious in movement and free in gesture. An interesting group of Swiss drawings are ascribed to the glass painters of Zurich and Basle in the sixteenth century.

When we come to the Italian masters we find names of the greatest importance. Assigned to Titian is a highly finished drawing for the Jupiter and Antiope of the Louvre. The catalogue quotes an adverse judgment which gives the drawing to a period following the picture, finding in it a copy by another hand than Titian's, but Mr. Ederheimer justifiably lays stress on the high quality and spontaneity of the drawing as indicating an original sketch. A "Design for the Venus of Uffizi" also closely follows the painting except that in the background of the drawing a satyr peers from behind a tree at the lovely reclining lady whose resemblance to "la Bella di Tiziano" is famous. In the drawing she appears sprightlier, more engaging, and less mature than in the painting.

In these drawings it is obvious that the artist was working out his idea in careful detail, to convince himself of its total value. It is an tury, but Rembrandt in his magnificent composition, "Diana and Calysto," swings his outline over the paper, dabs shadow here and a secondary tone there, and the whole swims in light and breathes of light. With Rembrandt light always, to quote Taine, is "the principal personage in the picture." The drawing is made with a reed pen and sepia, summary and careless and rough, with scribbles and dashes, a short cut, truly, to complete expression, but the work of an artist who knows so exactly what he means that all he needs on paper is the briefest record of his idea.

Landscape art is represented by interesting drawings by Adriean and Willem van de Velde, Salomon and Jacob van Ruysdael, Jan van Goyen, Allard van Everdingen, and others. Rubens heads the list of the Flemish artists with a portrait in black and red crayons, said to be that of Marie de Medici, Queen of France, and a design for the painting of Moses causing water to issue from the rock. There are several fine drawings by Van Dyck, a strong sketch of an ox standing in a landscape, by Jacob Jordaens; a portrait of Emperor Frederick IV. of Germany by Peter Soutman, which is accompanied by the engraving by P. van Sompel to show how much character could evaporate in the process of translation.

Among the French drawings is one by Prud'hon, who worshipped Lionardo, and in such little works as this highly finished, graceful composition, borrows not a little of his tenderness in representing feminine types. The title is "The Cruel Laughs at the Tears He Causes to be Shed," and the part of the Cruel is taken by Cupid, who stands laughing at a weeping woman at whose feet is a rose. In a style the antipodes of this is the sketch by Greuze for his painting in the Louvre, "The Bad Son Punished." Greuze was 40 years old when this picture was exhibited with twelve others in the Paris Salon. He was at the zenith of his powers, and these family subjects were what he had chosen for his first essays in art, before this natural predilection had been confirmed by the taste of the age, which, under the influence of Rousseau, swerved toward exaggerated and emphasized simplicity and the domestic virtues. The clean, vigorous play of line in the sketch, the effective rendering of the spirit of drama in the harrowing scene, show how completely and spontaneously it formed itself in the mind of the artist. The composition betrays neither uncertainty nor sloth. Each touch is quick with energy, and one marvels that an artist who could thus summon to his aid a rugged strength and economy could throw them aside so completely as he did in the sentimentalized painting. How vainly one looks in a painting by Greuze for this keen emotion, this swift descriptive touch, this manly reticence!

French Wood Engraving.

IT WAS a clever idea for the Museum of French Art to exhibit the work of the "Société de la Gravure sur Bois Originale." This society requires that each exhibitor shall agree in writing to send only original engravings on wood, in the production of which photography shall have played no part. The first salon of the society in the Winter of 1912 brought together nearly three hundred wood cuts by native and foreign artists and awakened eager interest in Paris, a city that boasts of at least ten great municipal, national, and private collections of prints, and of twenty societies of wood engravers.

The French can be counted upon to carry through a difficult technical process with judgment and that manual dexterity and precision which spring from the Gallic ability to make the hand serve the brain in a reasonable manner, and the present exhibition is in itself a brilliant little monument to technical capacity. The most interesting examples, regarded from this point of view, are contributed by Auguste Lepère, one of the most flexible and free, the most fastidious and robust craftsmen produced by the present century, and an artist of fresh and sensitive vision as well. His etching of Rheims Cathedral is very well known; here he undertakes to render the Cathedral at Roüen in much the same spirit on the wood block, producing with his carefully related values a wonderfully atmospheric tone.

His "Paris sous la Neige" is in the same mood, an atmospheric and tender transcription of the city streets as they appear through the falling snow, and is quite the most beautiful piece of fine craftsmanship in the room. The mere cutting of the multitudinous lines on the block so delicately that they give the requisite aerial perspective is, however, a small part of the artist's task, so scrupulously performed. He has placed Notre Dame a little to the right of the centre of his composition, has veiled her rugged outlines with the feathery mist, but has left the mass of the structure the chief dark in the picture. He has kept the noble curve of the Quai aux Fleurs which leads toward the distant buildings on the opposite bank, and he has so placed his dark, sharp accents in the foreground and the sweeping flight of bats, birds chosen by artists and poets alike to express the romance of the cathedral, that the mists of the distance are given a greater mystery without resorting to fuddled outlines. It would be difficult to imagine anything more perfectly combining the precise and the suggestive. The freshness of Lepère's interest in his art and his willingness to turn from one style to another with a different type of subject are seen in his frank and brusque "Le Paysagist," evidently from the inscription a portrait, and a discerning interpretation of personality. Again, he is witty and vivacious in "La Seine au Pont d'Austerlitz," where the people on the bank are much disturbed by gusts of wind blowing their garments and threatening their hats.

Jacques Beltrand works with what might be called an orthodox technique, asking of the wood no effect that it does not render easily, yet exacting from it a complication and brilliancy. "Le Remise aux Chevreuils," a wood scene with no small amount of careful detail, is clear and firm in line, and the "Cathedrale de Rheims," with its brown foreground and blue sky, conveys the impression of massive structure. E. Boizot is brisk and coquettish in "Une Parisienne," and insistently Japanese in the "Promenade au Bois," a tour de force in composition, the modern French type of fashionable woman being placed in park surroundings without the slightest effort to compromise the national and modern aspect of the scene, but by the ingenuity of the arrangement and spacing giving the effect of a Hiroshige print.

Amédée Weter is definite and vigorous and hovers on the verge of caricature in "Le Petit Jardinier" and "La Ménagère." T. E. Laboureur is somewhat crudely humorous in his effective black and white "Souper Montmartrois" and cleverly capricious in the "Masque aux Cheveux d'Or," in which the hair is gilded to make the title literal. Other exhibitors are Paul Emile Colin, F. Chalandre, Pierre Gusman, Mathurin Mehent, Theodore Rally, and Achille Rouquet.

In addition to this exhibition there is one of French porcelains of the eighteenth century, especially designed to show to the public the beauty and exquisite quality of the productions of the less well-known factories, those of Saint Cloud, Chantilly, Mennecy-Villeroy, and Vincennes; but there are also many pieces of Sèvres, including delightful statuettes and groups, and examples of the Gros-Bleu, the Bleu du Roi, the Turquoise Trembleuse, and other colors the names of which in themselves reflect the age in which they were invented.

The set of knife handles of Chantilly ware with Chinese decoration is lent by Miss Margaret B. Gould and is remarkable for having the original blades, very seldom found in eighteenth century specimens. An interesting pitcher and bowl lent by Mrs. Thomas E. H. Curtis bear a classic design, and come from the Consular period between 1802 and 1804, when the factory at Sèvres opened for six months after the suspension of its activities during the Revolution and before it was re-established as a national factory by Napoleon.

The first Bulletin of the Museum of French Art appears this month and contains, in addition to a list of the exhibits, lectures, committees, and other more or less formal data, an excellent little essay on wood-engraving of the past and the present, which serves as an informing introduction to the exhibition of engravings.

Modern Mezzotints.

AT THE Crosby Galleries is an exhibition of mezzotints by Elizabeth Gulland, whose work in this field is marked by exceptional skill and conscience. During a period of five years she has engraved only nine plates, and on one of these, "The Age of Innocence," after Sir Joshua's picture in the National Gallery, she spent over a year. Owing to the poor position of the picture in the gallery and its general condition, it was a particularly trying subject, but the result has many points of interest. Through an artist who has been copying the painting regularly for about half a century, Miss Gulland learned that fifty years ago the sash, which now has a strong greenish tone, was pink, (alas for the experimental disposition of Sir Joshua!) also that the sash fell over the skirt, as it appears in Miss Gulland's plate, but not in other engravings.

The portrait of Miss Emily de Vismes, by Raeburn, in the Earl of Mansfield's collection, is the subject of another plate, and the history of its progress is given in the catalogue, and a number of impressions are shown of different states, together with a photograph of the first rough sketch made from the original. In the course of the work the artist took an impression with her to Scone Palace, where the original hangs, and made with three days' work a very careful and highly finished water-color drawing to serve as a guide in printing the proofs in color. In the case of the Viscountess Althorp's portrait by Reynolds, the original painting was removed from its frame, and the artist spent a number of days in close study of its characteristics and in the comparison of it in its present unsatisfactory state with mezzotints made while it was still in good condition. In all cases she takes detailed notes of colors and underpaintings, tones and shadows, working with that "self-abnegating passion of interpretation" which has been called the genius of a translator. Even with this thorough and intelligent method, however, it is impossible that a sensitive engraver should not find one artist more possible than another to reconstruct with sympathy and fidelity. Miss Gulland is Scotch, and her artist is Raeburn. On his portrait of Mrs. Scott Moncreiff she has spent her most rewarding labors.

At the galleries of Arthur Ackerman & Son is a double exhibition of landscapes by Charles E. Brittan and garden subjects by Miss Lilian Stannard that will have an associative value for a very considerable public. Those who know the Cambridge gardens, the Girton Garden, and that of Emmanuel College, the Pembroke College Walk, and the Walk at Sidney College, will be glad to have their memory stimulated by these gay versions of the ancient places in the freshness of their Summer bloom. Not less attractive are the cottage gardens with hollyhock and lilies and deep blue larkspurs. Such pictures strike an intimate note that immensely strengthens the appeal to the aesthetic sense. The moors are a different matter. Their glooms and mists and the violet and rose of their heather carpet give an opportunity for dramatic treatment of which Mr. Brittan has not availed himself. He has seen the moors patiently and without emotion. But he has painted drenching mists that hang over Arran and the deep sunsets of Perthshire, and that is enough to recall the reality.

Thumb Box Sketches.

Thumb box sketches again at the Powell Galleries. Not many of them the first fine careless rapture; but rather intentional bits of spontaneity, and occasionally quite complete small pictures ready for a frame in a little room. The best place in the world for a small and daintily executed picture, by the way, is by the side of the telephone, where it will be studied with an attention not to be commanded elsewhere. Among the painters represented in this annual feast of entremets are Paul Cornoyer, Walter Douglas, Frank Bicknell, Hilda Belcher (with a frank little outdoor scene of exceptional charm,) Tony Nell, Althea Platt, Chauncey Ryder, Edward Dufner, Orlando Rouland, Martha Walter, Herbert Faulkner, Matilda Browne, Cecil Chichester, Jonas Lie, and others worthy of this excellent companionship.

The Making of an Etching.

MR. WEITENKAMPF of the print room in the New York Public Library announces that;

For the next few months the print gallery (Room 321) will be occupied by an exhibition illustrating the making of an etching. This may possibly look forbiddingly technical at first sight, but interest in this side of the subject is apparently growing, and the matter is here presented in so graphic a manner as to heighten the interest. The visitor is taken through the entire process, beginning with copper plates bare, grounded and smoked, through the matter of production by means of etching-needle, burin, roulette, aquatint, and other aids, the acid bath, the work of the printer to the finished product, the print itself. Even some pictures of print lovers and print-shops are shown, and the rear end is brought up with a selection of etchings by the masters of the art. Wherever possible the actual objects are shown: plates, proofs, counter-proof, early and late impressions from the same plate, prints illustrating changes made on the plate, prints on various kinds of paper and on satin. Processes are illustrated pictorially; to name a few instances: Buhot is shown smoking a plate, Rembrandt appears etching, Neureuther shows the imps of the acid attacking the artists' handiwork, Whistler is seen at the press.

The Art League, now in the fourth year of its organization, is carrying forward an active campaign in various directions, particularly in school museum co-operation. At the present time lectures are being given once a fortnight in the Metropolitan Museum, on Saturday mornings, for the members of the league, and a second series of lectures, on intermediate Saturdays, for the pupils of the public schools. The latter popular talks are being repeated in Brooklyn before audiences of a thousand children at each session. These elementary pupils come from all over Brooklyn without escort of teachers or parents. Their conduct has been so good as to delight the Museum management. Mr. Fox, the Curator in Chief, saying recently: "The behavior of the elementary school children at the Saturday talks is excellent, and since these talks have begun we have had a daily attendance of school children traceable to this influence greatly in excess of any previous period in the history of the Museum."

The latest work of the league has been the organization of a junior membership among the high school pupils. These pupils pay nominal dues of 10 cents a year, and are admitted on their membership card to the lectures given to the regular members of the association. Nearly 1,000 high school pupils joined the association as junior members within the last month, and the league's officers confidently expect that this number will be doubled before the end of the year.

The Hundred Best Books of the Year

List Selected by a Committee from the Department of English, Columbia University, PROF. JOHN ERSKINE, DR. H. R. STEEVES, and DR. C. A. VAN DOREN, with Introduction by Prof. Erskine.

Feminism . . . . . By ELLEN GLASGOW

In this article woman as portrayed in the novels written by men is contrasted with woman as found in real life, and it includes a study of Mrs. Walter Gallichan's "The Truth About Woman."

Socialism . . . . . By ALGERNON LEE

Educational Director of the Rand School of Social Science.

What the year has produced of importance in the literature of Socialism is told by Prof. Lee, who reviews at length Allan L. Benson's "The Truth About Socialism" and Morris Hillquit's "Socialism Summed Up."

Psychism . . . . . By HENRY M. ALDEN

Editor of Harper's Magazine. Author of "A Study of Death."

Interest in Psychical Research and in the possibility of a life after death has been greatly stimulated by Sir Oliver Lodge's recent address before the British Association for the Advancement of Science. Henry Mills Alden, who has long been known for his writings on immortality, discusses the year's contribution to the subject, and reviews Maeterlinck's latest book, "Our Eternity."

Eugenics . . . . . By DR. CHARLES B. DAVENPORT

Director of the Station for Experimental Evolution of the Carnegie Institute.

Prof. Davenport, who is recognized as a leading authority in Eugenics, reviews Dr. Woods's book, "The Influence of Monarchs," and points out what history contributes to the science of race improvement.

Prof. Erskine Tells How the Selection Was Made

A WORD of comment upon the accompanying list will not be out of place. The compilers of it recognize the inadequacy of any such reckoning up of the literary output of the year, yet are confident that what they have attempted will not be without profit to their readers, as it certainly has not been without enlightenment to themselves. Sorting out the "best books" from a national or world literature is a recognized pastime for critics of an optimistic temper, and the general reader has usually found the selection worth considering; for even if we pretend to no omniscience, our preferences in books, like our other preferences, will reveal us to ourselves if we honestly face them, and will excite the interest of our fellows, whether or not they agree. Even the cautious reader who calls no one great book better than any other, usually feels a stirring at least of wrath at the hardy soul who ventures to decide. And such lists do us good service by compelling us to inventory our tastes and appreciations. So long as we are sincere, and do not pretend to like the classics simply because they are the classics, the tabulation of the books we think most worth while is a spiritual taking of stock.

When we set out to choose the best books of the current year, however, we can hardly be conventional, even if we will: there are no undisputed classics to cling to. The danger of making a mistake is, therefore, greatly increased, but so is the excitement of the choice. The cautious reader who frowned on a discrimination between the great books of all time will here throw up his hands at our impertinence, will gasp that any verdict on contemporary books is immoral, and will comfort himself by approving Shakespeare, as of old. But the critic who cannot pick out a good book until some one else has picked it out is not a critic, but an echo. The function of criticism, as the word implies, is to sift the good from the bad. Time does this sifting without our help. There would be no use for the critic if he could not anticipate time's verdicts. Even though criticism often tries to guide our appreciation, as it were to teach time how to sift, the principles of criticism nevertheless are deduced from the judgments pronounced by the years, the centuries, and the ages.

We are, therefore, not disposed to apologize for temerity in separating these hundred books from the others published in America, or imported, since Jan. 1, 1913. We realize at the same time that in judging contemporary books the likelihood of error is great. Some book of which we have never heard may prove at last to have been the notable contribution of the year. The strongest impeachment of our choice will probably come from the authors we have omitted, not from those we have included, and such an impeachment may very well be just. We have tried, however, to make it impossible. We regret that we had not time to give every book published in 1913 a personal and critical inspection. But even if THE NEW YORK TIMES had invited us earlier to make this selection, we should still have had to depend, in the case of many rejected books, upon the opinion of competent judges who had read them. It has seemed best to omit text-books and all highly technical works. It has also seemed best to omit new editions which contained no additional matter of importance, and serial publications, such as the Cambridge History of English Literature and the Cambridge Mediæval History, which began to appear before 1913. Exception has been made of volumes which, though in a series, seem notable in themselves. We, of course, have not considered volumes still to appear in 1913, nor volumes which appeared after Nov. 15. Exception is again made of a few books which we were able to examine in advance sheets.

The significance of our list lies, first, in the standards by which it was made, and, second, in its revelation of certain trends in the year's literature. Our standards were simple. We first obtained the opinions of experts as to books in special fields. Books of a more general nature—novels, biographies, poems, essays—we chose, first, for the importance of their subject, and, second, for a certain finality of treatment. That is, a "best book" in our opinion is one that raises an important question, or recurs to a vital theme, and pronounces upon it what in some sense is a last word. For example, we have included Mr. Churchill's "The Inside of the Cup," not because we indorse his picture of the religious life in America, but because his novel has vitalized the question of religion among us to an astonishing extent, and because he has given what is probably a final statement of his point of view; another novel written from the same angle will be an anti-climax. If a book on a serious subject does not add to the vitality of its theme, or makes no appreciable advance upon earlier treatments of it, and is, therefore, liable to be superseded at any moment by volumes which do add to the vitality of the subject and do advance the treatment of it, that book is in our opinion not a "best book." Exception to this principle has been made in the case of a few important works now translated for the first time into English, and in the case of a few books which, though they would not rank high in a European bibliography of their field, are yet the first to open that field to English readers. The pioneer quality of such works entitles them in our opinion to more lasting remembrance than they would otherwise have. From about a thousand titles, selected by these standards, we threw out the most doubtful, until only a hundred remained. These we submit as the most important books published in America or imported during the year.

The biographical writing, we think, has been much finer in quality than the fiction, and by our standards the best biographies have been more numerous than the best novels. Important books in philosophy and religion form a class next in size; we do not presume, however, to pass on the relative importance of this class, nor of the remaining classes. The only conclusions that we care to formulate are that the best biographies are eclipsing the best novels in number and in art; that the most important poet of the year is not American, nor even Anglo-Saxon, and that the other poets on our list either belong to former decades and speak to us now as veterans, or have ceased to promise any novelty of subject or manner.

Feminism . . . . . By ELLEN GLASGOW

WHEN the most popular of men's heroines, after being blighted by love, went to the undertaker's to select her coffin, ordered that a broken lily should be engraved on the lid, and had it sent home to use as a writing table during her decline, an admiring eighteenth century public exclaimed that this touching episode had immortalized the womanly woman. No other heroine in fiction has been so passionately eulogized or so widely mourned, and even to-day she remains the most convincing of the feminine prigs with which the imagination of man has enriched the pages of literature. For Clarissa belongs not only to the evolving novel, but to the evolving masculine ideal of woman.

And since the hardest traditions to shake are those relating to women, since even a realist is apt to romance about women in English fiction, and so great a writer as Thackeray went to life for his heroes and to the Victorian pattern of femininity for his heroines, it is, perhaps, asking too much to expect an avowed sentimentalist to create a natural Clarissa. When woman herself has shown such eagerness to conform to man's ideal of her that she has cheerfully defied nature and reshaped both her soul and body after the model he put before her, one can hardly demand of a man novelist that he should write of her as she is and not as he desires that she should be. Ages of false thinking about her on the part of others have bred in woman the dangerous habit of false thinking about herself, and she has denied her own humanity so long and so earnestly that she has come at last almost to believe in the truth of her denial.

So it is not surprising that, until the day of George Meredith, English novelists, though they often wrote of men and things as they were, invariably treated woman as if she were the solitary exception to natural law, and particularly to the law of development. Fielding, Thackeray, Dickens, and a host of others prepared their womanly woman after the same recipe—modesty, goodness, self-sacrifice, an inordinate capacity for forgiveness, "about as much religion as my William likes," and, now and then, a little vivacity—all sufficiently diluted to make the mixture palatable to the opposite sex. And in time, after the manner of mankind, this formula received the sanction of custom.

From Richardson to George Meredith there was little change in man's ideal of the womanly woman. In fiction man might wear his cloak of many colors, but woman appeared changelessly white except on the occasions when, for purposes of plot, she was depicted as changelessly black. Never by design or accident could the colors run together—never could Amelia become Becky for an hour or Becky become Amelia. The womanly woman of the earlier novelists was wholly contented with her immemorial position as the spectator of man; and when she wasn't womanly, and wasn't contented, she was inevitably, as in the case of poor Beatrix, hunted to her destruction. Because it has pleased man to imagine that woman is passive and hates change, no English writer of fiction before George Meredith—or, I may say, instead, before Mr. Hardy—ever dared to recognize that she is, and has always been, in her heart at least, the adventurous sex. Even Fielding, who feared nothing else on earth, lived in terror of offending against the popular legend of the womanly woman, and was oppressed by the curious delusion that woman is made of different clay from man—that, while he progresses, she, corresponding to some fixed ideal of her, remains static. To be sure, the period in which he lived was one in which, to quote from his Mrs. James, "no woman could be genteel who was not entirely flat before," and for this reason, perhaps, his vision of the eternal feminine is as sentimental as Thackeray's. And yet, in spite of the fact that the world, or a part of it at least, has outgrown the belief that the worship of a dissolute husband is an exalted occupation for an immortal soul, it is impossible to resist the charm of Fielding's Amelia. Never before or since has man's womanly woman been made so lovable; and if she no longer commands our unquestioning esteem, she still continues to enchant and delight us. For, passive as she is in every quality except that of sex, she is drawn by the hand of a lover, and there is good red blood, not printer's ink, in her veins.

As for the two greatest novelists of the nineteenth century, they never forgot for a minute, like the kind-hearted gentlemen they were, that the souls of their heroines were encased in crinoline. The Victorian ideals of femininity lay as an incubus upon the earlier fiction of the period—for it is, after all, an imperfect transcript of life that paints man as a human being and woman as a piece of faintly colored waxwork. It was a cherished tradition of the century, and in the beginning was probably construed into a delicate compliment to the young Queen, that the womanly woman had been created by the hand of God wholly passive and perfect, without the faults or even the ordinary impulses of human nature. It is true that when she became old and ugly she was permitted to be funny; and it is entirely to the saving fiction of the womanly woman's imperishable outward loveliness that we owe some of the most entrancing characters in Dickens's novels. His heroines belong in a gallery of waxwork figures; but his old women, his ugly women, and his wicked women are wholly delightful. For the old, the ugly, and the wicked growing cramped in their positions or dissatisfied with their entertainment as the audience of man, become miraculously alive. When they cease to be valued as witnesses of the achievements of others, they display an amazing activity.

But with Meredith and Hardy, woman, for the first time in men's novels, drops her cloak of sentimentality and appears not less human and vital than does the source of her being. And yet even here the ancient tradition is not completely discarded, and these great writers, unlike in so much else, are alike at least in this—that they both appear, in many of their books, if not in all, to regard caprice as the ruling principle of woman's nature. That a real Diana would have sold her lover's secret is exceedingly doubtful; that a real Sue would have deserted the suffering Jude is almost unbelievable—but caprice is probably the last quality that the masculine imagination will relinquish in its conception of woman; and certainly to make the womanly woman capricious is a pleasant change from the earlier fashion of making her insipid.

For before Meredith's splendid heroines appeared, when English novelists portrayed woman in heroic dimensions, it was invariably in dimensions of sex. She lived for man, and failing this, she died for man, and at long intervals she even disguised her sex and wore man's clothes for man but the beginning, middle, and end of her existence was simply man. Without the prop of man she was as helplessly ineffectual as the "tender parasite" to which Thackeray compared her. And with the sacred inconsistency possible only to tradition, she was represented as passive even in the single activity to which her energies were directed—for in love, as in all else, she was supposed to sit with smiling patience and wait on the convenience of man. When she grew restless it proved merely that she was not the womanly woman—since to grow restless in the opinion of most novelists is the exclusive prerogative of man. And so deeply rooted in the masculine mind is this inherited belief in the right of the male to want to rove, if not actually to pack up and go, that we find so essentially modern a writer as Mr. Galsworthy speaking of "the aching for the wild, the passionate, the new, that never quite dies in a man's heart,"—implying, one gathers from the context, that this aching has either never been born in the heart of a woman or has died there in its infancy. Yet Mr. Galsworthy possesses an understanding of woman's nature—of her strength, her weakness, her blindness to the virtue of expediency, her tragic wastefulness in love—that is not equaled—that is not even approached by any other of our younger novelists. In his perfect novel "The Dark Flower"—for it is impossible for one who is by temperament a novelist, not a reviewer, to speak in measured terms of praise of work so rare, so delicately wrought as this—he has painted the portraits of four women that stand out as softly glowing, as mysteriously lovely, as the figures in Titian's Sacred and Profane Love. About them one and all, ardently as they are imagined, there is a certain wistfulness—a pathos that seems inherent in sex—as if Mr. Galsworthy were oppressed by the feeling that woman could never really be happy—that Nature had, from the beginning, ordained her for suffering. These four women are but exquisite variations from the indestructible type of man's womanly woman—the woman who lives by love alone—the woman for whom Goldsmith wrote his famous advice on the simplest and most satisfactory way of wringing her lover's bosom. These women exist only in their relation to man; and, despite a feverish energy that love gives them, one feels that they could never become free women, that they are doomed to remain the slaves of passion or of memory. Only in self-sacrifice have they power, and it is not often that the beauty of self-sacrifice in woman is denied by one of the opposite sex. But it is Mr. Galsworthy's peculiar distinction that in his masculine insistence upon the beauty of self-sacrifice in women, he should understand the full cost of it to women themselves, the tragic waste of useless renunciation, the bitter loss to the world of that joy which is the crown and heritage of fulfillment, never of crucifixion.

Now, it is only by perfectly realizing this tradition of the womanly woman, it is only by completely understanding how deeply it has colored almost all that man has written about woman from the wisdom of Solomon to the folly of Sir Almroth Wright, that we shall begin to grasp the profound significance of the woman's movement. For what we call the woman's movement is a revolt from a pretense of being—it is at its best and worst a struggle for the liberation of personality. After centuries of silence or of idle chatter on the part of woman about their own natures, there has come, within the present decade, a rather startling burst of world confidences. Women novelists are still content, with some honorable exceptions, to copy the models as well as the methods of men; but in the brilliant and fearless books of Ellen Kay, of Rosa Mayreder, of Olive Schreiner, of C. Gasquoine Hartley (Mrs. Walter Gallichan), woman has become at last not only human, but articulate. Mrs. Gallichan's "The Truth About Woman" is an honest and courageous attempt to view woman, not through man's colored spectacles of tradition and sentiment, but by the clear, searching light of reality. It is not a book for babes, nor, for the matter of that, is it a book for octogenarians, unless they have abandoned most of the opinions held by the octogenarians of my acquaintance. She destroys much that the world has long valued, and particularly does she destroy the image worship of the womanly woman of fiction. One may not always agree with her conclusions; but she has admirably succeeded in freeing herself from sex prejudices and superstitions, and she brings to the familiar facts of biology and history an entirely fresh point of view and a remarkable keenness of insight. In preaching the gospel of freedom to women, however, it is well to remember—and it is not fair to imply that Mrs. Gallichan wholly forgets this—that the best use man has made of his liberty in the past has been to place restrictions upon it. For love, which would be so easy a solution of life's problems if it existed as a pure essence, may become sometimes, through its strange intermingilngs, as morally destructive as hatred.

But Mrs. Gallichan writes with conviction, fairness, and sincerity, and she appears splendidly above that feminine priggishness, the irritating assumption of woman's moral superiority to man, which to the present writer at least sounds out of place, though not without humor, on a woman's lips. For virtue, after all, is not biological, but spiritual, and is of an infinite complexity—yet there are modern crusaders who seem to have forgotten that the Wisdom that forgave the thief and the Magdalen had only scorn for the Pharisee and drove the money changers out of the temple. So it is a pleasant change to find that Mrs. Gallichan rejects the popular doctrine of man's natural grossness as fearlessly as she denies the other sanctified fallacy of "woman's consecration to suffering." Of the one, she says wisely: "We women are so easily deceived by the outside appearances of things. The man who calls 'a spade a spade' is not really inferior to him who terms it 'an agricultural implement for the tilling of the soil,'" and of the other: "The female half of life has not been pre-ordained to suffer any more than the male half; this belief has done more to destroy the conscience of woman than any other single error. You have only to repeat any lie long enough to convince even yourself of its truth. But assuredly free woman will have to yield up her martyr's crown."

And it is just here, in this yielding up of the crown of the martyr and the manner of the Pharisee, that Mrs. Gallichan seems to make her greatest contribution to her subject. There is a song of joy in her pages—a song so different from the many mournful hymns with which men have celebrated the fact of sex, that one is tempted to ask if, after all, the sorrows of woman have existed chiefly in the imagination of men. She rejoices in womanhood, but it is a womanhood so free, so active, so conquering, that the word takes a new meaning from her interpretation, and she strikes her deepest note when she adds: "that from which woman must be freed is herself—the unsocial self that has been created by a restricted environment. * * * Woman is what she is because she has lived as she has. And no estimate of her character, no effort to fix the limit of her activities, can carry weight that ignores the totally different relations toward society that have artificially grown up, dividing so sharply the life of woman from that of man."

In the three main divisions of her book—the Biological Section, the Historical Section, and the Modern Section—Mrs. Gallichan discusses at length, and with a personal enthusiasm that makes it very interesting reading, the evolution of the woman's part in nature as the guardian of the life force, and therefore as "the predominant and responsible partner in the relations of the sexes." The ancient social dominance of woman in the mother-age, the transition from this to the inferiority and dependence of the mother during the father-age, and the present unstable efforts of the sexes toward a balance of power—all these periods of bondage or of liberty she regards merely as nature's provisions for the better care of the race. In contrast with much that man has written about woman—in contrast with the intolerant bitterness of Weininger, of Nietzsche, of Schopenhauer—there is a large, calm justice in her criticism of this man's world in which we are living. To her clear vision man appears, not as a conscious tyrant, but, equally with woman, as a victim to the conditions of social evolution. Beneath the historic fact of man's dominance, she discerns the invincible purpose of nature without which man's efforts to dominate would have been as useless as a child's cries for the moon. If the balance of power passed from the matriarch to the patriarch, this was possible only because the growing race needed to cradle itself in the father-age before it could gather its strength. Not male tyranny, but the selective agency of life decided the issue. While the race needed woman's subjection, she was condemned to remain subject; when it needs her freedom, she is inevitably ordained to become free. It is as useless for men to fight progress as it is for women to fight men—"For to go on with man, not to get from man, this is the goal of woman's freedom. Just in measure as the sexes fall away from love and understanding of each other do they fall away from life into the futility of personal ends." In the harmonious adjustment of the future she sees:

"Neither mother-right alone, nor father-right alone, can satisfy the new ideals of the true relationship of the sexes. The spiritual force, slowly unfolding, that has uplifted, and is still uplifting, womanhood, is the foundation of woman's claim that the further progress of humanity is bound up with her restoration to a position of freedom and human equality. But this position she must not take from man—that, indeed, would be a step backward. No, she is to share it with him, and this for her own sake and for his, and, more than all, for the sake of their children and all the children of the race. This replacement of the mother side by side with the father in the home and in the larger home of the State is the true work of the Woman's Movement."

But where this very modern interpretation diverges most widely from the traditional ideal of the sexes is in the writer's rejection of the belief in woman's natural passivity, and by this single point, small as it may appear to some thinkers, will probably be decided the future success or failure of the movement we know as Feminism. If, as man has so confidently asserted in the past, woman exists, not as an active agent of life, but merely as the passive guardian of the life force, then, indeed, is her revolt doomed to fail and her struggle to bear fruit in her sorrow. If her fight is a fight against law, if it is nature's purpose that woman shall sit and watch, then, as surely as night follows day, she will continue to sit and watch until the end of time. To Mrs. Gallichan, of course, as to all feminists, this apparent passivity is not inherent, but acquired, and is obliged, therefore, to disappear in the higher development of the race. By an appeal to history, indeed, she shows how often it has vanished in the past when it ceased to be one of the necessary conditions of woman's relation to man. "Woman," she repeats, "is what she is because she has lived as she has." It is foolish to talk of a revolt against nature as if, by taking thought, one could change the principle of one's being; and it is not without deep significance that woman's long endeavor to exist artificially, instead of naturally, should result in the violent reaction of the present. For this hunger for freedom that is driving women to-day into strange countries, as it drove the pioneers of old across oceans to the wilderness of new continents, is bound up with the imperative striving of life.

A Trying Christmas

Grace S. Richmond's little holiday story, "Under the Christmas Stars," tells of the gathering of a houseful of sons and daughters and grandchildren at the old home for Christmas, of the general cold shouldering of the newest daughter-in-law because she was not quite conventional enough in dress and manner, and of how, during a wild storm, she met a critical situation with ability and turned a trying Christmas into one of joy and thanksgiving. There are decorated margins and end-papers and three full-page illustrations in tints by Alice Barber Stephens. (Doubleday, Page & Co.)

Socialism . . . . . .By ALGERNON LEE

Educational Director of the Rand School of Social Science.

THE year has brought us a dozen important books dealing with the Socialist theory and the Socialist movement in one way or another. Excluding some as too special and others as too controversial for our present purpose, there remain two of such nearly equal value that they may be taken up together—Allan L. Benson's "The Truth About Socialism" and Morris Hillquit's "Socialism Summed Up." Both are addressed to that large American public which is eager for information on all live topics, but is impatient of big books and technical language. Both have been well received. If not exactly in the class of "best sellers," they are at any rate good sellers and promise to continue so for an indefinite time. They are alike, too, in their origin, and that is worth noting.

The contents of the fifteen-cent monthly magazines are perhaps the best barometer of public opinion in the United States. The number of persons who buy books other than novels is comparatively small. At a price ranging from one to two dollars the prospect of ten or even five thousand readers is enough to justify a publisher in bringing out a book. The appearance of such a volume, or even of several within a year, therefore, does not necessarily indicate a very widespread interest in the subject. On the other hand, everybody buys daily newspapers, and no one reads more than a small part of what is in them. The daily editor's rule must be that, if a subject commands the attention of even a small fraction of his local public, it deserves at least a little space. But the monthly magazine is neither a necessity of life for all nor a luxury for the few. In order to live, the magazine must sell in the hundreds of thousands. In order to sell, it must be "live" from cover to cover. Each month's contents determine the next month's sales. The reader wants the full value of his fifteen cents, and something more. He is a captious critic. Like Marie Bashkirtseff, "he dislikes the things that he dislikes more than he likes the things that he likes." The magazine editor, accordingly, eager as he is to have positively attractive "features," is still more intensely fearful of putting in a single article that will offend or fail to interest even a minority of his readers.

This is what lends significance to the fact that three of the great popular magazines have of late given liberal space to the discussion of socialism. Mr. Benson's book is a reprint from the pages of Pearson's Magazine; Mr. Hillquit's first appeared as a series in the Metropolitan; Everybody's has since begun a series on the same theme; and all three periodicals have found the experiment more than safe. At least a million readers, most of whom never see the official publications of the Socialist movement, are welcoming its message as presented in these magazines.

Allan Benson was a newspaper man and magazine writer of established reputation before he became a Socialist. In fact, like Charles Edward Russell, he was brought to Socialism by the things he learned when, in his "muckraking" career, he got behind the stage settings of big business and practical politics and saw the real powers that shifted the scenery and prompted the actors. In "The Truth About Socialism" he tells, in very simple and direct language, the conclusions to which he has been led. He talks American—that is to say, a pure and unaffected English, easily understandable by alert, busy, and unbookish men. He avoids the error of those who imagine that, in order to be popular, a writer must think superficially and use cheap slang. There is nothing trivial in either his matter or his manner. He is dealing with a big subject and assumes that his reader is willing as well as able to think. Here is a part of the chapter "To the Disinherited" which introduces his book:

> This country belongs to the people who live in it.
> The power that made the Rocky Mountains did not so make them that, viewed from aloft, they spell "Rockefeller."
> The monogram of Morgan is nowhere worked out in the course of the Hudson River.
> Nothing above ground or below ground indicates that this country was made for anybody in particular.
> Everything above ground and below ground indicates that it was made for everybody.
> Yet this country, as it is to-day, is not for everybody. Everybody has not an equal opportunity in it. A few do nothing and have everything. The rest do everything and have nothing.
> The conditions that exist in this country to-day are indefensible and intolerable. This should be a happy country. It should be a happy country because it contains every element that is required to make happiness. The pangs of hunger should never come to a single human being, because we already produce as much food as we need, and with more intelligent effort could easily produce enough to supply a population ten times as great.
> Yet, instead of this happy land, we have a land in which the task of making a living is constantly becoming greater and more uncertain. Everything seems to be tied up in a knot that is becoming tighter. * * *
> If you have lost your hope of happiness, get it back. This can be a happy nation in your time. This country is for you. It is big. It is rich. It is all you need. But you will have to take it, and the easiest way to take it is with ballots.

There is the statement of the problem. It is a problem whose existence the majority of the people already recognize—are forced to recognize, because it comes home to them in daily life, because it is a problem of work and wages, of house rents and food prices, of comfort and health, of schooling for the little ones, of provision for sickness and old age, a question of giving the boys and girls a better start than their parents had or of slipping back bit by bit and dreading what to-morrow may bring.

The worshippers of Things as They Are never tire of quoting that fine phrase "America is another name for Opportunity." In sober fact, the phrase no longer rings true in the ears of nine-tenths of the wage workers who get less than $800 a year and have to send their children to the shop at fourteen to help keep the family together; nor in the ears of the small farmers who, though temporarily profiting by high prices, see a diminishing chance for their sons to get land and maintain a toilsome independence; nor even in the ears of retail dealers and petty manufacturers who see themselves being transformed into agents for the trust, and professional men who see their vocations being commercialized and are forced to live beyond their means in order to hold their own in the struggle for a livelihood. The generation that has now reached middle age was bred to the old ideal of climbing from class to class by individual effort. It was not a bad ideal in its time. But the younger generation, through hard experience, is learning a new and better one. "Give your brother a hand instead of clambering on his shoulders; strive to rise with your class, not out of it; cherish the dream of a classless society, and organize yourselves to make the dream come true"—that is the new gospel that is to-day saving the masses from dull despair or wild revolt.

That is the gospel that Benson preaches from cover to cover of his little book, never losing sight of the big idea, but confirming it on every page with appeals to every-day fact. The chapter titles will give a sufficient idea of the way in which he takes up the problem and sets forth its solution: What Socialism Is and Why It Is; The Virtuous Grafters and Their Grave Objections to Socialism; Why Socialists Preach Discontent; How the People May Acquire the Trusts; The Private Property Bogy Man; Socialism the Lone Foe of War; Why Socialists Oppose Radical Politicians; The Truth About the Coal Question; Deathbeds and Dividends; If Not Socialism—What?

On the whole, "The Truth About Socialism" is the best propaganda book since Blatchford's "Merrie England," which it somewhat resembles in style, while it has the advantage of being a native product and up to date.

Mr. Hillquit, unlike Mr. Benson, was reared in the atmosphere of Socialism and has been active in the movement since his early youth. For almost thirty years he has grown in and with the party and helped it to grow. A lawyer by profession, and a busy one, he early learned how to economize time and mobilize energy so as to combine with his practice an intense, continuous, and many-sided participation in the work of the Socialist movement. As a member of party committees, a delegate to national and international conventions, a lecturer, and a writer ("Socialism Summed Up" is his third book, not to mention numerous fugitive articles) he has had at least as large a share as any other man in framing, in expounding, and in executing the policies of American Socialism.

Although born in Russia, he has long since learned to speak and write an idiomatic English which, if it is not always as free and graceful as Benson's, is both clear and forcible. Hillquit's great strength, in whatever he does, is his sense of order and proportion, his ability to deal with large outlines and yet not neglect details. "The style is the man," and "Socialism Summed Up" is characteristic of its author—cool, leisurely, thorough, objective, concise, concrete, exact. Perhaps we may say that Benson's book is the more persuasive, Hillquit's the more convincing.

In his first chapter, "Causes That Make for Socialism," he shows in just what respects the problem of wealth and poverty in the present age differs from the class problems of the past. As a result of the development of social production by means of power-driven machinery—

> For the first time in history free producers found themselves divorced from the tools of their labor. The modern worker cannot revert to the simple tool of his forefathers. He must have access to up-to-date plants, machinery and equipment. His entire social usefulness depends on that machinery. Without it he is an industrial cripple. But the individual worker cannot own the modern machine, and the workers collectively do not own it. All the modern sources and instruments of wealth production are owned and controlled by a class of persons other than the workers. * * *
> Millions of workers yearn for the necessaries of life. The material for the production of these necessaries is right around them. They are eager to make their food and clothing by their own toil. They have the requisite skill and ability. But between them and their living stands the modern tool, the key to all wealth, and behind the tool stands the capitalist owner, with power to withhold its use from the people. * * *
> The poor have always been with us. But the poverty of former eras was a necessary evil due to the simple fact that man had not yet learned to produce a sufficient supply of necessaries by means of proper tools. Modern poverty is entirely artificial and wholly unnecessary. The marvelous growth of the productivity of labor within the last generations has enabled mankind to produce enough to satisfy all reasonable needs of all reasonable human beings. The mass-poverty of to-day is due solely to irrational and faulty industrial organization.

Then he sets forth "The Socialist Aim"—the social ownership and democratic control of all those means of production which, by reason of their magnitude and complexity, must be operated by social labor and whose use is necessary to the existence of civilized society. This does not mean "dividing up." It does not mean government ownership of typewriters and knitting needles. It does not mean government interference in the private life of the individual.

When we have done away with the right of some men to enrich themselves by controlling other men's opportunity of employment, and consequently with the interest of a few in using law and government to regulate the lives of the many, we need not fear that the economically free people in their collective capacity will out of sheer perversity use the political power to oppress themselves in their individual capacity. Not only will the realization of the Socialist aim diminish rather than increase the prohibitory and punitive activities of the State, but in another and still more important way it will widen the scope of liberty. It will free mankind from the domination of blind economic forces, which now so often compel rich and poor alike, in the competitive struggle, to stifle their noblest impulses and outrage their own individual sense of right.

THE TRUTH ABOUT SOCIALISM. By Allan L. Benson. New York: Huebsch. $1; in paper covers, 25 cents.

SOCIALISM SUMMED UP. By Morris Hillquit. New York: The H. K. Fly Company. $1.

When the Socialist speaks of the advent of Socialism as an assured fact, he is not merely expressing his determination that it shall be so. He bases his prediction on a study of existing society. In his chapter on "The Trend of Social Development," Mr. Hillquit shows that the logic of events is leading in that direction—the Socialist propagandist is but the spokesman or the interpreter of actual evolution.

The entire trend of modern economic development has been away from competition and toward combination. The true meaning of the great trust movement of the last generation is just this simple fact, that competition has become inadequate and incompatible with the modern large-scale industry, and must yield to combination. It is only a question of a short time when combination will become the absolute rule in industry. * * * Trusts represent a distinct tendency toward co-operation in industry and are developing the material basis for a Socialist form of industrial organization. * * *

In the domain of politics and legislation the socialistic tendencies have been even more pronounced. * * * The modern principle of control and regulation of industries by the Government indicates the complete collapse of the purely capitalist ideal of non-interference, and signifies that the Government may change from an instrument of class rule and exploitation into one of social regulation and protection. Like the industries, the Government is becoming socialized.

The remaining chapters include a rather detailed account of the methods of the Socialist movement and its working programme, a summary of its achievements in the Old World and the New, and a brief sketch of its history and present status in the United States.

The time is past for the Podsnaps to wave the subject aside with the phrases "not American" and "visionary," and "contrary to human nature." The Socialist movement has struck deep roots in American public life, it is a very solid reality, and a million voters have fought it quite compatible with their nature as human beings who long for economic liberty and social peace. Two recent occupants of the White House, not to mention a Vice President and a host of trust magnates, Senators, college Presidents, Bishops, and other distinguished personages, have declared that Socialism is the issue of the age—not merely of the day. It is worth everybody's while to know what this movement is, so that he may know whether he is for it or against it. Mr. Hillquit and Mr. Benson have done good service in making the information available in two such small and readable books.

"THE EGOTISTICAL I"

THE ECOTISTICAL I. By Ellen Wilkins Tompkins. E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.

Take one old bachelor, possessed of a garden and three devoted servants, a pretty and attractive young girl—called by him the Youth Pessimist—whom he loves as dearly as though she were his own daughter, a poor but worthy young man, and a half dozen or more minor characters; season mildly with humor, add a dash of charm—and you will have something closely resembling "The Egotistical I."

It is an agreeably written story, quite real and human. Old Timothy is just the kind of man one would like to have for an uncle, and his garden was an almost ideal meeting place for lovers. The Chance Acquaintance, the Wainwright girls, Roger and the rest are all pleasant people to meet; so, too, is Patsey, despite the tragedy of the black roaster. A sunshiny, friendly little book is "The Egotistical I."

"THE BRIGHTEST, CHEERIEST, HAPPIEST BOOK."

MAKING OVER MARTHA

By JULIE M. LIPPMANN

The FINAL TEST for the success of a book is in the book itself. Every now and then there appears a new book that through sheer intrinsic merit wins its way to the front. A year ago a new book and a new author appeared, unheralded and almost unknown, but the story, because of its merit, its human appeal, its sweet humor and delightful cheeriness, surely won its way to the front. MARTHA BY-THE-DAY, of which it is said "no sweeter humor has been written into a book," has gone through 10 editions, and more people are buying it to-day than ever before.

MISS LIPPMANN has written a new book, MAKING OVER MARTHA, a larger, stronger and even happier story than MARTHA BY-THE-DAY.

Psychism . . . . . By HENRY MILLS ALDEN

Author of "A Study of Death."

MAN is a being "looking before and after." If the terms "before" and "after" are used to express space relations, they are merely relative. But as terms of time they are capable of suggesting, if not expressing, something of not merely relative but essential meaning. Thus, if we apply these terms to a flowing river, we may be thinking of the static shore it passes, when they express only space relations; but we may be thinking of the passing stream itself—of its source and issue. That is different. The very idea of the source is far-reaching in its suggestiveness, leading us into the skies and involving the mysteries of thermo-dynamic alchemy.

But the idea of source as connected with a living being, and especially with a being like man, whose human distinction is that he has psychical activities, has a suggestiveness far beyond that caused by any other passing. Here we confront the subtler mysteries of psychical dynamics, and are taken out of space and out of clock time into what Bergson calls Real Time, meaning what the poet means when he creatively imagines Eternity—what the schoolmen meant when they conceived of form sub specie aeternitatis.

In common religious parlance, we are at death "launched from time into eternity," and this eternity is thought of as endless duration. What, then, of that other endless duration before birth? We can have no intuition of the reality of psychical life save as we see that eternity is its essential quality—here and now, as really as it ever can be—not its quantitative duration, past or future.

This is only to say that reality is inseparable from the genetic or creative quality of life, which cannot be better expressed than by the term "Becoming," which is Janus-faced, at once Source and Event—these two aspects of the genesis too intimately belonging together to be thought of in any formal relation, as that of "before" and "after," or that of cause and effect. They belong together in every living moment, also in the term of every individual life and in the whole cycle of humanity, which are only larger moments. Creative evolutionary procedure is through specialization, which also is creative. The entire procedure is dynamic, as distinguished from a contrived mechanical process, and fundamentally the dynamics is psychical, implying purposive intelligence, not as separate from, but as immanent in, the creative activity. Not only the consistent harmony of the universe, but every part, form, and proparent to our senses are as repetitions itatedly, an implication of creation itself.

The most illuminating intuition possible to reason or to faith is to see beginning and ending as complementary aspects of creative activity. The reason why the physical universe is a so blind leader to the human soul is that the beginning and ending of its vast cycles are hidden from us. We may detect signs of its decadence, and science may in due time disclose reintegrations as well as disintegrations, but its motions as directly apparent to our senses are as repetitious as those of a machine.

It is only in organic life—a brief season of macrocosmic Time—that, in the phenomena of birth, growth, decadence, and death, both the ascent and descent of life are open to observation, and in the human consciousness alone do we become aware of psychical activities, whose source, significance, and destination are in no sense referable to any visible phenomena. It is here, in the life of the soul itself, that man asks whence he comes and whither he goes—more especially and solicitously the latter question, taking, in all the ages, this form: If a man die shall he live again?

It is my purpose here briefly to indicate the present attitude of philosophic and scientific thought in response—so far as it is at all responsive—to this everlasting question. This purpose would not adequately be met by a formal review of the book whose title I have placed at the head of this article—Maurice Maeterlinck's "Our Eternity," though it is the most significant treatise that has appeared concerning the claims and results of "psychical research," to the consideration of which more than half of the volume is devoted. Philosophically the most valuable portion of the work is that part of it which had previously been published as an essay on death, mainly concerned with the question as to the survival of individual consciousness.

Every point and aspect involved in the speculative discussion of immortality, including the neo theosophical theory of reincarnation, are competently treated in this work, and with the author's characteristic charm. He appeals to reason alone, accepting no religious belief, and repudiating the most cherished of human sentiments, giving these not even the indulgence of a hearing in court. In full accord with science, he is not disposed to bring scientific data to the support of his position. He is psychological, dealing with psychical activities, but not technically a psychologist; he never subjects a mental function, as for instance that of memory, to analysis. Consciousness is to him a detached thing, he deals with its components and what we might call its haoits, and even with its subconscions ground, but not with its genesis. He leaves this field to Bergson, just as he leaves to him the intuitional method. He leaves it to Sir Oliver Lodge to find in the ether the ground of continuity in the universe and, so, of the survival of human personal identity after death. It would never occur to the reader of his books to think of Maeterlinck as professor of anything. As I have said, he directly addresses the human reason, not as a trained faculty, and he does this in common terms—so cogently that the reason responds, complaining only that there is not something more positive to respond to.

Simply human enough in his appeal, Maeterlinck is most unhuman in his detachment, which the reader follows to find himself in a cold, indifferent region, assured by his guide that he is still somehow a denizen of the universe, still somehow participant in the light and joy which are its essential gifts to the spirit. It is not so easy to realize the warmth of interstellar spaces. Maeterlinck is not a skeptic as to God or as to the future life. He does not accept annihilation, though evidently he eagerly would, as an alternative to the kind of future existence spiritistically disclosed, displacing a larger by a lesser mystery. "If death carried us to nothingness, did birth then draw us out of that same nothingness? Why should the second be more impossible than the first?" For the author insists upon what he calls "the two eternities"—that before birth as well as that after death. The emergence into a life to come is more novel, he holds, than birth. In the divestiture he leaves not a shred of the "ego," meaning by that the individual consciousness. There is no continuity of identity. What it is that emerges, however substantial it may seem in the author's mind, is not clearly and vividly presented to the imagination of the reader. It is something which assembles and controls the compunents of consciousness here and which may have the same relation to a new consciouaness hereafter. Sometimes the word "mind" seems to stand for this—the desire for knowledge seeming to the author the highest and noblest of aspirations. One might almost vainly search the pages of the book to find the word "soul," or any indication of what the author considers the qualities and activities distinctive of the soul. His sense of the Reality of life does not, for the reader, get the better of his very keen sense of its Illusions.

Maeterlinck gives himself here mainly to showing what immortality is not. But surely little real knowledge has come to us from attempts that have been made to show what it is. Illusive hopes and groundless fears have given it, for religious sensibility, a vividly picturesque portrayal. Now that reason has so far dispelled superatition, eminent scientific investigators have honestly and, as is their wont, cautiously sought to find in their own field some solid basis for belief in life after death, and some of these have eagerly lent their service to the Society of Psychical Research. Sir Oliver Lodge has perhaps come the nearest to making the survival of human personality seem scientifically plausible. As to the results of psychical research, Maeterlinck admits that they have established as a fact "that a spiritual or nervous shape, an image, a belated reflexion of life, is capable of subsisting for some time, of releasing itself from the body, of surviving it, of traversing enormous distances in the twinkling of an eye, of manifesting itself to the living, and, sometimes, of communicating with them." But he is obliged to add that these phantasms soon fade away and disappear forever, and that they have never brought us a single revelation of the new estate into which they have passed. He attaches no importance to such supposed disclosures as have been made through mediums and automatic writing, except as indicating the supernormal powers of the living. Can any disclosure be made to us, or could we understand any that might be made, of a life that may be as different from ours as the organic world is from the inorganic? We are in full sympathy with Maeterlinck's feeling that "explanations should be superior to the silence which they break."

We do not ask an explanation of a life to come, and the time will soon come when immortality will cease to be a subject of discussion. We have called it "the everlasting question." But it could not have been a question to primitive man; rather it was a reality as intimate and indefinable as was the wonder of the world he was shut in with. It will not be a question when the life of reason brings back into clear light the immediate sense of living reality which primitive man felt in the darkness. The ages between Instinct and Intuition have been those in which man's mind in its making has put itself questions that could not be answered, but which nevertheless the speculative imagination, prompted by hopes and fears, preaumptively answered.

The modern attitude of Science is not thus presumptive. Even for its hypothesea it waits to see enough of the truth, dispassionately observed and co-ordinated, to frame them by. The creative imagination may enter into the co-ordination, but it is the illumination of a real vision—the flash lighting up a completed circle—and to this exteat science follows an intuitional method. Psychology, because it deals directly with the data of consciousness, can be more convincingly intuitional and, since it has come to realize this advantage, it has made a wonderful advance. The displacement of Herbert Spencer's uninspired exposition of evolution by Bergson's Creative Evolution is due to the most luminous intuition of our early twentieth century.

What will now engage the philosophic mind will not be an inquiry as to the immortality of the soul, or as to the conditions of its future life, but rather one as to its own nature and its creative activities. There can be no real vision of the scope of psychical life as confined within the term of an individual existence, or even within that of the existence of humanity on this planet. The limits which Maeterlinck has imposed upon his contemplation of "our eternity" preclude such a vision, leaving us blankly confronting the cosmic consciousness.

Eugenics . . . . . By CHARLES B. DAVENPORT

Director of the Station for Experimental Evolution, Carnegie Institute.

THE aim of this study is to appraise the influence of the innate qualities of a single man of a country on the history of that country during his active life. The single man selected is the reigning monarch.

The method of the study is to render a judgment, as objective and free from bias as possible, concerning the position of the reigning monarch in one of the three classes: Plus, plus-minus, and minus. In the plus class are placed men with exceptionally numerous and vigorous talents for leadership, in the minus class are placed monarchs with feeble intellect and few talents, and, in the plus-minus class are placed the others. Similarly, the change in the political status of the country during the reign of the monarch is assigned to one of these classes. An agreement in the sign of monarchial ability and political progress during his reign counts one for the hypothesis of an influence of the monarch. A disagreement in sign counts against the hypothesis. The correlation in signs can be mathematically calculated and gives a numerical expression for the influence of the monarch.

This method is applied in the successive periods of the history of France, Castile, Aragon, United Spain, Portugal, the Netherlands, Denmark, Sweden, Russia, Prussia, Austria, Turkey, Switzerland, and England. For example, Gustavus Vasa was a marked personality with very high ability; he was brave, cautious, ecoomical, industrious, stern, virtuous. During his reign Sweden became independent of Denmark and increased in commerce, agriculture, mining, law and order. He was succeeded by Eric XIV., brilliantly endowed but devoid of practical wisdom, suspicious, violent, cruel, and headstrong; at times mentally deranged. During the reign of this rather unfortunate Prince public treasure was wasted, there was much discontent and suffering, and finally a rebellion arose and Eric was deposed. Here a weak ruler permitted to decay what his strong predecessor had built up. In this way the personality of Kings and the history of civilization in the various countries of Europe are traced in parallel fashion, and the whole makes an interesting review of European history, even if it accomplishes nothing else.

But Dr. Woods does draw very definite conclusions from the vast array of facts which he has so painstakingly amassed. There are altogether 105 instances of a superior ruler associated with advancing conditions of his country as against 11 associated with decline. There are 87 cases of a weak ruler associated with the marked decline of a nation, and only 30 cases where a weak ruler is associated with an advance in the welfare of the country, despite the fact that, when the monarch is weak, the Government is usually administered by some strong power behind the throne. If there were no correlation between the human and the political status the relation would be indicated statistically by 0. Were the correlation perfect it would be indicated by unity, or 1. Actually the correlation figures out .6, or three-fifths of unity, and this is a very high correlation as anthropometric and biological correlations run.

Granting this correlation, the crucial point still remains to be discussed, did the conditions of national development determine the eminence of the King, or, on the other hand, was it the capacities of the monarchs that determined the conditions of their countries while they were ruling? Dr. Wooda finds the latter conclusion established by three lines of argument. First, the transitions from + to − states of progress of the country are not through transitional neutral stages, but are abrupt and irregular, and the irregular changes follow rather closely upon the accession of the new monarch. Second, during minorities of interregnum, if no member of the royal family is in control as regent, the prosperity of the country almost invariably declines. Thirty-six such periods were periods of retrograding conditions; mostly under weak regents or "councils" with divided power. On the other hand there are only two divided regencies associated with progressive conditions. Progress occurred generally when one strong leader was in control and acted like a monarch. Third, if conditions determined the rank of the monarch there should be less evidence of an inheritance of the intellectual qualities of monarchs than of some character not influenced by conditions, e. g., eye color. But quantitative studies indicate, on the contrary, that the inheritance of abilities in monarchs is just as marked as that of other qualities. Therefore their abilities and rank have not been perceptibly modified by conditions, but, on the other hand, the monarchs have determined the conditions of their countries.

Prof. C.B Davenport

Dr. Woods lays emphasis on the conclusion "that the royal breed, considered as a unit, is superior to any other one family, be it that of noble or commoner." Proof that the superiority of royalty is due to inoate qualities is found in the facts that younger brothers are just as eminent in intellect as are the inheritors of the crown; that many scions of royal houses have been exceedingly precocious; that, on the whole, their genius has been shown in war and government, (for which the blood was pended preeminently upon the presence of men possessing innate talent for those fields. It should be a nation's chief concero to secure, in some way or other, the multiplication of individuals from the strong and "gifted" stock, so that the proportion of such persons in the population shall increase.

In the United States the maintenance and increase of the population by immigration approach in importance the contribution made by reproduction; thus our problem is both that of securing a relatively greater fecundity of the best stock already in the country and a relatively greater migration of the better strains into the country. This result may be brought about, on the one hand, by restricting (through segregation, and, if it seems desirable, even through sterilization) the fecundity of persons who belong to mentally and morally defective strains and by excluding at our gates immigrants who belong to such strains. This result may be achieved, on the other hand, by arousing our most efficient stock to a sense of the sacred duty that devolves on them of high fecundity and by encouraging the immigration of peraons that we know to belong to good European stock.

In theory every man in America is a "king"; if bad rulers destroy the prosperity of a country, as Dr. Woods shows, woe to that democracy that neglects every proper means of securing strong rulers.

THE GARDEN WITHOUT WALLS

By Coningsby Dawson

HENRY HOLT AND CO., Publishers

This announcement is more than an advertisement. It is the first news of some books of a distinctive kind which are just ready at every book store.

A BEAUTIFUL LEATHER BOOK WITH A HEART INSIDE IT

Twelve of them, in fact, so that every individual taste may be supplied. Before now you have found the Rubaiyat, Browning and the Christmas Carol in leather bindings. But here are Henry van Dyke, Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, Albert Bigelow Paine, Owen Wister and others—the refreshingly new and modern writers—in a distinctly bookish and tasteful leather binding. These twelve books are the few, selected from the many, written at different times—not for any series—now offered to you because they are specially suitable for Christmas giving and all-the-year-'round reading.

Overworked adjectives can hardly describe the good taste, the special quality, of these books. So here are the bare facts of their making:

Size, extra tall 16mo.; bound in full sheep; flexible; colors French blue, cochineal red, apple green, bottle green; antique tinted end-papers; rough edges; gilt tops; wide margins; full gilt stamping on covers; glacine wrappers; enclosed in colored cardboard slip case with paper label. Many of the books have frontispieces in colors.

Each Book Was Written for One Reason—Because the Spirit of Sympathy Was Aroused—It Had to be Written

You can compliment the taste of each friend, for these books are varied. The Christmas spirit shines brilliantly in their pages, whether the particular story is about Christmas or not. Many of us are a bit tired of the so-called Christmas story, and several of these books are for just such tastes.

A little glimpse of each book is given below as a guide to help you in placing your friends among them. The descriptions of the stories are, of course, too brief to do more than indicate what they are. Here, as in the beautiful appearance of the books, you must see for yourself. Go to the nearest bookstore—and at the first opportunity you have, for it may solve a large part of your Christmas problem.

THE STORY OF THE OTHER WISE MAN By Henry van Dyke

The beautiful fancy of a fourth Magi who sought "Him who is born in Bethlehem." The story has been translated into many foreign languages, including Turkish and Bengali.

"PEANUT" By Albert Bigelow Paine

He is a very poor little boy and his home is far away among the hills; but he is loyal in his friendship even to the memory of the desperado who was good to him, and about whom he will believe no ill.

THIRTY PIECES OF SILVER By Clarence B. Kelland

A part of the price of the great Betrayal slips from the palm of Judas down through the ages. The story is dramatic as a play, with the spiritual appeal of a poetic allegory. A rare Christmas book.

FINDING HIS SOUL By Norman Duncan

A big-hearted, merry man, a hustler, is one of the best traveling salesmen in his line. His little boy dies, and the cruel blow unhinges his reason. The firm sends him abroad. On Christmas Eve, among the hills of Bethlehem, he has a wonderful experience.

THE MANSION By Henry van Dyke

In this new story spiritual truth burns radiantly in the lamp of fiction—so beautiful, so deeply spiritual, that it satisfies the reader while it stirs his conscience.

THE ROAD TO JOY By Louise Collier Willcox

This is a book that will guide the reader along the path of contentment. It is a guide-book of the road to joy, pointing out the heights from which the goal may best be viewed, the spots where the traveler should linger, the paths he should avoid.

Why Give a Christmas Card When You Can Give a Real and a Beautiful Book?

The price of these books has been fixed at the lowest possible figure which would give you these new, fresh books in a leather binding of genuine worth. They sell for $1 each—at the bookstore nearest you.

HARPER & BROTHERS

LINCOLN AND THE SLEEPING SENTINEL By L. E. Chittenden

A young soldier—a boy he was, half dead with fatigue—relieving a sick comrade on watch, and then falling asleep at his post—the soldier's shame, his dishooor, and his saving by Lincoln.

JONATHAN AND DAVID By Elizabeth Stuart Phelps

This is a simple village story, with an old man's gentle character and affection for his dog as the governing motive. It belongs to that class of stories that take hold by reason of their sincerity and unaffected pathos.

THE APPLE TREE COTTAGE By Elinor Macartney Lane

A little pastel sketch in apple-green—a story light and delicate and fresh as the Summer sea itself, and a flower-bordered cottage by its side, where "he and she" are all that count in the gold-and-blue Summer setting. Illustrations in color by Frank Craig.

THE TOY SHOP. A Story of Lincoln By Margarita Spalding Gerry

The kind of story that brings a lump to the throat. Here is Lincoln visiting a toy-shop on a Winter evening to buy tin soldiers for his little son, and talking with the old toy-maker, veteran of Napoleon's wars.

PADRE IGNACIO By Owen Wister

On the Californian coast, at the parish of Santa Ysabel del Mar, Padre Ignacio, once a member of the gay world, has found "contentment in renunciation." But temptation comes upon him.

COMRADES By Elizabeth Stuart Phelps

A Civil War veteran, who has outlived all his companions, goes forth alone on Memorial Day to decorate their graves. His wife's devotion makes him realize that the title of comrade belongs to her even more than to the men who fell by his side.

In order that the public may not be disappointed, the publishers have made special arrangements to place quantities of these books at all stores, so that early selections may be made. If, however, you are not able to get those you wish, send immediately to the publishers and get the books by mail.

The Hundred Best Books of the Year

THE following reviews of the One Hundred Best Books of the Year are given in accordance to the classification decided upon by Prof. John Erskine, Dr. H. R. Steeves, Dr. Carl Van Doren, the committee for THE NEW YORK TIMES BOOK REVIEW from the Department of English, Columbia University. The list thus selected is the result of six conferences at which the members of the committee discussed the results of their independent investigations and came to a decision as to the books herewith chosen.

FICTION

THE CUSTOM OF THE COUNTRY

By Edith Wharton. Charles Scribner's Sons.

In no previous novel has Mrs. Wharton displayed her remarkable gift for character analysis so effectively as in "The Custom of the Country." Her theme is one that she is peculiarly fitted to develop—a comparison of certain elements in our new "smart set" with the old social order that still survives among the so-called exclusive circles of society in New York and Paris. Undine Spragg, the heroine of the story, is the only child of an uncultivated Westerner, who has made a fortune in a real estate boom and who comes to New York to launch his daughter in the "high society" that she craves. She is a woman of superlative beauty, and this, together with her father's wealth, furnishes her with the means by which to achieve something of the social success upon which she has set her heart. The absorbing interest of the book lies in the development of Undine's character. As a study in selfishness, the complete subordination of every minor interest to one consuming passion for power, this "social climber" of the twentieth century reminds one of Becky Sharp. Unlike Thackeray's heroine, however, Undine is not particularly gifted intellectually. She makes mistakes, she is guilty of errors in judgment, her conversation is anything but brilliant. But these limitations give to her portrait a stronger color of realism than one finds in the marvelous heroine of "Vanity Fair," while the art of Mrs. Wharton is further shown in the charm which Undine, in spite of her defects, exerts over her readers. As a satire on certain demoralizing tendencies in our modern society, Mrs. Wharton's book is a most significant contribution to recent fiction; as a story it is told with all the mastery of English and the charm of character depiction that long since won for this author a foremost place among the novelists of the period.

Edith Wharton
Author of "The Custom of the Country"

THE OLD ADAM

A Story of Adventure. By Arnold Bennett. George H. Doran Company. $1.35.

That "card," Denry the Audacious, who dodged and strode and mounted his successful way through the Five Towns in one of Mr. Bennett's previous novels, appears once more as the hero of "The Old Adam." Mr. Bennett has shown Five Towns to be England's Gascony and Denry its D'Artagnan. It is a middle-aged Denry that we encounter this time, to be sure, and we sigh regretfully for some of the youthful breeziness of the account of his younger days. But he is still Denry the Audacious, with the D'Artagnan flavor strong upon him. He has a wife and three children, and is known to his admiring townsmen as Alderman Machin and to his family as Edward Henry. He has the most modern house in Five Towns, with an electric chandelier which would have been "adequate for a lighthouse," an income of $25,000 a year, and various other accoutrements and symbols of success. But he longs for other worlds to conquer, and presently he rushes into the theatrical world of London, passes through several whirling experiences that land him on the verge of failure, but in a half chapter's breathless trip to New York he snatches victory from defeat and returns home with the laurels of still another success upon his brow, only to hear his son remark condescendingly: "Isn't father a funny man?"

The book is pure farce, written in slap-dash, haphazard style, but it is always amusing, and rises occasionally to the point of brilliancy. Casual entertainment is its only purpose, and in that worthy aim it is eminently successful.

O PIONEERS!

By Willa Sibert Cather. Houghton Mifflin Company. $1.25.

Miss Cather's story of Western pioneers is practically a novel without a hero, but it makes up for that omission by having three heroines. There are men in the book, but the interest centres in two women, not rivals, but friends—the splendid blonde farm woman, Alexandra, and Marie, poor little spirit of love and youth snatched untimely from her poppy fields. And, as much heroine as they themselves, looms large the earth, the land, patient and bountiful source of all things.

The average American does not have any deep instinct for the land or vital consciousness of the value and dignity of the life that may be lived upon it. But "O Pioneers!" is filled with this instinct and this consciousness. It is a tale of the old wood and field worshipping races. Swedes and Bohemians transplanted to the uplands of Nebraska and of their struggle with the untamed soil and finally their conquest of it.

Thomas Hardy
Author of "A Changed Man, and Other Tales"

It is a good story, a direct, human tale of love and struggle and attainment, a tale that is American in the best sense of the word. A thread of symbolism runs through it, in which the goddess of fertility once more subdues the barren and stubborn earth. This attitude of the author toward the soil gives her story an unusual interest and significance, since it is so directly opposed to our characteristic American feeling toward the land. For we are prone to consider it, in both our life and our fiction, as a sort of springboard from which to jump into other and more congenial modes of living.

THE INSIDE OF THE CUP

By Winston Churchill. Illustrated by Howard Giles. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

Mr. Churchill has embodied the spiritual problems of the age in his preacher hero, John Hodder, who voices clearly the spiritual unrest and yearning of our time. Revolting against spiritual inaction, he considers dogma of little consequence and demands spiritual virility, a Christianity that lives and acts rather than one that believes. The scene of the story is laid in a Middle Western city that might easily stand for St. Louis, but the stage setting and the actors are typical of our present-day American civilization. They strike true of well-to-do society in any of our large cities. St. John's might be any rich and fashionable parish between the oceans, and John Hodder, when he goes at the beginning of the book to minister to its spiritual needs, a virile young man, but orthodox and dignified, could be matched in a thousand parishes. The conditions he meets with in his parish, wealth exploiting poverty, financial power creating for itself more and more power, legal talent prostituting itself at their command, soon stir the young minister to deeper thought and closer observation of life. And finally he revolts against the domination of wealth in his church. But, instead of leaving it, he endeavors to bring it closer to his conception of what Christianity should be, and, supported by a portion of his vestry, starts sturdily forth upon his determination to make a new and better St. John's. It is a book tremendously in earnest, stamped with the zeal of a man who believes that he is setting forth in it truths of the greatest significance to his fellowmen. Dogma is of little consequence to the author or his preacher hero. What does matter is that the spirit of Christ should rule a man's actions in his home, his business, and in all his relations with his fellows. A story of dramatic situations and absorbing interest, it is also a significant indication of modern tendencies and an illuminating comment upon modern life.

CONCERT PITCH

By Frank Danby. The Macmillan Company. $1.35.

The artistic temperament plays an important part in this new novel by the English novelist Frank Danby, who, in private life, is Mrs. Julia Frankau. Incidentally, the book illustrates a myth in the making, a myth, indeed, that is nearly made, which the novelists have helped to develop into its present maturity—the myth that artistic genius, and especially that brand of it that is concerned with the making of music, is desperately selfish, and excessively egotistical and disloyal. The musician in Mrs. Frankau's novel is all these things and some other equally unpleasant ones besides.

Her heroine, Manuela, is young, lovely, and impulsive, and she and a certain Lord Lyssons are much in love with each other and engaged to be married. But Manuela has a stepmother who is quite as objectionable a person, and equally efficient as a developer of dramatic situations, as was the stepmother of Cinderella. Between the blundering of Lord Lyssons and the machinations of the stepmother, Manuela is finally goaded into eloping with an artistic temperament in the person of a musical genius. She does not care for him in the least, and between her indifference to him and his indifference to the making of money for the purpose of buying bread she has a most unhappy time.

Finally comes along an evil genius of a man who is "a born co-respondent," and he weaves a trap for the ensnaring of Manuela's feet. By that time the artistic temperament has got itself entangled with an opera singer who refuses to sing in his magnum opus unless he worships at her feet. A shot from her husband's revolver ends that complication as well as Manuela's inconvenient domestic bonds. And when Lord Lyssons returns to his first love she welcomes him gladly and they live happy forever after.

THE GARDEN WITHOUT WALLS

By Coningsby Dawson. Henry Holt & Co.

The desire to climb garden walls rested heavily upon Dante Cardover even from his childhood and sent him forth many times on the old vain quest for freedom and happiness. Narrow affections, safe within the garden walls of convention, he passes by, often with a cruel indifference, longing always for the unwalled garden, yet afraid at the crucial moment to pick the bitter fruit although refusing to allow any one else to do so. For him, life revolves on the pivot of his love affairs and when this is suddenly removed the fabric crashes down around his ears and leaves him sitting with empty hands in the ruins. Apparently the conclusion that the author wishes to have drawn from his story is that happiness is the merest will-o'-the-wisp and that walls have nothing to do with its comings and goings.

The book contains enough of brilliant patches of love sentiment and of melodramatic situations to make it popular. But its real value is not nearly so much in these parts of it—so many novelists can do that sort of thing—as in its crowd of secondary characters which give it the color and feeling of actual life. The earlier part of the book, with its long sketch of the boyhood of Dante Cardover, is done with a delicacy and sympathy that give promise of future good things from Mr. Dawson's hand. When he paints the awakening, sensitive soul of a child he rises to the highest level of realism and true artistry.

THE DARK FLOWER

By John Galsworthy. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.35.

Mr. Galsworthy's latest and, in many respects, his best novel, fulfills at least one requirement of great art—it is many things to many men. But to most, at least to those who look beneath the surface of a novel to its inner meanings, it will be an allegory of youth, age and love. The most striking thing about the book is the way it bodies forth our great modern longing for youth, our dread of age. At first it is a woman entering upon middle life who feels that the time is coming when beauty and youth will be no more her's and love will pass her by. She has dreamed of a simple and satisfying love, but has never found it, and with so few years left in which it may come to her she clasps the knees of youth, as though she would thereby recreate her own springtime, and bestows upon a lad of 18 the dark flower, the flower of passion, whose disturbing fragrance shall pursue him to the end. In time, the boy, grown to manhood's middle age, and feeling the oncoming of the dark and loveless years, makes the cycle complete and himself turns to youth, loving and craving to be loved by a girl in the first flush of youth and beauty, as if he, in his turn, hoped thereby to make himself young again. There are four women in the book and the curtained portrait of a fifth, and all come to disaster, all are broken quickly and tragically on life's wheel The men also, although they are not thus torn asunder, live their lives only, as it were, by compromise with the whirring wheel, in constant contest with their yearnings.

Mr. Galsworthy's story may be condemned in some quarters because it is a story of "illicit love." But it must be remembered that all through it the "dark flower," by which he symbolizes that love, sends forth the breath not of life, but of death. He must be accounted not only one of the greatest living English writers, but also one of the greatest living English moralists.

VIRGINIA

By Ellen Glasgow. With frontispiece. Doubleday, Page & Co.

The old order changeth, and Miss Glasgow's new novel reveals the tragedy of the woman who, essentially of the outgrown time, endeavors to bring its ideals over into the later generation. From the time of the appearance of her first book, "The Descendant," Ellen Glasgow has been recognized as one of the most capable of the present-day American novelists. With each succeeding story she has grown in knowledge of human nature, in understanding of her time, and in the skill with which she uses her medium of expression. So one is not disappointed in finding her latest book the most mature and significant, as well as the broadest in sympathy and the most skillful in treatment of all her product.

It is the straightforward account of one woman's life, a woman brought up under the old idea and according to the old method, "founded upon the simple theory that the less a girl knew about life the better she would be prepared to contend with it." She is a lovely and lovable figure—gentle, exquisite, able to endure with fortitude. When she marries she is faithful to her ideals of wifely duty and self-sacrifice, and by reason of them and that very fidelity she undermines what should have been some of the best and strongest traits in her husband's character and acts as a weakening force upon his moral fibre. And, finally, in the hour of need, because self-effacement has atrophied her own powers and contributed to the failure of his, disaster comes upon them.

The book is a noteworthy and significant study of our own times, done with an art that in its neatness and fineness is more like that of Jane Austen than is usual in modern writers. During the years covered by Virginia's life the position of women changed more than it had done in several previous centuries. And this tremendous difference between the girl of the eighties and the girl of to-day Miss Glasgow has transferred to her pages with all the clarity and fidelity of the artist that she is.

A CHANGED MAN AND OTHER TALES

By Thomas Hardy. Harper & Brothers.

This collection of Mr. Hardy's short stories, written at various periods in his long and distinguished career, may safely be called a representative volume. It is by no means of uniform excellence; some of the work is so filled with his least fortunate mannerisms as to amount almost to parody. Notably is this true of "A Waiting Supper," the monotonous recital, an unpleasant young woman's amatory misadventures, and of a dull thing called "Alicia's Diary."

But these are the only parts of the collection really to be condemned; most of the other stories are excellent, and several of them are splendid, showing the greatest living novelist at his best. There is, for instance, "The Romantic Adventures of a Milkmaid," surely a classic. When this entertaining history first appeared several years ago it was given an enthusiastic reception by discriminating readers. It is pleasant to find it thus conveniently presented.

Then there is "A Tryst at an Ancient Earth Work," a charming Dickensian fragment. "Enter a Dragoon" is a dramatic short story, full of that irony of which Mr. Hardy is master. "What the Shepherds Saw" is not only drama, it is melodrama. But then life itself is not infrequently melodramatic, and this tale of sin and retribution is sufficiently logical not to strain the credulity of its readers.

Of "The Changed Man," the story from which the book takes the title, much might be said by way of praise as to its construction. Considered purely as a work of art, it is perhaps the best thing in the book, but it is less entertaining reading than the delicious "Romantic Adventures of a Milkmaid."

NEW LEAF MILLS

By William Dean Howells. Harper & Brothers.

Mr. Howells's latest novel is a study of character, rather than of action, but the author's keen and sympathetic observation of human nature and his absorbed interest in the habits of the mind give "New Leaf Mills" a charm which all its readers must feel. It is, in fact, a novel of thoughts, rather than of deeds.

Its hero is a gentle, lovable, shiftless man, potentially a poet, who goes to the Middle West with his family about the time of the Mexican war. He is absolutely unfitted for the life of a pioneer, nor has he any particular aptitude for the work of a miller. Nevertheless, he bravely establishes himself on the edge of the wilderness, and dreams great dreams of the golden grist to be poured out by the New Leaf Mills.

Not all his rough neighbors look on the poetic miller with kindly eyes. Indeed, some bitter enemies appear, and there are hints of tragedy. But his own inaction is his most formidable foe. Mr. Howells is particularly skillful in exhibiting the emotions of his pathetic hero's wife, her affection for her visionary, childlike husband, her pride in his intellectual powers, and her grief in his failures.

The miller is a Swedenborgian, and in the study of mysticism he takes refuge from the disappointments of his business career. Finally, after the failure of the mill, he gets work in a Swedenborgian bookshop and with his family leaves the West for a more congenial home. He is a worthless fellow, the peace and happiness of his family are sacrificed to his idleness and impracticality, yet Mr. Howells looks on him with no unkindly eyes, nor can the readers of this novel dislike him.

Incidental to the narrative are many vivid descriptions of the Middle West of pioneer days. Mr. Howells has recorded the life of Americans of that place and time with fidelity, and his book is a real contribution to history, as well as a fascinating psychological study.

V. V.'S EYES

By Henry Sydnor Harrison. Houghton Mifflin Company. $1.35.

Mr. Harrison's second novel is cast in a graver key than its predecessor, "Queed," which brought him such instant success, and the author is a little longer in getting into the free stride which sweeps the reader's interest along with it. Nevertheless his story does not lack humor, and it has many qualities which entitle it to a higher rank than even that which "Queed" won so quickly. It has a greater variety of delicately differentiated individualities. The author is equally at home with his characters, and equally true and convincing in his portrayals, whether they are children of slums, gay young women of the social world, money-making newly rich men, or the lame slum doctor hurring with enthusiasm for humanity.

The novel describes the evolution of a soul. Cally, the lovely and soulless only child of the Heths, living with no thought beyond her own pleasures, thinking of her father's money-making machinery, with its constant toll of the life and health of his employes, merely as something which exists for the enhancing of the luxury and the beauty of her own life, meets the slum doctor with the confiding eyes, who somehow has the power of making people better by believing them to be all he wants them to be. He takes it for granted that Cally is ready to do the right thing, the brave thing, and confidently believes in her in spite of her resistance, until finally, with struggle and protest, painfully, slowly, grudgingly, her soul is born, and the higher vision of herself which she has seen in V. V.'s eyes has "poisoned all meaner choice forevermore." Mr. Harrison tells the result of it all so eloquently that it becomes to the reader almost as if he himself had been having experience with the things that really matter.

STELLA MARIS

By William J. Locke. John Lane Company. $1.35.

Mr. Locke's latest heroine is an invalid, a girl who has been ailing all her life. She cannot even lift her head from her pillow. All that is visible to the little circle of friends who pay court to her are "a pair of frail arms, a daintily curved neck, a haunting face, and a mass of dark hair encircling it on the pillow like a nimbus." But she is a merry, joyous creature, much beloved by her company of faithful friends. When these enter her room it is as if a charm falls upon them, for they leave all the wickedness and sorrow of the world outside. They create for her a dream world in which all is sweet and beautiful.

Stella gets well, and then the story really begins. She is a woman in years, but a child in knowledge of the world. Among her faithful friends are two men, both of whom love her. One of them has a wife who is criminally insane, and, in addition, he is adored by the slum child, grown to womanhood, whom he had once adopted. Her, in complication enough, and out of it Mr. Locke evolves a story that moves swiftly, with much action and with emotional crises of painful intensity. But excellent as the story is as a novel of action, it deserves higher praise as a novel of character. Its people stand out, clear and round, and its wonderful heroine stays in the reader's memory with a delightful sense of intimacy. Locke's method is that of genuine realism. He deals with the essentials, not the accidents, of passion, with matter inseparable from mind, with flesh inseparable from spirit. His characters, it is true, are not commonplace or uniformly vicious. They do and say strange, amusing, and noble things. But he is never more fantastic than life itself, and no contemporary writer gives a more convincing picture of the world as we know it.

JOHN BARLEYCORN

By Jack London. The Century Company. $1.50 net.

It is not solely as a work of art that this novel must be judged, but as a bit of frank autobiography, as, to use a trite phrase, a human document. Mr. London tries to tell all that he personally knows about John Barleycorn, from the first stolen sips of alcoholic liquor in his childhood to his habitual consumption of cocktails during the last decade. He has never, he says, been a drunkard, although there have been periods in his life in which he has been no stranger to drunkenness. He has known, however, what it is to depend upon the stimulus that comes from alcohol; to look forward to the drink which he had arranged for a certain hour, and to find his system growing more and more insistent in its demand for its unnatural food.

William Dean Howells

His chief charge against drink is that it brings its victims what he calls "white logic"—a condition of mind in which all the pleasant illusions vanish, life seems a foolish tragedy, and, in general, the "philosophy" of pessimism seems sound. He believes—perhaps without absolute justification—that this is the experience of every cultured, imaginative man who drinks largely. That it is his own experience cannot be doubted, for his recital is absolutely convincing.

Mr. London has not given up the habit of drinking. He still drinks more than is good for him, he says, but he is no longer in danger of John Barleycorn's mastery. The solution of the drink problem which he proposes is not definitely stated, but its chief characteristic is to make liquor less accessible; to prevent the saloon from being the legal, convenient, comfortable place that it is to-day. In the first chapter of the book, he tells that he has voted for woman suffrage, and he states that his chief reason for doing so was to put in power John Barleycorn's most formidable enemies.

The value of this novel as temperance propaganda may not be admitted by every reader. But its sincerity is indisputable, and its interest

THE CATFISH

By Charles Marriott. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $1.35.

The story of "The Catfish" is the life history of a certain George Tracy, member of a respectable and well-to-do English family and himself a successful business man. But, more especially, it is the story of the other side of the man and his life. The outside aspect of George is that of the usual matter-of-fact, healthy Englishman. But in order to establish this aspect he has been obliged constantly to subdue and belie his true self, the man he really is. This man is peculiarly sensitive, high strung, imaginative, clear seeing, with a keen perception for the relations of things and an all-pervading love of beauty as a vital part of existence. He continually doubts this side of himself and distrusts whoever calls it out or seems to perceive it. His constant endeavor from childhood to maturity had been to climb out of the world that this side of him made, which to him was the world of reality, and make a foothold for himself in the world created by other people and the things which they believed and did.

The love story of the book is concerned with his attitude toward a slim, wise girl who saw clearly through all George's bluff about himself and down into that other side of his life and his character which he tried so zealously to hide. And for that reason George feared and distrusted her. It is a love story that, in Mr. Marriott's telling, becomes the very opposite of the commonplace. There are delightful glimpses of London in its social and work-a-day aspects and several characterizations of an unforgettable charm. As in all his novels, the writing of his pages has been ruled by a high imagination. Mr. Marriott looks upon life with an understanding so fresh and unconstrained that his novels are, perhaps, quite unique in present-day English literature.

OTHERWISE PHYLLIS

By Meredith Nicholson. With frontispiece. Houghton Mifflin Company. $1.35.

In this new novel Mr. Meredith returns to one of those little Hoosier communities he knows so well and tells us what happened to various inhabitants of the town of Montgomery, especially to Phyllis Kirkwood and her relations. Phyllis is an attractive heroine, lovable, outspoken, quick-witted, thoroughly American, who has an unusual knack of being on the spot whenever anything exciting was taking place. But although she has the star rôle, the most interesting person in the book is not the 19-year-old girl, but her mother, a "sinful woman" of an extremely modern type.

Until this present day no author would have dreamed of presenting a woman who had left husband and child for a lover as returning in any other guise than weeping, repentant, and imploring forgiveness. The only thing he could do with such a woman heretofore would have been to show her on the swift road to destruction or as repenting in sackcloth and ashes. But not so does the author of "Otherwise Phyllis" deal with Lois Montgomery Kirkwood Holton. For he writes in the second decade of the twentieth century, and so it becomes possible for him to show his heroine returning in a Parisian costume, smiling and cheerful, and as consciously fascinating as ever she had been. She charms Phyllis, the daughter she had deserted, and her generous brother. It is her ex-husband who suffers and who pays the price of her wrong doing. The author draws very clearly and convincingly her light and shallow nature, with its inconsistencies and its possibilities of fascination. The study of Lois, as a character representative of some of the changes that are going in the world, gives the book value as a comment upon contemporary manners and customs.

VAN CLEVE

By Mary S. Watts. The Macmillan Company.

Mrs. Watts has already earned a secure place in the affections of novel readers, but "Van Cleve" is far superior to her previous works. It is a vivid picture of life in the Middle West ten years ago. The hero, after whom the book is named, is a young banker in Cincinnati, a humorous, human creature, whose plodding career conceals from the world his shining virtues of courage and self-abnegation. He slaves for the benefit of his idle and selfish family, and goes to Cuba to hunt for the vagabond brother of the young woman who has rejected his suit.

Van Cleve's visit to Cuba gives Mrs. Watts an opportunity to write about the Spanish-American war, and of that opportunity she takes advantage admirably. She writes about the Spanish war nearly as vividly as Mrs. Johnston writes about the civil war—and that is saying a good deal.

The plot is well worked out, and the romance leaves the reader satisfied—satisfied, that is, with the fate of the men and women with whom he has spent a pleasant hour or so, dissatisfied with the necessity of bidding them farewell.

Mrs. Watts's realism is the sort that American literature needs. She is not morbid, not sordid-minded, not obsessed with a sense of the weaknesses and wickednesses of humanity. She describes the people that we know, she writes of the life about her with keen enjoyment and accurate observation. And she knows how to tell a story.

CRITICISM

THE DRIFT OF ROMANTICISM

Shelburne Essays. Eighth series. By Paul Elmer More. Houghton Mifflin Company. $1.25.

The broad spirit in which Mr. More approaches his subject and his conviction that the romantic principle should not be considered as something concerned only with literature but as a vital part of life will make his book attractive not only to those who care about the literary life of the nineteenth century but often more to those who are interested in the tendencies and portents of our present day life. He studies the appearance and significance of this romantic principle in the lives and works of six men, each of whom he considers typical of a certain drift toward romanticism in the literature and the life of modern times.

These six men are: William Beckford, the dilettante, whose romantic and eccentric career furnishes a symbol of romanticism; Cardinal Newman, whose insistence on a God of revelation the author holds to be an example of romantic drift; Walter Pater, the aesthete; Fiona Macleod, the rhapsodist; Nietzsche, the philosopher-rebel; Huxley, the minister of science. The binding together with a common thread of authors so widely severed in activity and so opposed in conviction as these leads Mr. More and his readers to the sounding of some profound philosophic depths, which are especially dealt with in the "Definitions of Dualism," which follows the six essays forming the body of the book.

Mr. More thinks romanticism pernicious and its manifestation in modern social forces entirely deplorable. He looks upon it, whether in an individual or in a society, as the expression of a perverse soul. The limitless hypothesis of science, the limitless superman of philosophy, the limitless deity of religion, each a phase of the romantic drift, have influenced our modern philosophy of life, and together they have developed a deplorable passivity.

THE VICTORIAN AGE IN LITERATURE

By G. K. Chesterton. The Home University Library of Modern Knowledge. Henry Holt & Co. 50 cents.

Mr. Chesterton's contribution to the Home University Library Series is not a discussion of literature in the Victorian Age, but of the significance of the Victorian Age in literature. He takes up separately, it is true, the great names of the period and succeeds in giving a singularly rounded and integral impression of each of several noted writers. But this whole takes on a unity distinct and impressive, due to the author's very clear conception of the age and the part which its literature as a whole played in modern development. Mr. Chesterton does not quite clearly define his conception of the Victorian Age, but he does make it clear that he sees at the beginning of the period a "compromise" between opponents of privilege on the one hand and on the other the holders and middle classes. Because of this "compromise," the opponents of privilege, instead of making a political and social revolution, as in France, contented themselves with wild and eccentric productions in literature. He is mightily and hotly indignant and disgusted that this compromise made it possible for "utilitarianism" and its more powerful congeners, "individualism" and "industrialism," to dominate the literature of the period. But apart from his treatment of the age as a whole, Mr. Chesterton's handling of the individual authors of the time is wholly delightful, with its flashes of wisdom, resentment, humor, and now and then fanaticism that reveal familiar beings in a wholly new light. The pages are rich with the author's own vital personality, and sparkle with witty sayings and unexpected and ever delightful turns of thought and expression that are peculiarly Chestertonian.

THE ENJOYMENT OF POETRY

By Max Eastman. Charles Scribner's Sons.

A distinct freshness and vigor of expression mark Mr. Eastman's book, and these, together with a certain zest, akin to the excitement of adventure, that runs like an undercurrent through its pages, make the latter interesting, although there is nothing particularly novel about the author's theories. He holds contemptuous opinions about the present method of teaching literature, because it makes this study a thing apart from the subjects it deals with, and he declares that "as usually taught for three years to post-graduates in our universities it is not worth spending three weeks upon."

His idea is that a teacher of literature should, above all, be a thorough psychologist, able to gauge the abilities and predilections of students and set their feet at once upon whatever literary road will lead them most quickly into the happy hunting grounds of understanding, appreciation, and pleasure. He pleads for a "sounder estimate of the place and dignity of the poetic" in our lives as well as in our reading. Especially would he like to see the poet himself treated with more consideration. "It appears," he says, "that a poet in history is divine, but a poet in the next room is a joke."

Mr. Eastman's clever book, which holds out the possibility that he may yet accomplish a great deal for American literary criticism, is a fine effort to free poetry from what he conceives to be the limitations of the schools and to reveal it wherever it exists—on the lips of children and savages and in the rude tropes of the unlettered, as well as in the poetry of Keats and Christina Rossetti.

SHAKESPEARE AS A PLAYWRIGHT

By Brander Matthews. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

Prof. Matthews's study of Shakespeare is directed to a consideration of his quality as a playwright, and starts with the declaration that "poet as he was, and philosopher and psychologist, Shakespeare was first of all a playwright, composing plays to be performed in a theatre before an audience." It seems to Prof. Matthews that too little serious effort has been made to appreciate Shakespeare's work as a dramatic craftsman, seeing that it is the drama of Shakespeare the playwright, rather than that of Shakespeare the poet or philosopher, which has held the stage through the centuries; hence the determination "to disentangle the fundamental principles which guided Shakespeare in the construction of his successive plays, to analyze the elements of his craftsmanship, and to trace the development of his dramaturgic technic."

The study that is made for us along these lines is intensely interesting; it takes account of the various influences that affected Shakespeare's work, deals with his methods, sketches his development, and appraises his productions in the several stages of his career.

One of the features of the study is the finding that Shakespeare's development as a playwright falls into three fairly distinct periods. According to this allotment, we see the playwright, first as a novice learning his art mainly through the revision and adaptation of old plays; then as a master, producing his best stage pieces—the romantic comedies "Merchant of Venice," "Much Ado About Nothing," "As You Like It," and "Twelfth Night," and the tragedies "Hamlet," "Othello," and "Macbeth," and finally, as a somewhat careless craftsman, writing plays which for the most part have vanished from the stage. Prof. Matthews thinks that in his later life Shakespeare gave little thought to providing satisfactory frameworks for his plays, contenting himself with endowing them with vital characters and ennobling them with the "lavish wealth of his poetry."

THE ENGLISH NOVEL

By George Saintsbury. E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.50.

A work of astounding familiarity with the byways of English literature for the last three or four centuries, Prof. Saintsbury's history of the rise and development of English fiction is also a wonderfully interesting and companionable book, because of the evident zest with which the author has explored those byways and the gusto with which he writes of them. Prof. Saintsbury has read omnivorously the publications of decades and of centuries and has gained thereby not only the authority which springs from great learning but a broad humanity of judgment and a catholicity of literary appreciation which enable him to see and enjoy whatever there is of the breath of life in a book. He tells the story of the English novel with all his usual intimate knowledge of out-of-the-way literature and with all his usual strong human quality, which vitalizes it all and makes it very attractive reading.

Prof. Saintsbury does not agree with those critics who think that the romance and the novel are two distinct developments. He holds that the one sprang out of the other and that all the germs of the modern novel are to be found in old Anglo-Saxon heroic poetry. Bunyan was an effective factor in the evolution of the novel as a literary form. "Pilgrim's Progress" has the four requisites: plot, character, description and dialogue. The sense of character which Addison showed in the "Coverley Papers" carried the evolution of the novel a step further. And so, by the time Prof. Saintsbury's "great four"—Richardson, Fielding, Smollett, and Sterne—were ready to write their tools were ready for them, the methods of the novel had been slowly worked out. Prof. Saintsbury brings his survey down almost to the present, and in a final chapter on "The Fiction of Yesterday," gives some subtle criticism.

THE ENGLISH LYRIC

By Felix Emmanuel Schelling. Houghton Mifflin Company.

Prof. Schelling is a scholar, but not a pedant; he has the ability, somewhat rare in academic circles, of imparting sound information in an entertaining manner. He has prepared an exhaustive history of the lyric poetry of England, from mediaeval times to the present time. His introductory pages, with their thoughtful discussion of the nature of poetry, are decidedly of value.

Another part of this treatise which is well worth the attention of students of poetry is that devoted to the lyric in the reign of the first two Stuart monarchs. Prof. Schelling is keenly sensitive to the beauties of the verse that appeared to the generations of bygone centuries; he reconstructs, in fact, the esprit of past literatures. Perhaps he may be criticised adversely for the chapter called "Some Successors to Swinburne and Meredith." He does not, it must be confessed, display an extensive knowledge of contemporary verse. But he does shew somethiog more important—comprehension of the purpose and place of poetry. His book will be valuable for use as a supplementary textbook in university courses in English literature, and it should find also a cordial welcome in unacademic circles.

THE INFLUENCES OF BEAUDELAIRE

By G. Turquet-Milnes. E. P. Dutton & Co. $2.50.

As a thorough, sympathetic study of a complicated movement whose outreachings have gone far and in many directions, Mr. Milnes's book is deserving of attention. He takes Beaudelaire, his school, and his influence very seriously indeed, and finds signs of them in some rather unexpected places. Beaudelairism, he says, is characterized by the following features: The faculty of self-analysis and self-torment in love; the pursuit of lust, mingling with it a kind of sacrilegious pleasure; the pursuit of sensations at any cost, with its inevitable consequences; perversity and madness on one hand, mysticism on the other; moral anarchy, overwhelming pessimism, and terrible solitude of the soul. He finds some touches of these things in such sane men as Benjamin Constant, Saint-Beuve, and Alfred de Vigny. Others who influenced Beaudelaire and showed in their lives or their works outcroppings of Beaudelairism were Poe, whom Beaudelaire translated and from whom he learned much in the artistry of horror and mystery; Bertand, Borel, and Gautier, of whom it is said that he "made Beaudelaire possible." Thus the author traces Beaudelairism in a large group of French and English authors, musicians, and artists.

As Mr. Milnes explains it, Beaudelaire revolted against the positivist spirit represented by Comte, Littré and Mill that held sway over French minds between 1840 and 1860. It induced in him hatred for all things progressive, utilitarian, humanitarian, and this hatred, which was his impelling force, has exercised an influence down to the present day in the poetry, art, and music that revolt against accepted standards.

IRISH PLAYS AND PLAYWRIGHTS

By Cornelius Weygandt. Illustrated. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

To the facts that he is thoroughly informed on the subject, and is also interested and enthusiastic, Mr. Weygandt adds the further qualification for writing about the modern Irish dramatists the fact that he is not Irish himself. Therefore he can, and does, write of the movement with racial detachment, and the reader can feel that he is not being led astray by patriotic fervor or a too intense sympathy. His point of view is that of regarding the whole movement purely as a literary phenomenon. He has amassed a great deal of material, not only about the leaders of the movement, but also about less well-knewn writers and even its most obscure followers and hangers-on,

Max Eastman

and he writes concerning the work of all these people with sincere appreciation.

The body of the book is more comprehensive than its title, for he takes up some authors, such as William Sharp, who are not Irish, but seem to belong in the Irish movement by spiritual affinity. Poets and novelists also are included, as well as dramatists, so that the book becomes a sympathetic study of the modern Irish literary revival, with its dramatic features dominating all, and, in a way, symbolical of the whole.

The place of honor is given to a study of the art of Mr. Yeats, which receives thoughtful and penetrating criticism. Mr. Weygandt thinks it a great pity that Mr. Yeats has practically deserted lyrical for dramatic poetry, and says of him that in his lyrical work he has struck the most distinctly new note of all the English poets since Swinburne. There are excellent studies of "A. E.," John Synge, Lady Gregory, and other prominent figures, and much information concerning the young dramatists and other writers who are less well known in this country.

ANTHROPOLOGY

THE GOLDEN BOUGH. PART VI

By J. G. Frazer. New York: Macmillan Company.

Dr. Frazer's valuable work, "The Golden Bough," originally contained in two volumes, is now appearing in its third edition in ten large volumes, having developed from an elaborate study of a curious custom of the Arician priesthood into an encyclopaedia of primitive cults and myths, mainly those connected with the agricultural stage of culture. It is predicted that this work, when completed, will present a more important contribution than has hitherto been made to the elucidation of primitive thought concerning man's relations to the woods and fields on which he depended for nourishment.

The installment of the work under notice deals with the tendency exhibited by men in all parts of the world to think they may get rid of their sins and sorrows by transferring them to some animate being or some inanimate object. It is pointed out that this doctrine and the practice based on it are to be found in much of the theology of the present day, and it has been suggested that in the showing he makes of curious customs of primitive peoples Dr. Frazer brings to the attention of the theologians the fact that doctrines that have been considered peculiar and distinctive in the three religions derived from the Hebrews of old time have been common to all mankind; the scheme of vicarious atonement is mentioned as one of the doctrines that is robbed of its distinction in this way. Indeed, Dr. Frazer derives the title for the volume we are considering from the practice of the Jewish high priest on the Day of Atonement, who transferred the sins of the people to a "scapegoat," and sent the poor animal away into the desert to perish.

It appears that the scapegoat has been used by many peoples in many lands for cleansing themselves of their sins. At Lhasa there is an annual sacrifice of a human scapegoat and the same practice, we are told, has been followed elsewhere by both ancients and moderns.

ANCIENT ART AND RITUAL

By Jane Ellen Harrison. Home University Library Series. Henry Holt & Co. 60 cents.

"The point of my title," says Miss Harrison, "and the real gist of my argument lies perhaps in the word 'and'—that is, in the intimate connection I have tried to show exists between ritual and art." What she tries to do in the book is to throw light on the function of art in human life, to discover what it has done in the far-away past and what it is doing in our own time. To make this clear she thinks it necessary to go back to the beginnings of art, or, at least, to its earlier and simpler forms. And this earlier stage, this simpler form, she finds to be—ritual. She has studied it very carefully in this volume, because ritual is, she believes, "a frequent and perhaps universal transition stage between actual life and that peculiar contemplation of, or emotion toward, life which we call art."

Beginning with the earliest primitive rites, Miss Harrison, who is one of the foremost English authorities on Greek art, religion and mythology, comes down through the ages, examining beast-dances, May-day festivals, seasonal rites, until the journey brings her to the Greek drama, her aim being to make clear that art, except perhaps for the specially gifted few, "did not arise straight out of life, but out of that collective emphasis of the needs and desires of life which we have agreed to call ritual." In a final chapter she takes up the discussion of modern art in its relation to philosophy, morals, science, and practical life. There are many interesting comments in this chapter upon the work of the great Victorian authors and upon living writers, from Arnold Bennett to the Indian poet, Tagore. And after this survey Miss Harrison comes to the conclusion: "There are not wanting signs that art, both in painting and sculpture, and in poetry and novel writing, is beginning again to realize its social function, beginning to be impatient of mere individual emotion, beginning to aim at something bigger, more bound up with a feeling toward and for the common weal.

NATURAL SCIENCES

THE LIFE OF THE SPIDER

By J. Henri Fabre. Translated by Alexander Teixeira de Mattos. Preface by Maurice Maeterlinck. Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.50.

M. Fabre has devoted half a century to the study of insects and has made himself the foremost living authority upon them. His "Souvenirs Entomologiques" is a monumental work in ten volumes of which only bits here and there have been translated into English. And each new fragment that is doled out to English readers but emphasizes the need of having the whole werk made accessible.

M. Rostand has described M. Fabre as "The savant who thinks like a philosopher and writes like a poet," and this volume proves the truth of the description. For all its observations are made with the keen and accurate eye of the man of science, which sees, understands, classifies, elaborates, but when all this knewledge is put into words it becomes fascinating, dramatic,

J. Henri Fabre
Author of "The Life of a Spider"

absorbing. M. Maeterlinck calls him "the Homer of the insects," and says of his volumes about them that they contain "the most extraordinary of tragic fairy plays that it is possible for the human imagination, not to create or to conceive, but to admit and to acclimatize within itself."

The book consists of essays selected from the ten volumes of the "Souvenirs" dealing with a great variety of spiders. They picture the real life of the spider, of a great many kinds of spiders, from the egg to extinction, and give an account both fascinating and instructive of marvelous things the author has learned through patient watching and ingenious experimentation. The narrative, which tells the story of his observations and experiments with each specimen, is long and circumstantial and so charmingly written that it is as fascinating as a story about human beings. With respect to certain groups of spiders M. Fabre tells us practically everything worth knowing.

THE LIFE OF THE FLY

By Jean Henri Fabre. Translated by Alexander Teixeira de Mattos. Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.50.

Made up of extracts from Fabre's great work, "Souvenirs Entomologiques," this volume contains a good deal about flies, but much more about other things. There is a particularly fascinating chapter on the caddis worm; there is a good deal about Fabre's own school days, at first as a child and later at college. There is much about various kinds of insects, and there is a chapter entitled "Heredity," which turns out to be a quaint study of his grandmother, whose round of ideas comprised only pickles, hemp, chickens, curds and whey, washing the clothes, and minding the children. The book is a collection of informal essays on a great variety of subjects, all informed with the vitality of his mental endowment.

Fabre was keenly and wisely aware of the limits of human knowledge, and he never presumed to draw conclusions that would carry him beyond those limits. As a scientist and a keen observer of facts and conditions and manifestations of insect life, he came time and again to the question, Why does the insect do this or that? How does it know that that is the right thing for it to do? "I bow profoundly," he says in answer, "without understanding or even trying to understand. The question is far above our inane means." "I pry into life," he declares. "And if I write for men of learning, for philosophers who one day will try to unravel the tough problem of in-

With such authority behind it, this frank statement ought to make all business men think. Isn't it short-sighted not to equip yourself and your employes with this most wonderful of all instruments of human knowledge—the new Encyclopaedia Britannica?

Any day down at the National City Bank in Wall Street you will find the new Encyclopaedia Britannica in use in a working business library that is the product of the highest grade of business acumen.

The Standard Oil interests have never been behindhand in seizing upon aids to success. The men conducting this great institution appreciate the value of expert knowledge; knowledge that is available at any time it is wanted, and on any possible sort of occasion. They are men quick to recognize the latest and best means for improving efficiency. They make money work, whether they put it into an encyclopaedia or a share of stock. And they know that system counts, in making information accessible no less than in the handling of checks.

A large manufacturer of flavoring extracts found that information the book gave him about materials used in his business was alone worth more than its price.

A big company engaged in the manufacture of steel and brass products had the article on Iron and Steel reproduced for special use in connection with its business.

An expert on commerce, writing of the industrial articles, says: "This work ought to find a place on the shelves of every manager of big works in the English-speaking world."

The Index—a Unique Feature

THE most comprehensive and highly perfected card-index system ever put together was probably that maintained in the editorial offices of this work for gathering, sifting, classifying and checking the knowledge of today, in all fields of achievement in its most recent developments. (The index volume, volume 29, with its 500,000 references, grew out of this great intelligence bureau. No other encyclopaedia is indexed. It more than doubles the efficiency of the Britannica.)

Fifteen hundred practical experts and specialists from 21 countries worked together on a systematic plan to produce this entirely new work, and the unprecedented sum of $1,500,000 was spent to make it.

Whether you are manager or clerk, banker, merchant, manufacturer or salesman, steel man or grocer, this work has a claim upon you. It renders a service unparalleled in this day of specialization.

"The best library for the business man. Progressive firms should see to it that it is not only in their offices, but in the homes of those on whom their business success depends," says a specialist on business system.

Last Opportunity on Monthly Payments

THE CLOSING OF THE SUBSCRIPTION LIST opened by the Cambridge University Press for the sale of the New Encyclopaedia Britannica at specially low prices and by monthly payments of only $5 marks a radical change in the method of purchase, and the successful conclusion of a bold enterprise.

The 11th Edition of this work, an entirely new and original survey of human knowledge, was designed to meet the need of the present day for a work of universal reference based upon the latest authority. Upon its completion by the editors, after eight years' continuous labor, an introductory offer was made, at an exceptional price, by direct sale to the public.

The price was exceptional because it was 40 per cent less per volume than the price at which previous new editions of this work had been issued.

The purpose of this early sale at a low price and for small monthly payments was to bring a great educational work, upon the preparation of which over $1,500,000 had been expended, within reach of the largest circle of readers, and to make its usefulness widely and rapidly known. These two objects have now been achieved, more than 50,000 sets having been distributed.

IN ENGLAND, THE OFFER AT THE PRESENT PRICES WILL BE TERMINATED ON DECEMBER 20TH, AND IN THIS COUNTRY, SHORTLY THEREAFTER.

THE FARMER OF TO-MORROW

By Frederick Irving Anderson. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

It is hardly too much to say that no other writer on the subject of American farming has presented the facts of present conditions with their relation to future opportunities in so clear and forceful a manner as has Mr. Anderson in his delightfully written and very instructive volume. He devotes particular attention first to the value of the land as a factor in the financial success of the farmer of to-morrow, and, second, to the problem of the fertility of the soil. The coming farmer, he tells us, is handicapped by the fact that there is no more free land and therefore he must invest capital and at the same time compete with the holders of the free or cheaper lands. Therefore, if he wishes to succeed he will have to speed up the production or make unproductive land compete favorably with the older cultivated lands. In the United States only 25 per cent. of the land is producing food, and this fact leads the author to say that, compared with other nations, America has not yet begun to farm. In Germany, one laborer for every nine acres is the average, while in this country one for every forty suffices. With us ten acres are available to feed one person, while in China the allotment per person is less than half an acre.

Vincent Van Gogh

The author maintains the indestructibility of the soil, following the lead of the Federal Bureau of Soils. It is the one resource, he insists, that cannot be destroyed or used up. Its value may be impaired by ill-usage, but this is not necessary if it is farmed with knowledge and care. Mr. Anderson quotes China, whose soils are still the richest in the world after 4,000 years of intensive cultivation, as proof of his contention.

PROBLEMS OF GENETICS

By William Bateson. Illustrated. Yale University Press. New York. 1913.

The discussion of certain important aspects of the problem of genetics is based upon Dr. Bateson's series of lectures delivered at Yale University in 1907. The book follows on the author's masterly interpretation of Mendel's principles in an earlier volume, and is an effort to discuss some of the wider problems of biology in the light of knowledge acquired by the Mendelian methods of analysis. Dr. Bateson has made a serious attempt to examine the manifestations of variability, realizing that the variation regarded by naturalists fifty years ago as a single phenomenon is not one but many, and that the systematist's hard and fast distinction of species is arbitrary and artificial, lacking in the recognition of the intermediate forms. The premise assumed throughout the work is a correction of the old Darwinian theory of variation, to the effect that "the fixity of specific characters cannot readily be held to be a measure of the economic importance to their possessors." The overlapping forms which complicate the task of the systematist and which, according to Dr. Bateson, are too completely ignored, are fully discussed with reference to conditions of climate and locality. There is an interesting chapter on de Vries's mutation theory, in which Dr. Bateson concludes that its proof has by no means been firmly established; that there are examples in plenty of mutation in respect to some one character, or as a result of recombination, is not challenged, but it is denied that there is conclusive evidence for the origin of new specific types from simultaneous variation in several independent respects. Secondary to the problem of specific difference, the author discusses the grave and perplexing problem of adaptation, refuting the vague but general notion that organisms have within themselves from the very beginning the innate power of adapting themselves to their environment. The concluding chapters, on the causes of genetic variation and the sterility of hybrids, represent the fruit of Dr. Bateson's careful study of two of the most perplexing problems concerned with the evolutionary process.

HEREDITY AND SEX

By Thomas Hunt Morgan. New York. Columbia University Press. 1913.

In this volume Dr. Morgan unites two lines of scientific research which have long been working in comparative independence of each other—the study of the cell in its relation to problems of heredity, and the study of heredity as bearing on the analysis of germinal materials. Like many of the other discussions of the evolutionary problem, Dr. Morgan's book throws serious doubts on Darwin's theory of sexual selection. In the first place, it can be refuted that the evolution of certain characters has come about through choice or selection on the part of the female lacks conclusive evideoce, and there are facts in plenty to support the assertion that other conditions than selection are responsible for mating. Second, the De Vries assumption of variation by mutation, which Dr. Morgan nowhere subscribes to as a "law," may be responsible for the inheritance of sex characters. Study of sex-linked characters shows, especially in the work with red eyed and white eyed flies, in Dr. Morgan's opinion, that while following the Mendelian principle of segregation, these are also associated closely with sex-mechanism. Study of the conditions in plants and animals of gynandromorphism, hermaphroditism and parthenogenesis throw considerable light on the problem of sex-determination, as does inquiry into the conditions which result in sterility. In this connection there is an important exposition of the work of Prof. Jacques Loeb in the process of artificial parthenogenesis, with an estimate of its importance on the problem of the inheritance of sex. The discussion of sex-determination in man is drawn largely from Dr. C. B. Davenport's study of the relation of heredity to eugenics, which points to the conclusion toward which all of Dr. Morgan's work has been verging, and which in the case of some plants and animals is an established fact, that it is by an inner mechanism and not by environmeatal changes that sex is determined.

POETRY AND DRAMA

POEMS

By Alice Meynell. Charles Scribner's Sons.

Mrs. Meynell has been sure of appreciative readers from her first appearance as a poet, a quarter of a century ago. The discriminating have given a welcome to every succeeding thin volume of hers, just as they will to this new one, which includes many poems now published for the first time. That she appeals, notwithstanding her limitations, to a large audience is shown by the fact that her early verses in less than twenty years passed through ten editions—a success that visits but few young poets, and not many poets of any age.

She writes almost always in the mood of thoughtful melancholy, a mood that does not permit a wide sweep of wing. She herself recognized her limitations in the poem, "A Poet of One Mood," and describes her compass accurately:

The countries change, but not the west-wind days,
Which are my songs. My soft skies shine above,
And on all seas the colors of a dove,
And on all fields a flash of silver grays.

It is the melancholy that one expects in early poems—for when was a really cheerful youthful poet known?—but the mood persists in her mature work and deepens often into sadness and sometimes even into pessimism. This latter note is strikingly given in her description of "The Modern Mother," who—

Giver of life, death, peace, distress,
Desired, ah! not so much
Thanks as forgiveness.

Many of the religious poems are full of a mystical beauty that recalls Francis Thompson, whose genius Mrs. Meynell and her husband did so much to cherish and develop.

TALES FROM THE MERMAID TAVERN

By Alfred Noyes. Frederick A. Stokes.

Few novels are richer in action than Mr. Alfred Noyes's series of poems—epic seems too formidable a word—"Tales from the Mermaid Tavern."

John Masefield
Author of "Daffodil Fields"

Other poets—notably Mr. Watts-Dunton—have used that famous inn, the haunt of so many of English literature's most illustrious figures, as the subject of verse. But Mr. Noyes has recreated it, recreated, indeed, the very atmosphere of the golden days of Queen Elizabeth.

The narrator tells in the beginning that while one day wandering through London and dreaming of its glorious past, he found himself before a little inn which he recognized as the Mermaid. Then by some magic power he was carried back through the centuries and made pot-boy at the Mermaid, so he takes up his tasks, serves cups of malmsey to Sir Walter Raleigh, Ben Jonson, Dekker, Marlowe, Snakespeare, and the other giants of the time, and listens to their great talking.

Each of the stories is devoted to one of these illustrious men, and the thread of continuity is the presence of the pot-boy narrator. There is variety enough in the tales. We hear Will Kemp, that famous jester, tell how he danced across England, we watch the tragic death of Marlowe, we follow the midnight funeral train of Mary Queen of Scots. There is rollicking humor, there is delicate pathos, there is grim tragedy. The mighty poets and warriors of the time seem amazingly real, they lose none of the glory with which time has covered them, but they become appealingly human.

Mr. Noyes shows in this volume a mastery of rhyme and rhythm that places him in the highest rank of poetical technicians. He shows also imagination, passion, power. His book is a notable achievement; distinctly a contribution to literature.

THE DAFFODIL FIELDS

By John Masefield. New York: The Macmillan Company. 1913.

One of the later of Mr. Masefield's long narrative poems which have aroused widespread discussion and considerable imitation, "The Daffodil Fields," is written with the poet's characteristic vigor and tremendous force. Neither the story of the slums nor the sea this time; the scene is set in the daffodil fields and thickets of Shropshire, along the muddy rivers of the Argentine and on the broad streeches of the South American pampas. The narrative unfolds the tragedy which centres about three Shropshire folk, Michael, Lion, and Mary. Michael is the wrecker of hearts, the selfish, self-willed sensualist, and it is Michael whom Mary loves, while Lion stands aside. Michael goes away for three years of life on the vast cattle ranges of the River Plate, and when the three years are up he does not return, having forgotten Mary for the charms of a dark-eyed Spanish girl. And Mary, full of grief at her loss and later pitying Lion, who has suffered long in silence, finally marries him. Michael returns, and with him comes back all Mary's love for him. But he is the same vacillating, passion-driven Michael, and it is through him that tragedy, triple horror, overtakes them all in the daffodil fields where they had played as children.

The story is a simple one, but intensely dramatic, dealing with elemental passions entirely without recourse to subtleties. The pictures of dawn and sunset in the Shropshire country, with glimpses of the rustic life of the region, as well as the sharply contrasted vastness of the South American pampas, the stories of wild nights among the ranches, of headlong rides under the open sky with stars, all are presented with Mr. Masefield's particular forcefulness. Compared with the earlier poems, "The Widow in the Bye Street," "Dauber," and "The Everlasting Mercy," "The Daffodil Fields" is more closely concentrated and more intensely dramatic, showing a distinct advance in the poet's mastery of a form and style which he has made peculiarly his own.

THE WOLF OF GUBBIO

A Comedy in Three Acts. By Josephine Preston Peabody.

That most appealing and lovable saint, Francis of Assisi, is the leading character of Mrs. Marks's new drame which she chooses to call "a comedy in three acts." As a matter of fact, it is a Christmas miracle, done in Mrs. Marks's most delicate and appealing manner, and takes place in the woods of Gubbio seven hundred years ago. At the inn of Gubbio the great King Louis and his six attendants are expected, and the tiny hostelry is already crowded, for it is the day before Christmas. A poor man with his wife and baby try to get a lodging at the inn but are turned away. Despairing, they wander into the forest, where they are set upon by thieves, who throw the father over a cliff and steal the woman's cloak. In the encounter the Wolf of Gubbio appears and carries the baby off to his den, and the frantic mother hastens back to the town for aid. Arrived at the inn, in disguise, the good King Louis hears the pitiful story and at once sets out with his six men to search for the child and the lost man. When the party return triumphantly with the man, St. Francis appears on the scene and chooses the man and his wife to impersonate Joseph and Mary in the Christmas celebration. The village folk bring their gifts, one by one, as they begin to realize the lesson of devotion and sacrifice which the Saint is pointing out to them. But there is no Child in the manger. It is through St. Francis, finally, who has done the Wolf many a good turn in former days, that the child is brought back in time for the celebration. Touched by the power of love, the Wolf himself brings back the baby and there is a dramatic moment when he appears to lay him in the manger. The Christmas miracle is wrought; the Wolf, under the spell of love, speaks with the voice of man, and the people in wonder and amazement drop down before him, calling him Fra Lupone.

GITANJALI

By Rabindranath Tagore. With an introduction by William B. Yeats. Macmillan Company, New York. 1913.

This collection of poems, "Song Offerings" as the author translates "Gitanjali," is one of the books on which the award of the Nobel Prize for literature was recently made to the Bengali poet, Rabindranath Tagore. It represents the later work of the Bengali poet, known for the last twenty-five years to the fifty millions who speak the Bengali tongue, but not until recently introduced to the Western world of letters. Tagore's earlier work was characterized by a very hot and romantic type of mysticism. Then followed the period of transition during which the warring elements of sensuality and spirituality were at work, and finally in the quiet and retirement of Bolpur emerged the renascent spirit from which all the later work of Tagore has sprung. The "Gitanjali" reflects this change in the life of the poet. The themes are not of men and women, of streets and the rushing life of cities, but of splendor in nature, of divine love and spiritual beauty. The sun, the moon, the stars, clouds, all the trees and flowers of the earth now speak a different language for Tagore, a language of love for an all-pervading Supreme Being. It is this contact with the infinite which the poet tries to bring to the printed page and with extraordinary success. Mr. Yeats, in searching for some Western mind with which to compare the Bengali poet, has selected Thomas à Kempis in his "Imitation of Christ," noting, however, the wide difference in the fact that à Kempis was obsessed with the idea of sin and that Tagore "has as little thought of sin as a child playing with a top."

This remarkable collection of Mr. Tagore's verse is more difficult for the Occidental reader to receive and to appreciate than the earlier work; it is remote and lofty, its mysticism is based upon a culture and a philosophy far removed from that to which the Western mind is accustomed. But the religious fervor and the high spiritual temper which actuate these exquisite lyrics will be felt by every reader. The translation from the Bengali to the English has been done, as in the former instances, by the poet himself, and is no small part of the whole achievement, which is undoubtedly one of genius.

WORKS OF FRANCIS THOMPSON

Three volumes. Charles Scribner's Sons.

During his lifetime Francis Thompson's admirers were few, but they were devoted. Recently (by Mr. Harrison in The English Review) a somewhat elaborate attempt was made to relegate him to the rank of the poet of a clique, and to show that he was dependent for his fame upon the praise of his coreligionists. This is rather amusing when we remember that his poems received their first high praise from Richard Le Gallienne and Arnold Bennett. These gentlemen are not as a rule considered fanatic Catholic apologists. Arnold Bennett wrote: "My belief is that Francis Thompson has a richer natural genius, a finer poetical equipment, than any poet save Shakespeare. Show me the divinest glories of Shelley and Keats, even of Tennyson, who wrote 'The Lotus Eaters' and the song in 'The Princess,' and I think I can match them all out of this one book, this little book that can be bought at an ordinary bookseller's shop for an ordinary, prosaic crown."

Those who have known Francis Thompson by "The Hound of Heaven" and the great odes will find in the three beautiful volumes now under consideration material for many amplifications of their view of him. For here is not only great poetry, august, white hot with inspiration; here also are essays, tender, whimsical, satiric; here also are gay verses on such light and pleasant topics as cricket. It is good to have these by-products of genius; they make Francis Thompson seem human and approachable. The essay on Shelley is included, of course, and "Health and Holiness." And there are many critical essays and discussions of various subjects—paganism, the Salvation Army among them. There is one volume of prose and there are two of verse. No one can read these high thoughts clad in lovely words without the honest conviction that Thompson was a poet of genius, and that in our own time has been produced work that has an assured place among the richest treasures of English letters.

THE KINGDOM OF ALL SOULS

By George Edward Woodberry. Boston: The Merrymount Press. $1.50.

Three poems and a preface make up this slender volume of artistic appearance, for which the Woodberry Society is sponsor. The author's earlier verse was chiefly an expression of the relation between the personal, the physical, and the spiritual worlds. But the present poems carry us with a rush and a sweep into the very heart of all that is most vital in our modern thought and action. Mr. Woodberry greets the present-day promise that the individual is about to obtain freedom from the bondage of old tyrannies and conventions, and that the brotherhood of man will become a practical standard of action rather than a theoretic creed, as if this were all an accomplished fact. Like many another poet who has summed up the social forces working in his age, his own passionate convictions have swept him to a height beyond that on which the battle is actually being waged.

In the multitudinous changes that are going on Mr. Woodberry sees signs not of decay, but of promise. For him the whole universe is instinct with youth and hope:

When sheathed and glacial o'er us
Arcturus courses cold,
And dry and dark before us
Aldebaran is rolled,
Far clustering orbs in chorus
Shall light the pealing sky,
And throne to throne reply,
The heavens grow not old.

As the author says in his delightful preface, these poems breathe "a mood of faith in the unimagined future. They have a touch of prophetic conviction and that atmosphere of largeness of world hope which is a trait of our time."

BIOGRAPHY

LETTERS AND RECOLLECTIONS OF ALEXANDER AGASSIZ

Edited by G. R. Agassiz. Houghton Mifflin Company.

In temperament and achievement there was a wide difference between the famous naturalist, Louis Agassiz, and his no less brilliant son, Alexander Agassiz. But while the character of their renown may vary, the real contributions of the son to scientific advancement are of no less consequence than those of the father. The son of Alexander Agassiz, who compiles and edits these "Letters and Recollections," says of the two men that "one was temperamentally a great teacher and the other a great investigator."

The volume opens with a delightful account of the boyhood of its subject in Neuchatel, for it was not until three years after Louis Agassiz's coming to this country that he was able to summon his family to join him at Cambridge. After being graduated from college his first years were spent in teaching and later in work on the Coast Survey. His correspondence does not begin to play an important part in his biography until he returned to Cambridge and began work for the Museum of Comparative Zoology at Harvard, with which his name is so brilliantly connected. From that time until his death, in 1910, the letters present a kaleidoscopic picture of his many and varied activities. There are letters to and from Darwin, Sir John Murray, President Eliot, Haeckel, Huxley, and the members of his family. They give charming and vivid descriptions of his scientific activities, his expeditions to Mexico, India, the Bahamas, the islands of the Pacific, and of his laboratory work at the Museum and elsewhere. And all of them reflect a vigorous and live personality, while together they present a striking impression of a versatile scientist who excelled in many and varied fields of research.

JANE AUSTEN

Her Life and Letters. A Family Record. By William Austen-Leigh and Richard Arthur Austen-Leigh. E. P. Dutton & Co. $3.

This book, say the authors, "is intended as a narrative and not as a piece of literary criticism." The volume, which is compiled and written by Miss Austen's grandnephew and his son, makes a very complete record of her life, as far as existing materials render possible, and the recent renascence of interest in Jane Austen and her work will assure for it a general welcome.

Although the authors have based their work upon the well-known "Memoir" and upon the "Letters" published by Lord Brabourne in 1884, and have referred also to more recent commentaries, they have brought forward many new facts, and have endeavored to remove previous misconceptions. The volume bids fair to be the authoritative account of Jane Austen's life for many years to come. Their description of her character is worth quoting:

Hers was a mind well balanced on a basis of good sense, sweetened by an affectionate heart and regulated by fixed principles; so that she was to be distinguished from many other amiable and sensible women only by that peculiar genius which shines out clearly in her works.

MY LIFE

By August Bebel. With frontisplece. University of Chicago Press. $2.

The leader and one of the founders of the Social Democracy in the German Empire, Herr Bebel has seen his party grow from nothing until it has become one of the great political organizations of modern Germany, and his own name has become a power in all the countries included in the phrase Western civilization. His autobiography, as thus far published, carries the story of his career only as far as the attempt on the life of Kaiser Wilhelm I. in 1878, and the effect of that crime upon the party. Consequently, the book covers only the first days of the Social Democracy before it received the form impressed upon it by its originator. To the student of Socialism such an account of its early days from the pen of the man who had so large a share in it will be of the greatest value.

The sketch of Bebel's boyhood days appeals strongly to the interest of the reader, who must marvel over the difficulties the author surmounted. The book tells how, when Bebel was finally ready to begin his life work, he gradually made himself known; how he founded Socialistic organs with practically no resources, and how he built up an organization with pitifully small contributions from its members. The volume closes on the eve of the adoption of the anti-Socialist laws, the great blow struck by Bismarck, with whom Bebel was at war all his life, against the new power in the community.

RETROSPECTIONS OF AN ACTIVE LIFE

By John Bigelow. Volumes IV. and V. 1867-1879. Doubleday, Page & Co.

Full of picturesque and entertaining detail though they are, the late Mr. Bigelow's "Retrospections" have an importance far beyond that of being interesting glimpses into the life of yesterday. In constant touch, as he was, with the men and women who were making history, being himself one of the actors, the views he gives of what was going on behind the scenes form a record of decided historical importance. His memoirs will form an original source which no future historian can afford to neglect, while no reader who wishes to get the true flavor of the life of that time or the accurate measure at first hand of its famous personalities will be willing to pass it by.

Mr. Bigelow is very frank in all of his revelations. But the frankness, no matter what the resulting revelation, is entirely without malice and is partly the consequence of the material that is used—letters and diaries—and partly of the sincerity of Mr. Bigelow's mental attitude. Himself a part of the great events of the time and in constant companionship with men who were among its moving forces, the letters to and from his intimate friends discuss freely many facts about world politics which even now are not generally known. The letters are supplemented by extracts from Mr. Bigelow's diaries, in which with a Pepysian frankness he recorded his impressions of the life and the men of two continents which he knew well as diplomatist and editor. When he repeats Seward's story of the bribery necessary to bring about the annexation of Alaska, shows us Charles Dickens in his cups, Wilkie Collins taking his nightly spoonful of laudanum, Horace Greeley in tears over an editorial in his newspaper, he may give us a shock, but he convinces us of his sincerity.

THE LIFE OF JOHN BRIGHT

By George Macaulay Trevelyan. New York: Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.30.

Mr. Trevelyan's biography of John Bright is an extraordinarily useful book. It gives a comprehensive, authoritative, and entertaining story of a great and good man, who did great and good things for his country and the world, and its publication has notably enriched the literature of English politics and the history of philanthropy.

Mr. Bright was such an important person that his biography necessarily includes pretty near all of the political history of his country during the period of his activity in public life, and Mr. Trevelyan might very well have entitled his excellent work "The History of John Bright and His Times." The association of the man with his times runs all through the book, and it is most admirably maintained. When Bright, acting contrary to the wishes of his best friends, including members of the Church he loved, emerged from comparative obscurity and entered upon his political career he became a central figure in the national life of his country, and to tell adequately the story of his development from that time on demanded on the part of the narrator a full knowledge of his subject, a nice sense of proportion, and an unusual literary skill. Mr. Trevelyan, fortunately, was abundantly able to respond to these requirements, and those who read his book will credit him with an admirable performance of a difficult task.

Americans, of course, will be greatly interested in the chapter in the biography that deals with our civil war. There are men and women living in this country to-day who are able to recall that in our war time their hearts were full of gratitude to John Bright for the effective stand he took in his own country against those who were eager that England should aid the Southern Confederacy. Mr. Trevelyan directs attention to an act of President Lincoln which was indicative of the feeling toward Bright that pervaded the North. A young Englishman had been sentenced in San Francisco to ten years' imprisonment and a fine of $10,000. Lincoln [illegible] the man and said the [illegible] was granted "as a public mark of the esteem held by the United States of America for the high character and steady friendship of the said John Bright."

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF WILLIAM COBBETT IN ENGLAND AND AMERICA

By Lewis Melville. Two volumes. John Lane Company. $10.

William Cobbett was a tempestuous Englishman, whose mission in the world seems to have been to stir up strife. He loved a fight, and took the utmost satisfaction out of doing and saying things that would enrage his enemies. As he held decided and frequently contemptuous opinions about contemporary men and affairs, and had not the least hesitation in expressing them, he had no difficulty in keeping on his hands all the fights that any man needs want. He made two visits to America, coming the first time to Philadelphia, in 1792, and living there for a number of years. He came again, in 1817, and lived for two years at Hempstead, L. I., after which he spent the rest of his life in England. He was one of those political malcontents, useful in their own day for calling attention to grave abuses, who are of interest to a later time because their diatribes helped to start movements or gave impetus to those already under way. Cobbett published in England for many years a "Political Register," famous in his time and having considerable influence.

Of special interest to Americans will be the two chapters which deal with Cobbett's life while in this country. His account of men and affairs in Philadelphia during the French Revolution and the Napoleonic wars is particularly worth reading. He did not have a good opinion of his adopted country, and wrote in the most scathing terms of the morals of the people, whom he called "a cheating, sly, roguish gang," the climate, the products, the land. Party politics in this country at that time were much entangled with European affairs, the Federalists being friendly to England and the Democrats anti-British and friendly to France. Cobbett was soon engulfed in the local strife and proved himself a good fighter. When he returned to England in 1819 he took with him the bones of Paine.

WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON

By John Jay Chapman. New York: Moffat, Yard & Co. $1.25.

Mr. Chapman's essay on William Lloyd Garrison is a strong, brilliant work, of notable literary merit, and those who share the author's opinions—and prejudices—with respect to the men and matters with which he deals will read what he has written with very great satisfaction.

It is not an impartial survey he gives us of Garrison's stormy career and of the controversies with which he was engaged; on the contrary, it presents views as to the man, the cause to which he was attached, the methods he employed, and the enemies he made, that agree perfectly with those pugnaciously proclaimed by the men and women who fought under Garrison and the other famous Abolitionists. It contains an ardent eulogy of the great anti-slavery leader and a stout denunciation of the slaveholders and their Northern sympathizers and supporters that will warm the hearts of those who proudly remember their identification with the abolition movement. Without doubt, too, the essay will greatly impress readers of later generations who are able to consider the slavery question with open minds.

But there certainly will be two judgments on Mr. Chapman's essay, and he must have anticipated there would be, knowing as he did that there was a very considerable body of men and women in America who had never ceased to regard William Lloyd Garrison as a detestable person. Assuming that this anticipation lay in Mr. Chapman's mind, we are permitted to wonder over something he says in a prefatory way. "I wrote 'Garrison,'" he remarks, "in order to bring back to notice the anti-slavery epoch, a period almost forgotten, yet which brought salvation to our people. This salvation Americans accepted at the hands of Garrison, giving him small thanks." It is time that Garrison took his place in the school books and in the imagination of the American people as one of our greatest sons." Did Mr. Chapman, when he wrote these sentences, have any expectation there would be a nation-wide response to the suggestion they carry? Probably not.

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF JOHN PAUL JONES

By Mrs. Reginald de Koven. Illustrated. Two volumes. Charles Scribner's Sons.

Mrs. de Koven first became known as an authority upon Paul Jones when she proved a few years ago in an article in THE NEW YORK TIMES that Buell's life of Jones, which had formerly been accepted without question, was a tissue of fictions, misstatements, and forgeries. She had for years been making a thorough and painstaking study of the hero's life and, fully equipped with the conscience, the purposes, and the methods of the modern historian, she had gone to every existing source of original information. She showed that Buell's references upon which he based his innumerable fictions were mainly to books and manuscripts that never existed, and that practically everything new in the book had been invented to suit the convenience of the author. By that time Buell had died, and as no one has ever been able to make an explanation of his strange crime, his purpose in it is likely to remain forever one of the darkest of literary mysteries.

Mrs. de Koven now comes forward with two splendid volumes in which she presents the real history of the real Paul Jones. She does not offer them as a refutation of the predecessor whom she had already shown to be unworthy of credence, but, barely mentioning him, briefly though bluntly, for what he was, she contents herself with following her subject through all the phases and scenes of his varied life, in which there was so much of both glory and pathos. And this time, undoubtedly, his elusive character and remarkable career are presented as they were. Perhaps she does not succeed in making Jones entirely understandable. But she presents all the materials necessary for the reader to form his own judgment.

A SMALL BOY AND OTHERS

By Henry James. With frontispiece. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

"Come here, little boy, and show me your extraordinary jacket," said Thackeray to young Henry James, hovering on the stairway near his father's study. The jacket and the little boy wearing it appear as the frontispiece of this very delightful book of Henry James's recollections of his boyhood. The picture shows an interesting and attractive little figure, dressed in a sheath-like jacket, standing beside his father, a glow of happiness upon the young face, whose grave mouth and eager, questioning eyes impress it upon one's attention. Mr. James has not undertaken to give accurately and chronologically the story of his boyhood, but to present a series of recollections, or, perhaps, of persisting impressions received in his youth and afterward clarified and related to life and to one another by the force of mental habit. The origin of the big book of charming memories is set forth with all Mr. James's zeal for analysis and exact statement, from which the reader learns at considerable length that when the author attempted to place together some particulars of the early life of William James "aspects began to multiply and images to swarm," until at last he yielded to their pressure and set down all his memories of his earliest days.

Aside from all other considerations, the book is well worth reading merely as a picture of that priceless thing, a happy childhood. Henry's attitude toward his brother James, awful in the dignity of sixteen months' priority, is deliciously realized. And there are many interesting figures of people famous in one way or another, who take on novel and entertaining appearances when we look at them through the eyes of the child, Henry James. The figure of the father is reconstructed vividly and affectionately. And there are striking bits of self-revelation, as when he throws in the comment, after saying how far back he had reflected about something, "for I see I must have been always reflecting."

LIFE OF EDWARD BULWER, FIRST LORD LYTTON

By his grandson, the Earl of Lytton. Macmillan Company, New York, 1913.

This is the first complete and authoritative life of the famous novelist which has been given to the world, and its final completion is due to the efforts, not of his son, to whom the work of biography was intrusted, but to his grandson, the present Lord Lytton. Two volumes of the biography, as it was originally intended, appeared in 1883, having been prepared by the novelist's son, but death overtook the biographer before the task was accomplished. The present Lord Lytton has rewritten the entire story, hoping thereby to present a unified and continuous narrative, which will enable the world to form a true estimate of his grandfather's career.

In this work Lord Lytton tells unreservedly and without any attempt at concealment or glossing over of fact the full story of the domestic tragedy of the novelist's marriage, an account which will prove of intense interest to the many to whom the facts of the case were but partially known. "I soon came to the conclusion that it was necessary to tell all or nothing," explains the writer in discussing this laying bare of domestic infelicities to the public. Lord Lytton's purpose is unusually upright and sincere, and his wisdom in satisfying a curiosity, piqued by the partial disclosure of facts, is indisputable. This straightforward account places the elder Lytton in a true though somewhat searching and relentless light, but, as the biographer confidently assumes, "the truth can damage neither the dead nor the living."

The work, which contains several interesting portraits and other illustrations, is prefaced by an autobiographical portion, retained from the first publication of the two volumes of 1883, and dealing with the first twenty-five years of the author's life. As a restrained and yet sympathetic bit of biography, and quite apart from the material brought to light for the first time, this "life" has already won many readers.

THE STORY OF MY BOYHOOD AND YOUTH

By John Muir. Houghton Mifflin Company.

Born in a little village on the coast of Scotland, taken in his early youth to a log cabin among the forests of Wisconsin, Mr. Muir learned early to love wild nature. Not every boy, it is true, gains a lasting affection for country life from spending long hours in arduous farm labor, but Mr. Muir was an exceptional boy.

Exceptional he was, but he had none of the offensive virtues of the infant prodigy. His childhood was wholesome and natural, and he looks back to it with delight, and his recital of it is delightful reading. He was always a naturalist the intimate friend of frogs, eels, snakes, turtles, lightning bugs, oxen—of all beasts and birds and of all growing things.

He was a student of books, too, and he tells of rising at 1 o'clock in the morning to devote the hours before breakfast to reading. He had a gift for mechanics, and some clocks and thermometers of his own manufacture, exhibited at the State Fair at Madison, attracted so much attention that young Muir received a place in a machine shop in Prairie du Chien.

He left this position to enter the University of Wisconsin. There are many interesting pages of reminiscences of his college days; days pleasant to remember, although they were full of labor and privation. When he was graduated he left, he says, "the University of Wisconsin for the University of the Wilderness."

It is a refreshing book, full of the joy of life. Mr. Muir has conferred a favor upon the public by thus admitting them to the pleasure of intimate acquaintance with him.

NAPOLEON

By Herbert Fisher. Home University Library. New York: Henry Holt & Co. 50 cents.

Mr. Fisher has done well the difficult thing he was asked to do, having set forth, in a little volume of 250 pages, a clear and reasonable conception of the great Napoleon. The man of little leisure and the man who is unable to follow with interest detailed narratives of military campaigns and battles will find in Mr. Fisher's book a biography very much to their liking—a biography which shows what sort of man, General, and Emperor Napoleon was, and deals with his military operations with no more than the necessary fullness. The author gives rather more attention to Napoleon's statecraft, domestic policies, and diplomacy than to his work in the field of war, but whatever activities are recounted, be they of peace or war, they are referred to for the purpose of getting help from them in the elucidation of Napoleon's character and the appraisement of his various qualities.

Mr. Fisher does not credit Napoleon with great originality as a soldier, alleging that his war strategy was derived from French military students and writers, and that his policy of aggression and far-reaching conquest he got from the Revolutionary Government, simply realizing in terms of empire what they had conceived in terms of republic.

Referring to Napoleon's understanding of the masses and commenting on his bulletins and proclamations, Mr. Fisher remarks that, like the philosophy of Rousseau, which it temporarily displaced, the literature of Napoleon belongs to the library of the demagogue; he also characterizes Napoleon as a tyrannical censor of newspapers, "the pioneeer of those great newspaper trusts which now impress their violent unwisdom upon a suffering age."

Mr. Fisher runs against some students of Napoleon's military career in holding it was his practice throughout his career to leave minor tactics to his subordinates. Those who take the opposite view hold that this practice is noticeable only in the later Napoleonic campaigns, and contend it indicated the failing off in the man's mental powers, and that it contributed measurably to his overthrow.

LETTERS OF CHARLES ELIOT NORTON

With biographical comment by his daughter, Sara Norton, and M. A. De Wolfe Howe. Illustrated. Vols. I., II. Boston and New York: Houghton Mifflin Company. (The Riverside Press, Cambridge.) $5.

In the course of his long and busy life Charles Eliot Norton came into warm friendship and close intercourse with a very large number of the great writers of America and England, and his letters are chiefly valuable because they contain curious facts and vital impressions concerning many of the immortals of the nineteenth century.

He knew well all of his literary fellow-countrymen who were worth knowing, and put very interesting bits into his letters about some of them; but the best things his epistolary pen recorded are his pictures of his transatlantic friends. He was a thoroughgoing American—his lettera to James Russell Lowell, George William Curtis and others show that clearly—but there is no doubt the happiest periods of his life were those he spent in association with his friends across the ocean. He loved the literary atmosphere of England and delighted in his social and intellectual relations with the most important English writers.

His list of intimates contains the names of Ruskin, Carlyle, the Brownings, Mrs Gaskell, Clough, John Forster, FitzGerald, Burne-Jones, Morris, Leslie Stephen, John Stuart Mill, Matthew Arnold, George Eliot, Goldwin Smith and many others of high rank in the literature and the intellectual life of England—and it may be remarked that with respect to these important folk

Roald Amundsen
Author of "The South Pole"

Mr. Norton was not a mere hanger-on, but a friend among friends, cordially treated and highly esteemed.

Carlyle, in one of his notebooks, gives a good indication of Norton's standing in literary England. "An amiable, very friendly, sincere and cultivated Charles Norton is here all Winter, and much a favorits with me," writes Carlyle, and there is abundant evidence that this view of Norton was the prevalent one with those who knew him in England. It is not astonishing that Norton's letters, written by an alert and sympathetic observer, contain remarkable pen portraits of his English friends.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT—AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY

Illustrated. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

In this volume of more than 600 pages the ex-President has written in a vigorous, characteristic fashion on the events of his life up to the time when he completed his second term as President. He has gossiped about his early days, spoken with enthusiasm about his life in the West, and his hunting exploits, and has told with honest pride of what the Rough Riders did in the Cuban campaign.

Most of the book, however, is naturally taken up with Col. Roosevelt's political career. He has told of his first introduction into politics as an Assemblyman; he has described how Jacob Riis and he, when Police Commissioner, faced the great problems of this city. When he gets on to his Gubernatorial experience the author has something very timely to say to these days when the condition of our local political parties has created so much stir. He has discussed frankly what he considers should be the relation between the reformer in politics and the boss, and has told how he treated so powerful a leader as the late Senator Platt.

As he approaches the White House the great press of events in which he played the leading part forces Col. Roosevelt to drop the autobiographical style almost entirely and to write rather general statements of what he did and the methods he used. It is interesting to note the comparison which he makes between his own conception of the powers and duties of the Presidency and those he ascribes to Mr. Taft, and it is also remarkable that he seems never to have a word of praise for the man who was once his closest friend.

Conservation of national resources, the big stick, and the square deal, and social and industrial justice are some of the matters on which the ex-President dilates, and as he deals with his action in international affairs he becomes particularly interesting. He sets forth in detail the reasons which led him to intervene in the Russo-Japanese war, and he protests with great fervor that in the matter of Panama the United States lived up to the highest ideals of conduct.

SAINT-GAUDENS'S MEMOIRS

Arranged by Homer Saint-Gaudens. Two volumes. New York: The Century Company. 1913.

This is the amplification of the earlier reminiscences of the famous sculptor, by his son, Homor Saint-Caudens. No confidences are betrayed, but these two beautiful volumes are full of frank and winning revelations of personality. The narrative starts with a description, charming in its simplicity, of Saint-Gaudens's French father and his Irish mother, and their little cobbler's shop on Forsyth Street, later moved to the Bowery and thence to Lispenard Street. The elder Saint-Gaudens had a most distinguished clientele, including such names as Astor, Morgan, Dix, Belmont and Sickles. There are intimate pictures of the sculptor's early apprenticeship with a cameo cutter, Avet; the days spent in cutting shell-cameos of small-waisted ladies in hoopskirts, the evenings in study at the drawing school in connection with Cooper Union. The years following his study at Rome, spent in his studio on Fourteenth Street, are filled with a host of the sculptor's well-known friends, among them such as John La Farge, Stanford White, Robert Louis Stevenson, Gen. Sherman, Richard Watson Gilder, William Dean Howells and a score of others. Everywhere the reminiscences are piquant and characteristic of the writer. Stanford White "was drawn to me one day as he descended the German Savings Bank stairs by hearing me bawl the Andante of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony." A devouring love for ice cream brought Saint-Gaudens and McKim, whom he greatly admired, together. His explanation of the change in the relations between himself and his famous protégé, MacMonnies, is characteristically large and fine. MacMonnies, "the gentle, tender bird," taught by Saint-Gaudens the art of flying high, suddenly developed into an eagle. The change brought to the elder man not bitterness, but much sorrow. "I find," he says, "that I have met in Mac another man whose acquaintance I am now making—no doubt a fine fellow and a devoted friend when I get to know him again. It is all quite natural, and it was unnatural in me to expect that he was not subject to the same development as the rest of us." The latter years of his life, during which honors came crowding in upon him thick and fast, are pictured by his son with fidelity and a well-restrained sympathy, rounding up the record of a gentle and significant life.

ANTHONY TROLLOPE, HIS PUBLIC SERVICES, PRIVATE FRIENDS, AND LITERARY ORIGINALS

By T. H. S. Escott. John Lane Company.

Barset's chronicler is little known as a personality even to the chief admirers of his novels. Mr. Escott visited the novelist many years ago, to interview him for an English periodical, and formed with him a lasting friendship. Indeed, it seems from this book that Trollope desired Mr. Escott to write his biography, for he supplied him with an abundance of letters and other useful material.

It is by no means a model biography that Mr. Escott has written, but on the other hand it has charm and interest lacking in more formal and orthodox works of this sort. Trollope's life is described in full detail, with some hero-worship, it is true, but not enough to annoy the reader.

There is much about the rather restricted and bleak life of the Trollope family and about the poverty which troubled the novelist's youth. Mr. Escott will surprise many devotees of Trollope by his account of the books that came before the great studies of life among the British clergy. Some of them were about Ireland—"The Kellys and the O'Kellys" one of them was named—and one, "La Vendee," was a historical novel about the French Revolution.

Thoroughness Mr. Escott exhibits, and sympathy. These surely are good qualities for a biographer to possess. His book was needed, and he has executed his task in a manner that insures him the gratitude of his readers.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY AND LIFE OF GEORGE TYRRELL

Longmans, Green & Co. $2.

The revelation of his character which George Tyrrell has himself made in this book is a fascinating study, but it is doubtful whether it will do service either to his memory or his cause. The volume is a most interesting one, partly because of the character of the man himself, described ruthlessly and shrewdly by his own pen in the first part, and partly because of his connection with and leadership of the "Modernist" movement. The publication of the book was in accordance with his wishes, and was carried out by the most devoted of his friends.

George Tyrrell's character, by his own revelation of it, was exceedingly intricate and introspective. It was full of sudden generous impulses, of detached fits of cynical self-criticism, of a strange determination, of a freakish delight in masquerade. He was brilliantly clever, especially in his mastery of words and in his infinite subtlety in making language flexible and suggestive. This latter faculty seems to have been at once his strength and his undoing. Born of an Irish Protestant family, when scarcely out of his boyhood he submitted to Rome, and soon afterward joined the Society of Jesus. He remained a Jesuit until a few years before his death, when he allied himself with the movement known as "Modernism," and was released from his vows. There followed much vigorous warfare between him and his opponents and those who had been his ecclesiastical superiors. He died excommunicated and was buried without the rites of the Church.

VINCENT VAN GOGH

Letters of a Post-Impressionist. Translated and edited by Anthony M. Ludovici. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

The correspondence of Vincent Van Gogh, whose right to be considered a great painter few deny, twenty years after his death, will be of particular interest to artists and those concerned in any way with the art of painting. Although the letters are nearly all addressed to his family and friends, the editor has selected only those passages that deal with artistic matters. In them he expresses freely his opinions about his own art, about that of other painters, and about pictures in general. They are written in a simple and direct style, and now and then one catches a flash of dry humor. One cannot fail to be impressed by the evident painstaking habit of the author's mind. He is deeply interested in the technical side of his art, and for that reason the letters will be especially valuable to artists. His admiration of the Dutch masters is unbounded, and he seems to have been constantly going to them for light upon his own technical difficulties. Those who have felt and appreciated the simplicity of passion in Van Gogh's painting will find pleasure and delight in the same spirit in his correspondence. There is much suggestiveness and much to stimulate thought in his criticisms of other artists.

The introductory essay by the translator analyzes his technique, discusses his peculiarities, and describes many of his pictures.

GEORGE FREDERIC WATTS

The Annals of an Artist's Life. Illustrated. Three volumes. By M. S. Watts. George H. Doran Company. $10.

It is only eight years since Watts died and ceased to preach, by word and picture, his artist's creed of the ideal of allegory. In that time there have been a number of articles and a book or two that gave glimpses of his life and work. But the volume that was to allow us to see Watts the man and Watts the artist as a whole has been withheld until now, when it comes to us from the sympathetic hand of his wife. And so much has happened in the world of art during these eight tumultuous years that Watts, a very real influence up to the time of his death, seems very remote, indeed.

It was in 1837 that Watts sent his first important work, "The Wounded Heron," to the Royal Academy. And afterwards, for nearly seventy years, he was a positive, progressive force in art. As a protestant against the established order, he antedated and opened the way for the Pre-Raphaelites. Had he chosen he might have been one of them, as he was essentially in his attitude toward art. His "Time and Oblivion" and "Life's Illusions," the earliest of that long line of paintings which Watt himself liked to call "ethical reflections," were at the time of their appearance bold departures in form and feeling. From the first his dominating intent was to endow painting with the ethical qualities of inspirational poetry. Mrs. Watts quotes endless variations of his avowal that art must instruct and uplift or perish.

Mrs. Watts's three volumes—the last one made up of his writings—all copiously illustrated, shed much new light upon the painter's life and the processes and extent of his work. Altogether they constitute a work which no admirer of Watts and no student of art during the last century can afford to miss.

ESSAYS AND ADDRESSES

UNIVERSITY AND HISTORICAL ADDRESSES

Delivered by James Bryce during a residence in the United States as Ambassador of Great Britain. The Macmillan Company. $2.25.

Of the many addresses which Mr. Bryce delivered during his residence in this country, he has chosen twenty-two for this present volume. Seven of these are historical, or relate to history. In them he discusses the beginnings of English colonization in Virginia and Massachusetts, Thomas Jefferson, the discovery of Lake Champlain and its effect upon the extension of European occupation of America, the character of Lincoln, the writing and teaching of history, the latter a vigorous defense of presenting history in such a way as will make it attractive and moving as well as accurate.

A goodly part of the addresses before universities relate to the aims and methods of higher education. He is a convinced and zealous humanist in the sense that he feels that men are more important, more interesting, and more rewarding subjects of study than are things. He distrusts, for educational purposes, those studies intended to fit for special callings in life, and, although his estimate of the character and achievement of higher education in the United States is, in general, extremely favorable, he warns against the risk of making it too practical. The discourses which deal with law and legislation are perhaps the most valuable for American readers. That on "The Influence of National Character and Historical Environment on the Development of Common Law" is particularly penetrating and broad, while the object lesson in the business of democratic government afforded by "The Conditions and Methods of Legislation," which describes fully the machinery by which the work of the House of Commons is regulated, in order that the democratic principle upon which it rests may have full and just effect, is worthy of every citizen's careful attention.

HISTORY AS LITERATURE AND OTHER ESSAYS

By Theodore Roosevelt. Charles Scribner's Sons.

The address from which Mr. Roosevelt's latest volume takes its title was delivered at Boston, where the author spoke as President of the American Historical Society. Of the rest of the contents of this volume, the three most important papers are the address on "Citizenship in a Republic," which he delivered at the Sorbonne; "The World Movement," before the University of Berlin, and "Biological Analogies in History," at Oxford. They are all characteristic examples of Mr. Roosevelt's distinctive quality as a thinker, the quality that leads him never to aim above the head of the average man, whom he seems to regard as a creature of the most naïve simplicity and of very satisfactory limitations. For this audience, which apparently he keeps always before his mind's eye, he makes everything extremely plain, and does not torment his listeners with thoughts beyond the reach of their souls.

The address on "History as Literature," made to an audience as competently critical as, perhaps, could be gathered together in this country, is marked by that curious balancing of opinion that frequently becomes somewhat monotonous in Mr. Roosevelt's utterances. The "biological analogies" which at Oxford he traced "in history," are worked out with considerable ingenuity and are stated with unusual sobriety of style. But they are, for the most part, rather obvious.

The volume impresses, by virtue of its evidence of sheer fecundity, when one considers the multiplicity of activities which its author engaged in during the time in which he was producing it, and the enormous amount of physical and mental energy which those activities demanded. Perhaps he would have succeeded more brilliantly in the rôle of political philosopher which he here essays if he had not been doing so many other things, and doing them so strenuously, at the same time.

SPEECHES, CORRESPONDENCE AND POLITICAL PAPERS OF CARL SCHURZ

Selected and edited by Frederic Bancroft on behalf of the Carl Schurz Memorial Committee. Vols. I. to VI. (New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

The volumes containing Carl Schurz's speeches, letters, and miscellaneous political papers constitute a deserved and fitting memorial of one of the purest and most useful of the public men of America. From the time of his arrival in America in 1852, a lad of 23, Mr. Schurz was an ideal American—an industrious, energetic, upright, patriotic man, who invariably stood for what he conceived to be the right.

The story of his career may be read in his public utterances and private letters, which Mr. Bancroft has assembled and intelligently edited. They show him fighting just causes all through his life, fighting hard, too, and efficiently. There was no man of his time whose influence counted more than his for good government, impartial justice, and national honesty. He moved men because they knew he never advocated any cause which he had not carefully and conscientiously weighed and approved, and because he spoke with a power of persuasion unsurpassed by that of any of our great American orators.

It is thought by many of Mr. Schurz's admirers that his best service to his country was performed in his persistent fight for honest money. He began his fight in 1869 at a time when the tendency toward inflation was making its first threatening manifestation. From that time on he was constantly on guard against those who sought to debase our currency and to deal dishonestly with the nation's creditors. His speeches on the money question are contained in the memorial volumes, and the careful reading of them may be recommended to students of finance and to those especially who desire to know the history of cheap money agitation in this country in the period subsequent to the civil war. For near thirty years Mr. Schurz confronted our American fiatists and made ducks and drakes of the arguments of every one of them. It is a pity we have no Carl Schurz just at this moment to say the right things in the right way to the gentlemen at Washington who are tinkering with our currency.

STOWE NOTES

Letters and Verses by Edward Martin Taber. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

It is as a book of nature study that this volume will command fixed and lasting attention, as it has already been recognized as among the most charming nature books this country has produced. Its author, before his death in 1896, had won appreciation as a gifted painter, and his paintings, of which one hangs in the Metropolitan Museum, and his pen and pencil sketches bear witness to his keen perception of beauty. But he kept another record, in word sketches, of the loveliness he saw about him, and this now, as the journal that he kept during his stay in the hill country in Vermont and elsewhere, is published for the first time. The book is composed of the notes in which, with exceptional felicity and grace of phrase, he recorded the impressions that came to him as he walked about in the open air. What he felt most and deepest seems to have been the cordiality of nature to one lonely and seeking comfort. He found her heart hospitable, and the "Stowe Notes" are the account of a charming intimacy with her. His eyes seem to have been less often lifted to the hills than drawn persuasively to the contemplation of the infinite mysteries and charms immediately about him. His journal is no record of a solitary journey into austere fastnesses, but can be better likened to a ramble about a garden. The nature story that he tells is one that is less of awe and more of solace. He was peculiarly sensitive to every whisper of the swarming life of the out of doors and to every phase of beauty of hill and sky, lake and field, bird and beast, and he had also a rare gift of transferring to words both the beauty that he saw and his own responding emotions

Gilbert K. Chesterton
Author of "The Victorian Age in Literature"

HISTORY

GREEK IMPERIALISM

By William Scott Ferguson. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

The Greek city-state has been studied carefully and minutely by a large number of trained scholars. And it is therefore very creditable to the standing of American scholarship that one of its representatives should be able to bring forward new matter and sum up the results of latest research in such a very readable form. The author, who is a member of the Faculty of Harvard University, takes new points of view even in the case of Athens and Sparta and their place in Greek polity that go far to revolutionize long accepted generalizations. Greek imperialism did not move along simple lines, for those who ruled were the members of the city-state and those who became subjects to them had gone through the same kind of political trafning as their masters.

It is interesting to note how far from accurate was the old conception that the Athenians found leisure for art, literature, and philosophy by having all their work done for them by their slaves. Prof. Ferguson shows that only a few Athenians had slaves, and that even this small part was obliged to take an active part in the business activities of the day. The farmers had to till their own land, and probably at least a third of the citizens had to earn their living by selling their labor.

For the later types of Greek imperialism Prof. Ferguson, who has covered part of the field before in his work on Hellenistic Athens, brings much new information. Especially interesting is that which deals with Greek rule in Egypt, where the masses of records that have been discovered in the excavation of buried cities give us so many details of the life of that day.

EMINENT ENGLISH MEN AND WOMEN IN PARIS

By Roger Boutet de Monvel. Translated by G. Herring. Charles Scribner's Sons.

A big, gay, brilliant book, a real mine of amusing gossip and anecdote, is this study by M. de Monvel of the famous men and women from across the Channel who have occasionally made Paris their home for a longer or shorter time. But it is also a sympathetic, faithful picture of the British expatriates as they appeared to the French among whom they dwelt. Along with the gossip and the anecdote there is much curious information presented with such skill and charm as to make a book that one reads with absorbed interest.

The portion that will attract the most attention is probably the chapter on "Thackeray in Paris," in which M. de Monvel makes a courteous, brilliant, conclusive answer to the famous Englishman's savage criticisms and scathing censures of French manners and morals. He does it all so calmly and deftly and with such suavity and skill that the reading of it is a delight. First he draws a picture of Thackeray on his first visit to Paris, youthful, opinionated, and very British, plunging suddenly into the company of the gay vagabonds of the Latin Quarter and getting from them his first and lasting impression of the French people. Then he shows that Thackeray's knowledge of French life was mainly derived from lurid and sensational French novels which he accepted as truthful portrayals. And finally M. de Monvel brings himself and his readers to the conclusion that all Thackeray's angry rhetoric was directed against a France that has never existed.

Wellington, Sir Walter Scott, Castlereagh, Lady Blessington, Lady Morgan, are among the English of whose life in Paris M. de Monvel writes entertainingly, and one interesting chapter is devoted to the little company of Londoners

A HISTORY OF THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES FROM THE REVOLUTION TO THE CIVIL WAR

By John Bach McMaster. In eight volumes. Volume VIII. D. Appleton & Co.

The middle decade of the last century, that of the fifties, was the most dramatic of our entire history. The one which followed it was more tragic; others have been more virile or more surprising. But in dramatic situation, with its uncertainty of result and its thrilling expectation of what will come next, no other period will compare with that from 1850 to 1861, which Prof. McMaster takes up in this eighth and concluding volume of his detailed and intimate history of this country up to the time of the civil war. The same viewpoint, as of one writing from within a family rather than as a spectator from the outside, that made the previous volumes so full of the stir of life and growth, makes this final volume peculiarly interesting. It was the period when the value of personality in public affairs was at its height. It was the time when the opposing forces of pro-slavery and anti-slavery were lining up for the final trial of strength, and the prophet lightnings of the war that was soon to come were already flashing between them. The period was a most alluring one for any author as interested in the vital concerns of humanity as Mr. McMaster has always shown himself to be, and it was also one that would give the final test to an author's clarity of view, mental poise, and judicial temperament. Prof. McMaster has stood the test well, for his account of the complicated course of events, the clashing of personalities, and the hot and bitter temper of the time is not only clear, graphic, and interesting, but it is also accurate and judicious. Extensive research and impartial presentation combine to make the volume a standard history of the decade.

THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO—1821-1848

By George Lockhart Rives. Charles Scribner's Sons. $8.

Mr. Rives takes the view that the results of our early relations with Mexico—the acquisition of Texas and California—came about inevitably. Given the premises laid down by those early relations, and, no matter what legal bonds the two nations might have laid upon themselves, nothing could have stopped or turned aside the logical processes by which the Southwest and the Pacific Coast became American.

Mr. Rives, Corporation Counsel under Mayor Low and one of the Trustees of Columbia University, has made an exhaustive study of the dealings between Mexico and the United States from 1821 to 1848 that is just now of peculiar interest and timeliness. When Mexico allowed the settlement of Texas by a people alien to her in religion, language, and spirit she herself set going a machinery which it was impossible for her to stop. When, seeing that she could not populate that region herself, she allowed the United States to send in settlers, Mr. Rives holds that the fate of the territory was sealed. With regard to the case of California, also, which Mr. Rives takes up in his second volume, the logical march of events overrode the status that had been laid down by law. The inability of Mexico herself to foster and develop California left that territory on the doorstep of the world, to be picked up and cared for by the first nation that wanted it.

Mr. Rives brings out a number of obscure phases and episodes of our controversy with Mexico over these regions, one of them the interesting possibility, that loomed for a time in the background, that England would take Texas if we did not. He goes into the military operations of the war with Mexico at considerable length and writes of them with judgment and fairness.

HISTORY OF THE RECONSTRUCTION PERIOD, 1865-1877

Volume VII. of the History of the United States Under the Constitution. By James Schouler. Dodd, Mead & Co. $2.

Amending his former intention, Mr. Schouler, after the lapse of fourteen years, takes up again his very able "History of the United States Under the Constitution," and adds another volume. He announces that this is the last, and that as it now stands the edition is definitive. A general index to the whole seven volumes, appended to this present issue, makes the work complete. A lawyer and a lecturer upon law at Harvard, Johns Hopkins, and other universities, and a lifelong student of American history, Mr. Schouler has made himself an authority upon the story of our nation, not only upon its growth socially and politically, but also upon those legal lines of development which have been and still are so inextricably intertwined with its other phases. This history—his chief work as a historian—and many other volumes as well as addresses before historical societies, taking up special themes in our national development, have placed him among the ablest students of our history.

The narrative of the Johnson Administration, in this present volume, is developed from a recent course of university lectures which attracted attention at the time because he took the ground that President Johnson had been much maligned. The narrative is a vindication of Johnson's personality and of his course as President. During the remainder of the reconstruction period Mr. Schouler was a resident of Washington and a student at close range of public men and affairs, and there is much of personal reminiscence in his recital of events during that time. It serves well as a complement to Mr. Rhodes's account of the same period, as he gives prominence to some points which the other passes over lightly.

THE MAKING OF MODERN ENGLAND

By Gilbert Slater. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

This summary of the economic and social progress of England during the last hundred years presents English history from a new point of view, that of its concern with and its effect upon the artisan and the laboring man. It affords a measure of the tremendous importance of the changes which have been going on in England's social and economic life by bringing out clearly the changed and improved status of the lower classes. The author is Principal of the Ruskin College for Workingmen, Oxford University, and his connection with the modern thought upon these questions enables him to speak with sympathy and authority. He writes of incidents in English history from an entirely new point of view, which is in itself symbolical of the changes he has recorded. For example, when he considers the revolution in the English land laws after the Restoration he does not look upon it as the final emancipation of the land from feudalism, as do most writers upon the subject. He writes from the point of view of the results to the yeomen and the agricultural laborers who were given over to the mercy of their rich neighbors. The new laws aggrandised the squires and built up that form of local Government which other writers have found admirable, but which this author thinks responsible for the decay of English country life.

Dr. Slater has gone further, in his treatment of the consequences of the growth of industrialism, than have his predecessors, and has taken up the problems created by the evolution of the joint stock company. He has something to say also about such matters as the Crimean War, international relations and imperialism, as they have affected the laboring man. His sketch of the rise of the modern municipality is very interesting and he writes with unusual authority of the growth and evolution of the labor movement. There is a summary also of the special legislation affecting Ireland.

FINE AND USEFUL ARTS

ART AND COMMON SENSE

By Royal Cortissoz. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.75.

For a long time art has been the objective of this brilliant and experienced critic, and the mood in which he has approached it seldom has failed to justify the second part of his title. "It is common sense," he says, "that will bring the subject down from the clouds and keep the great work of art before us as the creation of a man, not of a demigod."

It would be difficult to find a guide at once more informed and more entertaining to lead us into the benignant presence of art than Mr. Cortissoz, whose likings are catholic, whose judgments are positive, whose temper is buoyant.

The book is made up of a great number of and variety of essays upon art subjects the most diverse. Among them are Ingres, Rembrandt, Hals, Verneer, Whistler, Sargent, Gauguin, Velasquez, Goya, Tiepolo, Rodin, Richard Morris Hunt, Mr. McKim, and J. Pierpont Morgan. The idea of treating all these subjects from the standpoint of common sense keeps the book coherent. Thanks to that point of view, which opens up for Mr. Cortissoz great fields of fresh thought, we have pages upon pages of instructed and instructive comment, happy humor, well-found anecdote, and entertaining biographical detail, with a reasonable share of criticism so acute and discriminating that the reader will wish it were more.

THE CURIOUS LORE OF PRECIOUS STONES

By George Frederick Kunz. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company. 1913.

This scholarly work is from the pen of the leading expert of precious stones

Meredith Nicholson
Author of "Otherwise Phyllis"

in this country, Dr. George F. Kunz, and is an extraordinary detailed description of the sentiments and the folklore, the many superstitions and legends which in times past have been attached to precious stones. The object of the book is to track to their source this multitude of curious ideas and fancies which have gathered about stones and gems at different times and among different peoples, and although many of these ideas seem bizarre and quite unfounded, Dr. Kunz is usually able to find their roots either in some intrinsic quality of the stones or else in an instinctive appreciation of their symbolical significance.

For his chapter on talismans and amulets, the author has not only delved deeply into mediaeval history from which he has brought forth all manner of quaint prints and curious quotations, but he has searched well the lore of the Orient to discover how the diamond and the amethyst, how beryl and lapis-lazuli and the long list of precious stones stood in the favor of the folk of, say, 2000 B. C. The discussion of crystal balls and crystal gazing, always a fascinating subject, is made doubly interesting by an inquiry on the part of the author into the laws which govern this curious phenomenon of seeing "spirit" pictures in clear quartz, and directions are given the amateur who would dabble in the occult. The chapter on the more extended use of precious stones in connection with religious worship, existing even at the present day in the ecclesiastical jewelry and its supposed symbolism, is based upon a careful study of the data offered on this subject in Biblical writings, as well as in the Talmud and the Koran. Lucky stones, birth stones, ominous and luminous stones, as well as the planetary and astral influences ascribed to different stones, are catalogued together with a most extraordinary number of fanciful and often beautiful stories gathered from centuries of folklore. Some of these long buried items which

Alexander Agassiz
Author of "Letters and Recollections."

Dr. Kunz has unearthed are not without humor; such as, for instance, a fifteenth century treatise on gems as amulets which recast the original Latin text, "If you find Andromeda on a stone with hair flowing over her shoulders, this stone will bring peace and concord to man and wife," to "if you find a dromedary engraved on a stone with hair flowing over his shoulders," etc. The excellent illustrations as well as the vast amount of well-ordered material presented in this volume represent the study of twenty-five years and the collection of the most comprehensive private library in the world on this subject.

THE OLD COLLEGES OF OXFORD: THEIR ARCHITECTURAL HISTORY ILLUSTRATED AND DESCRIBED

By Aymer Vallance. Illustrated. Charles Scribner's Sons.

Mr. Vallance has written probably the most exhaustive work upon the architecture of the Oxford colleges that has ever been produced. But, even so, his splendid quarto volume, a quarto as large as many a folio, with its hundreds of beautiful illustrations, does scarcely more than scratch the surface of a mine of treasure unique in the world. He tells of the history and the beauties of the various colleges and describes the vandalism of modern restorers and improvers, who have played sad havoc with the ancient treasures. Oxford is so rich in every kind of architect's and craftsman's work of the Middle Ages that a single generation can only scar its beauties, but the process, as Mr. Vallance describes it, is a sad one. "The short-sightedness and unwisdom of architectural innovation," he says, "until some consensus of taste shall have been arrived at cannot be too emphatically condemned."

The worst desecrations that have been committed upon these buildings, according to Mr. Vallance, were not during the despised and Philistine nineteenth century, but in our own twentieth century of enlightenment and self-satisfaction—even during the last ten years. He quotes approvingly the words of T. G. Jackson, the famous English architect, who was recently knighted, that "the record of buildings at Oxford since the end of the sixteenth century is one of continuous disaster."

ROMANESQUE AND BYZANTINE ARCHITECTURE

By Thomas Graham Jackson. University of Chicago Press. 1913.

In two elaborate and carefully planned volumes, Mr. Thomas Jackson puts forth the results of his long and intensive study of the development of post-Roman architecture, up to the Gothic period. The two chapters in that history, the Byzantine and Romanesque, are confused and complicated by the mass of detail, by the innumerable currents and cross-currents which influenced the art between the decline of classicism in the third and fourth centuries down to the dawn of the Gothic era. Mr. Jackson has painstakingly traced this development with sympathy and with a great deal of common sense, presenting a chronicle which is direct and lucid without being cut and dried. The latter defect is avoided by Mr. Jackson's intimacy with his material; his knowledge of the innumerable concrete examples of Byzantine and Romanesque architecture which he uses is first hand, and represents a good many years of close study. The prefatory chapters, showing the last stages of that Roman style from which all European architecture, according to Mr. Jackson, has arisen, and the gradual transition to the Byzantine under the influence of the Greek element, are especially thoughtful. There is an excellent grasp of the historical background, and in the instance of every change the environmental influence which brought about the modification is sought out. Thus it is no mere textbook which Mr. Jackson offers, but the interpretation of a cultural development along one specific line, but not considered apart from surrounding conditions. Mr. Jackson's discussion of that much-discussed stage of the later Romanesque, slipping into Gothic, is characterized by singular sanity and acumen.

The illustrations, by means of photograph, sketch, and colored plate, are abundant and bear the evidence of a careful selection among representative examples of every stage of Byzantine and Romanesque architecture.

STAFFORDSHIRE POTTERY AND ITS HISTORY

By Josiah C. Wedgwood. Illustrated. McBride, Nast & Co. $3.25.

The great-great-grandson of Josiah Wedgwood, the "prince of potters," tells in this volume the real story of the exquisite pottery and its making, and of the establishment of the industry that have brought lasting fame to North Staffordshire. He deals in detail with the early history of the pottery business in that region, going back to the very earliest references to it in the fourteenth and fifteenth centories. The Wedgwood family was interested in potting as early as the middle of the seventeenth century, when Thomas Wedgwood, great-grandfather of Josiah Wedgwood, was the legatee of "all my pottinge boards" of one of his relatives.

Mr Wedgwood tells in an interesting style, full of much colorful incident extracted from old papers of varied sorts, the story of the creation of the potteries—how potting passed through the stage of being a peasant industry, the work of the salt-glaze potters, and then passes on to the beginning of the factory epoch. Of Josiah Wedgwood he says that "he was first a skillful potter, secondly a pushing man of business, and only thirdly, perhaps, a great artist." His work and influence and the developments of the last century are treated with much care and with much sympathetic feeling in the telling of the story.

While the book will be invaluable to collectors and pottery students, it will be interesting also to students of history and sociology, since the author traces carefully the cause of the localization of the industry, its gradual change from a home to a factory business, the rise of capitalism within its narrow limits, the increase of machinery, and the consequent revolt of the workers. The identification and the linking together of the relationships of the old master potters, of their inventions, and factory sites and dates will be helpful and interesting to collectors and students.

PHILOSOPHY AND RELIGION

CARDINAL MANNING AND OTHER ESSAYS

By J. E. C. Bodley. Longmans, Green & Co.

Probably few now living are so well equipped to write of the great Catholic prelate as Mr. Bodley, a Protestant, who gives in this sketch a singularly vivid and intimate picture of the Cardinal. With a widely varied background of human and literary interests and with literary skill Mr. Bodley is well endowed in the first place. For, beginning his career as a barrister of the Inner Temple, he came into association, as Secretary, with several royal and Government commissions on practical matters, and he has become an authority upon modern French history. But his friendship, amounting to intimacy, with Cardinal Manning ought to make him pre-eminently the prelate's biographer. For the two were accustomed to pass evening after evening together, discussing Oxford and London and society and labor disputes, and exchanging reminiscences of old days. Steeped in these memories, Mr. Bodley has evoked a wonderfully graphic and illuminating picture. But, more important than the picture of the man himself, he makes the reader see in the Cardinal of Westminster a great and intricate symbol, first of his own past, and then of his religion in its present day relations toward the world. It is a brilliant piece of biographical writing, although it is a bit disappointing in one particular: In the comparison which the author draws between Cardinal Manning and Cardinal Newman his keen sympathy and intimate friendship with Manning have made him fail to appreciate the very different temperament of Cardinal Newman. The result is that he makes Newman appear as a sort of black background to the portrait that he limns upon it with loving and persuasive fidelity. Two essays upon French affairs are bound in with the sketch of Cardinal Manning.

THE BELIEF IN IMMORTALITY

By J. G. Frazer. Vol. I. Australia and Melanesia. New York: The Macmillan Company.

Dr. Frazer has set for himself the interesting though arduous task of showing the attitudes of all the races of the world with respect to belief in immortality, and in the first volume of his work directs our attention to the views of the more primitive races of Australasia and Melanesia, who are said to be the most primitive of all men now known, with the possible exception of the Veddahs of Ceylon. The author finds these untutored savage folk sharing with practically all the races of mankind a confident belief that there is life after death. Their doctrine of immortality is that the souls of men are reborn in their descendants, and await their rebirths in certain fixed places which are regarded as taboo. There are various phases of this doctrine, but there is the one basis for them all—confidence that the end of man does not come with his death.

In some very impressive introductory chapters Dr. Frazer comments on the prevailing adherence to a belief in immortality which has been manifested by all the peoples of the world whose histories are known to us. He does not agree with the theologians who find in the universality of the belief in the immortality of the soul proof of its validity. He holds it is quite as reasonable to regard this universal belief as a universal delusion, based on the natural inability of the human mind to concede or imagine its own non-existence. Entertaining this view, Dr. Frazer warns us that the work on which he is now engaged has no bearing whatever on dogmatic theology, but is intended simply to furnish material, derived from men's experience, that shall show what sort of worlds have been pictured in human minds as the abodes of those who die out of this world.

Dr. Frazer's own view with respect to the immortality of the soul is that of a scientific skeptic. The savage, he remarks, explains natural processes by the hypothesis of spirits or gods; the scientist's explanation is by means of a hypothesis of forces and atoms.

FRENCH PROPHETS OF YESTERDAY

A Study of Religious Thought Under the Second Empire. By Albert Leon Guerard. D. Appleton & Co.

The problem of religion in France is dealt with very frankly by the author of "French Prophets of Yesterday," who is Assistant Professor of French in Stanford University. The main question is the problem whether or not France is lost to Christianity he does not try to answer. He knows that France at present is anti-clerical, and that the tendency is away from Christianity. But he points out that in the time of the Second Empire the same religious problems were under consideration that confront France now, and the conflict over them was far more intense than that of to-day. But other faiths were urged upon the people instead of the established religion by men who were quite as sober-minded and spiritual as the best of the churchmen. Prof. Guerard insists upon the high spiritual aspirations of that epoch and warns his readers against being deceived by the surface appearances and the catchwords of the time.

So, he predicts, it will be in the years that are just ahead. The French people will not cease to be a religious people. They may fall away from Catholicism, and even from Christianity, but they will not undertake to get along without a religion. To-day the conditions, as between the supernaturalists and the naturalists, are substantially the same as they were at the end of the Second Empire, and he thinks that France will again listen, read, and think seriously, weighing with care and honesty the arguments between the two, all the time seeking the truth. He holds that whenever lives are transformed and upheld by the thought of eternal things sectarian names and formal creeds matter very little.

DEVELOPMENT AND PURPOSE

By L. T. Hobhouse. The Macmillan Company.

In the first portion of this book Prof. Hobhouse attempts to show that the mind, instead of being a mere useless adjunct, a sort of by-product, actually plays a very important part in the course of evolution. According to the strictly biological argument mind has evolved along with matter, simply accompanying it, and when matter disintegrates and disappears mind must go with it. But the facts, declares Prof. Hobhouse, can be otherwise interpreted. Mind, instead of merely accompanying matter on its upward progress, may perhaps help to create that progress. Indeed, if this were not the case there seems no reason at all for the upward striving energies of matter. To bring evolution about some urging factor must be in operation. Consciousness probably begins its shaping influence, the author believes, far down in the lowest forms of life and the greater mind gains greater and greater power and control in the upward development and course of evolution.

The second part of the book is devoted to a philosophical study of the meaning of this upward striving of the mind and to considering the conditions of development and inquiring whether or not, in view of the facts, teleology is justifiable. After an exhaustive analysis of the evidence Prof. Hobhouse concludes that the main objection to the theory of teleology, the theory that there is a purpose in all this upward striving, is not sustained. But he does not, however, fly to the opposite extreme and contend that a conscious force, from without, has caused this growth. The power, he thinks, is from within. He concludes that if the mind does not directly become aware of its relation to a greater Spirit, it does have to recognize the existence of the conditions appropriate for the operation of such a Spirit.

VITAL LIES

By Vernon Lee. Two volumes. John Lane Company.

These two earnest and eloquent volumes are put forth by Vernon Lee, English essayist, novelist, and general littérateur, for the purpose of showing that Pragmatism, as stated by William James and F. C. Schiller, is the Father of Lies. What she wants to do is to show up the preaching of all those who say that it is sometimes good for mankind to be deceived as intellectual fraud.

The net result of her investigation of William James's philosophy is her conclusion that according to him we should believe what we want to believe; if we find an idea pleasant, comforting, effective, we should call it true. To defend her position she makes many fragmentary quotations which seem to lend color to her charges, but which the student of James will be very likely to say misrepresent his argument, because they are taken out of their context. Her argument centres around him, and, therefore, her method arouses doubt in the reader's mind from the start. Her attack on Father Tyrrell's "Modernism," in like manner, will be convincing to those who are not familiar with his work. What she says of Ernest Crawley, the anthropologist, is similarly persuasive, but makes one doubt that she has grasped his meaning. Her treatment of M. Georges Sorel, the theorist of syndicalism, is perhaps the best in the book.

The book affords that stimulus to question and thought that always dwells in the eloquent statement of profound personal conviction. It is valuable also because it is always well to have theories attacked, and even maltreated, since only in that way can the truth be come at. But Vernon Lee seems to have been caught in the very coil which she contends has wound itself about William James. She believes as she does because she wishes to believe that way.

THE NEW PHILOSOPHY OF HENRI BERGSON

By Edouard Le Roy. Translated from the French by Vincent Benson. Henry Holt & Co. $1.25.

Of late many books have appeared concerning Bergson and his philosophy, but of them all this one may be singled out as being particularly sane and accurate. The author, it must be remembered, is not only a convinced but an enthusiastic "Bergsonian," and his "exposition" becomes at times a eulogy. Nevertheless, he has stated with admirable clearness the outlines of the system of the famous Frenchman who has made philosophy fashionable.

Amplifying these outlines somewhat, M. Le Roy gives a number of pages of "Additional Explanations," which treat in more extended form the ideas of "Immediacy," the "Theory of Perception," the "Problem of Consciousness," the "Problem of Evolution," the "Problem of Knowledge," and other subjects.

The author illustrates quite fully and clearly Bergson's method of teaching, and, on the whole, gives an exceedingly good bird's-eye view of the whole of Bergson's system of philosophy. Those who have not time to read his works in detail can get from this small volume a general idea, quite accurate, of his teachings.

OUR ETERNITY

By Maurice Maeterlinck. Translated by Alexander Teixeira de Mattos. Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.50.

A book profound and beautiful is M. Maeterlinck's discussion of theories as to survival after death. It lacks, however, definite conclusions even as to the author's own belief, and leaves the whole subject much where it was before, so far as reasoned grounds of conviction are concerned.

Maeterlinck presents only the familiar theories—reincarnation, spiritualism, annihilation, conscious or unconscious survival—every thinking person has pondered them all. But it is valuable to have these theories restated in Maeterlinck's magical language, with his wonderful play of argument and the illumination it throws upon all such queats. But one wishes that the elimination of untenable theories had been more decisive, and it would have been more satisfactory to have had a more concrete expression of Maeterlinck's own opinion.

Two chapters of the book discuss theosophy and reincarnation in all its history, with the acknowledgment that reincarnation is the most plausible and least repellant of all theories of survival. Much space is devoted to an examination and discussion of the experiments of the savant De Rochas in carrying a hypnotized subject back through what purport to be successive lives. Searchingly the author invades the spiritualistic realm and goes at length into the investigations of the Society for Psychical Research. Finally he returns to what he considers the two most tenable theories of survival—that where the ego persists with a modified consciousness, some link relating it to its new state so that it has a sense, however vague, that it persists in its own identity, and that of the ego losing its own conscious life in the cosmic consciousness. The latter is what Maeterlinck seems to regard as the only adequate infinity.

FOUR STAGES OF GREEK RELIGION

By Gilbert Murray, (Regius Professor of Greek at Oxford.) New York: Columbia University Press.

Prof. Murray's treatise on the religion of the Greeks responds to the needs of both student and general reader. It is a scholarly and exhaustive work, but it is easy to read and understand. Many persons who have been accustomed to think of the Greeks as having only one religion and only one set of gods, with Zeus at their head, will be quite astonished when they read there were four distinct stages of Greek religion and four distinct lots of gods.

Prof. Murray presents his facts and comments in four essays. In the first essay, entitled "Saturnia Regna," he deals with the primitive Eusthcia or Age of Ignorance. In that period the Olympians lived in the North, far away from the land of their worshippers. The religion of the time was one of fear, and in its ceremonies much use was made of magic and animal worship, said to have been survivals of another race than that which inhabited classical Greece.

Prof. Murray's second essay, entitled "The Olympian Conquest," covers the period when the gods of Greece were simply the mountain gods of the old invading Northmen. The author describes them as royal buccaneers, who fought and feasted, drank deep and roared with laughter, behaving altogether like the lordly freebooters from the Far North. But rough and coarse and obviously undivine as they were, they showed an improvement over the gods of the earlier period. In the next essay, entitled "The Failure of Nerve," the author depicts an age of pessimism, asceticism, and mysticism, in which Fortune and Fate took the place of the old personal gods.

John Muir
Author of "The Yosemite"

Then comes the final chapter, headed "The Last Protest," relating to conditions in the fourth century of the Christian era, when, under Emperor Julian, the old religions made their final stand against the conquering faith of the Christians. Appended to the fourth essay is a translation of the creed found in the work of Sallustius, entitled "On the Gods and the World."

THE PROBLEM OF CHRISTIANITY

Lectures delivered at the Lowell Institute in Boston and at Manchester College, Oxford. By Josiah Royce. Two volumes. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

The first of these two volumes of lectures by the Professor of the History of Philosophy at Harvard bears the sub-title, "The Christian Doctrine of Life," and the second, "The Real World and the Christian Ideas." The author's conceptions of "the problem of Christianity," as he carefully states it, is as follows:

When we consider what are the most essential features of Christianity, is the acceptance of a creed that embodies these features consistent with the lessons that, so far as we can learn, the growth of human wisdom and the course of the ages have taught man regarding religious truth?

Attempting to throw light upon this question, he analyzes and interprets three characteristic Christian ideas: Salvation, original sin, and atonement. He attempts to determine the sense in which the religious community and its spirit are realities, and definitely formulates his conclusions as to man's power to interpret the meaning of the universal constitution.

As a whole, the book becomes a social philosophy the sum of whose teaching is that traditional Christology must be simplified, the community exalted and loyalty made the means to new spiritual riches. Prof. Royce does not eliminate Christ, but translates His personality into terms of modern life. His own belief is that Christ presents "a creed at once human, divine, and practical, religious and universal." Natural science, he thinks, can never replace religion as the supreme interpreter, but the religious ideal must be realized by methods analogous to those now employed in the natural sciences.

FRANCE TO-DAY: ITS RELIGIOUS ORIENTATION

By Paul Sabatier. Translated by Henry Bryan Binns. E. P. Dutton & Co. $2.

In his survey of present day religion in France and its outlook M. Sabatier takes a very hopeful view of things spiritual in his native land. He admits on the one hand a growing indifference to religion and religious ideas, engendered by the spread of science and materialism. But along with this he feels sure that there is an increase of general interest in spiritual matters and that the crude materialistic beliefs of the last generation are passing away, to be replaced by others which penetrate deeper into the significance of life. Underlying all this is a revivification of the feeling of dependence upon a higher power.

This new religious feeling, M. Sabatier thinks, harmonizes well with recent philosophy, and particularly with the teachings of such men as Boutroux, Bergson, James, Payot, and others. The present religious attitude of his country he shows to be essentially national and French. The free-thought that is current there he does not believe to be really anti-religious. The picture he reveals of the inner life of the average Frenchman is full of emotion, sentiment, and religious feeling. And the author believes that this condition will be fostered and will grow until it finds expression in a true religion which will embrace the truest and loftiest features of all religions.

WINDS OF DOCTRINE: STUDIES IN CONTEMPORARY OPINION

By G. Santayana, late Professor of Philosophy in Harvard University. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

In his "Studies in Contemporary Opinion" Prof. Santayana remarks that the present age is a critical one and interesting to live in," and it has been suggested that the author's book might be described in similar terms, inasmuch as it is critical in every page and, all in all, extraordinarily interesting.

The book is so critical that it does not leave much, to anybody who accepts the criticism, of the opinions it overhauls. Of his own beliefs the author does not undertake to make a shewing; his effort seems to be to show his disbeliefs—his disbeliefs in the opinions of M. Henri Bergson, William James, and others. In speaking of these writers he remarks that "a philosopher in our day, conscious both of the old life and of the new, might repeat what Goetha said of his successive love affairs—that it is sweet to see the moon rise while the sun is still shining." It might perhaps be contended that one putting forth this pessimistic view should offer something in place of the opinions he casts aside as worthless; but Prof. Santayana makes no such offering. Very likely, if challenged to say why he propounds no philosophy of his own, he would frankly confess he had not been able to construct one that gave him more satisfaction than he had found in the speculations of his contemporaries—Bergson, for example.

Dr. Sven Hedin
Author of "Trans-Himalaya"

Prof. Santayana is rather impatient with what he regards as the central idea of the Frenchman's philosophy. "This transporting one's self into the heart of a subject," he says, "is a loose metaphor; the best one can do is to transplant the subject into one's heart and draw from one's self impulses as profound as possible with which to vivify tradition and make it over in one's own image."

THE MYSTIC WAY

By Evelyn Underhill. E. P. Dutton & Co.

In her previous work Miss Underhill rendered considerable service to the world's knowledge of myaticism, especially in that one of her books in which she showed the weakness and folly of many of the pseudo-mystical cults of our own time that are founded on a misunderstanding of Oriental philosophies, and clearly proved also that that attitude of the soul indicated, somewhat vaguely, perhaps, by the term "mysticism" has continued through all the centuries, down to our own present, to be a vital element in human nature. In this new book she endeavors to trace out from its early appearance within Christianity the type of life that is called "mystical," to estimate the character and origin of the Christian mystic, and to discover and define the qualities that differentiate him from those other mystics that have been evolved by other systems of spiritual development.

The author has read extensively and brings to her subject an interest and a zeal that ought to make what she writes vivid even to the most prosaic reader. She studies the adventures of the human soul unhampered by tradition, and her book contains much that is of interest and value.

THE RELIGIOUS REVOLUTION OF TO-DAY

By James T. Shotwell, Ph. D. Houghton Mifflin Company. $1.10.

The William Brewster Clark Memorial Lectures have been instituted at Amherst College by Fanny H. Clark and W. Evans Clark, and this series of four addresses by Dr. Shotwell, who is Professor of History at Columbia University, is the initial course, delivered during the present year. The aim of the foundation is to assist "Amherst College in throwing light in a genuinely scientific spirit upon the relation of the research, discovery, and thought of the day to individual attitude and social policy."

In the first address, entitled, "Contrasts," Dr. Shotwell discusses his basic problem, which is not to prove, he says, the existence of a religious revolution, since that is admitted by all who give the situation any thought, but "to measure its importance and to see its setting in the history of the world." Unlike the discussions of religion in previous times, this "is not a problem in theology, but in the social sciences." He compares the present day enlargement of intellectual horizons with the Renaissance, and says that these horizons, in comparison with the outlook of the sixteenth century humanist, have become almost infinite. And therefore this modern renaissance ought to supply us with "a new interpretation of ourselves."

The second lecture, on "Devolution or Evolution?" sets forth the thesis that back of the religious revolution "lies the tremendous process of social evolution, of emancipation from superstition, and the awakening of reason." The remaining addresses consider the significance of the vast contradictions and parallels between the new and the old attitudes of man toward the elements of religion.

DANTE AND AQUINAS

By Philip H. Wicksteed. E. P. Dutton & Co.

The two master minds of the Middle Ages, Dante and Aquinas, have never yet been so studied as to place them definitively in their correct relation, notwithstanding the fact that there has been no lack of commentators upon the indebtedness of Dante to the "Divine Thomas" of the Scholastics. In his Jowett lectures of 1911, now printed under the title of "Dante and Aquinas." Mr. Wicksteed makes a valuable contribution to the question without, however, exhausting its possibilities or presenting complete materials for a judicial decision. His volume performs the very necessary service of clearing away the brushwood of misapprehension of mediaeval philosophy and making a clearer view of the Florentine poet's mind, as it was influenced, whether consciously or unconsciously, by the "dumb ox" of the Dominicans. He compares the attitude of these two great minds upon such subjects as the questions of Hell, Purgatory, and Paradise, and shows how far the poet was indebted to the philosopher for his conception of these scenes and of the emotions of the characters whom he placed therein.

While Mr. Wicksteed is more intent on showing the philosopher in Dante than the vast poetic resources in Aquinas, there is much in the purely literary phases of the volume to interest the special student of the Florentine poet, and, indeed, of the mediaeval poets of all lands. A certain timeliness is given to the appearance of the book, since it is coincident with a very wide renewal of interest in the thought of the schoolmen.

POLITICS, ECONOMICS, SOCIOLOGY

ECONOMIC INTERPRETATION OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES

By Charles A. Beard. Macmillan Company. $2.25.

The orthodox, reverential view of the Constitution suffers another blow in this volume by Mr. Beard, who is Associate Professor of Politics in Columbia University. He has gone to the records of 1783-1787, both personal and political, and supports his novel view with original documents hitherto either not known at all or not considered of consequence. The conclusion to which he comes is that the fathers of the Constitution were more inspired by the desire to remedy the prejudice which property had suffered under the Articles of Confederation than they were to safeguard liberty, equality, and fraternity. Manufactures, trade, shipping, and finance had suffered under rule by those Articles, and these four groups combined to take care of their own interests.

According to Prof. Beard's view, the Constitution is essentially an economic document based upon the concept that the fundamental private rights of property are anterior to Government, and morally beyond the reach of majorities. It was not inspired or adopted by the whole people. Its draughtsmen recognized the claim of property to a special position of favor, and the leaders who supported it in the ratifying conventions represented the same economic groups, and in many cases had the same personal interests. Not more than one-sixth of the electorate had an opportunity to express themselves upon the form of Government which we have lived under and revered for more than a century.

Not less iconoclastic is the view Prof. Beard takes of the Constitution makers personally. He gives the record of their dabblings in all the speculations of their time. But he does not endeavor to paint the matter in dark colors. Rather, he explains and exculpates. And a close reading of his book brings one to the conclusion that social morality is sounder now than it was in those days.

EUROPEAN CITIES AT WORK

By Frederic C. Howe, Ph. D. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.35.

Mr. Howe's career has peculiarly fitted him to make the investigations of which he writes in this book. As lawyer, publicist, lecturer in the University of Wisconsin and other colleges, partaker in the government of Cleveland, formerly his home city, and of Ohio, he has been for years deeply interested in the problems of our own municipal government, and previously studied at first hand the workings of British cities. This present volume is largely devoted to the German municipalities, and his authoritative account of these cities at work—what they do, how they do it, what it costs, and what are the results—is of prime importance to Americans just now, when the whole country is laboring under such profound conviction of sin as to the misgovernment of our own urban communities.

Dusseldorf, in Mr. Howe's opinion, represents the high-water mark of "municipal socialism," although it is not controlled by Socialists, as the term might imply, but by hardheaded business men who run their city as they do their various businesses, making it produce its greatest efficiency, both in the present and for the future. The book presents detailed studies of all that the municipality does in Dusseldorf, Frankfort, Berlin, Dresden, and Munich. Among the activities which the author treats at length are the housing problem, the protection of the worker, town planning, the budget, sources of revenue, and the manner of administration. The author brings out also the multifarious activities which link the German city to the lives of the people. And he discusses quite freely the cost of it all, and whether or not it pays—pays the individual as well as the city. There is interesting consideration given also to the position within the State that the German city has taken, and finally there is a comparison between European and American municipalities.

WAR AND WASTE

By David Starr Jordan. Doubleday, Page & Co.

The voice of the President of Leland Stanford University, who is soon to pass over the active management of that institution to other shoulders, has always been among the strongest in this country against the useless horrors of war and in favor of peace. In this volume he continues to preach cogently and eloquently upon his favorite topic. The book is composed of a series of addresses, essays, and editorials, all opposed to war, war scares, and war accessories in general. The initial address, which was delivered at Harvard Union in 1911, gives its title to the book. It makes an eloquent presentation of the price which any nation pays for war in money, in men, in the value to the State and to civilization in general of the courage, the ability, the strength, the talent, the possible genius of those men. It is shown how the deferred war debt has become the overshadowing danger of national life, with, apparently, no end to its operations, and it is made clear that the interest money exacted and the millions yearly spent on armament by European nations will mean, unless the process is somehow checked, the collapse of European industry.

Another paper in the volume sets forth the proposition that if we in America would reduce our military expenses to our actual needs it would help greatly in enabling debt-cursed Europe to settle the war problem for all time. Dr. Jordan thinks that a robust public opinion demanding that nations devote their energy and their wealth to things more important than war scares and preparations must be developed if we are to kill "the perennial bogy of war." "At the last," he says, "the world is ruled by what its people think," and he makes it a personal question with each of his readers as to whether he or she will work for war or peace, for militarism or democracy. "As the spirit of manhood rises," he declares, "the war spirit must fall."

THE JEWS OF TO-DAY

By Arthur Ruppin. Translated by Mergery Bentwich. With an introduction by Joseph Jacobs. Henry Holt & Co.

Dr. Ruppin's book is a clear exposition of a single problem, which, in a way, covers most of the topics of interest about the Jews. His thesis is that, whereas the Jews have always had a whole furniture of their own, differing from that of other peoples in religious ideals, language, costume, manners, and all the characteristics which make a separate nation, all this seems now to be disappearing. Jews are beginning to discard their own language and their distinctive dress and customs, to be educated in the same way and along the same lines as the young people of the countries in which they live, and to intermarry with outsiders. Even in religious matters, we are told, skepticism and agnosticism are spreading rapidly among a people hitherto regarded as the type of steadfast fidelity to their ancestral faith. The author devotes a whole chapter to the declining birth rate, which, in some regions, is no longer able to make good the losses from these causes.

Dr. Ruppin contends that the separatist tendencies of the Jews have given them a racial and cultural value worth keeping at any cost. The remedy he proposes for the threatened danger of complete assimilation and disappearance of the special Jewish characteristics is the Zionistic ideal of a Jewish political State in Palestine. He thinks that the existence of such a State, though it would contain no more than a fraction of all the Jews in the world, would tend to repress the disruptive forces by creating a new Jewish culture. In the course of his treatment of this problem the author deals with almost all the questions relating to the status and condition of the modern Jew. He gives the facts about their numbers, their wealth and property, their recent dispersion from Eastern Europe, their congestion in the large cities of the world, the numbers who have been baptized or have intermarried, in short, all the data necessary for a work of reference.

SOCIALISM AND DEMOCRACY IN EUROPE

By Samuel P. Orth. New York: Henry Holt & Co. 1913.

The theme of this important work from the pen of a writer well qualified to deal with the intricacies of Socialism is not what Socialism proposes, but what it has accomplished, and by what various methods. By this retrospect over the lands in which Socialism has been accomplishing something, the author hopes to find a look forward into the affairs of our own land in their relation to Socialism. Dr. Orth discusses the differences, which in his opinion are microscopic, between Socialists and radicals in France, between Socialists and laborites in England; everywhere he finds the Socialist division to be the labor party and the radical party. But the inference is not that the cult is of the lower classes. In the countries which are considered—in England, France, Germany, Belgium, and Austria—there is noted a distinct change in the make-up of the Socialist following. No longer is it of the lower stratum, but is made up of lawyers, physicians, journalists, professors, even the very rich. With the entrance of a higher type of intelligence the old hope of the abolition of the wage system and collective ownership of the means of production, together with the disappearance of economic extremes has died a lingering death. According to Dr. Orth, the new Socialist has ceased to place extreme emphasis on the form of the State; his chief concern now is with the function of the State, and to that end he interests himself no longer in financial and political but in humanitarian measures; in such questions as the death rate of babies, the cost of living, the causes and remedies of underpayment and unemployment. These are the topics which the Socialist parties abroad are forcing on their legislative bodies, and with fair success.

This comparative study of the progress of Socialism in lands other than our own, tracing the development of its fundamentals and bringing its theory, as shown in its practice, to date, has been pronounced one of the most illuminating and far-sighted interpretations of the Socialist doctrine as it stands to-day, and as it should stand to-morrow, if it is to succeed.

SYNDICALISM, INDUSTRIALISM, UNIONISM, AND SOCIALISM

By John Spargo. New York: B. W. Huebsch. 1913.

This book is intended for the Socialist. It has already been read by many and has made numerous splits in the camp. In it, Mr. Spargo, who is one of the best-known among the leaders of Socialism in this country, clearly and insistently attacks prominent issues, denouncing as evils certain of the tendencies among the more radical followers of the red flag. The three phases of Socialism, syndicalism, industrialism and unionism, are boldly dissected, and the recent methods used in connection with each fearlessly discussed.

Although once in favor of sabotage himself, Mr. Spargo has come at length violently to denounce its adoption. Sabotage, in Mr. Spargo's opinion, threatens the interests of labor as much, if not more, than it does those of capital. Like syndicalism, it is the symptom of weakness and despair or the evidence of immaturity. Sabotage divides the house of labor against itself, according to the psychological law that a policy adopted in any struggle against a common foe inevitably appears in the internal conflict of the movement. In the progress of this idea of sabotage, denounced in 1912 by the forces of Socialism and unionism, Mr. Spargo has perceived the danger which is that of a weapon that can be turned in upon the body of labor itself at any time. This bitter denunciation of a policy which has already divided the Socialist camp, has lost Mr. Spargo many followers, but his conclusions have been based upon a practical experience and a close watching of the workings of Socialism, not only in America, but in France, Belgium and England, where the extended practice of sabotage had its origin, and the more far-seeing have recognized the value of his conclusions.

With equal determination and vigor, Mr. Spargo attacks syndicalism, which, in his opinion, bears the marks of the last resort, the final hope. Syndicalism has become the weapon, not of the "class conscious proletariat," but of the "slum proletariat," and its place in a modern and intelligent civilization is at the very bottom of the efficiency scale. The relation of industrialism and unionism to Socialism is searchingly discussed in Mr. Spargo's succeeding chapters, and the book gives an excellent cross-section view of the temper of Socialism in its present stage of development.

THE JEWS AND MODERN CAPITALISM

By Werner Sombart. Translated by M. Epstein. E. P. Dutton & Co.

While preparing a new edition of his book on capitalism Prof. Sombart came upon evidence which convinced him that competition and credit and the commercialization of industry which characterize the capitalistic régime are due mainly to the Jews. This interested him so much that he at once plunged into study of the matter and he has written this large book to prove the double thesis of the Jewish foundation of capitalism and the capitalistic foundation of Judaism. He traces the connection which he asserts to exist between Jews and modern capitalism from the transferring of the hegemony of the world's commerce from the Italians and Spaniards in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries to northern Europe, where the Jews had established themselves. By their introduction of the methods of underselling and competition and by their participation in the banks and exchange of Holland and England they brought about the modern economic system of credit and competitive prices.

Prof. Sombart's contention and the ingenious way in which he has worked it out have attracted much attention in Europe and in this country. He has brought together an impressive mass of details all of which confirm his thesis. But he has omitted to mention the facts that militate against it. The result is that he rides his hobby to death, but his book is a very real contribution to the hitherto neglected economic history of the Jewish people. It is misleading in the argument which the author endeavors to make from his facts, because he has failed to take account of other facts, just as important, which did not carry out his theory.

TRAVEL AND EXPLORATION

THE SOUTH POLE

By Roald Engelbregt Gravning Amondsen. Translated by A. G. Chater. Illustrated. Two volumes. New York: Lee Keedick, 150 Nassau Street. $10

Capt. Amundsen tells in a simple, manly, straightforward style the account of his peaceful conquest of the south pole. His modest narrative, so modest, indeed, that one frequently has to take pains to remember just what was his place in the expedition, contains, in addition to its brilliant story of adventure, a wonderful mass of information which scientists are welcoming eagerly. The observations of his party upon climatic, geologic, and biologic conditions in the antarctic are important contributions to the advance of science.

The reading of these volumes shows why Capt. Amundsen made his conquest of the south pole with such apparent ease, for they make manifest the careful calculation, forethought, and good management that went into his preparation for the journey. There was no guesswork in it. He profited to the full by the mistakes and the successes of all those who had preceded him, and he utilized the last scrap of his own knowledge of similar conditions. As far as human foresight could, he provided beforehand for every contingency. Stating facts with fullness, never magnifying difficulties, the two volumes make an exhaustive and accurate account of a really great feat. In a year that has brought out so many remarkable and important books of exploration this work stands easily among the first.

TRANS-HIMALAYA

Discoveries and Adventures in Tibet. By Sved Hedin. With 104 illustrations and 4 maps. Volume III. Macmillan & Co.

The publication of this third volume of Dr. Sven Hedin's "Trans-Himalaya" marks the completion of the task he set himself when he invaded Tibet a few years ago as a geographical, geological, and ethnological explorer. Previous to that time the major part of Tibet had been an unknown land. This final volume fills up the gaps and gives a correct picture of the Tibetan highlands. The journey which the author describes in it began Sept. 11, 1907, at Singi-Kabab, at the source of the Indus. The elevation was more than 16,000 feet—"an Eiffel Tower on the summit of Mont Blanc," he calls it. Leaving there he followed the course of the Indus for two months, parting company with the river at Lung-Kung and proceeding to Ladak. By that time he had passed fifteen months in the interior of Tibet and had a greater variety and profundity of knowledge concerning it than any other man in the world. The Winter journey across the loftiest mountains of Chang-tang in a temperature of 40 degrees below zero, or worse, was a trying experience. When Dr. Hedin finally arrived at Seilpuk, after two years of exploration in which he had seen no European, he was ready enough to turn his face homeward. But the Seilpukians met him with hostility, and only the audacious attitude he assumed toward them saved him from execution. Part of his caravan had gone astray, and he left this village on his march to far-away Simla with only the equivalent of a shilling in his pocket. During his two years of exploration he crossed the Himalayas along seven independent lines, persisting in his work until he was able to bring away with him data for a complete map. He has proved that the Trans-Himalayan region is a "labyrinth of lofty ranges," making one connected system of mountains, the greatest in the world.

FAMILIAR SPANISH TRAVELS

By William Dean Howells. Harper & Brothers.

Mr. Howells's kindly humor and accurate observation served him in good stead in his journeyings through the cities and villages of Spain. He begins his entertaining volume with a chapter called "Autobiographical Approaches," in which he tells how, a boy of 10 or 12, he reveled in that "incomparable romance," "Don Quixote," and how, throughout the years, he read Spanish novels and dramas and longed to visit Spain.

He was 74 years old when at last he arrived in the land of which he so long had dreamed, but none of his boyish enthusiasm had evaporated. He visited San Sebastian, beautiful in its rocky harbor; Valladolid, of the varied charms; Toledo, rich in tradition, and—of course—Madrid. He traveled in a leisurely manner, following his own desire, and his enjoyment of the experience shows in every line.

And the reader shares this enjoyment. He gets nearly as much pleasure as the traveler himself. There is plenty of graphic description, description of the things which the guidebook-bound tourist fails to see, and bits of characterization that are delightful. Every day was a day of adventure, and Mr. Howells tells of the guides, merchants, and beggars whom he met, with a joyousness that is contagious. It must be admitted that he shows a rather surprising disability to understand Spanish Christianity, and this defect mars several pages. But he is not provincial; he seldom condemns what he does not understand, and his book is a delight to readers who have been to Spain and to those who look forward to a visit to that country.

ROYAL SPAIN OF TO-DAY

By TRYPHOSA BATES BATCHELLER

Author of "Italian Castles and Country Seats"

This is principally an account of a motor journey through Spain recently taken by Mr. and Mrs. Batcheller, who were accompanied by H. R. H. the Infanta Eulalia. Many special opportunities to meet distinguished people and to see places and things of unusual interest were afforded; the accounts of such visits have been supplemented by appropriate historic data, and an attempt has been made to present a general picture of the country as it is to-day. There is also an account of a short trip to Portugal, during which the author was received and entertained by King Manuel and Queen Amelie.

exploration of Tibet. Since his experiences in that country sixteen years ago he has sought and found exciting adventure in China, Persia, Afghanistan, and the African Continent. But his modest story of what he did and saw and dared during this trip into the wilds of Brazil proves it to have been his greatest achievement.

The journey was undertaken for the purpose of acquiring first-hand knowledge of that vast area of Brazil, in the immense central basin of the Xingu, Tapajoz, and Madeira Rivers, hitherto regarded as impenetrable, and also to study the native tribes of Indians, to investigate the resources of the territory and report upon its possibilities for commercial development. During this trip he was lost to the world for eighteen months, traveled a total distance of nearly fourteen thousand miles, which took him, after he left Brazil, into Peru, Bolivia, Chile, and Argentina, always by unfrequented ways; saw endless pictures of Nature at her wildest and sublimest—rivers, mountains, forests, plains—never before seen by white men, and encountered some of the strangest adventures that ever befell an explorer. His reports on the fertility of the soil, the mineral and rubber resources, and the fruit possibilities of the regions he traversed are of the highest importance, as is also his contribution to geographical knowledge. There are nearly 300 illustrations in half-tone from photographs taken by the author, and eight full-page plates in color.

TO MESOPOTAMIA AND KURDISTAN IN DISGUISE

By E. B. Soane. Illustrated. 8vo, Maynard & Co.

Mr. Soane's book is an account of a trip he made in 1908 from Constantinople by steamer to Beirut, thence by train northward to Aleppo, from there northeastward to the Tigris, and then south to Bagdad. Sometimes he traveled by desert cart, sometimes by caravan, sometimes by the riskiest of rafts, and again by boat. He was in disguise all of the time and was so poorly supplied with money that it was necessary for him to practice all the small economies that were possible. Most of the time he traveled as a Persian Mussulman. Sometimes he was returning from a pilgrimage to Mecca, and so became a Hajji and worthy of much regard. Not once during the entire trip was he known or believed to be an Englishman, or even a European. At one time he told his associates that he was English and they would not believe him, but insisted that he must be a Persian gentleman who had been to England.

From the ordinary standpoint, judging by Mr. Soane's account, the trip must have been of the most trying sort, compact of rainstorms, burning heat, insects, and a thousand other discomforts. But travelers' joys burned with so fierce a flame in his heart that he minded not the discomforts, and he had many an interesting experience, many a unique adventure. The book is filled with entertaining anecdotes gathered from experiences and adventures, stories that illuminate racial character and throw light upon manners and customs. They throw light, too, upon the trail of the Turk over vassal lands and upon the sort of regard in which he is held by those vassals. Whoever is interested in the fate of Turkey will find the volume of much value. Students of affairs in the Middle East will discover in it much fresh material, part of it concerned with modern events and some of it obtained from old histories to which he had access through the local friendships that he formed.

SCOTT'S LAST EXPEDITION

By Capt. Robert F. Scott. Edited by Leonard Huxley. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. 1913.

The first of these two volumes contains entire the journals of Capt. R. F. Scott, written on his last eventful Antarctic expedition. The story of that expedition, especially its last tragic chapters, has become well known to the world; in these two volumes the full and complete account is given in Capt. Scott's own words, an entry for nearly every day of that long time from November, 1910, to March, 1912. The final chapter of the volume, telling of those last struggles in the blizzard; of the gallant Oates, who, near the end, walked out into the blizzard "for a moment"; of the gradual oncoming of death; of the resolve to meet it in the natural way, putting aside the opium tabloids and the morphine—these brave fragments from a splendid record of a heroism not soon to be forgotten. There is given a fac simile of that last leaf from Scott's diary, showing the pencilling in a firm hand, and the final words flung out to a public which might never have seen them, "Last Writing: For God's sake, look after our people—" Scott's last letters to his friends and his message, "Look after our people!" Scott's body, are also given in full.

The second volume contains material not so well known, being the reports of the journeys and the scientific work undertaken by Dr. E. A. Wilson and the surviving members of the expedition. This includes the account of both the western and the northern journeys; the exploration of King Edward's Land, which the Scott party has put on the map; the journey over the Koettlitz, Ferrar and Taylor glaciers; the geological exploration to Granite Harbor, and the record of that last year at Cape Evans, during which the ascent of Mount Erebus was made and the search party was sent out for Scott and his companions. This volume contains the reports which sum up the expedition's contributions to the world of science. There is a résumé of the physiography and glacial geology of Victoria Land by Griffith Taylor; a condensation of the magnetic observations and some notes on ice physics by Charles S. Wright; a summary of the geological journeys by the assistant geologist, F. Debenham, presenting the nature of the fossils brought back by the expedition, together with a meteorological report by G. C. Simpson.

THE CONQUEST OF MOUNT McKINLEY

By Belmore Brown. With an appendix by Herschel C. Parker. Illustrated. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.50.

Mr. Brown writes a singularly satisfactory account of the experiences of an explorer, because it is so human. He tells not only the things he and his companions do and see, try for and achieve, or fail, but he tells also how they felt about it, how they were affected physically by this, that, or the other effort or experience, and what were their emotions. He does it so simply and sincerely that it carries conviction. A taint of suspicion always hangs about emotions described with an eye to rhetorical effect. But when he says "we were wet-eyed and chatted like children as we prepared our packs," the next morning after they had slept on the ground instead of ice or snow the first time in a month and the smell in the wind of grass and flowers greeted them, the little human glimpse of feeling is just what the reader wants.

The book contains the full account of the three expeditions for the scaling of Mount McKinley of which Mr. Brown was a member, the first in 1906, the second in 1910, and the last in 1912. On this final one he, Prof. Herschel C. Parker of Columbia University and a companion passed the 20,000-foot level and fought their way through a blizzard that made the day seem, in Mr. Brown's memory, "like an evil dream," to a point so near the summit that they could have reached it, in good weather, with a few minutes of easy walking. The account of their desperate struggle against the blizzard makes some thrilling pages.

Only less fascinating than the text are the illustrations, which show the same facility for seizing upon and presenting the interesting thing. A hundred of these, four of them in color, are from drawings and paintings by the author, and these are supplemented by a large number of photographs and by a number of maps.

NEW CHAPTERS IN THE BIBLE

Books of Sacred History Resembling Apocrypha That Have Recently Come to Light

By JOSEPH JACOBS.

THE Bible, as known to half of Christendom, is a larger book than that with which the Protestant churches are familiar. Besides the Old and the New Testament there are a series of Apocrypha, "hidden" or esoteric books, which in the Greek or Roman churches are regarded every whit as inspired and divine as the books more familiar in the West. The Council of Trent, which fixed the creed for Roman Catholicism, declared any one as anathema who did not receive these books as sacred or canonical. Even the Church of England recommends them to be read "for example of life and instruction of manners." King James's version and nearly all Bibles authorized by the Church of England up to the beginning of the nineteenth century contained the Apocrypha, though their inclusion in the Holy Book was resented by dissenters. Even as late as the fifties of the nineteenth century a storm in a teacup was raised by the Prince Consort, who placed on a cairn raised on the grave of a favored servant a verse from Tobit. This was regarded as sacrilege by the dour Presbyterians, over whom his wife, Queen Victoria, presided as in some sort the head of the Presbytery.

It is indeed somewhat difficult to discriminate either in form or matter between the Apocrypha and the Old Testament, to which they form an appendix. They had contributed to popular art and literature a due quota of familiar figures; Tobit and his dog, Susanna and the elders, Judith and Holophernes are as familiar in pictorial art as Daniel and the lions or David and Saul. The sayings of Ecclesiasticus seem as pregnant as those of Ecclesiastes, while the Wisdom of Solomon has noble passages which come to us trailing clouds of glory in the magnificent rhythm of King James's Version. The Books of the Maccabees contain an account of as heroic a struggle as is known in history, though their contents used to be known to us from the vigorous reproduction of them by Josephus. It is scarcely to be wondered that the churches have been in doubt whether to accept the Apocrypha as equally sacred with the rest of the remains of the literature of the ancient Hebrews.

Of late years considerable attention has been redirected to these interesting books in the English-speaking world. When the English revisers had finished revising the New and the Old Testaments a conjoint band from the two companies set to work revising the Apocrypha, and Bibles can now be obtained containing the whole three sets of books in the revised version. The renewed search for the origins of Christianity in the later stages of the mother religion has sent theologians back to the study of these books, which fill up the gap, both historical and spiritual, between the Testaments. Like the converted Jew of Sheridan's witticism, they fill out the blank page between the Old and the New Testaments.

But during the last century or so a number of books have come to light, evidently of the same period and from the same sources as the Apocrypha; they are mostly mystical and Apocalyptic in character and are often attributed to some of the ancient patriarchs or sages of the ancient Hebrews. Indeed, one of them goes so far as to present itself as the Book of Adam and Eve. This series of books are, accordingly, known as Pseudepigrapha, because falsely attributed to supposititious authors. The chief of these is the Book of Enoch, the discovery of which forms quite a romance. It is quoted in the New Testament, in the Epistle of Jude, as if it were Scripture. It became lost to the world for seventeen centuries, after which James Bruce brought back from Abyssinia, after his celebrated search for the sources of the Nile, three manuscripts of it written in Ethiopic, which turned out to be translations into that uncouth tongue of the Greek version of the Book of Enoch. Still later another similar book, attributed to Enoch, was discovered in a Slavonic version in Servia and Russia, though every trace of the Greek original had been lost. Similar romances of scholarship attached to other portions of this curious byway of sacred literature. Only the other day the sands of Egypt at Elephantine yielded up some fragments in Aramaic of the Story of Achikar, which is referred to in the Book of Tobit. As these fragments are of the fifth century B. C. they may be regarded as the oldest manuscript portions of the Bible, or at least of its apocryphal Appendix, in existence.

Dr. R. H. Charles has been, for a number of years, devoting himself to this branch of sacred literature, and has published editions or translations of many of the Pseudepigrapha, including the two Books of Enoch, the Book of Jubilees, the Testaments of the Twelve Apostles, the Assumption of Moses, and the Apocalypse of Baruch. It was a happy thought for him to bring together all the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, to have them translated by himself and a band of scholars and to supply these texts, with short but adequate notes, rendering the many obscure passages and references as clear as possible to the ordinary reader. This he has done in the two finely printed quartos just issued by the Oxford University Press in a manner worthy even of its great reputation.

The result is a triumph not alone for English typography but for English scholarship. This is a piece of work which one has hitherto been accustomed to see done best by Germans. Indeed, it is only a few years ago since Prof. Kautzsch produced a German annotated translation of the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, which doubtless formed the model and suggestion for the present work. Yet Dr. Charles has surpassed Kautzsch both in quantity and quality. He gives more Pseudepigrapha and deals with their contents more thoroughly. Indeed, in his zeal he has somewhat overshot the mark by including in his second volume devoted to the Pseudepigrapha works which by no stretching of the expression can be regarded as pseudepigraphic at all. Thus he includes a translation of the "Sayings of the Fathers," a tractate of the Mishnah, (which is to be found in every Jewish prayer book,) and the fragment of the Zadokite work recently discovered by Prof. Schechter of this city. Neither of these are attributed to any author, and cannot therefore be wrongly attributed as the title Pseudepigrapha implies. This Dr. Charles owns, but excuses himself on the ground that the works in question are from the same period as the rest of this literature and throw light upon the tendencies of the times. It is perhaps ungracious to look a gift pseudepigraphon in the mouth.

These two volumes contain a Bible in miniature, yet a by no means small miniature at that. It has parallels and continuations of the historical books of the Bible, in Esdras and Maccabees, quasi-fictions of the order of Esther in Tobit and Achikar; its books of wisdom, Sirach, and the Wisdom of Solomon, rival proverbs and Ecclesiastes in gnomic lore. They even contain what might be called a continuation of the Psalms known as the Songs of Solomon. Almost the sole branch of Old Testament literature, unrepresented in the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, is that of pure prophecy in the sense of the higher politics, international and internal. But they carry to a huge excess one episodic characteristic of the prophetic literature, the Apocalyptic vision found in Isaiah, Ezekiel and Daniel. This is specially the characteristic of the Pseudepigrapha of the second volume in this edition, and may be regarded as the dominant note of the whole literature of the Jews between 200 before and 200 after Christ, during which these books were written mainly in Hebrew, but some in Aramaic and a few of them originally in Greek (though by far the majority are now known to us only in Greek versions.)

This preoccupation with the fate of the world is one of the most remarkable phenomena in all literature professing to be sacred. Here we have a few barely mountaineers who are fighting inch by inch and year by year to retain a territory not much bigger than that covered by New York or London with their suburbs, and yet the imagination of their thinkers was fired with the fate of the whole world, which was ultimately to be conquered by their Law. From Daniel to Revelations we have a whole series of Apocalyptic works dealing with these wondrous visions and culminating in the phantasmagorias of the Book of Enoch, which may be regarded as the centre of the whole literature. This book had great influence both on the phraseology and thought of the New Testament, and, as was mentioned above, is directly quoted as Scripture by Jude. Its influence was, of course, most marked on the Book of Revelation, but the Christian views of the Messiah and of the future world can, on several points, be directly traced back to Enoch. Strange to say, these visions of the future penetrated into the classic world, and even affected the poet of imperial Rome.

There is no doubt that Virgil, in his description of the Golden Age in the Fourth Eclogue, was using the so-called Sibylline Books, and from those portions of them which modern scholarship has traced back to Jewish authorship. The great Latin hymnologist of the Middle Ages who wrote the tremendous "Dies Irae" had a true instinct of the sources of the Christian doctrine of the last things when he wrote his line, "Teste David cum Sibylla." Though these visions of the future and of the future world have an element of the sublime in them, especially considering their source, they are, when regarded as literature, rather grandiose than grand. There is a hardness of outline and a want of imaginative detail which make them wearisome after a few pages. The Fathers of the Synagogue had a true instinct in putting them outside the canon and calling them accordingly "outsiders." There seems to have been doubt in only one case, that of Sirach, which is sometimes quoted in the Talmud as scripture. Just as there was doubt about the admission of Esther into the canon, there seems to have been some hesitancy about excluding Sirach from it.

Sufficient has perhaps been said to indicate the many points of interest presented by these volumes, not alone to the theologian, but to the student of literature in general. One of the largest sections of the second volume gives the story of Achikar, which may, perhaps, be even described as the first novel extant. As we have seen, this can be traced back to the sixth or fifth century B. C., and has been recovered in these latter days in Arabic, Syriac, Armenian, and Aramaic versions, besides a Greek rewriting of part of it found in mediaeval lives of Aesop. The book is thus one of the curiosities of literature in the variant forms of its tradition, and it is a sort of bridge between the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, being referred to in one of the former books; as Dr. Charles owns, it has little claims to be included in the present volumes, but is none the less welcome.

Each of the thirty books contained in these two volumes is introduced by one of the editors with an account of the manuscripts, versions, and editions, with a short account of the theological views of the author or authors. One would have been glad to have had a more general introduction summing up these conclusions, but perhaps this is more suitable for special work such as Dr. Charles has himself written on the Eschatology of the ancient Hebrews. He has scarcely been uniform in his treatment of the different books, giving variant readings for some of them but not for others; he has been rather inclined to introduce homiletic and aesthetic considerations in a sphere where scholarship pure and simple should prevail. But these defects diminish but slightly the solid value of this contribution to learning, which does honor to Dr. Charles and his colleagues, including Dr. Llewellyn Davies, who has added a magnificent index to the second volume, running to 140 columns and enabling one to find any topic treated in this labyrinthine literature.

CONCERNING SOUL-WHORLS

MUSIC AND THE FINE ARTS. A Psychology of Aesthetic. By Denton J. Snyder. St. Louis: Sigma Publishing Company.

Denton J. Snyder has taken for his field a universal psychology interrelating all sciences by an "ultimate psychological principle." This volume is one of the many in which this universal system is expounded, and the attempt is made to "define and put in order the so-called fine arts in accord with their psychological evolution." In these he includes music, painting, and the "kinetic arts," such as dancing. He asks, "Can we bring to light the original constructive principle of the total edifice of music?" as others who have grappled with the aesthetics of music have asked before him; but his analysis brings him no nearer to any tangible result than has been attained by his predecessors in this field. We read that "the sound-whorl wakens the soul-whorl and starts it to making the same movement which is primordially its own, given originally by the All-Self," and much more of the same sort of thing in relation to the other arts. There are less esoteric and more detailed analyses of their various manifestations, but we have to be satisfied with the conclusion that "sculpture represents the God humanizing, while music represents the man divinizing," and other statements of this kind. There are no doubt certain minds to whom this demonstration will come as a conclusive reality.

"RUTH ANNE"

RUTH ANNE. By Rose Cullen Bryant. Illustrated by Will Grefe. J. B. Lippincott Company. $1.25.

Miss Bryant's story adds still another to the endless galaxy of the studies of the modern young woman—the picture of a stanch, brave-hearted girl with as much courage and fortitude as a militant engaged in a hunger strike and showing at the same time the timidity and trembling shyness of an early Victorian maid. The author sets her against a background of present day complicated economic conditions and makes her responsible, through her ownership of property, for many evils. When, finally, she comes into her heritage of modernness through the awakening of her conscience the story begins. A good story the author makes of it, with many realistic and convincing situations and developments, and many that are dramatic and intensely emotional. It is all dominated by the character of Ruth Anne, whom the author has conceived very clearly and worked out so well that she stands out before the reader a complex, human, and very engaging girl.

"FROM CATHAY"

Mr. Benet's Songs and Stories from Other Lands

MR. BENET'S book of poems takes its title from a gay ballad that gave pleasure to many when it appeared several months ago in a leading magazine; a tale of two strange merchants who rode into town on paunchy beasts with golden hooves. They bought sacks of magic merchandise, and they sang a carol in praise of the Grand Chan, "the King of all the Kings across the sea."

Nevertheless, this reviewer will resist the temptation to call Mr. Benét himself a merchant from Cathay. It is true that he brings some strange exotic wares, songs and stories from other lands and other times. But he is not (as many young poets are) wilfully a foreigner. He does not rebel against the noble old traditions of English poetry.

Of late years there has been noticeable among the younger poets a tendency to break deliberately the established rules of rhyme and rhythm and to write the sort of verse which is called "free." Partly this comes from a morbid craving after novelty, partly from laziness. It is good to find that Mr. Benét takes seriously the technique of his art. There are in the volume now under consideration a number of poems—particularly "The Halcyon Birds" and "The Violin's Enchantress"—that are remarkable when looked at merely as examples of virtuosity. Not only does Mr. Benét show an enviable sense of verbal music, he also has an accurate perception of the connection between rhythm and thought, he uses the form conscientiously, but he selects the form with due regard to the idea to be expressed.

So much for his mastery over his tools. He has, it has been stated, that knowledge of the use of words which the public legitimately demands of every maker of verses. Now must be examined that even more important thing, the idea, which is the poem's essential justification. And (contrary to the platitude of the amateur) sincerity is not the quality by virtue of which a poem stands or falls. The idea must first of all be interesting. It may also be sincere, elevating, original. But it must interest the reader before it can display to him its other virtues. Sincerity undecorated and obtrusive makes the work and conversation of many young poets things diligently to be avoided. Well, he must be blasé indeed whom all of these poems fail to interest. For the romanticist here are such strange tales as "The Bird Fancier" and "The Halcyon Birds," and ringing tributes to such illustrious vagabonds as Baron Munchausen and Sir John Maundeville. Those (not all of them are gone) who know the difference between Helle and Hadea will enjoy such beautiful echoes of the classics as "The Centaur's Farewell," "The Winning of Pomona," and—best of all—"The Argo's Chanty."

> Orpheus hath harped her.
> Her prow hath drunk the sea.
> Fifty haughty heroes at her golden row-locks be!
> His fingers sweep the singing strings,
> Her forefoot white before she flings,
> Out from the shore she strains—she swings—
> And lifts, oh, gallantly!

Mr. Benét has written few "nature poems," but a keen and sympathetic observation of trees, flowers and clouds is manifest throughout his work. There are, of course, many love poems (the beautiful dedication is perhaps the best) and they are poems of real love, not sordid, not feverish, but strongly, whitely passionate. Mr. Benét is not interesting in sphinxes, "love" does not invariably suggest "pain" to him, nor does he even once use the dear old rhyme of "lust" and "dust."

Some—but not all—of the poems that are ethical or philosophical in theme, deserve high praise. To take an exception first, "Remarks to the Back of a Pew," is a composition which Mr. Benét probably wrote when he was undergoing some punishment for "cutting" chapel in his freshman days. All of us know that on a hot Sunday morning it is pleasanter to sit under a tree and smoke a pipe than to listen to a long sermon in a poorly ventilated church. Some 8,000 people have put this idea into verse—calling the results "The Cathedral of the Trees" "Nature's Church" or something of the sort, and most of them have done it better than Mr. Benét. Undoubtedly, the back of his pew was very much bored. "Ritual" is less trite, but it is evidently the work of one who, for the moment, tries to fix his own limitations on all mankind, who decries what—as yet—he fails to understand. But he will understand.

Having thus patronizingly insulted Mr. Benét, the reviewer desires to call particular attention to three poems, to which, in the course of years, there will come, he thinks, no little fame. These are "The Anvil of Souls," "Sincerities," and "Umbrae Puellularum." The poem first named is the splendid expression of a tremendous thought; critics courageous enough to use the term will call this poem "great." The second (refreshing after "Ritual") is full of that abasement before God's works which marks the true poet. The third is an exquisite memorial to the little maids of history and romance, a poem that for its sheer loveliness deserves immortality.

These three poems are things for which to be grateful. For the whole book we may well be grateful; it is a book of real poetry, musical, imaginative, vigorous. There are echoes of other poets—Francis Thompson, Alfred Nowes, Robert Browning, and (possibly) E. A. Robinson; but there is no slavish imitation; there is sure evidence of originality. Mr. Benét's second book will be better, but "Merchants from Cathay" is good enough to make all friends of American poetry glad.

JOYCE KILMER.

MERCHANTS FROM CATHAY. By William Rose Benet. The Century Company, $1.20 net.

LIVES OF SERVICE

HAPPY WOMEN. By Myrtle Reed. Illustrated. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.50.

THIS collection of twelve brief biographies of a dozen world-famous women was found among Myrtle Reed's papers after her death. Apparently, in making her selection of the women she wished to write about, she chose those who were honored and loved for the service they gave to the world and who found their happiness in service. A long "Foreword" by one of Myrtle Reed's close friends, Mary Badollet Powell, tells of many incidents in the author's life and of her attitude toward some of the important questions of the day which her army of admirers will find interesting. She recounts a conversation with Miss Reed in which the novelist spoke of her desire to write a series of short biographies of noted women that would illustrate her own conviction that "unselfish service brings happiness, regardless of worldly possessions or the want of them." In the working out of this purpose she wrote the papers, found among her literary remains, which have been brought together in this volume.

In the ordinary acceptation of what constitutes happiness, some of the figures of her little array of "happy women" do not justify their presence. Queen Victoria, for example, whose long years of widowhood and mourning have come to make of her almost a symbol of wifely sorrow, would hardly be called by most people a happy woman, at least for the longer part of her life. Sister Dora and Florence Nightingale also, with their lives of incessant toil and hardship, almost of poverty, would not be chosen by the average person as exemplars of worldly happiness. Caroline Herschel, with her almost hundred years spent in hard work, devotion to her brother, self-sacrifice, and denial of almost all the ordinary pleasures and joys of life, would hardly seem, from the ordinary viewpoint, to stand out prominently among the women of all time because of her happiness.

But in these, as well as in the other members of her little group of women, Miss Reed seeks to show from their own words that they were deeply and quietly happy and that their happiness came, not out of selfish pleasures and enjoyments—which the unthinking are apt to consider the only source of happiness—but out of the service they gave so unstintingly to the world. Even when her subjects lived what is usually considered a normally happy life, when fortune smiled upon them and love was kind and faithful, she passes lightly over these ordinary sources of pleasure in living and dwells upon the satisfaction they derived from the happiness which they could give to others.

Two Queens are included in Miss Reed's circle of happy women, Luise of Prussia and Victoria; two self-sacrificing sisters, Dorothy Wordsworth and Caroline Herschel; one great actress, one great singer, and one great poet, Charlotte Cushman, Jenny Lind, and Elizabeth Browning; two ministering angels, Florence Nightingale and Sister Dora; one reformer and one author, Lucretia Mott and Louisa Alcott.

TOPICS OF THE WEEK

THE fact that the list of the "hundred best books" of the year, published elsewhere in this issue, includes so many from the shelves of the Home University Library is no mere chance occurrence. It is an indication, by no means the first, that publishers who would furnish inexpensive books to a general public do not have to stay at the bottom of the literary ladder, restricting themselves to popular science series and propaganda literature of some sort. The scope of the Home University Library publications has been steadily widening, and in the past year it has rounded up a corps of able and representative thinkers, not writers all of them, but men who are contributing solidly to the discussion and the solution of present-day problems. When a publishing house can enlist the makers of some of our best books, and can, moreover, put those books, by reason of treatment and price, within the reach of a general public, furnishing not only what would be marked best by a judging committee, but what is accessible and popular, it is rendering distinct service.

APPEALING to a somewhat different class of readers, Everyman's Library accomplishes much the same result in its particular field. THE TIMES BOOK REVIEW list does not, of course, include the Everyman publications, and yet there are undoubtedly many who would consider the contributions of the house to the literary world in the past year a distinct achievement. The later work of the library is by no means a matter of reprinting well-known classics only. The translations which have been added to the list in the past twelve months—"The Pageant of the Muses" series, for a single excellent instance—approaches constructive work. Such publications as these, such as the scholarly edition of the Tudor Shakespeare, recently issued by the Macmillan Company, do not fit into the list of the year's hundred best books, but they are now the best examples of constructive editing and literary achievement.

THE Nobel prize for literature having been awarded the Bengali poet, RABINDRANATH TAGORE, English commentators, thus far at least, feel somewhat self-congratulatory about it. Their inference is that we must be getting over our provincialism at an amazing rate when we can go so far afield as India for our classics. The credit, however, belongs to Mr. TAGORE, and the emphasis is to be laid rather on Oriental initiative than on Occidental broad-mindedness. It is the mountain which has moved, and not Mahomet. RABINDRANATH TAGORE, the accepted poet of the fifty millions and more who speak the Bengali tongue, has come out of the East with an English translation of such of his work as he saw fitted in well with the tendency of Western literature. That the Bengali poet knew what he was about is no idle conjecture. Well read in Occidental literature to date, for some time a student in Europe, and, possessing the vantage point of a different civilization, he could not have been unaware of this Western drift toward mysticism, marked plainly enough by such as MAETERLINCK, the later HAUPTMANN, BERGSON, and the Celtic revival. The arts, philosophy, and politics, all but science, have of late been moving toward the East: the smattering of Eastern culture which has come about has been of trite and superficial things, but interest in the Orient has been awakened. These two tendencies, the one toward mysticism of any description, the other toward anything picturesquely Oriental, have given Mr. TAGORE the opportunity which no enterprising Westerner, hunting for something to translate, ever fancied existed, although fifty millions are living in what they call "the epoch of RABINDRANATH." The situation demands a drastic revision of our conceptions of the Eastern mind in its slow-moving remoteness from an every-day world; perhaps the Eastern mind is moving slowly, but it is not moving in one spot.

SOME years ago MR. KIPLING wrote the best airship story ever imagined, about the flight of a monster, power-driven dirigible, laden with passengers, across the Atlantic by night, and the incidents of the voyage. Some did not like it because of its multitude of technical details and its technical phrases, which were of course as imaginary as the airship's flight, but most people felt the power and movement of the tale. In the new number of the Metropolitan Mr. KIPLING has another bit of imaginative work about an aeroplane, or in which an aeroplane plays a part no other machine ever invented or imagined by man could play. KIPLING has certainly not lost his inventive power, though we do not hear from him as often as we used to hear. Great advances have been made in air navigation since he imagined and worked out that fine tale about the dirigible, but, although passenger dirigibles have since made long and fast voyages, the idea that the big balloon will ever be of much service in commercial traffic is not generally entertained. The aeroplane—that is another story. Nobody can say what cannot be done with that.

COMMUNITY SAVIORS

THE MIXING: What the Hillport Neighbors Did. By Bouck White. Doubleday, Page & Co. $1.20.

The social doctors are beginning to say that the ailment which has been sapping the life of American farm and village communities is a too intense individualism. They say that not only do the people lack the impulse and the training to work together, but even that they lack that community consciousness which would lead them to wish to work together. One of these doctors has called it "the tuberculosis of American country life"—a description which implies how dangerous they think the state of the patient. From various parts of the country has come news now and then, in newspaper or magazine article, of how some one community has taken its particular white plague in hand and presently, after much effort, made itself whole and united. But Mr. White's is the first such chronicle to find itself between book covers. While his account is cast in the form of fiction it reads as if it were founded upon reality. One would guess that the author took the experiments and achievements of several such communities, drew on his knowledge of the general movement for closer neighborhood association for material with which to expand and weave together several of its phases, and so made a connected story about a gone-to-seed country village not far from a big city. The town has its native residents, pig-headed and prejudiced, its Summer colony and its commuters holding themselves disdainfully aloof, its Shanty-town of Italian workmen. The story tells, with much dramatic incident, how a few people got together and set the leaven of neighborliness at work among these disorganized elements, the struggles they had, the difficulties they encountered, the things they did and the success that finally was theirs. The book is cleverly written and will be of much interest and help to all who are engaged in the movement to improve country life.

"A WOMAN'S DIARY"

Picture of Life in France, Part Fictional, Part Real

MADELEINE AT HER MIRROR. By Marcelle Tinayre. Translated from the French by Winifred Stephens. John Lane Company. $1.25 net.

IF the term "a woman's diary" had not grown hackneyed beyond meaning almost, it might have served to denote the character of this book of grace, elegance and a charm most engagingly feminine. The author herself describes it as "a collection of impressions, of dreams and of memories, in which fiction mingles with fact." Further, explaining her title, she speaks of it as a mirror in the hands of a woman, reflecting her own thoughtful face, her own alert mind, "the lights and shadows of feeling and the fleeting pictures of life."

These reflections she gives at thirty-five, which is "not the evening of life's day, but rather the full noontide's lengthening, the flowering of woman at her best, the open bloom of the rose on the eve of maturity." Nothing of interest as between one woman and another is omitted, whether it touches on love, on married life, on the relations between a mother and her children, on widowhood, or on the mere material facts of abode, travel, shopping and dealings with dressmakers. There is also a chapter on justice to men in which the author records an acrid dialogue between two of her women friends who had no real grievance against "the trousered, bearded race," we read, never having been "deserted or beaten by any son of Adam." This leads her to question why it is that when members of the same sex are together they have a craving to criticise the opposite sex, and she wonders whether it is a tradition, an ancient rite, bravado, a sacrifice to some secret weakness, coquetry, or a game. Perhaps she reasons "it is a little of them all."

Yet, for all this generality of acute observation, it must not be thought that the book is a succession of isolated commentaries on the topics mentioned. The interest and value of it, on the contrary, is that throughout we have the acquaintance and the confidence of a woman part fictional, part real. Just enough of herself is told so that we fix her as a recognizable being, while, through the medium of her opinions and impressions, we grow to know her intimately. This method of stating one's life and conclusions, of course, has no autobiographic authenticity. It is the method of the novelist, but it is used avowedly. It provides for a mixture of fact and fiction, as the author announces at the start, which is a provision even some celebrated autobiographers have failed to make.

As for importance, once the charm of the recital is granted, it is safe to assume that the character here delineated is not such as is classed in the archives of a nation, whether historical or literary. She is merely one of those women, whom nine out of ten women, if wishes were horses, would ride their heads off to resemble and mingle with. She is a Frenchwoman, civilized to the tips of her fingers—in the world, but unscathed of it. Without romantic upheaval she has married the husband presented to her as most suitable, and has maintained his station and dignity and her own in manner befitting. The marriage took place when she was very young, so that some years after becoming a widow, she finds her children growing up rapidly and envisages them going forth "to love and new homes." Nor does she repine, or ace precipitately, because, as she says, she is cheerful, brave and a determined optimist, keeping the robust health of her childhood, "an equable temper and a well-balanced mind." Altogether she is a most attractive and intelligent woman to meet, who furnishes incidentally a picture of French life that is not too familiar according to the convention of the so-called French novel. The book is excellently rendered in this authorized translation.

IN A FEW WORDS

O. H. NELAND is the pseudonym of an author whose new book, "The Crimson Fist," declares that peace is made impossible by patriotism. This writer belongs, it is said, to an ancient aristocratic family associated with imperial rule and conquest.

"The Little Book of Modern Verse," edited by Jessie B. Rittenhouse, has already gone into a second edition.

Dr. J. F. Dickie, pastor emeritus of the American Church in Berlin, is on a visit in this country. He is publishing three books.

The Century Company has not yet announced the name of the author of the anonymous novel, "Home," now appearing in The Century Magazine, but he is said to be some one in the United States diplomatic or consular service. His ignorance of Catholic customs shows that he is not stationed in any Latin country.

"Snow White," which was a success at the Little Theatre last season, has been brought out in book form.

Mrs. Hugh Fraser has collected some of the little known traditions and legends of Italy into two volumes, to which she gives the title "Italian Yesterdays."

Charles Scribner's Sons are bringing out an American edition of Everard Meynell's "The Life of Francis Thompson."

William Oglevie, D. L. S., F. K. G. S., has written the story of the Alaskan immigrants, among whom he worked for years. It is called "Early Days on the Yukon."

Sully & Kleinitch are publishing a new "Handbook of Quotations," by Edith B. Ordway.

"A Modern Eve," by Mary Edington, is one of the four best novels selected in competition for a prize of £1,000 by an English publisher. The judges were unable to choose among the four.

In his "Japan as I Saw It," A. H. Exner tells of attending a performance of Othello given in Japanese. In this version the scene is laid in Formosa, and Iago is called Muro.

Honoré Willsie, who wrote "The Heart of the Desert," accompanied her husband, who is a civil engineer, on a trip to the arid lands of Arizona for the purpose of making heat tests.

The author of "Jack the Young Cowboy," George Bird Grinnell, was himself a cowboy for many years.

Dion Clayton Calthrop is a grandson of Dion Boucicault. His godfather is Sir Johnstone Förbes-Robertson. But the most interesting biographical fact known about him is that he keeps dormice.

Agnes I. Hanrahan's exquisite poems of Irish life are familiar to the readers of the leading reviews of Great Britain. They have now been collected into a volume, with the name "Adown the Boreen." An American edition will appear in January.

Life at Sea

To the bred-in-the-bone, life-long sailor the sea is home, the normal place for a man to live, and the land is a more enjoyable incident to be made use of now and then for the purpose of recreation. It is from this viewpoint of the sea as the scene of real life that Capt. A. W. Nelson tells, in "Yankee Swanson," the story of his first voyage, a voyage that proved to be the opening chapter in a life-long story which finally led up to the command of one of the finest passenger liners in the world. It is the sailorman's own account of what life was on a sailing vessel thirty-five years ago—that phase of sea life that has practically become a thing of the past—and he tells it with a simple zest that shows how much he enjoyed it. "Yankee Swanson" was his first mate and Capt. Nelson says that he was "the embodiment of what a good sailor and officer should be." (Sturgis & Walton Co. $1.50.)

THE LOVE-LETTERS OF A NOVELIST

Entertaining Confessions of a Novelist Whose Best Seller Has Brought Him Experiences

By CONINGSBY DAWSON
Author of "The Garden Without Walls."

THE title of this article is impertinent. I intend to describe to you the attitude of a certain part of the public toward the author of a love novel. I certainly don't intend to tell you anything about my own heart throbs. Still less to betray confidences, even though they were uninvited.

When a theatre is packed to see a beautiful actress, by people who have come not to see her act, managers expect it—they count it one of her assets. The same applies to the male matinée idol. Now, in the same way, there's an emotional following, scattered and tucked away through the world, for every moderately popular novelist. This following is undiscerning—it really doesn't care how the fellow writes any more than the matinée adorer cares how her actor acts—it simply wreathes absurd nobilities about his personality.

I say that this following is undiscerning. It is undiscerning to the extent of identifying him with the heroes of his imagination—of not discriminating between the attitudes which his puppets strike toward life for the sake of the story and the attitudes which are his own essentially. These latter the reading public have no chance to know anything about.

For instance, I remember two lady novelists of standard reputations crushing George Meredith on a garden seat in Surrey and upbraiding him for writing that woman would be the last thing civilized. They were angry with him; they had long harbored a grudge against him for that epigram, and were glad to have him in their power. They disguised their anger under a sham, kittenish and heavily middle-aged playfulness. George Meredith was feeble, and failing in sight; he let them have their way, and then, "it wasn't I who said that," he objected; "it was written in a diary by one of my characters—an embittered old man."

Precisely. But the public will insist on identifying the author with the vagaries of his creations. If he paints an unbalanced lover, then he must be an unbalanced lover. It would be as reasonable to declare that Arnold Bennett is a woman because "The Book of Carlotta" is a woman's autobiography.

And here I digress to illustrate how a fiction writer is handicapped by this annoying habit of both enemies and friends—yes, and of those between people, more loving than friends and more frank than enemies, his family—of attributing to him personally all the opinions and evil-doings of his chief male character. I know a man, a brilliant fellow, who wrote a brilliant novel. He was happily married. He wrote his novel in secret, letting his wife know nothing about it. It had for its leading woman a girl, tepid as the soup they serve at—I'd better not say where—but fiery in her beauty. She led the hero on from despair to despair, taunting, teasing, arousing him, till at last he aroused her and they fell. My friend was cock-sure of fame when he read his effort in its final form. He knew that he had a seat—or was it a stool?—between Dickens and Thackeray. He was so certain that he resigned all his merely lucrative jobs the day the book came out. He was going to do nothing but write novels till they laid him to rest in Westminster Abbey. If they wrote novels in heaven, he wouldn't stop even then.

But—and here comes the tragedy—on the evening of publication day his wife read it. She became so absorbed that she refused to come to bed. The novelist in the husband was flattered. Ha! ha! So she was at last discovering that he was a really big man! She sat up all night; he fell asleep watching her. He awoke at dawn when the book—his book—was thrown at him. She was crying—hysterical. Was it because she was so glad? Did wives chuck books about in sheer joy at their husband's cleverness? He tried to clutch her to him—then he found out. Every time the Sir Arthur of his story had held Lady Gwendoline's hand Mrs. M— had seen her husband caressing another woman. In the end, when Lady Gwendoline, so ardently wooed through three hundred pages, returned Sir Arthur's passion—well!

Mrs. M— thought she had spotted the real Lady Gwendoline in her husband's circle of acquaintances. What she wanted to know was how dared he (her foot stamped); how dared he have done things like that behind her back and then have had the shamelessness to record them?

The poor man tried to explain that he was no passionate baronet—a mere cold-blooded, decent living commoner. Sir Arthur was a person imagined. But his wife wouldn't hear of it—it was no good denying things to her. If he hadn't actually flirted with the lady in question, then he'd pictured himself flirting—which was just as bad. When all arguments had failed, he pleaded as excuse that the novel would put them on Easy Street—that the end would justify the means. But, alas! the novel didn't sell, and he didn't get his merely lucrative jobs back. The domestic infelicity which resulted from this adventure into the world of fancy has clipped the wings of his daring. He writes tame stories to please his wife now—stories which are so little expressive of himself that they fall still-born from the press.

This is the true story of one man's experience; the same thing has happened in a more or less disastrous degree to all novelists. It has happened to me. In my novel, "The Garden Without Walls," I tell in the first person the story of a love-wabbler—a man who was too forewarned as to consequences to seize his happiness; a man who had been intimidated in youth by too much morality; a man who was too chivalrous to love badly, and too calculating to love well, who had heard that love was a stinging nettle and was, therefore, afraid to pluck it. The name of this fictitious person was Dante. I find my friends calling me Dante and trying to trace a similarity. Now, if I must confess to you, the type of lover on whom I would pattern my own conduct is the young Lochinvar kind of person. I like to imagine myself as a cavalier who grasps his lady, swings her into his saddle and, in the face of all opposition, rides hard for the west. Rather hard luck, isn't it, to be so misinterpreted by your own handiwork? What fascinated me in describing the vagaries of a wabbler in love was that I considered myself so unlike him.

But, if it was only my friends, I could put up with them. The worst of it is that I've roused compassion in the breasts of numerous anonymous ladies, and they write me letters. One sends me flowers, tied with a narrow white ribbon, horribly suggestive of marriage. She does not sign her name, but on a slip of paper is written "Just for remembrance." Another pens me poems. In a recent inspiration she asked herself the question, through six pages, "What am I?" Each stanza told me what she was not. Only in the last line did I learn her secret, "I am love. I am passion, I am human sex."

Doubtless, these ladies think that I am the wabbler of my story—a person athirst, who stoops over every spring, but is frightened to drink lest the water be poisoned. They are sorry for me. They might well be, if I were a wabbler like Dante. I am not, and I am glad to take this opportunity of informing them that their pity is misspent. If you contemplate writing a love novel, think twice about it.

A WILDERNESS DETECTIVE

NOVEMBER JOE. The Detective of the Woods. By Hesketh Prichard. Illustrated. Houghton Mifflin Company. $1.25.

The adventures of a Sherlock Holmes of the wilderness, with a wistful little touch of romance at the end, furnish the feast which Mr. Prichard, known for several books of forest lore, sets before his readers in this new volume. His November Joe is a fine young fellow who lives in the woods of Beauce, beyond the Maine border. He is good to look at and he is not only "the producer but the master of his environment." The book consists of a series of detective episodes told in the first person by a wealthy business man of Quebec, who, by way of recreation from too much making of money, spends some every spring, but is frightened to drink lest the water be poisoned. They are sorry for me. They might well be, if I were a wabbler like Dante. I am not, and I am glad to take this opportunity of informing them that their pity is misspent. If you contemplate writing a love novel, think twice about it.

"When in doubt, try this novel. The first treat of the new season."

HAVE WE LOST THE ART OF HUMOR?

Writers of a Few Decades Ago Who Made Us Laugh, and Their Successors

By MARY S. WATTS

THE favorite diversion of this age is that of exploding theories. So popular has the pursuit become that nothing's safe any more, neither the good name of our forefathers, nor the fame of our great men, nor the Constitution of the United States, nor the moral law. Any moment our accepted, cherished, time-honored views about any one of them may boom off in smoke and fragments before our eyes. It is a common daily spectacle to behold some coldly earnest person arise and prove upon unanswerable authority that Nero was really a sort of a George Washington. No sooner has he got through than some one else takes up the duty of showing us incontestable evidence that George Washington was really a sort of a Nero. Most of us have been for years firmly established in the opinion that science and the creeds are and will be eternally at odds. All a mistake. Science and the creeds in fact are (colloquially) as thick as thieves. So some accomplished theory buster tells us; he has made a study of both of them, and, as the Oriental singer reports, he knows about it all—he knows—he knows. We have been accustomed to associate marriage with morality. Pop goes another theory! Marriage is in reality the most unmoral institution ever devised by man.

And so on and so on. The above are large questions with which this writer is not fit to cope. But lately a new bomb-thrower has come up here and there whose destructive catchword is the non-existence of American humor; and anybody can take a hand against such an anarchist. According to his conclusion, we do not, as a race, make good fun, or understand good fun. That timely, homely, shrewd, naïve, pungently ironical, always good-natured humor which we supposed to be almost our strongest national characteristic we have never possessed at all! To borrow the terms of a religious sect, we had an "error" of thinking ourselves humorous. True, we have produced, from time to time, a funny man of great achievement and celebrity—nobody ever heard of a funny woman, so that sex may as well be left out of the reckoning—but a handful of funny men does not make a nation. And, besides, they are all gone—Hosea Bigelow and Mark Twain and Field and Stockton and Artemus Ward and Josh Billings, and all the host of quaintly named jesters are gone—and who is there to take their place in these discouraged days? Where among us can real humor get an audience anyhow? It is not that we take ourselves too seriously; the signs point to something far worse than that. We laugh enough, but at the wrong time, the wrong thing. We are alarmingly pleased with a rattle, appallingly tickled with a straw. If you don't believe it, go into the nearest theatre and listen, if you have the pathos, to the abysmally dull stuff that is nevertheless sure of a general guffaw, and observe the unrestrained delight of everybody in the place when some one on the stage falls downstairs. If you don't believe it, open any nearly any! magazine and read something like this under the heading—it may be—of "American Humor": "Our humor on the decline? Well, not so you could notice it! On the decline? I wot not, says John B. Smith, and John B. is some wot-notter—" &c. And, finally, if you don't believe it, look at the colored supplements to the Sunday papers, and say if anything more drearily vulgar ever masqueraded under the name of comic? The theatre is crowded, the magazine sells by the ton, the paper by the carload; if nation-wide familiarity and approval are a good gauge—and we know of none better—these fairly represent our taste in fun.

Mary S. Watts
Author of "Van Cleve"

We have to admit that the non-existence arguer makes out a pretty strong case. Much against our will, he momentarily causes us to view with alarm where we had been innocently pointing with pride. Because there is a doleful deal of truth in these allegations. We do laugh at silly and sometimes brutal things; and we make fun of that which should not be made fun of, and we do not make fun of that which should be made fun of; but there is some health in us in spite of all. To be sure, those genial gentlemen he names are gone, to our deep and enduring regret, but it is not necessary or desirable to fill their places; at that rate we should be everlastingly pulling down statues and setting up new ones. To every generation its own funmakers; and as long as we have Mr. Dooley and the Japanese Schoolboy, and the jocund authors of "Fables in Slang" and "Pigs Is Pigs," and the "Maxims of Methuselah" and "Bunker Bean," we may consider ourselves not wholly impoverished. Moreover, the presence among us of a reasonable number of humorists living (as we hope and trust they do) in the very best possible style with automobiles and country places and good cooks and ever so many bathrooms—I say their presence with all these evidences of prosperity reassures us about those deplorable tendencies over which the non-existence iconoclast is shaking his head. For, to be sordidly practical, they couldn't get along so nicely without a tolerable audience; they couldn't get along at all. Your humorist might as well be an undertaker if he can't find people humorous enough to see his point and laugh with him.

To this the practiced demolisher of theories retorts by setting off another fuse. It is conceded, he says, by all philosophical observers, that real humor is invariably of universal appeal, unimpaired by the lapse of time or by difference of race and speech. Once funny, always funny, everywhere for everybody. Now, nothing could move in narrower limits than ours, or be more unacceptible to those differences. Almost all of our humor employs a vocabulary which nobody but ourselves can understand, and which can't by any possibility be translated; it is based upon events that by to-morrow will be forgotten; it has to do with attitudes of mind, passing fashions in thought, in customs, in national life that a few years hence will be as extinct as the dodo. For example, there was a time when we thought misspelling the funniest thing on earth, and would roar our heads off over, "The honey-bee is an inflamible critter, sudden in his impreshuns and hasty in his conclushon or end." After a decade or so, bad spelling went out of style and dialect came in; and we were immoderately entertained by: "Hit don' make no diffunce ter me," said B'r'er Dickey; "ef 'Lijah went ter glory en de cherryot of fiah, er hit de fiah atter he done git dar. De leadin' question with me is, How Dickey gwine git dar? * * * When you git up yander dey ain't gwine ax you, 'Whar yo' wife an' whar yo' mudder-in-law?' Kase why? Dey well knows you come dar ter rest." Dialect held the funny column for a long while. In fact, it has not yet been ousted; but now slang is beginning to press it hard, and we have so many daily samples of the latter, one need not take the space to quote. If these humorous offerings were written out in plain English, no one would ever think them in the least funny; even Mr. Dooley in plain English might not be funny. But nobody will pretend to say that bad spelling and dialect and slang are in themselves imperishably humorous; humor ought to be independent of any quality they can confer—independent and immortal. Can we expect this stuff to be laughed at a century from now, like "The School for Scandal," like Calverly's verse, or Gilbert's? The orator pauses triumphantly for a reply.

This time, too, his point is well taken; ruefully we must acknowledge it. Some of us, it is true, still have a smile for the "inflamible critter" and B'r'er Dickey; but we probably lack the discrimination which would allow us to laugh only at what is destined to be immortal. The sole argument we offer in defense is that if our fun is evanescent, it has at any rate the quality of that defect, a very marked timeliness and aptness; and if it is so intensely racial in diction and point of view that it cannot pass freely into other lands and tongues, why, we like it all the better! We are not less humorous because of that detachment and that individuality.

And, warming up, we will go on to announce our conviction that durability and universal appeal are no such indispensable characteristics of good fun anyhow. We repeat it, to every generation its own jokes and jokers. If all the work of Mark Twain and the rest of that goodly company were blotted from our knowledge and memory (far fall the day!) it would be an incalculable loss; but there were great men before Agamemnon, and will be again. Even the assertion of the sages that since the foundation of the world there have been only seven original jokes, all others being mere emplifications and alterations of the seven with which we started out—even that statement cannot move us to a policy of economy and conservation. We believe that we have an inexhaustible supply of funmakers peculiarly our own product; no other country ever had their like; their jokes may not be laughed at a century from now, but they are laughed at today, which is, after all, the main thing. A century from now we are confident there will be another set of them, giving us something just as good. We never know their names, and the whole country is their home, yet they are a national institution. If they organized themselves into a Brotherhood of Newspaper Humorists and went on strike it would be one of the most formidable movements in the history of labor. What would we do without our daily grist from the newspaper funny man? We have heard him called the last stronghold of American humor; but in truth he was and is the first, the beginning, middle, and end, the whole thing. How he can be, collectively and individually, so funny day after day, year in and year out, passes comprehension; but he is funny. He never misses fire. All the tricks of bad spelling and dialect and slang he has at his finger ends, but he does not need them; he has swallowed all those formulas. He gives the impression of being funny because he can't help it; and about that spontaneous, wing-shot wit there is something dear to the American heart. When he is not aiming a gay, irreverent, satiric shaft at our Government, or at other people's governments, at the hero of the hour, or the scandal of the week, he turns with the same light-hearted facility to the manufacture of his little, pithy, epigrammatic sentences on any abstract subject that comes handy, or breaks blithely into verse, such as:

He practiced playing on the harp,
For heaven was his goal,
But old Saint Peter was too sharp,
And now he's shoveling coal!

"Things to worry about," he writes with ineffable gravity, and underneath that heading, "Fifteen million bushels of prunes were harvested in California this year." He invents bits of conversation between Paw and Willie: "What is a genius, Paw?" "A genius is a successful crank, my son." Spacewriting, of course; and, considered as humor, it does not claim immortality; and unquestionably nobody but an American reader would be amused by it. Perhaps he is not a humorist; perhaps the things he says and we chuckle over are not really humorous at all; perhaps his performances, and all our other so-called humorous performances, exhibit only a certain not always harmless levity, a perennially juvenile and irresponsible spirit. This is the pessimists' view. Yet somehow we refuse to be cast down or to mend our ways.

AN OLD-TIME MAID

BEATRICE OF DENEWOOD. By Emilie Benson Knipe and Alden Arthur Knipe. Illustrated by C. M. Relyea. The Century Company. $1.25.

The capable young heroine of "Beatrice of Denewood" is the same girl who won favor and friends as the chief character in "A Lucky Sixpence." She is also the teller of her tale, which begins at a Germantown estate in the latter days of the Revolution, goes across to England, and back again to America. Many of the famous people of those days, on both sides of the Atlantic, enter into the story. This old-time maid is a brave young woman and is always ready for any adventurous undertaking, of which a-plenty come her way. The story, which is meant for young readers, is a wholesome one, although somewhat woodeny in the manner of its telling. Young people will find in it not a little history, very well disguised as part of the story.

LITERARY EXILES

Experiences of Some Russian Contemporary Novelists

To define Russian literature at any of its epochs is to define the written expression of a social movement. You can cut it like a layer cake and see the layers separate and distinct, so individualistic do the various strivings of the Russian people toward the light express themselves in their literature. M. Persky has taken only a slice of the top layer, the novelists of the late reform days, 1880-1900, and of the present stormy times since the upheaval of 1905 when the writings have been those of fierce and active combat.

He prefaces his work by a general sketch of Russian literature, marking its ramifications according to the spirit of the times. This is followed by detailed interpretative and appreciative essays on Tchekoff, Korolenko, Veressayev, Gorky, Andreyev, Merezhkovsky, and Kuprin. A brief mention of the writers in vogue finishes the volume.

There are many points in the general sketch of Russian literature worthy of comment; two especially are striking for their concise sommation:

Instead of being a product of the past, Russian literature is a protestation against it; instead of tracing the old successive stages, it appears like a light suddenly struck in the darkness. Its whole history is a long, continuous struggle against the darkness, which has gradually melted away beneath the rays of light, but never entirely ceased to veil the general trend of Russian thought.

And the second:

To-day, as before, Russian literature is made up of just that small fraction of the whole which has escaped Government inquisition.

Despite the statement, it is a remarkable coincidence that the majority of the novelists of which M. Persky writes have either suffered Siberian exile, or, fearing it, and their works made ineffectual by the censor, they have been forced completely out of propaganda writing into purposeless mysticism and decadence. Some have been driven out of their native land.

Tchekoff, who is beginning to have a vogue among American readers, the author terms the novelist of Russia's gray days, i. e. 1880, and thereabout, when the Russian people suffered a great disillusionment in their effort for freedom. The grayness darkened into the deepest pessimism toward the end of Tchekoff's life. Korolenko, on the other hand, has, in the past thirty years, sounded to his writings the note of patience and hopefulness. His novels always show the light on the horizon. Veressayev paints modern Russian society much as did Tchekoff. He is better known this side of the Atlantic as author of "The Memoirs of a Physician"; in Russia he has been a moving spirit in the political and social regeneration of his beloved narodniks, the common people.

Gorky, of course, is known to us, though not the Gorky that the Russians read and love, for to them he represents the vagrant element, which in the Czar's kingdom is an appreciable factor. In classifying Andreyev, M. Persky shows him to be the direct follower of Dostolevsky in the portrayal of the abnormal.

The two novelists who have succeeded in steering clear of the literature of action and social propoganda are Merezhkovsky and Kuprin. The former, in his trilogy of the gods has been constant in his endeavor to glorify antiquity. Kuprin has found in pure romanticism the channel for his expression.

M. Persky's little volume will be found an excellent commentary by those who through the study of Russian literature are striving to understand that much misunderstood nation. It is concise in its characterizations, sympathetic in its treatment, and wholly lacks the bias which destroys the efficacy of so many works on Russian subjects.

CONTEMPORARY RUSSIAN NOVELISTS. By Serge Persky. Translated by F. Eisenman. John W. Luce & Co.

A Christmas Story

J. Edgar Park, who wrote "The Man Who Missed Christmas," is the author of another unusual Christmas story, "How I Spent My Million." It tells how a hard-working young man received an unexpected legacy and spent it all in giving to a great many people the things they did not need, but would like to have. He has much fun out of it, and gains at the end something he wanted more than he did the money. There is a number of black and white illustrations in silhouette. (The Pilgrim Press. 75 cents.)

The Piano's History

A concise and entertaining story is told by Ellye Howell Glover in an illustrated volume entitled, "How the Piano Came to Be." The story contains considerable curious information, which does not appear in any other history of the piano. (Chicago: Browne & Howell Company, 50 cents.)

PUBLIC OPINION AND POPULAR GOVERNMENT

SOME LAND MAMMALS IN AMERICA

An Important Contribution to a Discussion of the Darwinian Theory

PRIMARILY intended for the lay reader, Dr. William B. Scott's "History of the Land Mammals in the Western Hemisphere" will nevertheless prove of great service to many scientists who have neither the time nor the opportunity to keep in touch with the wealth of discoveries resulting in the numerous palaeontological excavations of recent years. Discovery of new and as yet totally unclassified forms is now so rapid and so extensive that the zoologist, and the palaeontologist in particular, knows not at what moment the revolution of accepted theory and long-established classification may occur. As Dr. Scott points out, fresh discoveries, even while the present volume was in press, made necessary the entire recasting of several parts of the text.

Although the book is condensed to a single volume, it represents the work of Dr. Scott and his colleagues for the past thirteen years at Princeton University in the field of palaeontology, and is probably the most important contribution of its class offered by this country to the general and at present very vague evolutionary theory, "descent with modification," since the publication of Prof. Henry Fairfield Osborn's "Age of Mammals" in 1910. Much of the book is based upon a study of the collection of fossil mammals brought back from the Princeton expedition to Patagonia, the report of which, in eight volumes, was prepared and edited by Dr. Scott himself. This is supplemented by study of the collections in the American Museum of Natural History and of those of the Argentine museums, the latter affording much valuable material concerning the ancient life of South America. A great number of photographs and sketches of restorations from important specimens is here presented for the first time.

Dr. Scott and his colleagues are working in a field which, with experimental zoology of the "genetics" division, is accomplishing much more toward the solution of the evolutionary problem than the results obtained from work in comparative anatomy or in the later study of embryology. The theory of evolution is presupposed by most scientists of the present, but since the day of Darwin that theory has become decidedly hazy in its concrete application. "Descent with modification" is universally accepted as the law by which the present organic world has arisen, but agreement stops there. Is development parallel and convergent, is it at the same time divergent from one common stock, is change always in the direction of reduction in the number of parts, is development continuous, a series of gradual modifications, or a succession of sudden changes? These are the questions, simply stated for the benefit of the lay reader, which are fundamental to the understanding of the working of the evolutionary theory, and which, nevertheless, have as yet never been conclusively answered. By adding to the history of life, which numbers millenniums as minutes, and by advancing a few well-founded guesses, based upon the examination of a vast number of fossil remains, Dr. Scott is able in this present volume to contribute materially to the solution of these much-disputed problems.

The question of parallelism and convergence in evolution is set on considerably firmer ground by Dr. Scott's discussion, for instance, of the two subfamilies of cats, the true felines and the sabre-tooth tigers. The history of the true cats has long been a moot point, and further discovery along the line of their development, which is curiously parallel, though apparently quite independent of the sabre-tooths, may completely revise opinions concerning mammalian development. Dr. Scott refuses to accept the Matthew postulate that the sacre-tooth is the ancestor of the the sabre-tooth is the ancestor of the the irreversibility of evolution," to which Dr. Scott is—though cautiously—addicted. The Matthew hypothesis must suppose that the specialization of the canine tooth toward a thin tusk is suddenly reversed, giving a return to the original form. Although at variance with this conjecture as to the relationship of the two, Dr. Scott traces clearly, from later periods, their independent development, marked by the acquisition of similar characters.

In the same way, a more detailed study of the White River and John Day groups, as well as the more recent additions from South America, especially in regard to the phyla of horses, camels, and rhinoceroses, enables Dr. Scott to uphold the probability of parallelism and convergence against those who are still denying the existence of these modes of development. Considering the same problem from the point of view of single structures, there is amplification of the evidence that these can be acquired independently; such, for instance, the reduction of the number of toes, which occurs repeatedly in entirely unrelated groups.

Further evidence of parallel and convergent development is selected by Dr. Scott from instances of independent modification of parts and the acquisition of totally new structures.

(1) The second vertebra of the neck was primitively a bluntly conical peg, a form which is still retained in the great majority of mammals, but in the true ruminants, the camels, horses and the tapira, the process is spout shaped, concave on the upperside, convex on the lower. By tracing the development of these groups, it has been conclusively demonstrated that the change of form took place independently in each of the four.

(2) The ruminants have molar teeth composed of four crescentic cusps arranged in two transverse pairs, the pattern called selenodont. The evidence is very strong that this highly characteristic molar pattern has been several times independently repeated, as in the true ruminants, the camels, the oreodonts and probably other groups also. * * *

(4) A very striking instance is afforded by the three widely separated groups of hoofed animals, members of which had their hoofs transformed into claws; the chalicotheres arose from the normal perissodactyls, the agriochoerids from the oreodonts and the entelonychia from the toxodonts.

The observations furnished by Dr. Scott should put an end to the attempts repeatedly made to unite two or more of these latter groups.

While contending for the existence of parallelism and convergence as well-established modes of the evlutionary process, Dr. Scott does not go to the extreme supposition that genus, family or order ever arose independently, and from radically different ancestors, that is, that identical groups arose and developed in lands cut off from each other. On the other hand, claims Dr. Scott, > parallelism by which related forms pass through similar stages of development would seem to have been so extremely common as fairly to deserve being called a normal method of evolution.

Study of the South American Litopterna, skeletons of which are in the American and the Princeton museums, long confused with the horses, contributes much valuable material to the discussion. It has long been claimed that the extreme similarity between the horses and these South American animals now extinct could mean only close relationship, and that so many corresponding characters could not have been independently acquired. Dr. Scott advances much data to support the hypothesis that the resemblances were due to convergence.

Convergence and parallelism are, however, subordinate to the method of divergence, the branching out of a single line into several parts, which Dr. Scott with many others assumes as the most important evolutionary process. The process is most clearly illustrated at a period when there was a radical change of environment, causing that swift and radical change which has been styled "adaptive radiation," by Prof. Osborn. But as Dr. Scott points out in the records of such parallel phyla as the rhinoceroses, horses and camels, these can be traced back to a period when they drew closely together, indicating a single origin.

It naturally follows that Dr. Scott inclines to the theory of a monophyletic origin of the mammalia; that is to say, the postulate that all mammals are descended from a common stock, this stock probably developed from the reptiles. This latter conjecture, however, is quite outside the scope of Dr. Scott's work, which endeavors to trace in detail the development of certain mammalian orders only from the more definite period of the lower Eocene.

As regards the course of development, whether it be direct or fluctuating, Dr. Scott favors the latter view.

> When any long-lived phylum, made up of numerous well-preserved members, is studied, the observer cannot fail to be impressed by the straightforward course of the evolutionary process, as though the animals were consciously making for a predetermined goal, which, needless to say, they were not. A minute cusp makes its appearance on a tooth, enlarges steadily in each succeeding genus, and ultimately becomes a very important element in the pattern, and in this series of changes there is no oscillation backward and forward.

On the other hand, Dr. Scott is open-minded, as he needs must be, when dealing with a history in which gaps so great and so numerous must be presupposed, and admits the possibility of fluctuation in development, quoting the instance of the possibility of changes in the canine teeth of camels, growing first larger, then smaller. With the definition of the ancestral camels of the middle and lower Eocene, this point might be established, and the Matthews theory in regard to the origin of cats from sabre-tooth tigers upheld. Dr. Scott cautiously admits the possibility.

It is with pleasure that the careful

STUDIES IN MILTON AND
AN ESSAY ON POETRY
By ALDEN SAMPSON, M. A.
(Haverford College and Harvard University.)
Illustrated with a wood cut by Timothy Cole, N. A., from the bust of Milton at Christ's College, Cambridge, England. 8vo., 320 pp., uncut. $2.00 net.

The studies which compose this volume deal mainly with the middle period of Milton's poetical career, and are an examination of his development as a poet and of the various circumstances which shaped and brought to its final effectiveness his lifelong purpose to write a great epic poem. These years, although in themselves almost barren of poetic result, were vital and formative ones, educating and enriching his nature, enabling him finally to speak with commanding power as poet, statesman, moralist, and impassioned lover of liberty.

reader will note Dr. Scott's refusal to speculate at length upon the history of man in the Western Hemisphere, although a treatment of this subject which properly belongs to the anthropologist and the ethnologist would undoubtedly make the work "popular." While there is no reason why man should not have formed a part of the mammalian immigration from the Old World during the pleistocene epoch, the many "proofs" of his existence in this country at that period are utterly unfounded.

In fact, "Land Mammals of the Western Hemisphere" is not for the average, but for the exceptional lay reader. Any one endowed with that scientific imagination which can clothe simply presented facts, which can grasp the tremendous significance of a change in molar pattern, for instance, will find Dr. Scott's work intensely interesting. In addition, the numerous illustrations and diagrams, many of them showing animals as restored from rare fossils just uncovered, and presenting a horde of the bizarre and almost incredible creatures of earlier epochs, make the book a most interesting document, even to those not well versed in the science on which it is based.

WE AMERICANS

An Amusing Comment on Us by Mrs. Alec-Tweedie

MRS. ALEC-TWEEDIE always sees a vast amount of interesting things when she visits us. Perhaps it is that she sees no more than any other normally observant person, but she has a happy faculty for telling about what she sees in a most amusing and often pertinent fashion. Many of the observations in "America As I Saw It," which has for a sub-title "America Revisited," have already tickled the fancy of readers of THE NEW YORK TIMES SUNDAY MAGAZINE, where they recently appeared. It is always nice to have some one lam epithets at you, dissect your characteristics, blame or praise you. It is akin to the individual passion for having one's palm read. And although Mrs. Alec-Tweedie remarks on many a page of this, her latest commentary, that our chief fault is hypersensitiveness, we are going to buy her book in enormous numbers, just for the pleasure of having her tell us so.

In fact, we prefer to hear about our faults, the blacker the better. Mrs. Alec-Tweedie finds plenty of them. Take New York. The dirtiest city in the world, unspeakably dirty, and the writer points her finger accusingly at a Street Cleaning Department that allows "dustbins full of garbage, breeding disease," to stand outside the door. And as for the gentlemen in white, wearing Indian sun helmets, "who run about the New York streets with large spoons cleaning the road," they remind Mrs. Alec-Tweedie of nothing so much as the men in St. Petersburg who cool the streets with a ridiculous little pail of water and a mop.

Transportation in New York. Mrs. Alec-Tweedie has one word for it; vile. Sometimes she says, perfectly vile. The one-storied cars, instead of the three-decker affairs of London that sort passengers according to their destination, the pack and jam of people, the noise and clatter and withal the slowness of them seem barbarous to her. Bumped, crowded, "transferred," and invariably delayed, she has her grave doubts about this New York hustle. In fact on another page she brands it as a myth. Witness the fact that we always say automobile instead of motor. Witness a few other things; that we are invariably unpunctual, thereby wasting those moments which we "gather like pence"; that one has to walk miles occasionally before discovering a "pillar box" into which one has difficulty in poking one's "post"—indeed, there are many all too pertinent paragraphs on the subject of delivery of things, delivery of groceries, of dry goods, of letters, of "express" packages.

Mrs. Alec-Tweedie sees a great deal, and a varied deal of American "society" when she visits us. The way in which Americans entertain puzzles her. They live in subdued light, she asserts, and they entertain in the dark. Even for luncheons the curtains are drawn, and a dubious light let through Tiffany glass, beautiful it must be admitted, assists in concealing the identity of one's friends. Perhaps we get the habit, our guest theorizes, because our wretched apartment dining rooms look out of their blank windows only at the stone walls across the shaft.

Correct and sumptuous she finds American methods of entertaining. Original never. It is bad form in the United States to be original. Mrs. Alec-Tweedie claims, a bit sadly. Menus are the same, clothes are the same, conversation is the same. This applies mostly to the women, of course. But it need not be inferred that the writer failed to find her American sisters charming. She notes much that is peculiarly admirable and characteristic of the American women as she met them in this country. Fortunately, she remarks that they are "smartly" dressed, that they wear their clothes excellently. It is a point of pride and lucky Mrs. Alec-Tweedie is in perceiving it. The voices of the American women, she says, are better than they were ten years ago; the high nasal tones, the unmusical American laugh, the flatness of pronunciation are all becoming softened. She is thunderstruck at the ease with which American women rise to their feet and say pretty, brief, and graceful nothings at their club meetings and at public affairs generally. "To say one cannot speak is an awful a crime as to own one has not been in Boston." She finds many pleasant little ways of American women with one another; they try so hard, she observes, to be genuinely nice to each other, they give each other such dainty luncheons. She likes, too, the pretty way they have of giving flowers "for everything but divorce." She notes, not without amazement, the tyranny of the young girl in this country. The importance attached to a young girl's début astounds her; the way in which the chatterer monopolizes the conversation hardly pleases her, but she admits, withal, that the youn American lady is a very good thing to look upon, straight and slim, and needing only a few generations of culture to give her an excellent poise.

So much for New York America, for that matter for Chicago America. It is Boston that Mrs. Alec-Tweedie calls the other America. "Boston I saw, and Boston conquered me," she declares enthusiastically, and even the New Yorker feels a thrill of pride at being in the same country with a blessed old village that can call forth so many pleasant adjectives. Not that the visitor finds Boston English and likes it accordingly; it is thoroughly American, but quite other-American. Comfortable and cozy, sufficiently efficient and not lacking in "hustle," "a city of crooked roads and straight deeds." Boston creeps right into Mrs. Alec-Tweedie's receptive heart. We judge she had a very good time in Boston; at all events, she saw and appreciated a vast amount, playgrounds, libraries, slums, the Christian Science churches, graveyards—that is in itself a considerable achievement—lunchrooms of all sorts, galleries, with especial mention in the latter connection of Mrs. Jack Gardiner's; which, for some reason, she describes enthusiastically but does not name.

THE ROMANCE OF LACE

An Art That Brings to Literature Glimpses of Italy's Courts and Peasantry

By FRANCES MORRIS.
(Curator of Laces, Metropolitan Museum.)

THE mention of Bergamo, that remote hamlet in Northern Italy, always suggests an atmosphere of quiet far removed from urban activities. Yet this same little town with its mediaeval environment is a live art centre, the home of the Instituto Italiano d'Arti Grafiche, to whose splendid work we are indebted for many valuable monographs on Italian subjects, and whose presses in 1908 produced the original edition of Signora Ricci's splendid work on Italian lace, now published for the first time in English. While much of the charm of the author's facile pen has been lost in the somewhat prosaic translation, nevertheless the material presented in the two sumptuous volumes will be most welcome to the student to whom the Italian version would be a sealed book. The illustrations themselves, of which there are 700 in photogravure and color, represent an enormous amount of research, and offer a comprehensive history of the art in Italy from its earliest days to modern times. In these one may view the priceless treasures of Italian collections selected by the trained eye of an expert. Lace collections, both public and private, have been carefully studied and their choicest bits reproduced; even the glorious rose point of St. Mark's has been made accessible to the camera of the author, whose gracious charm seems to have vanquished all strongholds and emerged triumphant. Supplementing the hundreds of plates showing the fabric in its various techniques are contemporary portraits of the different periods gathered from the various European galleries, several of which are reproduced in exquisite color prints, from negatives made by the Government photographer.

Seldom has an author been so advantageously placed, so splendidly equipped for her subject as Signora Ricci. A Milanese by birth, she married Corrado Ricci of the Brera Museum, who later became Director of the Uffizi and is now Director General of Fine Arts at Rome. Gifted with a charmingly feminine personality and an altruistic point of view, she has long been actively interested in husbanding the native handicraft of her countrywomen. Being naturally endowed with what may be termed the true "lace instinct," her interest centred in textile fabrics, and her untiring efforts have availed much in the way of securing to small local museums valuable specimens of native handiwork in the line of primitive weaves and needlework. In the Scuola Italiano of Rome she has also shown an active interest, furnishing typical examples of pure Italian work for the use of the lace workers in the reproduction of the antique fabric.

In the work under consideration it is a delight to take a quiet survey of the fascinating matter so attractively presented. In the first volume the facile pen of the author leads one deftly through the intricate mazes of the historical side of her subject, treating of the birth and development of the art in her native land with peculiar charm; with scholarly attainment she traces the influences that produced the techniques peculiar to certain localities, and at the close of the second volume leaves the reader unwearied and eager for more, to tarry on the sunny slopes of the Abruzzi, where the comely peasants still ply the bobbins as did their forebears in years gone by. The keen interest of the author in the peasant work of her country leads her to hope that it may in time be possible to reproduce, at small cost, a series of reprints from this work that may be available for use in out-of-the-way districts, binding up certain of the plates that might be used as patterns; for instance, some of the beautiful illustrations of cutwork and others showing the bobbin edges of simple technique but pure design, as an incentive to those patient toilers who lack the inspiration to venture beyond the simple forms they have always known.

While, in the first volume especially, we find much fresh matter as regards technical terms, it is to be regretted that the different stitches constantly referred to could not have been more clearly defined. Such plates of stitch details as are furnished in Hungerford Pollen's "Seven Centuries of Lace," are most helpful to the uninitiated. It is also unfortunate that in the English translation of punto tagliato a fogliami the French term "rose point" is constantly employed, whereas this applies more strictly to the finer punto a roseline, not to the punto tagliato a fogliami, or "gros point." As an adjunct to the study of costume, however, the work is a valuable adjunct, presenting in the portraits of the titled personages a marvelous array of sixteenth and seventeenth century magnificence. In the earlier portraits one finds an abundance of rich jewels worn over gowns of velvet elaborately embroidered in gold; gradually one's attention is directed to a simple insertion of cutwork introduced at the throat or wrists, or as in the case of Bronzino's portrait of Eleonora di Toledo (1550 circa) one sees a neckpiece of the mezza mandolina. In fact, in all portraits of the middle sixteenth century one finds elaborate embroidery in gold and color, such as is shown in the superb camicie of Italian noblewomen. The Metropolitan Museum is fortunate in possessing several wonderful examples of these which originally formed part of the trousseau of a Sicilian noblewoman, and which show the gorgeous style of needlework that resulted in the issuance of certain sumptuary laws, prohibiting the use of gold and silver on household linen and wearing apparel. On this subject Signora Ricci has much to say of interest, and one gains an insight into the unhygienic conditions that existed even in the homes of the wealthier classes when domestic science was still an unexplored field and the laws of hygiene as yet in embryo. With the enforcement of the various edicts arose a demand for more simple ornamentation, and from this the author shows how a vogue was developed for the white embroidery and cutwork that in time developed into punto in aria and the later Venetian laces. These, in all their beauty are dwelt upon at length, the treasures of Italian collections having been placed at the disposition of the author in order that the world at large might realize the incomparable beauty of the Venetian fabric.

Much of the material of this section, while familiar ground already covered in previous publications on the history of lace, appears in a new light when dealt with from an Italian standpoint. In each of the groups covered by the first volume, which divides needlework into three general divisions—Mondano, Fili tirati, Buratto; Punto a Reticello, and Punto in aria—one finds much that not only brings out new features of the different techniques but that will prove most welcome to the connoisseur intent upon locating the provenance of individual specimens. Again one has to regret that a confusion of terms is liable to arise from the too literal translation of the word reticello, which is given as "mesh net." There is nothing suggestive of mesh in the geometric laces of the early period when the worker, still dependent upon the linen foundation of cutwork, had not ventured beyond the confines of the geometric framework resulting from the warp and woof of the linen. As the art developed, the workers, venturing upon curves and scrolling designs for punto in aria, evolved patterns that resulted in a graceful foliated scroll connected by short tie bars, or "brides," that served simply to hold the pattern in place. In Venetian needlepoint nothing in the slightest degree resembling mesh appeared until the eighteenth century, when competition with the French marked a distinct change in the character of the Venetian product; for it was the French who introduced the close arrangement of brides that resulted in the hexagonal groundwork of the point de France, later supplanted by the laces with mesh grounds created to meet the demand of a fashion that required lace of a lighter texture and patterns less ornate.

In the second volume the scene shifts and one is transported to an atmosphere less suggestive of the palace or of ecclesiastical circles; needlepoint laces must always be associated with the wealthier classes, just as bobbin laces are distinctly of the peasant realm and suggest the free life of the open air. The author vividly describes the natural setting of the peasant life, the isolated villages, where, after a day of toil beginning at sunrise, the Italian women turn to their lace pillows for rest and recreation. Interesting as well is the description of Salo, where the borders of the lake are white with the bleaching thread used all over Italy by her never-tiring lace workers. Here for centuries the different flax centres have sent their product for bleaching, and among the towns enumerated it is fitting that one should find Bergamo, the same Bergamo whose press was called upon to publish this history of Italy's greatest fabric. Of the origin of bobbin lace Signora Ricci has much to say. She fails to find in Coptic fragments any suggestions of bobbin work, although rumors have recently reached us from Brussels of a fragment claimed by the authorities of the Musée des Arts Decoratifs to be of undoubted bobbin technique. For Venice she claims precedence not only in needlepoint but as well in the invention of bobbin lace, basing her claim on an extract from the work of Froschower of Zurich, who, writing in 1560, makes the following statement:

> From among the divers arts invented and practiced for the good of humanity we wish to mention the art of making bobbin lace, which arose in our country about twenty-five years ago and quickly took root amongst us. It was imported into Germany from Italy for the first time by Venetian merchants in 1536.

According to this statement, the historic figure of Barbara Uttmann, whose monument credits her with the invention of bobbin lace, must be set aside, except in so much as she did a splendid work in introducing and organizing a

EDWARD HOWARD GRIGGS
The Philosophy of Art

What is Art? What does Art do to the artist who creates? What does Art do to the student who appreciates? These questions underlie this work which deals with sculpture, painting, music and poetry. The author's remark that it is "not a restatement of criticism and philosophy, but the condensed result of twenty-five years' study of works of art in each of the four fields, recording and interpreting what these masterpieces have done to my senses, emotions, imagination and intellect," will stimulate interest among the large following that awaits any utterance from his magnetic pen. $1.50 net; by mail, $1.60.

PAUL HERVIEU
The Labyrinth

This represents the best in modern French drama. James Huneker speaks of it as "a great section of throbbing, real life." "In no other play has Hervieu preserved so great a height of passionate emotional power, nor exposed the relentless working out of human motives struggling with forces greater than themselves; nowhere else has he sustained his interest and developed his story simultaneously with so sure a hand," to quote the introduction which covers Hervieu's dramas and outlines his life. $1.00 net; by mail, $1.10.

AUGUST STRINDBERG
By the Open Sea

In this, Strindberg's best novel, the characters develop through words and deeds. The background is woven from the lives of fisherfolk into a striking tapestry of revenge, love, hate, prejudice and superstition. The unfolding of the hero's mind as it responds to modern scientific thought, and the psychology of Marie's course, are notable accomplishments. Nature life in the North—its fish, vegetation, rocks, its mirages and winds and waters—is delightfully presented. This aspect of Strindberg will attract those who know only his dramatic and self-revelatory works. $1.25 net; by mail, $1.35.

profitable feminine industry among the peasants of the Hartz Mountains. As to a Flemish origin for bobbin lace, the author claims that had Flanders produced lace at the time when Froschower was writing, the merchants of Zurich would have been more likely to come in contact with the Flemish industry than the Venetian, as the Swiss traded freely with Flanders and would not have waited to have the art introduced by Venetian merchants, as there recorded.

On the legendary side a slightly different version of the origin myth is given, which we quote in full, although here again the translation gives but a faint suggestion of the charm of the original in the mother tongue. The Flemish myth is courteously given precedence:

Once upon a time in Bruges there lived a poor girl, loving and beloved by a boy even poorer than herself; notwithstanding unceasing toil, they were unable to earn sufficient to enable them to marry. Serena—that was the girl's name—seeing her old mother languishing in poverty, made a vow to the Virgin that, should she descend from Heaven to help them with a miracle, Serena herself would give up the boy she loved. Shortly afterward, the following occurrence befell: One day whilst Serena and her lover were sitting under a tree a spider's web fell into Serena's lap; it was woven so finely that the girl's attention was arrested and she said to her companion: "Why should I not copy this design with the finest thread I can find for my bobbin?" The lad stretched the girl's apron, containing the web, upon four twigs of the tree and Serena took it home, where she set herself to copy it at once. As her thread persisted in tangling and knotting, the lad, not knowing he was working against his own interests, invented a method of keeping each strand firm and separate by twirling the ends round tiny morsels of stick. Serena's work was most successful and found favor in the eyes of the wealthy ladies of Bruges; and the humble cottage was filled with gold, but not with happiness. Anxious to fulfill the condition of her vow, Serena at length found strength to tell her betrothed she could never become his wife. But the Virgin Mary would not exact the sacrifice of the girl's happiness, and on the anniversary of her first gift she dropped into Serena's lap another web, in which were woven words absolving her from fulfillment of her vow.

The Venetian version is as follows:

The daughter of a fisherman had a lover, who was also a fisherman. One dreadful day the Doge of Venice declared war on the Sultan and summoned all young men (whether in love or no) to follow his banner to the East. At the moment of bidding his girl farewell, wishing, perhaps, to hide his tear-filled eyes, our sailor plunged into the sea, and bring a lovely seaweed floating by plucked it to give to the girl as a last pledge of love. Whilst the lad was fighting by land and sea his betrothed passed the weary hours in netting for him the most beautiful fishing net ever seen on the shores of the Adriatic, made of thread as fine as hair and strong as steel, with each mesh of exactly perfect dimensions, the work seemed to have been done by magic fingers. Ceaselessly busy with her net the girl never took her eyes off the seaweed, which was always fresh and beautiful and green, unfading as the love that had picked and received it in that far-off day.

One morning, see! the net is finished, the last mesh made perfect, and home comes the warrior, as unlooked for as he is welcome, whole and hearty in every limb. Half crazed with delight in seeing him once more, the girl spread her net in the midst of all the rejoicing villagers. * * * Marvelous to relate in the midst of the meshes there was woven a lovely weed similar in every detail to the love token snatched from the bottom of the sea. Thus the Flemish laces sprang from the miraculous cobweb and the Venetian from the delicate weed woven by love into the precise and formal fishing net.

The bobbin work of Italy is grouped under four heads, according to the four principal centres, with many plates showing the local characteristics of each fabric. There is the Venetian with its "Gothic" points, the Genoese with its rose medallions of seedlike petals, (here again an unfortunate and misleading term, "rose point," appears;) the Milanese with its ribbonlike motifs, doubtless suggested by the flourishing trade carried on in the silk ribbon industry, and the Abruzzi, with its primitive patterns and coarse, heavy thread, made for practical use, strong and firm like the sturdy peasants who work it.

Not since the production of Mrs. Bury Palliser's "History of Lace" has so important a volume been written on a subject dear to the heart of womankind, and all lace lovers owe a debt of gratitude to Signora Ricci for her scholarly work. One cannot but hope, however, that in future editions the publishers of this English version will give greater care to the revision of proof and the verification of dates, as in many instances there have been slips in the translation of the cinquecento and seicento, which are most unfortunate. An index also would add greatly to the value of the work.

IN AUTOGRAPH LAND

Bits of Literary Gossip from the Late Adrian H. Joline's Unique Collection

THERE are in this world just two classes of people—those who understand and those who don't. To the former belong those who collect things, anything—Japanese pipes, perhaps, as did Lafcadio Hearn, or autographs, as did Mr. Joline. No matter what their individual joy in life, they understand, one and all, the collector's craving and the collector's happiness. The other class is composed of all those who do not collect and therefore are disposed to feel sarcastically superior to those who do. But even they might read Mr. Joline's charming book with pleasure, even with unexpected understanding of what it is that makes a collector love to collect, and with some insight into the nature of his delight in his avocation. As for the initiated, they will find it absorbing.

Mr. Joline, who died about a year ago, had previously published several books upon somewhat similar themes. The manuscript of this volume was found among his posthumous papers. But it was already so nearly ready for the press that only a few slight rearrangements were necessary to prepare it for publication. His collection of autographs, original manuscripts, letters, and documents was so large and important that it has been appraised by the State Controller's office at a valuation of $70,692.

It is quite impossible for the reader of "Rambles in Autograph Land" to escape the contagion of Mr. Joline's interest in his collection. Each item has been for him not merely an item and nothing more, but a significant piece of human activity, full of human interest in itself, having a background of causes and complications worth thinking about, and consequences, real or potential, that allure for discussion. These various items evidently had for him their individual value as items and he knew and delighted in it to the collector's full. But their chief value, that from which his greatest pleasure arose, was their human interest. And because he felt this way and put his feeling into what he wrote he is able to make his readers enjoy his pages, whether or not they have previously sympathized with the collector's viewpoint.

Mr. Joline wanders about in his own collection, opens one portfolio after another, shows its choicest treasures, and tells stories of how he got them, or of how some other collector got something similar, recounts the history of this or that letter, makes shrewd or tolerant or humorous comment upon its writer or upon the times in which he lived. De Quincey "had such a store of reminiscences of things that never happened." Shelley "manifestly was afflicted with a mania for 'rebates'." Richard Henry Lee "seems to have had the unfortunate habit of 'betting on the wrong horse.'" "There was always a bit of the charlatan about Poe, despite his flashes of brilliancy."

In addition to the chapters which tell of and quote from his own collections, Mr. Joline writes with much knowledge and genial humor of facsimiles and forgeries, the autograph market, collectors and their methods, private vendors and their ways, the autograph in literature. The opening chapter on "Unread Books" will surely tempt onward even the reader who is inclined to sneer at the collector's hobby and the final section on "Two New England Philosophers" will shock all those who hold with New England's literary traditions.

Many portraits and manuscript facsimilies illustrate the volume.

RAMBLES IN AUTOGRAPH LAND. By Adrian H. Joline. Illustrated. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

WOMAN VS. LADY

In a series of clever and diverting essays Emily James Putnam gives us the history of "The Lady," or as the author defines her "the female of the favored social class," "the beneficiary of monogamy," and "almost the only picturesque survival in a social order which tends less and less to tolerate the exceptional." The gentleman in contrast is a negligible quantity, for he holds his position first and foremost by virtue of his manhood; but the lady holds sway solely through her "ladyship," and it is only of late that woman in general has come to the fore.

The preliminary pages of the book explain how the lady came to be, how from a free rover, the equal of man, she came into a state of subjection, and has finally evolved into one of the luxuries of modern life—like any other object of art, "her uselessness is her use." The following sketches outline the position of the lady through the ages in various typical societies. They picture in phases of her daily life, show what her education has been, how time has changed her ideals, her occupations and her pleasures, and note the terms she has contrived to make with the very special conditions of her existence. The "lady" is always an interesting topic of discussion, and the present volume proves entertaining, often brilliant, and with a keen and pungent vein of humor throughout.

CHRISTMAS, CHILDREN AND BOOKS

Holiday Season Brings a Horde of Fairy Tales and Pretty Pictures

THERE are certain things which are woven into a delightfully heterogeneous conglomeration in our Christmas thoughts. Church chimes and the fresh odor of evergreens, roast turkey and plum pudding, Santa Claus and rows of stockings in the chimney place, bonbons, and books. It is a cheerful kaleidoscope, good for big people and little people, and if we stopped to think and be thankful there is probably nothing that we should be really more thankful for, the big or the little ones of us, than for books. They are a nice holiday lot, the books, and none more so than those for the children.

And such a very nice book to start the children off with this year! The grown-ups will be wild with envy, for it is a book they would never dare to buy for themselves and no other grown-up would have the temerity to give it, and the only chance to enjoy it is if there is a child in the house. Of course any one would guess what it is—those dear old jingles of Mother Goose and this particular one—"The Arthur Rackham Mother Goose." (The Century Co. $2.50.)

The book is a large one and there are all of the old familiar rhymes and a good many more. Mr. Rackham wisely says in a preface that Mother Goose is indefinite and every one may add a well-loved jingle, and they are all put under the same comfortable and homelike name. In his own family, he says, there was no complete Mother Goose book, and the different sets of verses which he has put together in this volume are all those for which he cared the most and were handed down by the elder members of the family. Arthur Rackham is a famous illustrator of children's books, but in this Mother Goose he has done unusually delightful things and made the most fascinating surprises. The charm commences on the book cover, where is Mother Goose herself astride of a gander, a group of her child admirers gazing up as she and her steed ride the clouds.

The surprise begins at the title page, which has every appearance of a nice old sampler worked with little straight trees and a little Noah's ark house. Then comes the index, which is almost the best of all, for below the little black silhouette figures at the top of it, peeping out here and there all through the list, are tiny pictures of the little Mother Goose people. There are twelve lovely full-page pictures in color and over sixty in black and white. A sad little Bo-Peep telling her sorrows to a crow is one of the most charming in black and white and the most weird and delightful shows where

There was an old woman lived under the hill,
And if she's not gone she lives there still.

Here is a rhyme that is one of the more unfamiliar ones in the book:

Pussy cat mole
Jumped over a coal,
And in her best petticoat burned a great hole.
Poor pussy weeping, she'll have no more milk
Until her best petticoat's mended with silk.

Another nice book, this one of the long ones in shape, is "Our Old Nursery Rhymes," the original tunes harmonized by Alfred Moffat, illustrations by H. Willebeek Le Mair. (David McKay.) The book has highly calendered paper, a picture or a pair of pictures on one side and the words and the music on the other. The pictures are in very delicate tones and delightful.

A charming holiday book set is in two volumes, the pictures by Jessie Willcox Smith. (Duffield.) The first is "A Child's Book of Old Verses," selected by the artist, the work of well-known writers—Robert Herrick, Keats, Coleridge, Jane Taylor, Bunner, Tennyson, Tadema, Kate Greenaway, and among others there is Isaac Watts's "How Doth the Little Busy Bee" and "Let Dogs Delight to Bark and Bite." There are ten beautiful full-page colored pictures, and a little girl of olden times, with poke bonnet and pantalettes, is rolling her hoop inside the cover pages. The second volume, "A Child's Book of Stories," has the familiar fairy tales, selected and arranged by Penrhyn W. Coussens. The two books are put together in a box showing the little old-time girl on the outside.

The Story of the Chanticleer," by Edmund Rostand, is adapted from the French by Florence Yates Hannis and illustrated by J. A. Shepherd, (F. A. Stokes Company, $1.50.) The pictures show a combination of vivid reds and subdued tones. Chanticleer himself appears, en bust, on the cover, a gallant and pompous bird, quite different from the subdued and drooping cock shown later on when "a feeling of deep discouragement swept over him." All the friends and enemies of Chanticleer appear in the pictures as well as in the text.

The beautiful "Fairy Tales" by Oscar Wilde (Putnam, $1.25) are brought out among the books of the season, and they are well worth reading. The first is of "The Happy Prince," who, while he lived, knew nothing but pleasure, but as a statue, high on a pedestal, he can see nothing but the misery of his people. Then the little swallow comes to him and becomes his messenger, takes the ruby from his sword to a poor seamstress, one of the beautiful sapphires of his blue eyes to a poor young writer in distress and another to a poor match girl. The fine gold with which the statue of the Happy Prince is covered goes bit by bit to others of his poor until the little children's faces grow rosier and they play happy games in the street. The little swallow dies and the lead heart of the statue snaps in two. Later, when the great God in heaven sends His angel for the two most precious things in the city, there is brought to Him the leaden heart of the statue of the Happy Prince and the dead bird. "And the bird sings for evermore and the lead heart of the Happy Prince praises for evermore in Paradise—the little bird and the heart of lead have done their best and lived for the joy and happiness of others."

Rhymes of the Japanese In a book with a Japanese cover and pictures made by Japanese artists is "Blossoms from a Japanese Garden: A Book of Child Verses," by Mary Feoollosa, (F. A. Stokes Company, $1.50.) There are many pictures in colors and the verses run like this one, the first in the story of "A Shopping Expedition":

Little Miss Yuki and Pretty Miss Ko
And dear little Hanabi San Went shopping one day
In the leisurely way
Which is most approved in Japan.

A nice, thick book with 312 closely written pages and many pictures in colors and in black and white is "The Strange Story Book," by Mrs. Andrew Lang, edited by Andrew Lang, (Longmans, Green & Co., $1.50.) There is a red cover with a group of queer looking people done in gold upon it.

This is the twenty-fifth of the Lang wonder story books, and has tales of many lands, with a preface by Mrs. Lang, who says the twenty-fifth book will be the last of these published in twenty-five consecutive years. There is a portrait of Mr. Lang as a frontispiece, and all sorts of good stories follow.

A large and delightful book, which is not a new one, is from the Swedish of Selma Lagerlöf, written to use as supplementary reading in the schools of Sweden; "The Wonderful Adventures of Nils," translated by Velma Swanson Howard, with very lovely picture by Mary Hamilton Frye (Doubleday, Page & Co.) The book tells much of the natural history of Sweden, for Selma Lagerlöf devoted three years to nature study and to observing bird and animal life and to the folk lore and legends of the country. They are all woven into the tale of Nils, a selfish and naughty little boy who, by his unkindness to an elf, is changed into one himself and starts off unwittingly for a long journey on the back of Goosey Gander.

A twelfth century fairy romance is "The Pipes of Clovis," by Grace Duffie Boylan, (Little, Brown & Co., $1.) The story tells of the King Karl of Swabia and the marauding Huns. Clovis of the woods, however, the forester's son, has nothing in common with the warlike people of that time. But he can tame all animals and the gnomes, shoeing with fairy shoes the leader of a herd of wild horses. Clovis takes him, and with his pipes pipes away the horses of the invaders of his country. There is a pretty princess who visits Clovis—and the shy boy, sympathizing with a young creature lost in the woods, makes her a pair of doeskin sandals, places beside her as she sleeps a leaf of fresh berries and marks her way from the woods with a spear and the petals of scarlet blossoms.

A book which could not be omitted from a holiday list, though it is plain in appearance, is "Children's Book of Christmas Stories," edited by Asa Don Dickinson and Ada M. Skinner. (Doubleday, Page & Co., $1.25.) The stories are all good ones by different authors—Charles Dickens, Hans Christian Andersen, Mary E. Wilkins Freeman, Olive Thorne Miller, Elia W. Peattie, John

Strange Winter, and many others. There is only one picture, the frontispiece, "Christmas Jollity," from Dickens's "Christmas Carol."

A gay little book for the little people and amusing for the big people is "The Ballads of the Be-Ba-Boes," by D. K. Stevens, illustrated by Katharine Maynadier Daland. (Houghton Mifflin Co., $1.50.) It is a book of rhymes filled full of pictures of the Be-Ba-Boes who are lively roly-poly folk. The tale begins with

A Chinese Mandarin named Chow
Renowned for his Chesterfieldian bow, who issues a challenge to a bowing match in the public square. Now the Chow Chinaman is one of those bowing Chinamen to be seen in the shops, but what chance has he with a Be-Ba-Boe?

The signal strikes and they both turn to,
They bowed till the face of each was blue.

The Chesterfieldian one bows his head straight off and the Be-Ba-Boes go rolling happily through the book.

Of course, every one longs for a Kewpie these days, and there is a chance to have not one, but many of them in Rose O'Neill's "The Kewpies and Their Book," (Stokes, $1.25.) The Kewpies are not only in the big pictures, but they riot everywhere, on the inside cover pages, through the index, through the text, wherever there is a white space there is one of the dear little people. There are the funniest grown-ups and children in the pictures, and the gay little rhymes are the right kind to match up with the Kewpies.

"The Torn Book," by A. Z. Baker (D. Appleton & Co., $1.25) is a trick book like that of the Peter Newell "Hole Book." Apparently the full-page color pictures are complete, but turn a page and there you find a slashed corner to every other picture, sometimes an upper corner, sometimes a lower one, but one picture fitting into the other so that both are perfect.

A real French story for the little people is "Girls and Boys, Scenes from the Town and Country," by Anatole France, with illustrations in color and black and white by Boutet de Monvel, (Duffield.). There are different stories in the book, all written in English, but set into the full page colored picture on every other leaf is a full description of it in French. The illustrations are distinctively French, little French children in looks and dress, and the coloring is the coloring of the French artist. Little peasant children are shown with wooden sabots on their feet, the boys wearing long smocks and carrying quaintly shaped baskets on their shoulders.

A nature book is "Sonny Boy's Day at the Zoo," (Century Company, 90 cents,) verses by Ella Bentley Arthur and pictures from photographs by Stanley Disbrow Arthur. It is a real history of Sonny Boy at the New York Zoo. There are excellent animal pictures on every page, and Sonny Boy, the little two-year-old, is in many of them. The book is a picture history of the animals.

Another nature story of a different kind is "The Three Bears of Porcupine Ridge," by Jean M. Thompson, illustrated by Charles Copeland, (W. A. Wilde Company, $1.25.) It is a continuous story of the wild dwellers of forest, marsh, and lake. It tells "Why the Weasel Never Sleeps," "Where the Partridge Drums," "How Solomon Owl Became Wise," and there are the many adventures which the creatures of the wild always meet. The pictures are excellent, the animals about which the different chapters speak appearing in attractive line drawings on the title pages of each chapter.

An excellent story by Katharine Lee Bates is "In Sunny Spain with Pilarica and Rafael," (Dutton, $1.) It tells the story of these two children, a vivid one, and at the same time depicts the life in Spain, the customs and manners of the people. The many Spanish riddles of "Grandpa" are not the least interesting part. A very good girls' story and travel book is "The Four Corners in Egypt," by Amy E. Blanchard, (George W. Jacobs & Co., $1.50.) This contains all sorts of travel adventures and Christmas in a foreign land.

HER FIRST SEASON

CONFESSIONS OF A DEBUTANTE. Anonymous. Illustrated by R. M. Crosby. Houghton Mifflin Company.

A bit topheavy in its title is this graceful little book for the holiday season. So innocent and young are the letters from the girl enjoying her first season in New York to her mother in Paris that to call them "confessions" seems rather a misfit in description. She is a nice girl, and the mind and heart she discloses to her mother are very sweet and fair. She takes a serious view of life, also, notwithstanding the zest with which she enjoys her good times. It is all done with a certain dainty realism that makes it very girlish and charming. The portrait she unconsciously draws of herself in her revealing letters is that of such a winsome young woman it is no wonder she has so many opportunities of marriage during her first season. The illustrations, from line drawings, are notably good.

A MILD MASQUERADE

HURRYING FATE AND GERALDINE. By Florence Morse Kingsley. Franklin Bigelow Corporation. $1.25.

A mildly amusing little story about a girl, a garden, and a young man who for purposes of his own borrowed an elderly one's name, is this tale entitled "Hurrying Fate and Geraldine." Geraldine's grandfather, old Judge Osborne, had left the beautiful house and grounds inherited from his grandfather to his two daughters, but no money. So when they received a letter from a law firm telling them that the Judge had died owing a client of theirs $3,000, and demanding immediate payment, they were naturally much perturbed. Of course it all comes out right in the end, with two weddings and general rejoicing.

MODERN RUSSIA

Mr. Alexinsky's Depressing Picture of Present Conditions

GREGOR ALEXINSKY is the latest prophet of an imminent death struggle between Russian bureaucracy and the commercialized, half-starved and bot-headed Frankenstein of the moujik. He tells us that Russia to-day presents the picture of the Asiatic despotism of the bureaucrats and of what is in many respects a demoralized commercial civilization struggling for the whiphand—the strange spectacle of a Tamerlane ruling a nation that has railroads, telegraphs, telephones, and wireless.

The first part of his book is devoted to a general sketch of the historical development of Russia, its geography, races, and the evolution of the State and of the national mind, up to the freeing of the serfs in 1861. That year saw the birth of the modern period, when the poor of mediaevalism was first stirred by the currents of modern life introduced by Russia's participation in the commerce of the world and the development of her own resources. The author discusses lucidly the growth of capital in this period, the problem of rural economy, the agrarian question, and the rise of the intelligentsia and of the Nihilist. The remaining chapters deal with the organization and resources of the Absolute Power, the Japanese War, the Revolution of 1905, literature, and the religious and national questions.

The problem of Russia to-day, as M. Alexinsky sees it, is due to a conflict between opposing economic types by force of which the national conflict is becoming a social conflict. He classifies these economic types as: The Absolute Power—the royal family, and the administrative, religious and military aristocracy; the new proletariat of commerce and manufacture constituting 16 per cent. of the population, mainly dwellers in the cities, and the peasantry who represent the passing Russian spirit and life though upon whose labors in the fields has always depended the success of the empire.

As matters stand to-day, M. Alexinsky claims, the bureaucracy is as much in power as ever, despite the revolution of 1905, for the first two Dumas were cowed and driven out of existence, and the present, fearing Siberian exile, is treading cautiously in the footprints of the reactionaries. The great mass of the population, the farming element, is in a more unhappy position to-day than under serfdom. The efforts of the zemtvos, or local governments, have been repressed, and the methods of cultivation have not perceptibly improved. To the old mir system of village government, says the author, can be traced the present condition of the moujik, to that and to his three hundred years of serfdom. Yet this peasant, he fears, cannot be relied upon in the hour of revolt. His spirit has been broken by lack of food. He assumes a paradoxical attitude; although he hates his immediate superiors, he holds his Tsar in great affection, suspecting his clergy of gross corruption, yet he accepts the teaching and counsel of the church with childlike devotion. Besides, he has lost none of his old reverence for the uniform. To another class the Russian people must look for deliverance, the author says, to the body of workers in the factories that is yearly increasing in numbers and importance.

It is interesting to read what the author has to say of his national literature. "Social literature," he calls it, and his explanation justifies the epitome:

> For the majority of Russian writers, literary work replaces political work, the latter being almost impossible; and the conflict of the various literary currents acquires in Russia the character of a political struggle, a character unknown to Western literature. * * * Even in lyric poetry that which especially enchants the Russian reader is the social sense of the work, the humanistic ideas, the civic sympathies of the author.

On the whole, it is a depressing picture that M. Alexinsky paints. He sees little good in the old ways of Russia, the old faith, the old simplicity; but he marks the solution of the social conflict as coming on that day when the race of Russian shopkeepers shall be strong enough to prevail in a crushing revolt, when bureaucratic despotism shall lose its power at the behoof of commerce. That, of course, is only one side of the Russian question. M. Alexinsky is an economist and he gauges Russian social and political progress by statistical evidence. His picture lacks a sympathetic recognition of the Russian soul, that which gives the Russian his abundance when he is most poor, his might when he is impotent.

CLARENCE E. MULFORD

It tells how Buck Peters started the famous "Bar 20" ranch, how the greatest outfit in Texas was gathered together, and incidentally how Hopalong got his hop. It's a great story.

AN AUTHOR "PERSONALLY CONDUCTED"

Theodore Dreiser Tells How Europe Became Literary Material for Him

FOR a whole book to be written around the personality of a man, that man must have a truly remarkable character," said Theodore Dreiser to the interviewer who had been sent to ask him about his first non-fiction work, "A Traveler at Forty."

"No; you wrong me," laughed Mr. Dreiser. "'A Traveler at Forty' is by no means written around myself, but around the personality of the extraordinary Englishman I call Barfleur. Without him the book would never have been written. I have always been fortunate in having within reach people who believed in me and who insisted that I must write.

"This was the case with my first book, 'Sister Carrie.' An intimate friend of mine kept ding-donging into me that I must write a novel. He was the city editor of a newspaper. We were both hard-worked men, and lived together. He would not take no for an answer. So, eventually, 'Sister Carrie' was written.

"In the case of my latest book, Barfleur invented it, told me I was to write it, arranged for an American and an English publisher, and then, what was the most difficult of all, made it possible for me to see the people and things I was to describe.

"If I had had unlimited time, I might have rambled through England and the Continent and got a series of impressions of some value, but without Barfleur's sympathetic guidance how could I have seen the real color of life that I was seeking to observe?

"Barfleur and I have seen something of the world. I know America, which, by the way, does not interest Barfleur. He knows Europe. We both look upon life from a similar viewpoint. He also is fascinated by the color of life.

"Whenever he told me to go to see a certain thing or placed me in touch with some human condition, I invariably found it worth while. I did make a few of what the tourists call 'side trips,' which interested me. For instance, my pilgrimage to Mayen, Germany, where I sought living and dead Dreisers, and was startled to find on one grave stone 'Theodor Dreiser,' with the dates, 1820-1882. But many of the characteristic and charming people I met on these travels I never should have seen at all had it not been for the foresight and wisdom of Barfleur.

"Barfleur telephoned me in New York one day that he would breakfast with me the next morning. He arrived late. He is magnificent, with a gleaming monocle, and behind it a shrewd inquisitive eye. He is also masterful. He unfolded his plan, not as a proposition that I might accept or decline, but as an elaborate series of instruction that I was expected to obey. As I am not at all managerial myself, there was no argument. If I had been asked to assent, I should have assented.

"Those who may read 'A Traveler at Forty,' or who have read the chapters that have appeared in the Century, may feel that Barfleur is an important figure in it, but no one can quite appreciate how nearly every door I entered was opened to me by Barfleur.

"On the steamer he instructed me in the intricacies of life aboard ship. He saw to it that we sat at the Captain's table, and told me what to say to the Captain. He provided companions at the table that would not bore us. At the end of the trip he made a list of the tips that I must give.

"Barfleur is an English gentleman who, I believe, wishes that he was not so conservative as he is. What I am grateful for is his tactful consideration for my moods as I, at 40, first came in contact with Europe, and especially his beloved England.

"He took me for a few days to his place in the country. There again he was not only showing me something admirable and typical of England, but he made everything easy, smooth, orderly for me personally, just as he did on the ship.

"One day his two sons took me for a walk to such an English village, on the banks of the Thames, as the untraveled American dreams of. The inns were the inns we read about. The houses were thatched. The stone walls were mossy. It was lovely, but very sad.

"Of course, Barfleur had an uncle who was an Oxford don. And so I came to see the university whose very name means so much to the world. Even without the uncle I should have had the book on Oxford that Barfleur put in my hands. And he showed me where Oscar Wilde and Walter Pater lived, and where in their college days various Kings were housed.

"Later, Barfleur let me take part in an English Christmas. Not the sentimental convention of the story books, but a genuine festivity with good cheer and a live Santa Claus.

"One day he introduced me to Lady R., a lion hunter of a species that I had never met. He made me think of the all knowing Pepys and of Beau Brummell. I remember his distress of mind when he found that he did not know the existence of a beautiful new neighbor of his whom I encountered, with her children, on the road near his house.

"Barfleur is a wonderful man. We were constantly meeting people that he knew, not only in England, but in France and Italy. One of the most delightful invitations I ever received—to a country place near Berlin—was, I am sure, instigated by Barfleur.

"He arranged my whole programme—Paris, the Riviera, Holland. Of course, he was entirely at home in Paris. The first morning in Paris was typical. I was to walk in the nearby Tuileries alone. Then we were to go to a certain bootmaker's, who was to make me a pair of shoes for later walking trips. Then a few visits to haberdashers. After that, the book stalls on the banks of the Seine, the churches of St. Etienne-du-Mont, Notre Dame, the Sainte Chappelle; Foyot's for lunch, and so forth and so on. Now could anything be a better introduction to Paris than a morning walk alone in the Tuileries? The scene of taste, lightness, magnificence—these gardens give it. We would be hampered in expressing so much charm and beauty because we do not permit in America the public use of the nude in our parks in this way.

"Along the Seine I kept recalling Balzac. Barfleur was fuller of allusion, from Rousseau to George Moore.

"At Monte Carlo Barfleur looked after our credentials, and was careful that we stopped at exactly the right hotel. His kinsman, Sir Scorp, who had joined our party, also had ideas as to the most desirable restaurants and other sights, but in a contest with the experienced and capable Barfleur he always lost out.

"On our way to Exe I exclaimed with delight at seeing a real barefoot goose-girl. Barfleur beamed at me through his monacle. 'Trust me,' he said. 'I provide goose-girls, monuments to Cæsar, fountains, shepherds, everything!'

"My visit to Rome was made delightful by Barfleur's mother, who was spending the Winter there. With infinite enthusiasm and graciousness, she took care that I saw what would most interest me. Although intensely conservative, she had an acute interest in life, and was a wonderfully industrious social mentor.

"Through Mrs. Barfleur I met Mrs. Q., a breezy and delightful American, who graces many pages of my book, and who told me, in the vernacular, the wonderful story of the Borgias, which I had all but forgotten. She enjoyed life as a spectacle.

"Barfleur made 'A Traveler at Forty' possible. But, of course, it is by no means the story of Barfleur's life. That would indeed make a book!"

THE MODERN NOVEL OF MARRIAGE

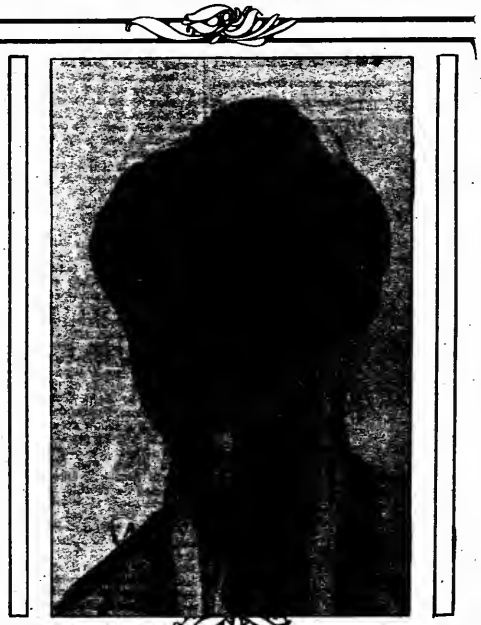
An Answer to Some of the Theorists and Feminists of the Day

By ANNE WARWICK

SPEAKING of writing," says a recent letter from an indefatigable reader and excellent critic—and incidentally my father—"how I do wish that some one would write a story with no marital deviations or complexities in it!"

Easily done; but the author would have to pledge himself in advance not to write about married people. For notwithstanding dark critical hints to the contrary, authors as a class are fairly truthful; they know that no marriage worth the name can thread its arduous way from altar to golden wedding, meeting its daily buffets, weathering them, progressing bit by bit to its final right fruition—without many a deviation sprung from many a complexity along the route. The important thing is that deviations are not necessarily, not even generally, infidelities; but temporary and inevitable "turnings away"—due to the butcher's bill, or the unfulfilled desire for a new hat, or a change in cooks. And I think one of the happiest tendencies in modern fiction, indeed in modern literature, is the passing of the ancient and erotic triangle and the prominence of the every-day battles and reconciliations of the human pair.

Now, time was, when an unexplained absence from home, a dropped letter and the introduction of a serpentine some one called Sonia, made one thrill like a warhorse at the bugle call. A liaison! One was promptly conscious of reading something one would later describe as "unpleasant but powerful," and never paused, till Sonia the siren was either laid by the heels, or had sobbed her intrigues and yearning to repent into the ear of the Second Young Man—who instantly married her. Such was the "strong novel" of ten years ago; considered too strong for the immature young person (who was therefore forced to buy a second copy,) and discussed on its doubtful situations with a discreet reserve.



Anne Warwick
Author of "The Unknown Woman"

But deary me, how times have changed. Once, "Lady Rose's Daughter" was regarded as a distinctly shocking tale; not referred to before the daughters of the house, or when the Bishop came to dinner. Now, white slavery and the doings of the underworld are in the hands of every schoolgirl; and preachers, gunmen, district attorneys, and mere authors fight for the privilege of describing these horrors, each with his favorite remedy. The marriage problem, for a while, sank to complete insignificance. But the Average Reader has now completed the journey from ignorant curiosity to a sophistry so thorough he is sated. So naturally his interest swings back to himself and his own affairs; the pivot of which is matrimony. Either he is married, or wishes he were married, or wishes he were not; or intends some day to be married, or is resolved that no one ever shall induce him to marry, or declares that they did not. Here is one subject on which the mildest and most neutral have definite, even violent convictions; which concerns every one, which must either be embraced or eschewed—with certain, uncomfortable consequences in either case.

Therefore the marriage novel: always with some further evidence, some further explanation, (or attempt at explanation,) some further theory for solving the all-important problem. To accuse an author of writing what comes into his head is calumny. He writes what is in other people's heads—the majority of people the majority of the time. And surely that is the war eternal, and the eternal project of peace. Even "the unknown contractors * * * of this armistice (marriage) inspire an interest. * * * That pomp of ceremonial, contrasted with the little wind-blown candle they carry between them, catches at our weaker fibres," and "it certainly is both exciting and comforting to hear that man and woman are ready to join in a mutual affirmative, say Yes together again"!

But we want to know what happens after they have said it. For we are no longer of the faith that takes the "happily ever afterward" assurance with a contented sigh and turns over to sleep. In this age of wide-propped eyes, we know they have to fight for their happiness—the two who have carried their candle out into the dark; we know they have to fight hard. And our once favorite authors, who put all the struggle and inch-by-inch victory before the wedding, implying thereafter the Elysium of blissful placidity, evoke nowadays a contemptuous "Bunkum!" The child of all ages cries louder than ever before for a "true story"; it may be sad, it may be awful, it may be simply sordid, but if it's "real," it's right. And the mere unadorned diary-record of the common, everyday marriage is about as real a story as can be unearthed. It is not always pleasant, no; it is not always ugly, either. There is resentment in it, and bitterness, and sometimes fierce hostility; there is tenderness, too, and self-denial, and loyal devotion: it is the index of human nature being forged into character; the truth that people of to-day demand in place of fiction.

And its aspects are inexhaustible! Its complexities, its deviations, its Sonias-up-to-date (which may be found in careers, in personal ambition, idealism, or in mere material atmosphere), all these tugging individual influences that beset the modern pair—are they not vivid to every modern one of us? And is not the "what-are-you-going-to-do-about-it?" the vital question that remains unanswered? People are no longer excited, or shocked, or amazed, when a woman shows an interest in a man other than her husband: they want to know what makes her do it, and why. The mere fact that a man is known to be unfaithful does not, in the twentieth century, cause a scandal, or even a flood of unsavory gossip. We consent to admit, at least, that there are human beings living in the world—not a lot of plaster saints. We know that they are tempted, and that sometimes they resist, and sometimes they fall. We exult for the one, and sorrow for the other, when we read their histories; and always we are searching the cause—of triumph or mistake. So often we find it to have been some one's else mistake we are led to re-examine our own history, seeking past responsibility shirked, or appeal avoided. And the old, impotent protest, "it can't be helped," gives way to "it could have been helped, and I see how."

That is the slogan of the modern novel about marriage; and generally the author carries us yet a step further and shows how it was helped and the struggling, stumbling pair finally established on the firm ground of mutual understanding. He does not assert that they will never stray from it again, but he is convinced—and, if he is a clever author so are you—that they will always find the way back.

In contrast with the hoary triangle, hung around with emotional murk, much pseudo-idealism, and a moral so obscure it was lost in the fog—in comparison with those "naughty," oh how stupid, volumes it used to be the fashion to draw from behind the cushions of the boudoir, thank heaven for the frank if brutal marriage novel of to-day! The hero may be a materialist, the heroine a blatant suffragette; but at least they are real man and real woman, trying to get somewhere, and to stick together while they do it. We are shown them as they are, not blurred by the mystery of their beautiful eyes, and clouds of perfumed cigarette smoke; and whatever they are is better than the eternal languishing-to-be of that pair of a decade ago. The one fact that they are married and endeavoring, in spite of natural selfishness and outside opportunity and interfering friends, and all the other enemies of matrimony, to stay married, is proof enough of their claim to respect.

Realists? Yes. But who have discovered by the end of the last chapter that the first aid to realism is romance—not the romance of rose spectacles and flowery paths, and no tradesmen's bills, but the downright romance that acknowledges: "I need you, and you need me; and we'll keep a bit of sentiment in ours!"

That is the theme of the marriage novel of to-morrow, as well as the answer to the feminists and theorists and fantastics of many sorts; who will doubtless work miracles, in their day that is at hand, but who will never make man and woman independent of one another.

BERGSON'S PHILOSOPHY

BERGSON AND THE MODERN SPIRIT. By George Rowland Dodson. American Unitarian Association. Boston. 1913. $1.35.

There are many who will read Bergson after Dr. Dodson's assurance that the reason we do not understand him is because we are too intellectual. Those who after their first and last rebound from Immanuel Kant have shunned the philosopher as a concocter of the abstruse and a user of preposterously long words, will find much comfort in this application by Dr. Dodson to the familiar aspects of our present-day civilization. Bergson's chief value, according to this most ardent of his disciples, lies in his applicability to life itself, and his doctrine of supra-intellectual intuition places him within easy reach of the layman. The present volume not only reviews the Bergsonian doctrine with ample interpretation by the wayside, but it considers it in its relation to the former schools of philosophic thought, contrasting it with Kantianism and with the more recent School of Pragmatism. There is an interesting chapter on the ethics of Bergson, and the final third of the book is devoted to the religious significance of the French psychologist's teachings.

A FAMILIAR HEROINE

SNOW UPON THE DESERT. By S. Macnaughton. E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.35.

Anglo-Indian stories have become so numerous that the habitual novel-reader is well accustomed to the types they usually portray. He, or more probably she, will find many of them in this new book by S. Macnaughton. The central figure, Mrs. Antrobus, is the familiar beautiful, unhappily married woman whom men admire and women dislike, accusing her of heartlessness, though she is in truth, as our friend Mrs. Skewton used to say, "all heart." In this particular instance she is perfectly respectable, though flirtatious and given to spasms of night-horror, when India terrifies her and she cries: "We are too near the unseen and the unknown; too near the mere tragedy of living." As was to be expected, she champions the little ingenue, who has become the innocent cause of scandal. Mrs. Mackenzie and Mrs. Grainger are both mildly amusing, but on the whole the book is dull.

CHRISTMAS IN DIXIE

Where the Christmas Scenes in "Mary Cary" and "The Man From Lonely Land" Came From

By KATE LANGLEY BOSHER
Author of "Mary Cary."

PERHAPS because of my happy memories and my love of the Christ child's day it has been difficult for me to keep Christmas out of my books. Mary Cary would not let me keep it out. She is rather a managing child, and, though hers was only an orphan asylum Christmas, she refused to let me alone until I told of it. In Yorkburg Christmas is still kept by certain old families in the dear old-fashioned way, and Miss Gibbie Gault's opinion of modern methods would be unconcealedly sniffy. A Christmas chapter was resisted in her story, but in "The Man in Lonely Land" Claudia Keith, sixty-five, for besides its many other meanings it is the home-coming time of scattered members of the family, and around the fireside meet once more those who have been months apart perhaps. For its proper celebration weeks used to be spent in preparation, and joyous was the day to childhood in which was its beginning.

My earliest and most vivid recollection of these Christmas preparations is that of perching myself on the end of the dining-room table, feet at first dangling over, and watching with awed and eager eyes the many and mysterious boxes and bundles and bowls and spoons and various other things that were put upon it. But as interest and excitement like Mary Cary, would have her way and an old-time Christmas house party and home-coming got itself sketched without permission on my part being asked. In "The House of Happiness" more spirit and restraint were exercised, for its every reader will know that in every happy home will be a happy Yuletide.

Time brings its changes as time must, and customs come and go, and with their going there is often regret. The Christmas of to-day lacks the flavor, the genuineness, the abundant cheer and glad warm-heartedness of the days that are no more. And the children of to-day—do they love the holiday as we did? The query brings to mind the memories of my own childhood and Christmas in the South. The picture that I see of myself as a child in those happy holidays is vastly different from the bored young people that are around us to-day. Times have changed. In many ways I prefer the memories, and the contrast is sharp.

In the South, you know, Christmas has always been the great festival of the year, the gayest, gladdest holiday, the happiest day of the three hundred and grew, with a thrilling sense of things happening that were delicious and unusual, I would crawl forward until near the middle of the table, and, craning my neck that no movement of my mother's hand, the cook's hand, or the nurse's hand escape me, in breathless delight and an occasional swipe of something I was not invited to share, I would sit the entire morning until the work was done.

In the air was the tingle of mystery and anticipation. Everybody helped, and for days there went on the making of mince meat, of fruit cakes, pound cakes, citron cakes, tea cakes, cut in fantastic shapes beyond resistance to thieving little fingers, and, oh, the thrill of it! Will it ever come again?

For the fruit cakes the raisins had to be seeded, the currants washed, the citron cut in pieces of proper size, and all other ingredients prepared in advance of the mixing, and the mixing in exact proportions was always done by my mother. Cooks in those days were to be trusted in their particular department, and the baking was always done by her good-natured highness, but the mixing was another matter. Through the years of a long life my mother never baked a cake or cooked a meal, and still she was a model housekeeper.

In large yellow bowls the eggs were beaten, and, expectantly, patiently, the judiciously selected shells were held in our hands while the process of adding the component parts of the cake that was to be went on, and when, finally, the latter had been evolved and was ready for the pans in which it was to be baked, a few spoonfuls were always put in our waiting egg shells, and triumphantly we would run with them to the kitchen and slip them into the oven, then back again to the table, with a determined swoop we would fall upon the emptied bowl, and with our index finger—for it was longest and firmest—we would scrape the remains of the batter and lick said fingers with unashamed zest. That chin and cheek and nose and eyelashes should be decorated with dabs of soft and yellow dough was of no moment. The thing that counted was the taste. The taste was good.

Long before the actual time for the hanging of stockings came around the place to hang them was a subject of discussion, and many were the hot and hasty arguments as to the exact spot on the mantel from which they were to be suspended before final decision was satisfactorily reached. The largest stockings in the family were always selected, and in an excess of pigginess or enthusiasm or Santa Clausian confidence we occasionally repudiated the stocking and hung a pillow case instead, and at night in bed we would tell each other again what we hoped Kris Kringle would bring, and in the darkness scrunch ourselves into little balls of squirming expectation and delight, and ask how many nights it still would be before he really came.

They are long ago—the days of my childhood—and in those days goods were not delivered as they are now, and bundles, if not too large, were brought home by their purchasers. Weeks before Christmas shopping expeditions would be undertaken, and, watching our mother depart in the morning, we would wait restlessly for her return, running backward and forward to the windows and doors to see if she were coming, and when she came greet her with excited shrieks of joy and waving of hands while she, well laden, made effort to make us go away or shut our eyes while she hid from us the queer shaped packages and bundles which filled us with delirious desire to know what each contained. For many years after the war no one had money for the costly purchases of to-day, but I often wonder if to-day the children thrill as we did over the simple presents that were ours. Many of them had to be made. Each member of the family gave something to each other member, to his or her friends, to the servants, and to some who perchance might not otherwise have been remembered, and for weeks

"The author, out of his scientific investigation which is based on a knowledge of medicine and a careful consideration of the laws of political economy and of political philosophy, makes out an argument which merits most careful consideration."
MRS. ARTHUR M. DODGE, President
National Association Opposed to Woman Suffrage.
"He argues that woman, on the whole, is inferior in public experience and in public capacity to man. This does not mean that woman is inferior to man in other qualities equally necessary for the welfare of the State—it does mean that in politics she is out of the place she can render the most efficient service to the State."

there were mysterious preperations. The sudden covering of something in our lap if its recipient happened to appear unexpectedly; the whispered consultations, the nods here and there, the effort to look unconscious if a hint was dropped, and, oh, bliss! the occasional peep our father, unknown to our mother, would let us make into the deep big top drawer of the old mahogany chest of drawers wherein were kept the Christmas mysteries, at which our hands would make a dive just to feel or pinch an odd-shaped bundle. There were limes when our aching curiosity and shameless begging were not to be resisted and, with solemn promises not to tell, we would hold our breath and look at a package father would slowly and cautiously unwrap, then rush off with a squeal of ecstasy and dance around and around with delight. Poor indeed is the man, the woman, who has no happy childhood memories. We had no money, but were rich. We loved much.

A day or two before Christmas the house was dressed with holly and mistletoe and running cedar, the storeroom well stocked for the demands to be made upon it, and when at last it was time to go to bed on Christmas Eve it was an excited and happy little bunch that hid their heads under the covers lest Santa Claus should not come. He never came as long as one child stayed awake—and how hard I used to try to go to sleep! Even as a child sleep never came to me readily, and long after the others were breathing softly I would lie awake and tell stories to myself in order to think of other things.

In the dark of Christmas morning the first one to arouse would jump up with a cry of "Merry Christmas!" and quickly from other beds and other rooms came answer clear and prompt, and in a flash, slipperless and in our nighties, we would scramble out of warmth and rush into our mother's and father's room, and, like pirates, pounce upon them, and then dash for our stockings, for the table or chair or corner we had selected the night before for our things. And such shrieks of joy as followed—such blowing of horns and beating of drums and cuddling of dolls and throwing of balls; such dashing round with the new sleigh or rolling of a baby carriage in between darting legs; such rushing to see what the older ones had gotten and back again for fresh discoveries of our own, and finally getting dressed for breakfast, which was eaten with a bulging refilled stocking in one's lap.

Through the morning guests would come and go with merry greetings, the older members of the family would slip off to church perhaps, and the gay romp of the children continue until dinner, and the dinner brings back memories all its own.

In a certain story of Henry James's he tells of being in a room of "beautiful omissions," and to many dining tables of to-day, among both the rich and poor, the same term could be applied so far as food is concerned, but to the Christmas dinners of my clearest recollections it would not properly apply. Ours was a large family, and always there were guests and relatives to dine with us; in consequence the table was enlarged to the limit of its capacity and reached from one end of the dining room to the other. In the centre was a bowl of holly whose berries gleamed in the light which fell upon them, and at both head and foot of the table a large, an imposingly large, and consequential turkey which had long been preparing for his fate lay ready for his sacrifice. Today two turkeys seem scandalously unnecessary. In the yesterdays they were not considered so. On one side of the holly berries was a Smithfield ham baked to a brownness that was indeed alluring; on the other a round of spiced beef whose fragrance made waiting difficult. Soup and fish on Christmas Day were always dispensed with. Oysters only were served while the carving was being done, and when the latter was sufficiently advanced to permit it was with right good will and appetites made ready by the close appeal of celery and cranberries and home-made pickles and crisp corn bread and vegetables of all sorts and kinds that thanks were given for another reuniting and for God's great gift to man, and all went merrily to work.

When dessert was served the table was again laden with a variety, that now seems prodigally wasteful, of things called sweet, and surely of a tempting not to be resisted. Plum pudding with its burning brandy perkily insisted that it be tried first, then pies of luscious filling and golden jelly, or perhaps of a rich red, according to the wine with which it was made. Fruits and nuts and raisins kept the children busy, and when at last the table was left it was with a silent prayer from some that penalty be not exacted for the misdeeds of the flesh.

In many homes of the South egg nog was made on Christmas Eve and kept over night to "season," and in others apple toddy was prepared a week or so in advance of its using. As appetizers either served the purpose well, but it was not as appetizers they were taken. The average Southerner takes them because he likes them. He thinks them very good, and Christmas comes but once in a long, long year!

Not only in costly gifts or rich rare food lies Christmas joy or blessing. It lies—no one can tell another where it lies. The finding must be for one's self alone. I can only say to all little children—to all grown up children; to all who are looking back as well as to those who are looking forward to them, I can say with Tiny Tim: God bless you each this happy Christmas-time, and if you would be very sure to get its meaning best make a real Christmas for somebody who might not have it but for you!

TOO HOSPITABLE

THE SPARE ROOM. By Mrs. Romilly Fedden. Illustrated by Hayden Jones. Houghton Mifflin Company. $1.

A clever bit of comedy that goes with spirit and sparkle, Mrs. Fedden's little story shows her to be a genuine humorist. As this seems to be the author's first book, she deserves to be welcomed cordially to the ranks of those who can make us laugh. Her tale is about a bride and groom—an Anglo-American marriage—who are too hospitable on their honeymoon. They are living in a rather dilapidated Italian villa, but they have one habitable spare room, and by letter they thoughtlessly invite one after another friend or relative to visit them. The unexpected happens and a most illassorted crowd swoops down upon them all at once. They have seven people to care for, they have only one spare room, and they cannot let any one of their guests guess their predicament. Mrs. Fedden handles the situation cleverly, shows much fertility in the invention of humorous situations, appreciation of the humorous in character, and great skill in dialogue. Sometimes her people verge upon caricature and her situations upon farce, but it is all done with refinement, vivacity, and charm, and her story is one of the most amusing trifles published in many a day.

Football

It is the opinion of Herbert Reed, author of "Football for Public and Player," that of all the parties to the game the spectator stands in the greatest need of coaching, and it is for the benefit of the spectator that Mr. Reed has written his book. Study of his exposition of the game will undoubtedly be helpful to those who are not able to understand fully the contests they witness from the benches. (Frederick A. Stokes Company. $1.50.)

The Chinese

An illustrated book entitled "The Chinese," prepared by Joseph King Goodrich, formerly a professor in the Imperial College at Kioto, appears as a volume of the "Our Neighbors" series. It contains an instructive and entertaining survey of the Chinese people as the author saw them during his protracted residence in their country. (Chicago: Browne & Howell Company.)

A PASSIONATE FLUTE

Color and Fragrance Aplenty in the Latest Verse from the Pen of Edmund John

THE very first line of the very first poem in Mr. John's new book:

Daybreak and slanting rain—simple and plain to bareness as it is, has something about it that warns us of magic to follow. And it does follow; not the particular magic that it prepares us for, perhaps, but the indubitable magic that has now and then risen through English poetry, as underground streams flash briefly in the sun before sinking again to their unseen caverns; the magic of a certain sensuous Orientalism that in our Northern imagination takes on the strangeness and morbid fascination of a tropical flower transplanted to the snows. Mr. Phillips, in an introduction wellnigh as poetical as its subject, says half-apologetically of a stanza from "Salome," "it will be quite easy to find fault with and even to deride; but to the present writer these atrsoge, barbaric words—yet, though barbaric, suggesting a civilization so untrue as to be at its last breath—come over the mind with a strange and haunting charm."

It needs no apology. "Salome" is, as Mr. Phillips goes on to call it, "'The Captain Jewel of the Carcanet.'" The picture of the dancer as

She stands there swaying sleepy like the sea,
Her feet pressed close, her faint hands floating free, lays the spell of the East, slow, languorous, and cruel, upon us. We watch as

The gleaming pallor of the braziers' flame
Curls upward like a letter of her name,
A sign for shame and sweetness of her sin,
Seared on the sable night in yellow fire,

THE FLUTE OF SARDONYX. By Edmund John. Introduction by Stephen Phillips. London: Herbert Jenkins. 3s. 6d. net.

Wrapping her round as on some funeral pyre,
And lighting the pale passion of her skin.

And we feel the nightmare shudder of the last lines:

There is a malady in the moon's light,
And in the darkness black shapes creeping near;
There is a weight upon my neck like fear
I flee alone through the pursuing night.

But though "Salome" is easily the most vivid poem in the book, there are others more wholesome. "Poème Erotique" is passionate enough, but with a clean human passion and a clean inevitable regret. One stanza with a "dying fall" in the last line is very beautiful:

Below the depths, high heart, your head is low,
And all the gleaming pageant of the morn
Has died through scarlet into eve forlorn,
And all the drooping leaves are chanting slow.

At its worst, Mr. John's remarkable gift of weaving words to the similitude of colors and fragrances leads him into a sort of frangipani bog, but so far he has come out safely on the other side. At its best, it brings an illusion little short of magical. In "Rain," for instance, we get an almost physical sense of space and mystery, and of a solution of mystery eternally grasped at and eternally eluding:

Rain, rain is falling
Upon my hands and lips and half-closed eyes,
And odors like a far voice calling
Uprise.

Dreams and the breath of myrrh
Hang in the pearl-pale air and speak to me
Of opals, and wan phantasies of fir
And sea.

We cannot have too much poetry of this sort, but a very little from the frangipani bog—though it is also poetry—goes a great way.

RURAL SCHOOLS

THE WORK OF THE RURAL SCHOOL. By J. D. Eggleston and Robert W. Bruere. Harper & Brothers. $1.

The premise from which the authors of this interesting little work start forth to consider their theme is that "the rural school more than any other one instrument to-day controls the food supply of the nation." They show briefly from the figures of the census that the production of food supplies in this country is lagging far behind the increase in population, and that if the tide does not turn it will not be long until production will not equal consumption. They believe that the rural school workers are the means through which a change must be brought about, and that upon them depends in great measure the introduction of those practical changes which will lead to increased production through the diffusion of scientific knowledge, and to such a socialization of rural life as will cause the resulting benefits to "accrue not only to the nation at large but to the local communities and the homes of the individual producers."

Having shown that rural school workers are alive to the importance of the rural school, and are already widening its outlook and improving its methods, the authors discuss the principal means by which these efforts can be increased and made more efficient. The community survey as the necessary basis for an effective programme is considered at some length, while the health of the children, the uses of the school plant, the school equipment and government, the various kinds of vocational training desirable in the rural school, demonstration work, and the teacher as a citizen maker are some of the other topics discussed.

Winthrop's fascinating romance of travel remains our most vital picture of conditions in Washington and Oregon during the territorial period, sixty years ago. The value of his book, for all who are interested in Western history and adventure, has been doubled by the addition of his letters and diaries, which cover his entire stay on the Pacific Coast, beginning at San Francisco early in 1853, and closing with his overland trip East via Salt Lake City in October.

BOOKS SPECIALLY PREPARED AS GIFTS

Volumes on Art, Reprints of Classics in Prose and Verse, Publications on Travel and Observation, and Dainty Biblios in Their Character of Presents

ALTHOUGH at this season of the year nearly all publications assume the character of gift books, there are some which, by the luxury of illustration, letter-press, or binding, particularly emphasize this quality. This is specially true of volumes treating of art, either for art's sake alone or as a medium for giving artistic expression to some rare or interesting text, of reprints of prose and verse which have stood the test of time, of books of travel and observation, and of those small publications in which artist, printer, and binder seem to exhaust their skill and taste.

In the first category there is a large quarto of French origin by Eugène Frémentin, translated from his language and called "The Masters of Past Times" (E. P. Dutton & Co., $2.50). Its illustrations in color and half-tones are reproductions of great paintings selected by the author with a view to reveal in broad lines the development of art through the centuries without emphasis of a given school or "ism." The frontispiece is Rubens's "The Descent from the Cross," and following it are Terburg's "The Lansquenet," Peter de Hooch's "An Interior," Rembrandt's "The Night Watch," etc. Each picture represents a masterpiece, so that the whole collection might be called a Salle Carré—that room of masterpieces in the Louvre from which, two years ago, the "Mona Lisa" disappeared.

Another volume from the same publisher, but of quite a different character, is "Fifty Charicatures" by Max Beerbohm ($2.00). It depicts with the well-known fine irony of the artist the prominent physical characteristics of Englishmen who are much in the public eye to-day. One of the best shows Prime Minister Asquith comfortably smoking a big cigar and surrounded by figures symbolizing the afflicting problems of the hour—the German war scare, suffragettism, the labor movement, the peerage, and education. Beneath is the legend:

> Come one, come all, this rock shall fly
> From its firm base as soon as I.

The drawings are executed with a fine pencil and show off well against their brown boards. Max Beerbohm is among the few caricaturists who can achieve the paradox: How to be funny without giving pain.

It is to be regretted that Mary Cadwalader Jones in her introduction to John La Farge's "The Gospel Story in Art" (The Macmillan Company, $5) did not deal a little more with the human side of the artist, who for many a Sunday, together with the late Francis Marion Crawford, was her guest at dinner. Their conversation, if preserved, would make a distinct addition to belles-lettres. As it is, she pays merely academic homage to the dead artist whose volume, a large quarto illustrated with eighty plates of famous paintings described in the text, was the last he wrote. La Farge painted many mural pieces, and his researches among the masters gave him a fund of knowledge as to their thought and methods, both artistic and theological, which made him as great a connoisseur as he was a painter and, as we now know him, an art historian. It is a fascinating story from the time when the Church dominated all brushes until Faith irked them, and inspired them, and made them individual—from mediæval art to that of the Renaissance. The author writes with great conviction and with perfect sincerity. The engraver has done his best to justify the author's selections by being just to their creators. It is a volume of great beauty and of real intrinsic value, not only to art lovers, but also to churchmen.

An art volume in folio size, "French Color Prints of the XVIII. Century" (J. B. Lippincott Company), presents a fine gallery of examples of the art which reached a high state of excellence in the period mentioned. Malcolm C. Salaman, the well-known connoisseur, poet and playwright, has provided a most exhaustive and pertinent introduction for the volume, the frontispiece of which is "Louis XV.," engraved by Jacob Christopher Le Blon after Nicholas Blakey. Then come forty-nine other plates, some familiar and some not, all suggestive or insinuating of the easy manners of the time in which not only love but life itself was an artistic feat, and among them the best examples of Gautier-Dagoty, François Janinet, Philibert Louis Debucourt, Charles Melchoir Descourtis and Pierre Michel Alix.

An Antiquity Shop

From Walter Tyndale's "An Artist in Italy"

"The Russian Ballet," with text by A. E. Johnson and illustrations by René Bull (Houghton Mifflin Co., $7.50), is a demi-quarto which has a clinging, exotic charm in both reading matter and pictures. The former describes sixteen elaborate ballets in the répertoire of the Russian dancers, ending in an intimate sketch of Anna Pavlowa. The pictures include fifteen in color and some eighty in black-and-white. Mr. Bull, aside from being an ingenious colorist, has a freedom in line which often implies more than it sets down—the imagination of the spectator carries on the movement beyond the limitations of the pencil. One of the finest pieces, both textually and pictorially, is "L'Après-midi d'un Faune," executed by Nijinsky, at which even Paris blushed. The volume is bound in cream-tinted linen boards stamped in gold with the Russian Imperial crest.

What can be done in photography to produce realistic yet strikingly artistic portraits is well illustrated by a volume by Alvin Langdon Coburn, the artist-photographer of Hammersmith, called "Men of Mark," (Mitchell Kennerley.) Mr. Coburn tells in easy direct English about his famous sitters, how he came to photograph them, and how they behaved before the camera. His notes very often are intimate and informing. His portraits, thirty-three in number, cover the years 1904 to 1913, and include among others George Bernard Shaw, H. G. Wells, John S. Sargent, Robert Bridges, and Henri Mattisse—the last two being respectively the new poet laureate and the famous futurist. The volume has a pleasing appearance in its yellow linen binding. The pictures are mounted on mats suitable to be detached and framed.

The latest news from foreign inventors of women's hats is that the chapeau of the future will be built up in the shape suggested by the coiffeurs of the Court of Louis XVI. Thus almost in anticipation is the publication of "Rose Bertin: The Creator of Fashion at the Court of Maria Antoinette," by Emile Laglade, adapted from the French by Dr. Angelo S. Rappoport, and profusely illustrated from rare plates of the time, (Charles Scribner's Sons.) This is more than a mere record of fashion, of convenience to social leaders and indispensable to actresses of historical plays, for through pictures and text the reader learns how fashions reflect the life of the times. Plastic exaggeration was the keynote that later developed into the fulminations of the French Revolution.

The man who may be said, more than any other, to have brought about a taste for Persian stuffs and costumes is Edmund Dulac, although the dressmakers of the Rue de la Paix would be the last to acknowledge this fact. Nevertheless, his illustrations to Persian tales have done much to prepare the popular mind. His latest work is to be found in the pictures he has painted for "The Princess Badoura," a tale from the Arabian Nights, retold by Laurence Housman, (George H. Doran Company,) and the "Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam" issued by the same publisher. In both the subtle, alluring, insinuating atmosphere of the East with its delicate fabrics, its perfumes, and its jewels attract and hold one and form a fitting complement to the imaginative genius of the last wife of the story-loving Caliph, or to the poetical genius of the tent-making astronomer-poet.

Together with two of the latest pictorial interpretations of Maurice Maeterlinck's texts a new Harrison Fisher book may here be mentioned (Dodd, Mead & Co.) With verses by Carolyn Wells and decorations by Theodore B. Hapgood, we have an array of American women whose idealized portraits are reproduced in four colors on boards suitable for framing, 9¼ by 13 inches. Mr. Fisher's point of view and art are quite familiar; his women are always types rather than individuals, and represent American womanhood in its latest and most captivating charms of physical and costume adornment. The frontispiece is a lady in a leopard's skin, but as the artist deals principally in contrasts there is nothing feline in her expressive face. ($3.50.)

Both the Maeterlinck books are translations by Alexander Teixeira de Mattos. The first is a quarto called "News of Spring" ($4) and the second, an octavo, is "Our Friend the Dog" ($1.25.) The first has mounted full-page colored pictures by Edward J. Detmold, attractive artistically as they are botanically, while the illustrator of the second is Cecil Alden, who also depicts in color. In "News of Spring" there has been incorporated an essay never before published, while in "Our Friend the Dog" the great Belgian poet-interpreter of nature and of nature's creatures reveals the real bonds that exist between man and his most faithful companion, and, incidentally, a charming picture of French life.

We now come to some reprints of classical fiction presented in holiday dress. Stevenson's "Kidnapped" (Charles Scribner's Sons, $2.25) has fourteen full-page illustrations, with title page and covers reproduced in full colors by N. C. Wyeth, whose fine illustrations to "Treasure Island" will be remembered. While peculiarly sensitive to low tones, his pictures have a color and dash, that, in their variety and suspense and movement, are suggestive of the author's style. All real lovers of Stevenson will be supremely satisfied with Wyeth's interpretation of David Balfour under various conditions, of Uncle Ebenezer and of Alan Breck.

George Eliot's "Adam Bede" (McBride, Nast & Co., $4.00) is illustrated by Gordon Browne with sixteen colored drawings and many pen and ink sketches dealing with the story in such a way as really to make its tragedy more real, its pathos less artificial. Browne has gone far to rescue "Adam Bede" from the oblivion its literary quality invites.

Helen Hunt Jackson's "Ramona" is issued in what is appropriately called a "Tourists' Edition" (Little, Brown & Co., $2.00,) for with it even Baedeker becomes superfluous. It is admirably illustrated from original photographs by N. C. Vroman and with drawings by Henry Sandham.

Michael Fairless's "The Gathering of Brother Hilarius" is a grandiose exhibition of both the bookmaker's and the illustrator's art (E. P. Dutton & Co., $2.50.) From binding to the detachable pictures on parchment paper it smacks of distinction. The pictures—merely, incidentally illustrative—are subdued in color but of much eloquence in suggestion. Particularly with the frontispiece representing the burial of the brother has the artist deftly connoted whole pages of text—the pathetic, yet glorious finale of the tale.

"Tales from Washington Irving's Traveler" (J. B. Lippincott Company) has given George Hood an attractive inspiration for drawing and color work of excellent order, in which full attention has been paid to the exigencies of time, place, and action. Among the tales selected for the artist's brush are "The Great Unknown," "The Hunting Dinner," "Adventures of My Uncle," and "The Devil and Tom Walker," and, from the Italian Banditti, "A Painter's Adventure," "The Bandit Chieftain," and "The Money-Diggers."

Thomas Hughes's "Tom Brown's Schooldays" (G. P. Putnam's Sons. 8vo. $3.50 or $5, either as it is edited by F. Sidgwick or Lord Kilbracken) is an appealing presentation of this English classic, from either the academic or the sentimental point of view. The pictorial feature is represented by an exhaustive array of old prints showing Rugby in the late thirties and of recently taken photographs. Many pictures are in color. The daughter of the famous head master as well as the authorities of the school itself labored through sympathetic co-operation to make these editions a definitive setting for the Hughes text, which is given complete, together with valuable notes upon the customs and games of the school in the old days.

W. D. Howells has written the introduction to "Gulliver's Travels," which Louis Rhead, whose work is already familiar to those who love the reprints of English classics, has pictured (Harper & Brothers). Mr. Howells says that he first learned to love the story when as a boy he had from his father a scrubby little copy of it. As he grew up, it became almost as dear to him as Goldsmith's Greece or Cervantes's "Don Quixote." "The taste in literature changes from age to age," he writes, but "Gulliver's Travels" is one of the things which does not change with it. It would be superfluous to characterize here the accurate and imaginative pen of Rhead, which has all the technique of the engraver's knife and all the freedom of the impressionist's brush. Besides Rhead learns all about his subjects—personalities, environment, costumes—before he puts pen to bristol board.

Scott's "Ivanhoe" (Houghton Mifflin Company, $2.50.) has gained much in strength and variety through the colored illustrations by E. Boyd Smith. There are sixteen in all, including the great scenes of the tournament, the prison, as well as other episodes full of action. As was well illustrated by his pictures for "Pocahontas" and "Robinson Crusoe," Mr. Smith's daring in color is only second to his restraint in drawing, both of which extremes work out pictures that are worth possessing, aside from the text to which, as has been implied, they lend fresh zest and reality.

It was rather a clever idea of Cyril Falls to novelize Offenbach's "Tales of Hoffmann," (James, Pott & Co.) for there is in the very nature of the theme that element of indistinctness and vagueness which particularly invites the storyteller's art, especially as the acts of the opera itself are supposed to be orally related. Still, it is to be regretted that his work is based on an English libretto which is notorious for its bad translation, as his extracts from the dialogue and lyrics show. Particularly is this true of the gondolier's song in the third act. The regret is more exasperating as his text reveals very well what excellent work he could have done had he had at hand a better translation. The illustrations by A. Brantingham Simpson, R. O. I., leave nothing to be desired in either color or execution. They are subtle and expressive idealizations of the familiar scenes.

Another clever idea is the selection of Hugh Thomson to illustrate a beautiful text of J. M. Barrie's "Quality Street," (George H. Doran Company, $5; edition de luxe, $25.) The work of the artist is particularly distinguished for its Old World playfulness and pathos in conception and his harmony in execution, particularly in color where old rose, violets, pale greens, heliotropes, and lavenders prevail. Thus are represented Susan and Phoebe Throssel in their quaint surroundings, while contrast is added by the darker tones in which Valentine Brown is represented, and still more so by the crimson-clad recruiting Sergeant. It is one of the few books whose appearance completely indicates its contents.

Blackmore's "Lorna Doone," Thoreau's "Excursions," Omar Khayyam's "Rubaiyat," and Wagner's "Parsifal" are distinctive offerings of the season, whose literary beauties are enhanced by pictorial settings (Thomas Y. Crowell Company). The Blackmore novel ($2.50) has sixteen illustrations in color by Christopher Clark exhibited on an 8vo. format, and in them careful observation and ingenious combination have united in presenting a series of pictures of the Devon country as it was in 1673. The Thoreau reprint ($2.00) has the familiar introduction by Ralph Waldo Emerson, together with thirty-three photographs supplied by the camera of Clifton Johnson, who is not only a devotee of Thoreau but an expert photographer with the skill of an artist in developing his plates. The quatrains of the astronomer-poet ($1.50; velvet ooze, $3.50; inlaid leather, $4.00) are those interpreted by Edward FitzGerald. The illustrator is Willy Pogány, who has an academic as well as an artistic acquaintance with the work complete and satisfying in every way.

Although coming from widely different sources, "The Carolina Mountains," by Margaret W. Morley, and "Picturesque New Zealand," by Paul Gooding, bear the same Boston imprint, (Houghton Mifflin Company. Large crown octavo, $3 and $3.50, respectively.) The first is a most useful and enduring guide book, with jacket and frontispiece in color designed by Amelia M. Watson and with many photographic reproductions. The text is historical, descriptive, and anecdotal, and has the compelling charm of utter familiarity. The second is a combined history and series of traveler's impressions written in the feverish style of the well-known Californian journalist and illustrated with fifty-eight specimens of his camera's the spirit of the East. Competent Orientalists have pronounced his work to be a realistic setting forth of the Persia of the romantic past. This artist has also tried his hand as a pictorial interpreter of "Parsifal" ($6.00; velvet Persian, $10.00; antique leather or vellum, $15.00), the story of which is retold by C. W. Rolleston from various sources but based principally upon the text used by Wagner. There are 192 pages reproduced in two colors with appropriate designs, together with sixteen plates in full colors depicting the most dramatic episodes in the legend of the Holy Grail. It is a superb publication and will please the devotees of Wagner quite as much as it will those of elegance in the bookmaker's craft.

A royal octavo volume of 340 pages by Robert Haven Schauffler and entitled "Romantic America" (The Century Company, $5) is a medium through which the genius of several artists has found appropriate and striking expression. Herein many of the natural show places of America are described—from Cape Cod to the Creole City of New Orleans, from Maine to the missions of old California—by the author with a graphic and sympathetic pen. This text receives adequate distinction from the mere names of the artists—Maxfield Parrish, George Inness, Jr.; Joseph Pennell, André Castaigne, Winslow Homer, and Albert Herter. No more is needed to demonstrate that "Romantic America" is an exceptional gift book, except to add that the publisher has co-operated with author and artists to make work. The frontispiece is a portrait of the Right Hon. Richard John Seddon, P. C.

Two other books in this category with a Boston imprint are "Wanderings on the Italian Riviera," by Frederic Lees, and "Athens, the Violet Crowned," by Lilian Whiting, (Little, Brown & Co.; both $2.50, although the latter is also to be had in a half morocco binding at $5.) The first, with frontispiece in color by Edith S. Lees and with sixty illustrations from photographs by the author, follows in the footsteps of Dante, Dickens, Byron, Shelley, and Symonds, but also treads many by-paths far from the main roads and where the born of the automobile rarely disturbs the tranquillity. Mr. Lees is a much-traveled man, one who has written much on foreign lands, who knows what to take and what to leave behind. Miss Whiting's volume will form an appropriate companion to the author's "Italy, the Magic Land," and "Paris, the Beautiful." It is illustrated with thirty-two full-page plates from finely developed photographs. Although not devoid of historical backgrounds, this book on Athens is more concerned with what the Greeks are doing to-day in life, culture, and art than with what their ancestors performed. It offers a comprehensive and spirited commentary on the achievements of the Greeks in the recent Balkan War.

Walter Tyndale, R. I., is an artist who is incidentally a literary man, or vice versa, and his new book, "An Artist in Italy," (George H. Doran Company, $5; edition de luxe, $25,) shows a most happy combination of both his talents. His journey covers the hill towns of Tuscany, Lombardy, and Venetia. He depicts market places as well as scenery, monuments as well as people. Tyndale is a splendid interpreter, whether with pen or brush. His book while reviving old memories for the confirmed traveler will particularly charm the traveler who is obliged to make his journeys in books or through lectures. The author-artist talks intimately, sometimes learnedly, and always with grace and humor.

"Winter Sports in Switzerland," by E. F. Benson, author of "Dodo" and "The Weaker Vessel," (Dodd, Mead & Co. Large 8vo. $4.50,) has a fascinating assortment of twelve full page color plates and forty-eight half tone reproductions from photographs. This author is a combination of the successful novelist and the sportsman. He has written a notable book, both as a piece of literature and as an exposition of the phases of skiing, tobogganing, &c.

"London, an Intimate Picture," by Henry James Forman. (McBride, Nast & Co. $2.50,) has an attractive format with broad margins and many reproductions from photographs in sepia descriptive of and identified with the life of the English as well as with visits of tourists—Trafalgar Square, Fleet Street, the haunts of Dickens, Shakespeare, and Milton, the monuments and picture galleries, and the homes of Londonera. It is a book of a convenient, even of a valuable sort. A somewhat similar, yet more comprehensive book with the same imprint, is "As It Is In England," by Albert B. Osborne. ($3.) This deals with ruins and with village and country scenes and life rather than with the literary or artistic Meccas of the great cities. For example, we have scenes in and about Oxford and Cambridge, the Lakes, the Channel Islands, the Shakespeare Country, Cornwall and the Scilly Isles, &c. One of its finest pictures is the frontispiece, which shows "Durham Cathedral." It is so excellent, indeed, that few may notice that it has really been set upside down. This accident, however, is not characteristic of the work as a whole.

A handsome collection of artistically prepared photographs, admirably toned and excellently mounted, is to be found in "The Old Spanish Missions of California," by Paul Elder, printed from various type on tinted paper, (Paul Elder & Co. Dolores edition, printed from antique type on heavy gray paper, $3.50; Junipero Serra edition, bound in pigskin, $6.50; both are boxed.) This is a book which shows that America has romantic ruins as well as the older countries abroad. The text, historical and descriptive, is emphasized by the work of some of the best and most artistic photographers of California. Both as literature and art it is a fine production, and may well arouse the envy of our more complacent East—envy for the delightful theme, for the artists, and for the author as well as for the publisher.

As usual the productions from the press of that excellent maker of books of Portland, Me., (Thomas Bird Mosher,) fall within various series, variously named on account of the initial volumes produced therein. Paradoxical as it may seem his most elaborate series is Miscellaneous. Herein are two titles which call for special mention: "Ten Spiritual Designs by Edward Calvert," (400 copies, octavo, Van Gelder hand-made paper, old-style blue boards, $3; 25 copies, Japan vellum, $6,) and "Dreamthorp: A Book of Essays Written in the Country by Alexander Smith," (700 copies, small quarto, Van Gelder paper, Ancona boards, $3; 25 copies Japan vellum, $5.) Calvert was an early disciple of William Blake, and he conceived and executed, while under the influence of the master, the ten engravings which are here presented. Preceding them is a notice, biographical and critical, by Herbert P. Horne. The Smith book is due to a revival of this man's prose and poetry and is reprinted from the Strahan edition of 1863. Other noteworthy Mosher items, but less formidable as pieces of bookmaking, are "Songs from Italian Gardens" by Mary F. Robinson, "The Pierrot of the Minute," a dramatic phantasy in one act, by Ernest Dowson; "Songs of Adieu," "The Growth of Love," by Robert Bridges; "From the Upinishads" and "The Sermon on the Mount." This last is reprinted from the King James Version of St. Matthew, in red and black, and with a simple yet striking format. (900 copies, 16mo, Kelmscott paper, old-style blue boards, 75 cents; 50 copies, Japan vellum, $1.50.) Other Mosher publications present a similar variety of make and price.

"Poetry of Heroism," with sixteen illustrations, by W. Rainey, deals with examples of heroic verse arranged chronologically according to the events celebrated, from Cowper's "Boadicea" to John Soules's "What the Kings Heard, 1910" (G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50). The selections have been made by John Jean Lang, and the pictures, in color, reveal Mr. Rainey's work at its best. Each poem is preceded by a historical or biographical note, as the occasion demands. It is all a fine array of heroic verse, but is of particular value as an anthology—containing pieces not easily found elsewhere.

A large quarto-boxed volume contains Walt Whitman's "Leaves of Grass" (E. P. Dutton & Co. $6.00). The type and format are similar to the author's own edition, but are here chiefly remarkable as having an artist interpreter who can do justice to the poet without turning his pathos into bathos. This artist is Margaret C. Cook. She has made no attempt at "illustrating" in the usual sense, for her pictures are all colorful, symbolical fancies teeming with spirit, movement, and soft insinuations. Whitman would have liked to see the day when his favorite work could be thus pictorially construed.

Some examples of the poetry that a lad of thirteen can write are given in "Rhymes and Fancies by a Boy" (Richard Badger & Co. Pp. 47). The lad in question is Lionel Meredith Reid. His verses, if untouched by a practiced hand, show much promise. But he should study the lesson that the capacity to interest one's self does not always imply the capacity to interest others.

"Wild Animal Verses Made at the New York Zoological Park" (The Broadway Publishing Company) is a sincere volume by A. M. Castello, who has developed an original idea with precision and grace. One of his best pieces is "The Swan Song." "Every Doe Has Her Day" is also good. All show keen and sympathetic observation.

A book of practical value as well as of pleasant appearance is "A Woman Rice Planter," by Patience Pennington, with an introduction by Owen Wister and with nearly 100 illustrations by Alice R. Huger Smith. (The Macmillan Company. 8vo. $2.50). The scene is two large plantations in South Carolina. The pictures are vital to the text, which is itself a human document of great value and absorbing interest.

"The Heart of the Christmas Pines," by Leonia Dalrymple, with a frontispiece by Norman Price. (McBride, Nast & Co., 50 cents,) is a story which concerns the uniting of long-broken family ties under romantic, rural conditions. The theme is slight, but it is pleasantly and brightly unfolded.

"Barn Doors and Byways," by Walter Prichard Eaton, pictured and decorated by Walter King Stone, (Small, Maynard & Co., 8vo., $2.50,) is a collection of essays dealing partly with the aspects of nature and partly with the haunts of man. Rivers, roads, and paths are individualized. Washington Square is dealt with in its animate and its inanimate aspects, and even the nature faker receives attention, for birds are robbed of their fiction only to be rehabilitated for better and more genuine appreciation. "Barn Doors and Byways" is a pleasantly written, contemplative book which can annihilate boredom without destroying time. All the same, it is a daring performance in these days of police court plays and white slave romances. The author is to be congratulated for his temerity.

"WANDERFOOT"

WANDERFOOT. By Cynthia Stockley. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.55.

Admitting that one of the greatest surgeons in America and the most famous woman journalist in Europe would be likely to marry on no longer acquaintance than a six-day ocean trip, neither having heard of the other before, and each strictly refraining from confidence, the man, in fact, sternly refusing to listen when his ladylove would have unfolded the sad, sad story of her life, because, forsooth, he positively suspects her of a lurid past—admitting the probability of all this to start with, the reader may get considerable pleasure out of Miss Stockley's new novel, for Miss Stockley knows how to tell a story. Even then, one could hardly help being irritated at the strong strain of feebleminedness in both these marvelously brilliant people when it comes to managing their mutual affairs. Everything goes wrong with them, beginning with Val's incapacity to manage servants and ending with the resurrection of her imperfectly dead first husband. At almost any moment throughout the story a frank statement of the case on the part of either husband or wife would have straightened everything out, but they are always too proud, or something. So of course they both suffer—damnably. But if they hadn't suffered, there wouldn't have been any story, and they wouldn't have been able to suffer so if it hadn't been for the original feeblemindedness. And there you are!

A Virginia Editor

The life story of an important nineteenth century Virginian is told by Charles Henry Ambler in his "Thomas Ritchie, a Study in Virginia Politics." Mr. Ritchie, who lived from 1778 to 1854, was for about half a century editor of The Richmond Enquirer, and through its editorial columns exerted a very strong influence in his State and throughout the country. Mr. Ambler represents Ritchie as one of the most powerful editors of his time and says he made Virginians think as he thought, speak his own words, weep when he wept, and vote precisely as he voted. CENTURY OF PEACE

America and Great Britain Since the Ghent Treaty

UNDER the title "One Hundred Years of Peace," (The Macmillan Company,) Henry Cabot Lodge gives a penetrating and delightful survey of the relations existing between Great Britain and this country since the Treaty of Ghent, signed on the Christmas Eve of 1814. "One hundred years of peace," when considered in the strict sense of "the absence of war," include a period for the most part of which the respective countries have been on anything but friendly terms, when, in fact, their diplomatic relations have been strained to the breaking point, and the popular feeling in each country has run high and bitter. But the entente cordiale of the present day having been reached through the stress of tumultuous years, it is safe to look back and mark the slow and lagging pace at which a genuine friendship between the two nations has become possible.

The bad feeling engendered during the Revolution might easily have been overcome, for the war as a whole was singularly free from acts of cruelty or ferocity. But the failure on both sides to keep to the strict terms of the treaty of relations, while a common policy in regard to the South American Republics then struggling for freedom drew the two countries together in the eyes of the world and also, to a less degree, in their own. The diplomatic intercourse assumed the courteous tone which acknowledged that "we had forced our way into the family of nations."

But unfortunately the English press and reviews continued "in a most persistent and malicious manner to assail anything and everything pertaining to the United States," giving rise to the opinion in this country that the writers of the caustic, often slanderous criticisms, were in the pay of the British Government. Their authors were not content with a justifiable assault on slavery, but devoted columns to petty and belittling mud slinging. The men of America were said to be "turbulent citizens, abandoned Christians, inconstant husbands, unnatural fathers, and treacherous friends." We also learn that "the supreme felicity of a true-born American is inaction of body and inanity of mind." Robert Southey, Sydney Smith, and Charles Dickens were only a few of the great writers who lent themselves to this sort of misrepresentation and animosity. The temperateness of Coleridge and the friendliness of Thackeray won few followers, and American sensitiveness and irritation grew daily. The Webster-Ashburton treaty, the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and the treaty of 1854 were arrived at only through the extreme tact and clear-headedness of the men concerned in the negotiations.

England's apparent attitude during the civil war, as set forth in her newspapers, including The Times, awoke even more bitter hatred on this side of the ocean. Only very slowly did the underlying sympathy of the British populace make itself felt, and it took the apology of 1871 to salve the wounds inflicted upon us during this trying period of our national life.

But the spontaneous friendliness of the British Government during the Spanish war has brought about a basis of good relations upon which succeeding agreements in regard to the Panama Canal and the various Canadian questions have been able to build strongly. Mr. Lodge summing up the new situation quotes Mr. Balfour in a speech at Manchester:

> The time may come—nay, the time must come—when some statesman of authority, more fortunate even than President Monroe, will lay down the doctrine that between English-speaking peoples war is impossible.

Labor Associations

A comprehensive review of the efforts of labor in Great Britain to better conditions by joining in voluntary societies is made by M. Fothergill Robinson in "The Spirit of Association." He discusses the origin, nature, and aims of the mediaeval guilds, considers the results of the industrial revolution brought about by the introduction of machinery, follows the development of the Friendly Society movement, the co-operative movement, and trade unionism down to the present time. The influences of syndicalism and the present status of organized labor in Great Britain take up his final chapters. Several appendices discuss arbitration and conciliation in New Zealand, Australia, and Canada, and consider the question whether or not the same methods could be used in England. EXPLORING UNKNOWN SOUTH AMERICA

Thrilling Experiences of A. Henry Savage-Landor Crossing a Continent That Is Full of Peril and Strange Adventure

SOME months back Mr. Savage-Landor emerged from the wilderness of Brazil with tales of narrow escapes and hardships so extraordinary as to outshine the famous experiences which he recounted as having happened to him a few years ago on his expedition to Tibet. Before shaping the results of his journey into a book he wrote a résumé of it which appeared in the Sunday Magazine section of THE NEW YORK TIMES. Mr. Savage-Landor now recounts in amplified form the thrilling adventures which he set down in that résumé, and has, moreover, added many more pages to his description of his journey through hitherto unpenetrated sections of the South American continent.

To say that these adventures are amazing is to put it mildly. Besides telling us of traversing unknown regions, taking valuable observations, visiting the headwaters of a dozen rivers, surveying hitherto uncharted areas, studying the languages and folklore of the aborigines encountered, and exposing himself again and again to violent death, Mr. Savage-Landor assures us that his expedition showed "that it is possible for people in a normal condition of health to go at least sixteen days without food while doing hard work."

The explorer started inland from Rio de Janeiro, the capital of Brazil, and for a while journeyed through regions which, though comparatively unknown to the outside world and presenting considerable difficulties to the traveler, were child's play to what lay before him. At the city of Goyaz, in the heart of Brazil, the real work of exploration began. From there he struck out northward through the region watered by the Tapajos, Madeira, and other streams, until he reached the Amazon at Manaos. Following the course of that mighty river to Iquitos, he crossed the Andes to the Pacific Coast of Peru. Thence, choosing ever unfrequented and dangerous paths, he worked southward through Bolivia and Chile, again crossed the Andes from the latter country to the Argentine, and sighted the Atlantic again at Buenos Aires. The total distance traveled was 13,750 miles.

Most of the trip was exciting and hazardous but nowhere so much so as in the "forest primeval" of Central Brazil. To begin with, Mr. Savage-Landor found the greatest difficulty in finding men to accompany him. Finally by offering pecuniary inducements absolutely dazzling in the eyes of the Brazilian natives he secured the services of six ex-convicts. These fellows caused him no end of trouble. They mutinied at the least provocation, and several times made treacherous attempts on the explorer's life.

But nothing sufficed to make him turn back. Pushing ever onward into the wilderness, amid scenery of surpassing beauty, he and his criminal companions at length found themselves hundreds of miles from the last vestige of civilization and wholly without food.

Then it is that Mr. Savage-Landor tells the tales that tax the credulity of the reader to the utmost. For sixteen days, he writes, he and the others struggled on without anything to eat.

He speaks eloquently of the effect which gnawing hunger had on himself and his men. Some of his companions seemed on the verge of losing their minds. They insisted that they heard shots and other noises about them, though there was not another person for miles roundabout. As to the effects of the sixteen days of privation on himself, the explorer writes:

> It is curious how hunger works on your brain. I am not at all a glutton, and never think of food under ordinary circumstances. But while I was starving I could see before me from morning till night, in my imagination, all kinds of delicacies—caviare, Russian soups, macaroni au gratin, all kinds of refreshing ice creams, and plum pudding. Curiously enough, some days I had a perfect craving for one particular thing, and would have given everything I possessed in the world to obtain a morsel of it. The next day I did not care for that at all, in my imagination, but wanted something else very badly. The three things which I mostly craved while I was starving were caviare, galantine of chicken, and ice cream—the latter particularly.

What made his sufferings trebly hard to bear was the fact that he was literally "lined" with money. He had on his person $30,000, of which $20,000 was in actual cash; yet he could not buy even a mouthful of food.

Another of the difficulties to be encountered in that long struggle was anta. They cut the strings by which the travelers had suspended their shoes in midair; they completely destroyed the upper parts, leaving only the hard leather soles. They cut the hammock strings, they swarmed over every tree which might bear nuts at the top, and when the travelers fell down in a faint, as they frequently did during the last days of this particular journey, ants swarmed over them, eating away the skin from their faces.

Curiously enough, the men lacking food did not want water, according to Mr. Savage-Landor.

> I do not suppose that my men, during the entire period of starvation, drank on an average more than a wineglass of water a day. Personally I know that I never drank more than a half a tumbler or less in the twenty-four hours during that time. Under normal circumstances I drink about a quart of water a day.

Heavy thorns which pierced the thickest shoes and tore away the strongest clothing made traveling still harder. Rain was constant, the small party encountering some terrific storms. "We had not been dry one moment since the beginning of July," says the writer, "and we were now at the end of September." Through all this, however, we are told that the expedition surmounted ranges of hills, cut its way through tangled underbrush, forded swollen rivers, and made a very respectable number of miles every day.

Mr. Savage-Landor's course took him to the Putumayo River, which has become notorious of late on account of the stories which have emanated from it of atrocities committed on the natives by rubber hunters. Apropos of these and similar outrages, Mr. Savage-Landor says:

> To any one not acquainted with those regions it is difficult to understand why those atrocities take place at all. Curiously enough, they are due to a large extent to medicine. Those regions are all extremely malarial. The people who are ordered there are afraid of being infected long before they start on their journey. They begin taking preventive quinine and arsenic, which render them most irritable and ill-tempered; the solitude preys upon them, and they add to the poisoning from medicine the evil effects of excessive drinking. Add again to this that few men can manage to be brave for a long period of time, and that the brain gradually becomes unbalanced, and you have the reason why murders are committed wholesale chiefly in a stupid effort to preserve one's self.

The narrative which concerns the explorer's trip up the Amazon calls for a complete revision of all former ideas about that lordly stream. The popular imagination presents the Amazon as a river flowing between banks luxuriant with immense trees, overladen with orchids, a sky of wonderful blue with swarms of birds of amazing plumage dashing across it, flowers, butterflies, the songs of tropical birds in great profusion. A disappointment is awaiting the imaginative traveler. According to Mr. Savage-Landor, the trees are small and anaemic, the birds are few and seldom sing, the marvelous iridescent butterflies are hardly ever seen except by the collector who is hunting them. As for orchids, there are plenty of them, but they can be found only after climbing the higher trees; even then it takes the eye of the expert to detect them amid the foliage.

Inevitably Mr. Savage-Landor's contact with many different tribes of Indians, many of them practically unknown even to the anthropologists and the ethnologists, brought to light many interesting facts. Customs and legends of all sorts were observed; especially strange were those of the Bororo living in the region of the Barreiros River, people who, according to the author, are evidence in plenty of the fact that South American Indians are not Mongolian, but Australoid or Papuan.

Among these Indians social clubs are found which play the part of matrimonial bureaus. The young men and young women of the camp go to the clubhouse, men sitting on one side, women on the other, in order to get better acquainted. In the Bororo country it is the woman who proposes to the man.

But Mr. Savage-Landor notes that most of the South American tribes are lacking in resistance and vigor.

The Indian tribes of Brazil impressed one as being strong, because one compared them with their neighhors and masters, the Brazilians, who were physically one of the weakest, least-resisting races I have ever seen. When you compared them with some of the healthy savage races elsewhere, the tribes of Central Africa or Asia, these Indians did not approach them in endurance and quickness of intellect.

The Indian races I saw in Brazil seemed to me almost exhausted physically, owing perhaps to constant intermarriage.

Unlike the African tribes, who can count to five, Indians can usually count only to three, according to Mr. Landor.

Pushing on to the sources of the Xingu and Tapajoz Rivers, the highest point in the Brazilian plateau was reached, an altitude of 2,600 feet. The ascent to this plateau was most dangerous, the mules slipping and sliding on the steep and rocky slopes, the native men of the party in mutiny most of the time. But this brought Mr. Landor to the very heart of Brazil, the spot where the waters of three rivers part to flow toward three different points of the compass.

This heart of Brazil was a magnificent but lonely place and contributed some of the more unpleasant features to the panorama which Mr. Landor spreads before the reader. In the midst of this solitude were found two miserable tiny sheds, belonging to a family of escaped negro slaves.

They had lived seventeen years in that secluded spot. They grew enough Indian corn to support them. All the members of the family were pitifully deformed and demented. Seldom have I seen such miserable-looking specimens of humanity. One was demented to such an extent that it was impossible to get out of him more than a few disconnected groans. He spent most of his time crouched like an animal, and hardly seemed conscious of what took place around him.

Another was a deaf and dumb cretin, a third possessed a monstrous hare lip and a deformed jaw, while two women, dried up and skinny, and a child were badly affected by goitre.

Other pictures of the filthy condition in which these isolated families, met with all over Brazil, live from year to year, and the horrible evidences of their degeneration, are appalling enough to blot out the vivid descriptions of flaming sunsets and clear views of the marvelous Brazilian tablelands.

The book is well illustrated throughout with hundreds of photographs taken by the explorer himself. In addition to these, showing the scenery and the natives encountered, and Mr. Landor's scoundrelly comrades, there are some plates in color giving—to use a mild adjective—a vivid idea of the brilliancy in the scenery of the wild regions traversed.

SPUN SUGAR ROMANCE

MADCAP. By George Gibbs. Illustrated. D. Appleton & Co. $1.30 net.

To the writing of spun-sugar "society" romances there is apparently no end. When at the commencement of this new one the reader meets a beautiful, daring, and enormously wealthy young woman who works hard to amuse herself and yet finds it necessary to take to aviating as a refuge from boredom, a portrait-painter of great talent, with "the manners of a boor" and "the chin of a gorilla," and to complete the triangle, a woman of the world, aged 30, beautiful and possessed of a Russian title, it is not difficult for him to make a tolerably accurate guess at the probable course of events.

Hermia Challoner, the heroine, defies the conventions of society, though never those of fiction, and goes on a walking tour through Normandy with Markham, the painter, chaperoned only by a donkey. The account of this tour is far and away the best thing in the book; it has charm, is well written, and introduces some really delightful people, the various inn-keepers and the "Family Fabiani" especially. So greatly superior is it to the rest of the novel that it leads one to hope that Mr. Gibbs may some day write a book whose every chapter will be up to the level to which these few attain.

Educating Boys

Parents and teachers charged with the rearing of boys will find useful advice in Frank Orman Beck's "Marching Manward," in which the author sets forth some things he has learned through long association with boys, as teacher, minister, and friend. Mr. Beck offers practical suggestions with respect to many problems that puzzle folk with boys on their hands. (Eaton & Mains. 75 cents.)

Cobb's Bill-of-Fare

In the little book he calls "Cobb's Bill-of-Fare" Irvin S. Cobb gives us some amusing nonsensical opinions with respect to "vittles," music, art, and sport. The book is effectively illustrated by Peter Newell and James Preston. Admirers of Mr. Cobb's humor will be glad to put his new book alongside "Cobb's Anatomy," for which it is meant to be a companion. (George H. Doran Company. 75 cents.)

STEFANSSON AMONG THE ESKIMOS

Startling Discoveries of the Famous Arctic Explorer That Shatter Some Favorite Theories

IF the many who have followed newspaper accounts of Vilhjálmar Stefánsson and his discovery of the "blond Eskimo" imagine that the whole story has been told, they will do well to investigate between the covers of the volume just published, "My Life With the Eskimo." For while there is here the authentic account of the first encounter of a white man with those auburn-haired islanders who "hooked to themselves wives with the antlers of bull caribou and killed all strangers," there is in addition a wealth of information gathered on that coast of Dolphin and Union Straits between 1908 and 1912, never before given to the public either through the press or the series of Dr. Stefánsson's lectures.

The present volume is filled with all manner of intimate detail which will not fail to hold the attention of the most blasé reader. Explorers' accounts are all too often made up of over-long and over-numerous quotations from diaries and log books—a mere skeleton narrative which the average person has difficulty and little interest in filling out. Dr. Stefánsson reserves his discoveries for scientific bulletins, and offers here the history of his expedition in a vigorous, telling style to readers most of whom, he always remembers, have never seen an ice pack and, in spite of the flood of polar literature, still want to be told the best way to build an igloo.

BUILDING A SNOW HOUSE.—MACKENZIE ESKIMO.

That curiously resigned frame of mind that is proof to disappointment, which seems essential to the explorer, has never been better illustrated han in this first account from the pen of the intrepid Scandinavian. Dr. Stefánsson will mourn for several pages the death of one of the dogs, calling to mind the animal's loyalty and faithfulness, but a matter like the starvation of the entire party is treated as a matter-of-fact occurrence:

> These two stormbound days used up most of our ordinary food, and on the first day of actual travel we were on half allowance. The second day out we boiled up some seal skins that we had intended for boots; the third day we ate some more skins and boiled a little of the whale tongue * * *
> I must not give the impression that we were really starving, or even suffering much from hunger. We had plenty of seal oil, and of this we ate all we wanted. All of us found however, that we could not take much of it "straight." The stomach needs bulky food; it craves to be filled with something. For this reason we used to eat seal oil soaked up in tea leaves, ptarmigan feathers, or caribou hair. Most commonly we used to take a calf-haired caribou skin, cut it into small pieces, dip the pieces in oil, and eat them that way. This is, too, a method we used in feeding oil to dogs in an emergency; on this trip, as on many other occasions, we and our dogs fared exactly alike * * * I have noticed that on a diet of fats alone one gradually loses strength, but that this symptom of malnutrition is not so conspicuous as sleepiness and a mental inability to call into action such strength as one has * * *.
> We also ate our snowshoe lashings and several pairs of rawhide thongs—fresh rawhide is good eating. It occurs to one in this connection that one of the material advantages of skin clothing over woolens in arctic exploration is that one can eat them in an emergency or feed them to one's dogs if the need is not quite too pressing. This puts actual starvation off by a week or so. A fire-eating one's dogs, to be very thorough in such matters * * * This method of dog that has stood by man failure and helped me to success is the death of a comrade in arms; to eat him would be but a step removed from cannibalism.

Death by starvation seems always something to be expected, and familiarity with that expectation reduces the fear. Then, too, the possibility of getting lost seemed negligible to them, although the reader shivers as he looks at the pictures of those almost limitless, uncharted wastes of snow and ice, and thinks of the blizzard that might come upon the wanderer. Getting lost in a blizzard, however, is not dangerous, declares Dr. Stefánsson—it is merely a nuisance to have to sleep out in it.

> The reason that so many white men freeze to death in the North is chiefly another one of their superstitions about cold, which runs to this effect: That when you are caught in a storm without shelter you must keep moving continually, because if you stop and sit down, and especially if you go to sleep, you are sure to freeze to death.
> The Eskimo rule, which is just the opposite of this, is a sensible one. Just as soon as you make up your mind that you are lost, stop. A white man, following his principle, will walk about until he is thoroughly exhausted, and usually until his clothes are wet with perspiration. The time finally comes when he has to stop through weariness and sleepiness, and his powers of resistance have then been brought to so low a verge that freezing to death is the common outcome.
> Of course, the best thing to do when you are lost in a Winter storm is to put up a snowhouse, but that is sometimes impossible. * * * The thing to do then is to find a small stone or a piece of sod or anything else that can be brushed dry of snow to sit on. Sit on this with your back turned toward the wind; rest your head on your knees and go to sleep if you can.

Another popular idea concerning cold is exploded when it is pointed out that to rub snow on a frozen cheek or foot is the last thing to do for it; warm applications should be used.

These, freezing and starvation, seem to be regarded as mere mishaps. The only occurrence which impressed itself on the mind of the explorer as dangerous was the poisoning of himself and his party by coal gas. At the end of a day's journey they had entered an old snow house.

> We were all warm from fast travel, and in our hurry to get the camp heated we closed the door tightly. * * * Cooking was my job that night, and I had set the primus stove on a block of snow and was on my knees cutting up snow into the kettle to make water. * * * In the midst of one of his funny stories, Tannaumirk all at once threw himself backward and made a sort of gurgling noise. I asked Anderson to look and see what he was up to. When Dr. Anderson turned to look, he fell face downward on top of Tannaumirk. I knew then in a twinkle what the matter was and immediately extinguished the primus stove.
> Natkusiak saw nothing to be alarmed at, and when I told him immediately to break a hole in the snow wall, he went about it with deliberation. When he tried to arise, however, he found himself powerless to do so, and that scared him so that with his last strength he threw himself back against the wall and broke away the loose block of snow by which he had a few minutes before closed up the door.

Twenty-five years from now, Dr. Stefánsson's book will have an added value, for it will furnish one of the few records of an extinct industry—that of whale fishing. The cheap commercial substitute for whalebone is driving the old whalers into other waters, and these pictures of the industry in its last days will prove a valuable bit of chronicle.

There are intimate glimpses into the business of hunting, told in a keen style and not without a sense of humor. Stalking seals, for instance. You must pretend that you, the hunter, are a seal.

To simulate a seal well enough to deceive a seal is not difficult, for to begin with his eyesight is poor. You can walk up without taking any precautions until, under ordinary conditions of light, you are within 250 yards. Then you have to begin to be more careful. You move ahead while he is asleep, and when he wakes up you stop motionless. Your method of locomotion must then be that of a seal, which does not differ materially from that of a snake, and which, therefore, has its disadvantages at a season of the year when the surface of the ice is covered with puddles of water anywhere from an inch to twenty inches in depth.

When you come nearer than 100 yards he will begin to notice you in earnest, and instead of dropping off to sleep every two or three minutes, he will stay awake and watch you.

The seal knows that no seal in this world will sleep continuously for much as four minutes at a time. If you lie still that long, he will know you are no seal, and up will go his tail and down he will slide into the water. When the seal, therefore, has been watching you carefully for twenty or thirty seconds, you must raise your head fifteen or twenty inches above the ice, look around seal fashion, and drop your head again upon the ice. He will then be convinced that you are a seal and all his worries will be gone.

These are incidental, though none the less interesting considerations. It is with the Eskimo, however, not only those who have never seen a white man, but those civilized and semi-civilized that Dr. Stefánsson's narrative is mainly concerned. Through the long Winter night, he has sat with them, hour after hour, taking at their dictation the folklore they would recount to him; he has learned their language and their ways, for six years he has lived among them, hunted and fished with them. As he himself says:

I have lived with the Eskimo until they have become as my own people. I pass my Winters in their houses and my Summers in their tents; I dress as they do, what they eat, and followed the game across the tundra to get my food exactly as they do, and I have come to feel that I understand them as well as I do my own people. My footing among them is antipodal to that of the missionary—he comes to teach, but I to learn.

At every point there is the expression of grave doubts about the efficacy of missionary work among the Eskimos and the importation of the white man's civilization. That same civilization which has taught the family to wash on Saturday nights has resulted in the increased transmission of disease through the use of the family towel; by the acceptance of the Sunday taboo two valuable days out of a fishing season of but six weeks are wasted; the frame houses have increased disease among them and been the cause of using up all the fuel along certain coasts.

I am so great an admirer of the Eskimo before civilization changed them that it is not easy to get me to say that civilization has improved them in any material way. It is easy to get themselves to admit it. To quote my man, Ilvarnik, again:

"The people of Kotzebua Sound were formerly very bad, but they are all good now. In my father's time, and when I was young, they used to lie and to steal and to work on Sunday." "But," I asked him, "don't they, as a matter of fact, tell lies now occasionally?" "Oh, yes, they sometimes do." "Well, don't they really tell about as many lies as they ever did?" "Well, yes, perhaps they do." "And don't they, as a matter of fact, steal about as frequently as ever?" "Well, possibly. But they don't work on Sunday."

Of the kindliness, the hospitality, and the high honor which characterise the so-called "savages," the Copper Eskimo who had never seen a white man and the white man's civilization Stefánsson cannot speak warmly enough. When he and his party arrived at the first of the Victoria Island villages, where no white man had ever before entered, they were received most courteously. A spacious ice house was immediately built, the women hurried home after the first look at the strangers to cook some dainty, such as seal flippers and seal's blood soup for their guests, and they were accorded the greatest respect and consideration. Dr. Stefansson's host was most eager to present his wife.

She was not a talkative person, but motherly, kindly, hospitable, like all her countrywomen. Her first questions were not of the land from which I came, but of my foot-gear. Weren't my feet just a little damp and might she not pull my boots off for me and dry them over the lamp? Would I not put on a pair of her husband's dry socks, and was there no little hole in my mittens or coat that she could mend for me?

This first dinner among "savages" was marked by an almost incredible ceremony and courtesy.

When we had entered the house the boiled pieces of seal meat had already been taken out of the pot and lay steaming on a sideboard. On being assured that my tastes in food were not likely to differ from theirs, my hostess picked out for me the lower joint of a seal's leg, squeezed it firmly between her hands to make sure that nothing should drip from it, and handed it to me, along with her own copper-hafted knife; the next most desirable piece was similarly squeezed and handed to her husband. One extra piece was set aside in case I should want a second helping, and the rest of the boiled meat was divided into four portions, with the explanation to me that there were four families in the village who had no fresh seal meat.

In degree of civilization these gentle people were Stone Age folk, declares Dr. Stefánsson, and yet they were the equals of the best of our own race in good breeding, kindness, and the substantial virtues.

They differed little from you or me, or from the men and women who are our friends and families. The qualities which we call "Christian virtues"—and which the Buddhists no doubt call "Buddhist virtues"—they had in all their essentials. They are not at all what a theorist might have supposed the people of the Stone Age to be, but the people of the Stone Age probably were what these their present-day representatives are; men with standards of honor, men with friends and families, men in love with their wives, gentle to their children, and considerate of the feelings and welfare of others.

If we can reason at all from the present to the past, we can feel sure that the hand of evolution had written the Golden Rule in the hearts of the contemporaries of the mammoth millenniums before the Pyramids were built. At least, that is what I think. I have lived with these so-called primitive people until "savages" and all the kindred terms have lost the vivid meanings they had when I was younger and got all my ideas second-hand; but the turning blank of this picturesque part of my vocabulary has been made up to me by a new realization of the fact that human nature is not only the same the world over, but also the ages through.

But, of course, there are many mental fissures, even in the mind of the civilized Eskimo, which bring about amusing contrasts. The explorers found that nothing appeared especially marvelous to them. When shown a rifle for the first time, having seen how it could kill a caribou at two, three, four hundred yards, they not only seemed to be little impressed, but inquired if the rifle could shoot a caribou on the other side of a mountain. When told that the white people by means of curious machines could fly like the wild ducks in the air, they politely observed that there were many of their shamans, or medicine men, who made trips to the moon. And since his stories were received thus courteously without a shadow of suspicion, there was nothing for Dr. Stefánsson to do but to accept the shaman's adventures in as good faith.

Of the religious beliefs of these simple folk, of their superstitions and their customs, there is much to tell; the picture is valuable in that it presents a race in the various stages of a white man's civilization, and in time those earlier stages are to be done away with. As a whole, "My Life With the Eskimo" is the most important book of its kind published for many years, rivaled only, perhaps, by the account of Mr. Savage-Landor's adventures at the other end of the globe.

A Clergyman's Letters

The Rev. Dr. Malcolm James McLeod's "Letters to Edward" contains real letters written by the minister of Collegiate Church of St. Nicholas, New York, to a fellow-clergyman and greatly beloved friend. There was no thought at the time the letters were written that they some time might be published, but Dr. McLeod's correspondent on his deathbed asked that the letters be made into a book, and his request has been complied with, some things having been excised because they seemed rather too personal for publication. The letters are extremely readable, because they contain frank, clever, and in some instances delightfully humorous pictures of the life of a New York City minister. (Fleming H. Revell Company, $1.)

MASEFIELD

Salt Water Songs and Sketches from His Early Work

AFTER a writer becomes famous his publisher would be more than human did he not send forth gleaners into the fields where he has passed, and offer the uneven product in neat sheaves calculated to catch the eye of the Christmas buyer. In the case of John Masefield the labor is more than usually justified; what he leaves negligently behind him has more sound wheat in it than the carefully garnered crop of most men. The present volumes contain pieces written, some of them, ten years and more ago, when the author must have been very young, but none of them is amateurish or uninteresting—the gleaning has been well worth while.

"Salt-Water Ballads" invites comparison with Kipling, but it is a comparison without odiousness. In "Sea-Fever," for instance, Mr. Masefield sings:

I must down to the sea again, to the lonely sea and the sky,
And all I ask is a tall ship and a star to steer her by,
And the wheel's kick and the wind's song and the white sail's shaking,
And a gray mist on the sea's face and a gray dawn breaking.

That is certainly the spirit of Kipling, but one would search in vain for the passage it imitates. Both men derive from the same source—they meet, as it were, in the same latitudes, though tha Kipling latitudes, it must be said, stretch considerably beyond those of Mr. Masefield.

The younger writer has the advantage—if it is one—of having been an actual sailor. His verse has the accent of old chantles, the rudeness and the mysticism, simple and matter-of-fact, of the deep-sea mariner. And in one respect at least Mr. Masefield is far enough from Kipling—he is not interested in steam. All his ships are sailing-ships, with the glamour of their clouds of canvas upon them. It would be hard to imagine a liner in the "Port of Many Ships":

Drowned old wooden bookers green wi' drippin' wrack,
Ships as never fetched to port, as never came back,
Swingin' to the blushin' tide, dippin' to the swell,
'N' the crewe all singin', sonny, beatin' on the bell.

"Vagabond" harks back to the old wanderlust that was one of our earliest and will probably be one of our last instincts. It is the "Tramp Royal," sentimentalized perhaps, certainly not so four-square to all the winds that blow, yet with a charm of its own.

Dunno the names o' things, nor what they are,
Can't say's I ever will,
Dunno about God—he's jest the noddin' star
Atop the windy hill. * * *
An' why I live, an' why the old world spins,
Are things I never knowed;
My mark's the gypsy fires, the lonely inns,
An' jest the dusty road.

"A Mainsail Haul" is a collection of prose sketches of pirates and buccaneers, interspersed with stories of the sea that remind one, now of Herman Melville—who reads Herman Melville to-day?—now of Defoe, now of old Celtic legends. "From the Spanish" contains a description that would have delighted William Morris:

In the decks of the cabins were roses, worked in parquetry of scarlet lignum-wood, with green leaves, in stained fir, surrounding the heavy blossoms. The bulkheads were of precious wood, carven in pilasters that had gilded roses at their tops. There was a painting on each cabin wall of Elizabeth with her roses, of Mary in the flowered field, or of those other hallows that have the rose as their symbol. The doorways were hung with blue arras of Persia, or with grey tapestry, splendid with purple peacocks, from the looms at Ephrata. Each cabin was lit with a silver lamp, that swung in gimbals above a mirror. Above every cabin was a silver crucifix, above an old censer of flowered copper, studded with jewels, which sent up scented smoke at every canonical hour.

"The Seal Man" has more than a touch of the true Celtic magic:

They stoned the seal-man, whiles, after that; but whiles they didn't stone it. They had a kindness for it, although it had no holy water on it. It was a very young thing to be walking the world, and it was a beautiful wee thing, with its eyes so pretty; so it grew up to be a man. * * * And he set his love on a young girl of the O'Keefe's, a little young girl with no more in her than the flower on its stalk. You would see them in the loanings coming home, or in the bright of the day, going. There was a strong love on them two young things; it was like the love of the Old Ones that took nine deaths to kill. * * * Then they went down into the sea together, and the moon made a track upon the sea, and they walked down it; it was like a flame before them. There was no fear at all on her; only a great love like the love of the Old Ones that was stronger than the touch of the foul. She had a little white throat, and little cheeks like flowers, and she went down into the sea with her man who wasn't a man at all. She was drowned, of course.

The true tales of buccaneers in "A Mainsail Haul" are good reading, but another man might have written them as well as Mr. Masefield. It is the fanciful tales like those from which we have quoted that give the collection its value, and we can only hope and pray that their author will write more of them.

Hunting Yarns

Another good book has come from the Boone and Crockett Club; it is entitled "Hunting at High Altitudes," and contains interesting narratives of the adventures and achievements of a number of eminent sportsmen. The longest of the narratives recounts some experiences of Col. William D. Pickett, the grizzly bear hunter, who, it is said, has had more encounters with grizzly bears than any other man who ever lived. Other interesting contributions are Daniel M. Barringer's memories of the "Old Rockies," a tale of ibex shooting in the Thian Shan Mountains by George L. Harrison, Jr., an account of a shooting trip in Rhodesia by the same writer, and an article on deer hunting in Cuba by Gen. Roger D. Williams.—(Harper & Brothers. $2.50.)

One Hundred Best Books for Christmas

A Representative List of the Season's Publications in All Departments of Literature, Alphabetically Arranged and Briefly Connoted

IN this list of books every publisher has made his own selection on the average of two to each, making 100 titles in all. The titles thus selected have been arranged alphabetically according to authors. Where the size of the book is not denoted it is the common 12mo, or novel size, and the price, unless otherwise qualified, means the net price, the purchaser paying for delivery.

AMERICA AS I SAW IT. By E. Alec Tweedie. With illustrations. 8vo. The Macmillan Company. $3.

The author sees most things and persons that are significant of life here and her observations on them will not always please those persons most interested.

HANS ANDERSEN'S FAIRY TALES. Illustrated by W. Heath Robinson with 16 plates in full color and some hundred line drawings in the text. Henry Holt & Co. 8vo. Probable price, $3.50.

Mr. Robinson is the illustrator of "Bill the Minder," which became such a popular child's book last season.

LADY LAUGHTER. By Ralph Henry Barbour. Illustrated in color by Gayle Hoskins, with decorations by Edward Stratton Holloway. J. B. Lippincott Company. Boxed, $1.50.

The scenes are laid in the Berkshires and the pungent breath of the pines is suggested by character and environment, in which a pretty love story is unfolded.

ALL THE DAYS OF MY LIFE. By Amelia E. Barr. An autobiography. Illustrated. Royal octavo. D. Appleton & Co. $4.50.

This is the life-story in sorrow, toil, joy, and contemplation of the well-known author of "Jan Vedder's Wife," "A Bow of Orange Ribbon," "The Prisons of Conscience," and "Friend Olivia."

QUALITY STREET. By J. M. Barrie. Illustrated with colored plates by Hugh Thomson. 8vo. George H. Doran Company. $5; edition de luxe, $25.

This is the text of Mr. Barrie's well-known play handsomely printed on decorated pages and illustrated in color according to the costumes and surroundings of the Georgian period.

ROYAL SPAIN OF TO-DAY. By Tryphena Bates Batcheller, author of "Italian Castles and Country Seats." 8vo. Illustrated. Longmans, Green & Co. $5.

The author has been peculiarly fortunate in meeting people at the very top of the social scale wherever she has visited and in winning their confidence and their autographed photographs.

THE IRON TRAIL. By Rex Beach. Illustrated. Harper & Brothers. $1.35.

A story of the new Alaska, with strange people whose moral and economic points of view are unknown in the East, and where love and industrial schemes are fought out in a primitive way.

A YALE POET

A WAND AND STRINGS AND OTHER POEMS. By Benjamin R. C. Low. New York: John Lane Company. 1913.

THIS is the second volume of poetry by a young writer whose work attracted considerable attention and was much discussed on its first appearance in a volume entitled "The Sailor Who Has Sailed." Mr. Low is an interesting figure in the new school of letters and poetry that looks to Yale as the fountain head of its culture, just as the flourishing young group of Harvard authors find their Acropolis just eight minutes by underground from Boston Common. We have reached a literature of schools, as well as schools of literature. The literary wars of Oxford and Cambridge reflect themselves on the Charles River and Long Island Sound. The Yale Review, the Harvard Graduates' Review, the pageants and their playwrights, the prize poets and literary groupings, indicate a new and flourishing age.

Thus far the schools have developed hardly what might be called distinguishing qualities; in a general way the Harvard poets show a more delicate quality of beauty. The Yale singers inclining to more strenuous moods and deeper sense of humanity.

Among these latter Mr. Low takes a foremost place in his new volume; he has advanced greatly in technique of verse without revealing the self-consciousness of the metrician, the besetting sin of the scholarly bard; in his complete humanity he stands shoulders above his fellows. His philosophy, unashamed of life but never shameless, marks him out as a poet to be noted and admired, from whom the new literature of man and woman may attain a noble and healthy message.

Mr. Low's "Idyl" reveals him in a pastoral wood that seems to suggest a blend of Sorolla and George Inness. Taken from their context these two stanzas stand forth as remarkable:

Here, if ever, Musidora, is the place—
(I pillow me on moss, with upturned face,
And through the foliage first dimly trace
White clouds and darting stains of blue.)
To put all mask and mystery behind
And be like children, met with open mind.
(The leaves are wet, the wind
Is after them.) I will; will you?

A peal of laughter: can it be? I look
To find myself the cause of it, forsook,
And Musidora, barefoot, in a brook.
This is your answer, then, arch maid?
No sooner said than done; off hose and shoon!
(Brook water frolics to a lively tune;
The low-bent bow, the leaves are whisper strewn.)
I am a child, and you? (We wade.)

TREASURES IN OLD BOOKSTALLS

How Old Friends Are Picked Up for a Few Pennies in Forgotten Corners of London

By ARTHUR L. SALMON

Author of "The Man and the Woman."

WHEN I was a boy, with a burning though immature love of literature, the second-hand bookstalls drew me with magical fascination. The pennies that other boys spent on sweets or tops or ponguns I spent on books. It was not that I did not care for sweetmeats, for I loved them, and do still; but the attraction of books was greater—so much greater that there was no conflict. Sweets and toys came sometimes through other avenues of Providence; but the few pennies that enriched me always drew me into the town to the dingy and dusty stalls of the booksellers.

Saturday night was the best time for my excursions to this treasure-land. It was looked forward to as a festival. Whatever coppers came in my way during the week were stored up; though sometimes I could not wait till Saturday, but must go and invest them at once. Happily they were not many; I had to undergo the splendid discipline of waiting or of doing without. There was a constant zest, a continual renewal of hope and expectation; satiety never dulled my appetite; there was always more to wish for. So may it be to the end—a life of alternate satisfyings and glorious discontent.

I still love to haunt the bookstalls, but not in quite the same spirit. For one thing, I have a little more money to spend; for another, I often see books that I want announced in some excellent cheap series, such as the "Everyman," and I order them in a prosaic way through my regular bookseller. Some of the romance, the unexpectedness, has gone, but not all.

Only a few weeks ago I picked up for sixpence an old friend of my boyhood, Howitt's "Homes and Haunts of the British Poets;" and it vividly recalled the days when I had to read this with the somewhat lessened joy of a borrowed copy. No borrowed book is quite the right thing, to a genuine booklover. It is a gratifying sixpenny-worth—seven hundred pages of close print. In my boyhood, had I seen this on the stalls I should probably not have had the sixpence in my pocket. My means were usually limited to one or two pennies, and though I eyed the shilling or the sixpenny rows of second-hand books with admiration and longing, I had enough philosophy to give my chief attention to the feasible, the possible, and I did not allow the unattainable to dim my happiness. For my possibilities, Saturday night was generally the best, added to which there is always a touch of the ideal about a Saturday.

On that night the bookstalls displayed their most tempting stores; and there was a bustle about the streets which increased the enjoyment of passing through them. Stalls which during the preceding five days had exposed nothing but more costly volumes, would on Saturday yield to the spirit of dissipation, and perhaps devote their whole space to lots marked "Only twopence each," or even "Only one penny." My heart would leap up at sight of such an announcement, as Wordsworth's did at sight of a rainbow. It was a sign of promise to me. The coppers in my pocket knew that they were doomed. They would never return home any more; something better would go back with me. In my sober middle-age, sleep sometimes takes me back to an ideal stall of such two-penny books—situated I know not where, for as in all my dreams its local details are never true to reality; but though in actuality the strange thrill returns when I see such a shelf or stall, I have now learned that life is short and space is limited, and I reason with myself temperately before I yield to temptation.

There were occasional anomalies in these cheap lots. At times a penny pamphlet, slightly soiled, would offer itself for twopence, which seemed an affront. There was also what seemed to me a great excess of hymn books. I never bought them. They were sometimes in deceptive covers, and I threw them down with resentment on discovering their contents. My tastes were mainly secular, and I was specially allured by eighteenth century poets. There was generally a plentiful selection of Thomson's "Seasons," and I yearned to buy them all. They were soiled and a little dog-eared, just as Lamb says they ought to be. But I deemed it unwise to go beyond two copies even of Thomson. Of course my parents' bookshelf had their copy, but I wanted to possess for myself. For this reason no free library ever attracted me like an old bookstall. It goes without saying that where pennies were limited a careful selection had to be made. General literature and poetry had the strongest charm.

As a rule fiction did not attract—I found all I wanted in a paper-covered small-printed edition of Scott, my beloved mental food for many a year, but I can remember buying a copy of Longfellow's "Hyperion" for a penny and finding it very delightful. Its sentimentality deeply moved me, and it gave a useful glimpse of German writers. This became a cherished pocket companion for some time, but a far more frequent and earlier companion was a small anthology of poems entitled "The Poetry of Music," which I purchased for a penny, and which went with me in numberless walks. Its quotations were not all classical; some were from such mild writers as Mrs. Hemans and "L. E. L."

Another favorite which I picked up for the same sum was an odd volume of Ossian. I must confess that I knew very little of Ossian when the volume arrested my attention, but I had a dim idea that he was a poet. A glance within the pages of the book quite mystified me. This did not look like poetry, but the titles were very attractive and there were learned dissertations all about Celtic matters, by Blair and others. I yielded to the lure, and found no reason to repent. It was an early edition, published about 1800, and its boast was that it was "embellished with superb engravings." I was quickly captivated by the Ossianic spell—just the tone to enthrall an imaginative boy, as it had enthralled a Europe whose taste was then very boyish. So sure was I of the authenticity, so enamoured of the romantic beauties, that I wrote an essay on the subject and offered it to Chambers's Journal. The editor did not think it suitable; I am quite sure he was right. But I have still a regard for Ossian (or must I call him Macpherson?) and find that he is best in an old copy like this, with the embellishments and the obsolete, upturned "s."

Another delightful penny purchase was Beattie's "Minstrel" and other poems in a miniature volume of small but remarkably clear type. Small print had a great charm for me in those days—I still maintain that some books are more alluring in small than they would be in large type. The rather thin vein of beauty in Beattie's verses was enough for my immature taste, and I still cherish the tiny volume. I also procured Bloomfield's "Farmer's Boy" for the same sum, and the possession gave me much joy. These small poets appealed strongly to me in those days, and the capability of seeing their value was not altogether to be despised. Bloomfield does not go deep, but he is thoroughly true. I cannot say quite the same for Glover's "Leonidas," another pennyworth which I respected so highly that I began to write an epic poem on the same hero myself. I never read further than the first two pages of Glover, nor wrote more than twenty lines of my own epic. There must have been some grit in the generation that could read Glover. For twopence I secured a volume containing the poems of Thomas Tickell and Smollett—a book really of some literary interest, for it contains that version of the first book of the Iliad which caused a quarrel between Pope and Addison. On another occasion I bought Ambrose Philips, whose poems some of his contemporaries thought "namby-pamby" and so gave our language a useful word. He was a very fair poet for that rather dull time, and his pastorals are really better than Pope's in spite of Pope's ironical letter in The Guardian. For a penny I also obtained Hamilton of Bangour, but I only cared for his "Braes of Yarrow." An odd volume of lives of Scottish poets gave me very great pleasure and was very useful.

Among other finds, a copy of Thomas Warton's poems filled me with great delight, and it gave me much satisfaction later to find that Hazlitt has a good word for Warton's sonnets. I had read of Warton in the writings of Kirke White, whom I greatly loved at that time and still hold in tender memory. Perhaps one of the cheapest of my gains was Mason's "Life and Writings of Gray," in one volume, for twopence. Gray's poems alone I had bought much earlier for a penny, and I had also a penny Collins. This was at a time when there were no penny poets for the millions. It would have seemed an ecstatic dream to imagine penny editions of Tennyson, Wordsworth, Matthew Arnold, Browning, such as we have seen since. But it is not certain that bringing things more within reach is an unmixed gain. That is most loved which is strongly desired, sought out, waited for, snatched by a rare opportunity, won by patience and some sacrifice. It was an admirable training to poke about among the cheap stalls, with only a penny to spend. It taught self-control, hopeful waiting, careful choice. It gave the far glamour of high ideals and the possibility of partial fulfilments. Sometimes I was sent empty away; sometimes I came homeward my feet treading on air, in a trance of joy, with a newly found treasure in my pocket. The gains were greater than the disappointments. I must go to-day, with the memory on me, and look at the old book stalls again, for whatever new life may await I do not know that there will be second-hand bookshops there. Time is short—and pennies not too numerous.

THE MOTHER INSTINCT

THE HUMAN DESIRE. By Violet Irwin. Illustration by James Montgomery Flagg. Small, Maynard & Co. $1.35.

The "desire" of this novel's title is the desire for motherhood, the mother instinct in a young girl's nature, and, in lesser degree, the desire for children in a man's heart. The author has much feeling for the "story" element in her novel; she is more interested in that than in any other of its phases—as any novelist must be if he or she hopes ever to write a novel that is worth anybody's reading. Miss Irwin starts out with some striking situations and the promise of an unusual plot. But her 'prentice hand plays her false and the tale falls more and more into the easy paths of banality. Much the same is true of her characters. During early acquaintance they seem to promise individualities worth further pursuit. But all of them decline into commonplaceness as the tale progresses. But the author had as the basis of her plot a remarkable conception, one whose adequate working out would have tested severely the hand of a skilled writer of stories. That she succeeded in writing as good a novel as she has done and in giving so many glimpses of real emotional power and of a sure instinct for weaving together the shreds of human life is much to her credit. This is the unique and striking conception upon which she has built her story: A little nun, hardly more than a child, in an Italian convent, with her heart so full of love for children, though she has never seen but one bambino, runs away and out into a world of which she has not the first scrap of knowledge, with the purpose of gathering up all the desolate little ones and bringing them back to the convent.

AN ARTIST IN THE NEAR EAST

Jules Guerin Describes His Experiences With Robert Hichens in the Balkans

JULES GUERIN, the artist, and Robert Hichens, author of "The Near East," were fortunate in having gathered their artistic and literary material in the Balkans just before the attention of the world was drawn to that fevered section. Their work has appeared from time to time in The Century Magazine, and is now issued in book form.

Mr. Guérin was run to earth by a representative of THE NEW YORK TIMES BOOK REVIEW in his beautiful studio in Gramercy Park, New York, and questioned about his journeyings in the Near East.

"When I made my trip," said Mr. Guérin, "the outcome of which was these Century paintings, war was simmering. I could look down from my hotel window and see ten or twelve Italian battleships lying in the Golden Horn. In the hotel, the Pera Palace, which might accommodate five hundred people, there were only about eight guests. There were soldiers in the streets everywhere—cafés filled with arguing crowds, and that peculiar fanatical type, the howling dervish, the kind of men who generally incite to discontent and war. One afternoon I saw half a dozen of these fanatics, holding high positions in their religions, dance at Scutari, back in a garden. After a long incantation and a gradual swaying of the body from right to left—with every fourth or fifth word 'Mohammed'—they began to whirl about, and then commenced literally to froth at the mouth. This in the broad sunlight. I have seen more agreeable sights.

"I felt at the time that at almost any moment war would be declared, and I hurried my work along and got out of Constantinople as quickly as possible, not only on this account but also on account of the cholera, which was raging at the time.

"At night at Constantinople one could look out of his hotel and see the white-sheeted bundles and hear the shuffle of the feet of the burial parties. During a cholera epidemic they burn the bodies with quicklime.

"Yes, Robert Hichens was with me at that moment," said Mr. Guérin in answer to a question.

"He is a most charming companion in every way; witty and delightful. We started to travel together, but we found out that a man who is painting and one who is writing cannot very well stay together on a trip like this. The trouble is, one does not always want to remain in the same place the same length of time; for instance, in one historic place I stayed about ten days and Hichens drove right through the town. Of course, there was a great deal for me to paint, and many things that I wanted to do, but the place did not appeal at all to Hichens. He went on to another town to take the Turkish baths.

"Generally we exchange letters and get a general idea of each other's plans, and then after he has done as he wants to do and I have accomplished what I wish we arrange to meet in some place and talk things over. That is what we did in Constantinople and on various other occasions. We don't travel together. We tried to, but gave it up."

Asked of his impressions of Constantinople, Mr. Guérin said: "You can stand on the bridge crossing the Golden Horn from Pera to Stamboul, the two sections of Constantinople, and see all humanity within a day's time—all rushing heaven knows whither—apparently simply hurrying out and hurrying back.

"Here we get that characteristic din of the Eastern cities—that low, persistent buzzing, unlike any sound ever heard in Europe or America—made up of the cries of the boatmen, the calling of the muezzins to prayer from the different minarets, the bargaining in the bazaars and on the streets, the shuffling of donkeys' feet, the shouts of the drivers, &c.—the usual mêlée of an Eastern city. If you forget all your senses except that of hearing and devote your attention to it this hum is tremendously apparent and quite unforgetable; you know immediately that you are not in a European city.

"The carriages in Constantinople are excellent—strange as it may seem—but the roads are perfectly dreadful, and when a villainous-looking Turk gets on the box you say good-bye to your hotel—the Lord only knows where you will turn up. He drives like mad, with his mind, if he has any, only on one point, and that is to dump you there as quickly as he can.

"Every one smokes—usually cigarettes, never cigars. The Mohammedan almost never drinks alcohol, as it is against his religion; occasionally you will see two men in a corner of a café sipping a little brandy, but this is never done in the open. The regular tipple of the East is coffee; a man will drink ten to thirty small cups of Turkish coffee in a day, grounds and all. It is very strong, and I should say has five or six times the amount of caffeine that a cup of ordinary coffee has. Turkish coffee is ground into a powder and boiled with sugar, and the result is a hot syrup; a few cups of this are very stimulating, almost the same as alcohol; a man does not reel with it, but it stimulates and is very apparent in the eyes.

"In the cafés where the Turks sit down to drink they almost invariably order a narghile. I have tried a narghile myself, and found it a very strong smoke. The smoke comes through water and through a long pipe, and is very cool.

"The favorite Turkish drink is made of a little sweetened water, and flavored generally with the juice of some fruit—pomegranate, orange, or peach. They are of all colors—green, pink, yellow, and so forth. An artist, in looking upon a scene, is in the habit of concentrating his attention upon certain things and eliminating others. For this reason the artist's photographer is handicapped because it is so hard for him to eliminate objects and colors that have nothing to do with what he is depicting. As an artist looks at one of the cafés in the Near East his eye is drawn to these minute spots of color made in the scene by these little brilliantly colored beverages which the people in the café have before them at the various tables. These spots are picked out like small electric bulbs.

"Things like this make me enjoy painting in the East and in the Latin countries. I am more in sympathy with them—the sunlight and the life of people always appeal to me. I would never go to Sweden or Norway or to England to paint, and expect to do the best work. A country without good architecture would not appeal to me, and it is the human element in the landscape which appeals to my imagination. To me the Grand Cañon is one of the atrocities of the earth, with absolutely no humanity to it—no beautiful form, no beautiful color, simply a gash in the heart of the earth—a thing that has happened, and the sooner forgotten the better.

"Street travel in the Eastern cities is anything but agreeable to the non-Mohammedan. The Mohammedan has a peculiar quality of looking at you and not seeing you. If you happen to be in his way he will not be overpolite in getting out of your way, but is more apt to push you aside and ride his horse or camel right over the spot where you had been standing.

"The costumes of that part of the world interested us both a great deal. I have watched with much interest, also, during the last year or so to see the growth of the Eastern idea in woman's dress in this country. I suppose we are indebted to the Russians a great deal for the first start of this invasion of the Occident, and more particularly to the artist, Leon Bakst, who designed the scenery and costumes for Pavlowa and the Russian ballet, and who has put on a number of these pieces, including that very successful piece that is now running in Paris. I consider M. Bakst a very great artist.

"There have naturally been excesses in this Eastern style of costume—you will always find certain people who will caricature a good motive. One of the best things about the costume is that it decorates the constructive lines of the human form and does not depend upon mechanical contrivances to achieve its results.

"Take women's hats, for instance: The crown of a hat which is supposed to fit the head will start in directly at the forehead just above the eyebrows and terminate at the back four or five, and perhaps six, inches beyond the nape of the neck; this gives the impression of an unnatural and lop-sided cranium. A dome-shaped hat should conform to the shape of the head, as a broad turban does, although it need not be the same size any more than a turban is.

"One of my Century paintings is called 'The Cemetery at Eyub.' It is only within the last few years that people have been permitted to visit the mosque at Eyub or even the courtyard. The Turks do not bury very deep in the ground, and looking over a cemetery you will find that the stones are seldom upright, being sunken so little below the surface they are not firm and have a tendency to lean over.

"Wherever you see a tombstone, and on top of it a carved stone fez painted red, you know that a man is buried there; the inscription is often painted in gold in the beautiful Turkish characters on a blue background, and his name accompanies the inscription. When a woman is buried there is no name put on the tombstone, but there is generally some beautiful flower—a rose, or some climbing vine, or some emblem of that kind that the man has adopted for that woman. He knows where she is buried, but no one else knows.

"There is a round hole cut through the centre of the stone which lies flat on the grave, and in this opening flowers are planted. The religious meaning of this is that the rain descends from above and through this hole percolates to the body and cleanses the spirit of the departed.

"This cemetery is a great place for the women to go and wander about amoog the tombs. It is perfectly beautiful to see them in their long robes—always with their faces masked, of course. Women do walk in the streets, but the cemeteries are the only places in which I have ever seen them loiter.

"The trees, which are cypress, are the most beautiful I have ever seen anywhere. They are about 150 feet high, the trunks 3 or 4 feet in diameter at the bottom, and are superb. I have never seen trees in any country—Greece, Italy, France, anywhere—comparable with the trees in the cemetery at Eyub. In form they are something similar to poplars.

"Down the hill is a mosque, the only one I visited having a woman's department. When you are in the court yard you can see the women standing in line and talking through a wicket, very similar to the confessional in the Catholic Church. What they are saying—whether they are asking for alms, or confessing, or what—I have never been able to make out. No one is permitted to go into the woman's mosque. On religious fete days women are allowed into other mosques, but ordinarily they are barred.

"The courtyard is the best beautiful I have ever seen. Right in the centre is a tremendous plane tree, the branches of which, when in full leaf, have to be supported by big props; they extend about seventy-five feet in each direction. The courtyard is filled with pigeons, which all descend like a shower. No one ever hurts a pigeon in that country—you simply shove them out of your way. Just like the dogs in the cities of the East, one must drive around a dog rather than make him get up and move out of the way. They are the scavengers and must not be disturbed.

"Several years ago all of the dogs in Constantinople were transported to a small island in the Sea of Marmora and left there to die. The carrion was purchased by an enterprising Frenchman who marketed it as fertilizer in France. When in Constantinople I saw a photograph of the last dog left on the island. The race of dogs, however, remains in Brussa just as it always has for hundreds and hundreds of years.

"Very few non-Mohammedans have ever succeeded in getting to the centre of the Mohammedan Church, which is at Mecca. Many men are clever enough to learn the languages, Arabic and its dozens of dialects, but where they are caught is in the religious ceremony—they do not know what to do when they get into the mosque, and then the knife is put into them. It is a matter of record that many men under disguise have attempted to reach Mecca, but few have returned—in fact, only one man, Sir Richard Burton.

"Everything in religion in the Near East is a song—a thing of joy and of happiness. In our Church it is not that way—our Church is a solemn occasion. When you see those fellows at worship you feel that they are happy. They go to the mosques many times for devotion, and they enter with smiling faces and to all appearances with great pleasure. When the muezzins call the Turk will get down from his camel, spread his little mat, and kneel on it, always facing the east, and bow his head to the ground—and no one takes any more notice of him than if he lit a cigarette. If there is water near he will wash his feet and his hands; if not, he goes through the motions as of cleansing. If sand is convenient he uses sand. In every mosque there is always running water, either in the form of a fountain or a larger basin; in some mosques you will see fifty men sitting at the edge of a circular basin washing their feet in the water before going in to pray—all laughing, none sanctimonious.

"In that dry country the bell-like music of running water is heard in nearly every house or garden. It is one of the ways in which the natives soothe their troubled spirits. Another method they have is to sit perfectly still, in deep contemplation, staring at nothing. This is called 'making kif.' On a rocky headland you will see a man sitting apparently looking out to sea, but when you look in his face you discover that he is staring at nothing at all. This very practical method of repose is one that must interest any Western traveler in these lands."

After alluding to the lovely color effects that he found in the cities and countries of the Near East, Mr. Guérin spoke of the work that is engaging his entire attention at the present time as Director of Color and Decoration of the Panama-Pacific Exposition of 1915.

"I am making an experiment in color directorship in this exposition that has not been tried before," declared Mr. Guérin. "In a sense, it is like the musical director with his baton and his different men playing their different instruments. I myself am not painting anything. I prefer this, because I think I can guide the other men better by doing nothing myself. The object is to give the men certain black-and-white values, certain scales of figures, certain horizon lines to be adhered to, and certain colors to be painted with. For instance, if a man is using vermilion he cannot use any other kind of red.

"Here is one little bit of color," said Mr. Guérin, picking up a bit of staff tinted a dull gray. "No man is permitted to paint higher in tone than this color, which is a long way from white, as you will see when I have placed it against this dead white bit of notepaper. In making the paintings which decorate 'The Near East' I adhered rigidly to a scale of tone which I set for myself. If I set a certain high pitch in some places—we will say like the high light in this 'Near East' painting—I never go the gamut in the black-and-white values again.

"This in itself will have a strong tendency to keep all the exposition decoration in tone. The general tone of the buildings of the Panama Pacific Exposition is that of Travertine stone—the same as the interior of the Pennsylvania Railroad Station, and also the Forum and the Parthenon at Rome.

"Decoration is my chief interest at the present time. If I could handle a landscape and make a decoration of it, then I would do it; if I were obliged to handle it architecturally, then I wouldn't touch it. Unless a man keeps to his own genre he never sustains his own reputation. For instance, take a man like Brangwyn. Suppose somebody were to come to him and say 'Now, won't you make a lot of pen drawings and make them look like Joe Pennell?' Why, Brangwyn would say right away, 'Don't you think you had better get some one else?' He wouldn't want to do that sort of thing; a man wants to put his own efforts into his own medium."

"Do you consider decoration in this country behind the other things in art?" Mr. Guérin was asked.

"The first real start decoration received in this country was given to it by Frank D. Millet at the Exposition in Chicago in 1893. They discovered that painting the buildings one more time was not necessary, and Millet went before the Directors and asked for that amount of money to put into mural decoration. It was an accident, in other words. Ever since then all expositions have had decoration on their buildings, as they should, and in the coming Panama-Pacific Exposition I have perhaps four times as much money to spend in mural painting as was ever spent in any previous exposition.

"All the tendency of my work at the present time, and will be in the future, is decoration, especially the larger things. It is not that I consider decoration a higher form of art than anything like this work I have done for 'The Near East,' but for me it seems a greater thing to be a successful mural painter than it would be to paint any number of decorative pages.

"Hichens says in 'The Near East' that he does not agree with the old notion that a fine view as such had little attraction for the Greeks. I am with him in this, for the ancient Greeks chose the best sites available for their monuments. For example, the temple at Sunium was built on a plane at Cape Colonna, right at the apex where returning voyagers from the East could see the temple with the statue of Athene the first thing, and just as soon as their eyes rested upon it they would fall face downward on the decks of the vessel and worship the goddess. This high point of vantage applies to virtually all temples in Greece. When the temple is not placed well in this way it is because in that community where a temple was needed no elevation exists.

"Now and then I hear that the Parthenon is disappointing at first sight. I cannot agree with this in any way; I consider that to-day the Parthenon, dilapidated as it may be, is the greatest architectural treat in the world, even in the condition that it is in, and that no amount of familiarity with it—through bad pictures and poor descriptions—can spoil it.

"We have recently heard of the terrific fighting of the Greek soldiers. It is ha' to think of those men in their opera bouffe costumes—their short starched skirts and tufted slippers—in a death struggle; as a matter of fact, I imagine that a good deal of the fighting was done in commonplace European khaki uniforms.

"The Turkish soldier looks the soldier from top to toe. After all, we must remember that the Turks have seldom been defeated before this recent war, and I believe that the real inside story of this war is yet to be told."

As to whether the Turks would ever regain the territory recently lost, Mr. Guérin said:

"We must remember that the Turkish people have not produced great painters, great musicians, or great literature, or, for that matter, are not pre-eminent commercially; they are almost alone in that respect, and it is very difficult in past history to find a truly great nation that has not excelled at some time in the arts. They have not; even their architecture, in which perhaps they rank higher than in any other art, is not as fine as has been offered by other peoples. The mosques themselves are wonderful creations, beautiful in construction, design, and material, and very inspiring in every way, but one does not recall any great masterpieces, architecturally, in Turkey; even the much vaunted Taj Mahal I consider to be inferior to most of the great architectural masterpieces of Egypt and Turkey.

"I think Turkey will always be the same; it was only in the fourteenth century that the Turks got ever into Europe—they had always been in Asia Minor. There has always been talk of a new nation growing up—a federation of the small countries, Greece, Bulgaria, and the rest—but religion, if nothing else, I believe, would keep them apart. Another great point of contention is the strategic position that Constantinople holds.

"I doubt if the Turks will ever be a power in Europe. They are not a progressive people; just as I was saying in regard to art, music, &c., they have got to have that background. In reading of the accomplishment of things in past times, what remains after all is said and done? There is not a banker's name ever mentioned, or a great merchant—it is the names of the great architects, the great painters, and the great musicians and writers; the commercial end of the thing does not exist in the personal quality, but it must be there in order to foster the other things—a background to play against.

"These States will never get together; they have not enough co-ordination to hold together. They have fought for many years, and they seem to be filled with hatred for one another; a Greek hates a Turk worse than he hates a snake. I have seldom seen a Turk in Greece, although there are many Greeks in Turkey, and in Constantinople."

FOR THE STUDENT OF CHURCH HISTORY

THE teaching of history has taken a new turn of recent years; the students are encouraged to go to the actual sources in the original or translation and see for themselves the basis on which the statements of the historian are dependent. A sense of reality is given to the study, by this means, which can be given in no other way. Prof. Ayer has applied this method to the history of the early Church from the Apostolic age down to tha Nicene Council, making use of the German works of a similar kind by Mirbt, Hahn, Knopf, and others, which give the sources in the original Greek and Latin. He seems to have made his selection with judicious care, and gives the student just those passages which are sufficient to indicate the critical moments in the development of Christian practice and doctrine. We see pass before us the persecutions from Nero to Diocletian, the apologetics of the early Christians against Pagans and Jews, the rise of the Gnostics and other sects, and the development of the internal constitution of the Church. With the period of Constantine the problems of the relation of Church and State come into prominence, as well as the curious episode of Julian the Apostate. A fairly full account is given of the Arian controversy, which was finally settled in the Nicene Council of 325, practically establishing the creed of Christendom. The latter part of the book tells of the spread of Christianity among the heathens of the North—the Celts, the Franks, and the Germans—and the book finishes with the foundations of the mediaeval Church and the rise of the new monasticism.

All these topics and many of their side issues are explained in Prof. Ayer's introduction to the various original sources which he translates, so that, in a measure, the book is both a history and a source book. Its value will be appreciated by theological students who will find their church history made both more interesting and more easily memorable by this collection of sources. The accounts of the many heresies, in particular, are often more clear in Prof. Ayer's words than in his quoted passages which, from the nature of the case, have to be restricted in number. Owing to the labors of Harnack and others this part of church history has been placed on so firm a basis that there is little dispute between scholars, even though of different schools of Christianity, with regard to the main lines of development. Prof. Ayer is himself an Episcopalian, but many of the books from which he takes his sources were compiled by Roman Catholics, and there is no reason why the book should not be used by Baptist or Presbyterian students of theology.

CHEW FOOD FOR STRENGTH

NO one should be in a better position to state what "Fletcherism" is than Horace Fletcher himself; and he has done so with admirable clearness and precision in the book before us. Here he gives us an account of his early struggles for health, his initial experimenting with diet, and his discovery of the benefits resulting from lessening his food-supply and in masticating it more thoroughly. He began experimenting upon himself, and reading various works upon physiology and diet. He induced others to experiment likewise. Years passed. The benefits of his system became more and more certain; the reasonableness of his theory became more and more patent, as it became more scientifically assured. One by one, physicians and physiologists came to his way of thinking. Sir Michael Foster, Prof. Mendel, Prof. Chittenden, Dr. Huggins, Prof. Bowditch, Dr. Kellogg, Prof. Irving Fisher, Dr. Anderson, and many others fell into line, saying that the accepted standards of dietary are too high, and that those advanced by Mr. Fletcher more nearly resemble the requirements of the human body. Experiments were instituted on a large scale. A squad of the army was tested in this manner, and the men were found to remain in excellent physical condition on about one-third the amount of proteid said to be necessary by the older physiologists. Groups of college professors and athletes were also tried—with the same results. In fact, in every case it was found that the men improved in health, strength, endurance and energy under the new regimen. More careful mouth-preparation of the food allowed the body to assimilate more nutriment from it, hence less was required. With less food, the body improved in health and strength—both mental and physical.

Mr. Horace Fletcher's own case—which he gives at length in this book—is most instructive. At 40 he had been turned down by an insurance company as a "poor risk." Twenty years later he was enabled to break, and more than double, the endurance records of all the athletes in Yale University! Under the supervision of Dr. Anderson, Mr. Fletcher undertook to break the endurance record without any previous training. The record stood at 175 lifts. Mr. Fletcher made 350-odd lifts, and stopped, feeling relatively fresh. His heart action, nerve, &c., were perfect. No trace of stiffness was found the next day. Several other records were made by Mr. Fletcher the same year in Yale and elsewhere.

The principle underlying all this is the following: Fatigue is due to self-poisoning—"auto-intoxication." The more poisons there are in the body, the more rapidly fatigue sets in, and vice versa. Mr. Fletcher's body was free from poisons, because of his careful system of living, and particularly his diet. Hence the lack of fatigue and soreness. Every one could do the same thing, more or less, with the same care in diet. Hence restriction in the diet is the greatest factor in the cultivation of endurance and in the prevention of disease. It is because of these facts that a simplified diet is so important. And, as Mr. Fletcher shows, it is easier to accomplish this result by carefully chewing the food than in any other way, since everything may be eaten, and as much as desired, but the body soon craves less. All students of dietetics, indeed, every man and woman who desires to retain a sound, vigorous, healthy body, should read this last book from the pen of the pioneer or Fletcherism.

AMERICAN VERSE

An Anthology That Proves Its Vitality

WHEN was it that poetry died? There was a really good obituary notice in some magazine. The deceased art was mentioned in the kindest terms, although it was evident that the writer was relieved to know that energies formerly frittered away in rhyme would now be devoted to the creation of serious works of art, like novels about the criminal classes.

But poetry is accustomed to reading its own obituary notices. And, like a sane man, it is confident of its own immortality. If any proof were needed that poetry is alive in America to-day, it would be found in Miss Jessie B. Rittenhouse's "The Little Book of Modern Verse," which has the sub-title, "A Selection from the Work of Contemporaneous American Poets." Undoubtedly there have been times when there were greater American poets than there are now—no contemporary makers of verse dominate our national culture as did Longfellow, Lowell, Whittier, Bryant, and Poe. But at no previous time has it been possible to gather so many good poems from so many living poets, to tap, as it were, the cask of song and draw so rich and sweet a vintage.

Miss Rittenhouse has not, she says, made a formal anthology. She has made "a small, intimate collection, representative rather than exhaustive," reflecting faithfully the spirit of modern American poetry. This being the case, "The Little Book of Modern Verse" cannot fairly be compared with such encyclopedic works as Stedman's "American Anthology" or Burton E. Stevenson's "Home Book of Verse." Nor can it be classed with "The Younger Choir"—which was primarily the expression of a group of young radical poets—nor with "The Lyric Year," which was a collection of poems entered in competition for certain prizes. In fact, it is practically unique among anthologies, unique in purpose and unique in method of presentation. Perhaps the book most like it in general character is "The Book of Georgian Verse," that interesting little collection of the work of the younger English poets published some months ago in London.

And if this be taken as representative of modern American poetry, and "The Book of Georgian Verse" as representative of that of England, then patriotic critics have cause for rejoicing. For this little book is to the English anthology as grand opera is to vaudeville. This reviewer likes vaudeville, and the vaudeville of "The Book of Georgian Verse" was for the most part excellent. But in Miss Rittenhouse's collection may be found on nearly every page that indefinable but unmistakable poetic quality for which, in the English anthology, it was necessary diligently to search. Of course, Miss Rittenhouse is to be congratulated on the excellence of her literary taste, but the prerequisite of her book was a large supply of genuine poetry on which this taste might be exercised.

The arrangement of the poems cannot be praised too highly. Heretofore poems have been grouped together chronologically or by subject, or alphabetically. It has remained for Miss Rittenhouse to unify her collection by so placing the poems that each leads to the next. Between every two poems there is some connection of mood or theme. So from the tragic agnosticism of Morris Rosenfeld's "I Know Not Why" the reader passes to the pathetic questioning of Edith M. Thomas's "Winter Sleep," and then to the passionate beauty of Louise Imogene Guiney's deathless "Tryste No." Chester Firkins's "On a Subway Express" is followed by Percy Mackaye's sonnet, "The Automobile," and then comes one of the best poems that aviation has called forth—George Sterling's "Black Vulture."

This scheme is followed out with admirable skill. Miss Rittenhouse has raised anthology making to the level of the fine arts; she has really created a thing of beauty. But while the conscientious following of this plan has made "The Little Book of American Verse" a delight to all who love poetry, it is responsible for some exclusions that many readers will regret. Louis Untermeyer's "Only of Thee and Me" fits in excellently between Josephine Preston Peabody's "The Nightingale Unheard" and Cale Young Rice's "When the Wind Is Low," but it is inferior to much of this poet's more recent work, the splendid "Folk Song," which recently appeared in Harper's, for example.

Mr. Rice's "The Mystic" is decidedly good, but it is difficult to guess why "Kinchinjunga" was included. And John Hall Wheelock's "Love Knocks at the Door" is amazingly weak when compared to the other poem by which he is here represented, the memorable twelve lines called "Life." Also this reviewer is tired of "The Ballade of My Lady's Beauty," and he believes he is not alone in his weariness.

But these are the only poems in the book which call for adverse comment. One looks in vain, it is true, for such a classic as Joseph I. C. Clarke's "The Fighting Race." And, indeed, this fighting race is rather thinly represented. There are fine things by T. A. Daly and Shaemas O'Sheel, but none of Teresa Brayton's beautiful homespun, none of James Dollard's stirring ballads, no samples of the work of Thomas Walsh, Eleanor Cox or Donn Byrne. The copyright law must be blamed for most of these omissions, and it is undoubtedly because of it that none of Henry van Dyke's lyrics are given.

But then, the book is not meant to be exhaustive, and it certainly is representative. More than any other anthology it is an indication of the tendency of the poetry of the period. It will be of great value to students and historians of literature, and surely generations other than this will be grateful to the wise gatherer of so much loveliness.

But why, in a representative anthology, are the exquisite lyrics of Jessie B. Rittenhouse omitted? Surely "The Skiff" should be given. Why be more modest than Burton E. Stevenson, Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch, and Edmund Clarence Stedman?

One fact that is clearly impressed upon the minds of readers of this book is that there are no American decadents. George Sylvester Viereck is represented by "The Candle and the Flame" and two finely wrought sonnets, but these poems are not decadent. They are strong, too simple and clear in their heterodoxy to deserve such an adjective. And the book as a whole, from the great music of Louise Imogene Guiney, Anna Hempstead Branch, Edwin Markham, and Edwin Arlington Robinson down to the least contribution of the youngest poet, is sane as sunlight and wholesome as spring water. The traditions of English verse are held sacred by the American poets of our time. Little men may scream about their little ideas—futurism, imagism, some other fancy—but they leave no record, and oblivion takes them all. The art that endures is the art that is reverent and disciplined, free in starry chains, and humble in the confidence of immortality.

Its Force in the Manifold Affairs of Life

MR. LEOPOLD has gotten hold of a splendid subject and, on the whole, has treated it suggestively. When one reflects on it, the whole world is ruled by prestige, yet there has hitherto been no adequate study of this mysterious power which enables gray-haired veterans to order about men who could knock them down with a blow, and even constitutes half the attractive force of feminine charms. Mr. Leopold is a pioneer in studying this mystic influence, and his book has a good deal of the charm, and some of the obscurity, which attends such incursions into the unknown.

As Mr. Leopold points out, prestige is the obverse of prejudice. Indeed, it is prejudice in favor of a person, just as prejudice per se is an unfavorable judgment of a person before real acquaintance with him. The importance of prestige in modern life cannot well be overestimated. The moment a modern man becomes secure of his bread and butter his chief striving seems to be to become known for some excellence among those whom he does not know. Hence the increasing bulkiness of the collections of non-celebrities known as "Who's Who." To be distinguished from his fellow-men is the chief striving of modern man. When he attains this goal he uses this prestige for realizing his ideals, whatever they be, with the least exertion of will force.

All this and more also Mr. Leopold illustrates and analyzes with great psychological skill and no inconsiderable powers of literary presentation. He has evidently read widely, especially in anthropology, and utilizes his wide reading by pertinent examples. He speaks somewhat contemptuously of the intellectual prestige obtained by the older type of savant who crowds his pages with learned reference to chapter and verse of the authorities he quotes. Mr. Leopold, with the pride that apes humility, refuses to give the exact references to the pages of the many works to which he refers, which may increase the prestige of his work but scarcely adds to its utility. It is exasperating to be told that Hewitt says this or Hearn says that without being able to check these statements in their own context. Still, this is but a small blemish in a fine piece of work, since Mr. Leopold's examples, pertinent as they are, for the most part, are only illustrations, and, even if unchecked, scarcely disturb the line of argument.

A more serious objection to Mr. Leopold's treatment of his subject is the obscurity of some of his terms, which almost suggests that his use of English, striking and vigorous as it is, is not that of a native. In particular, he uses the word "conception" in a manner unusual among psychologists; nor is his arrangement of his subject as clear as it might be. He seems to lay down a plan by which he should deal with the effect on the meh mind of prestige, then with the influence of that quality on the possessor of prestige, and, finally, on the effects of the mutual influence between the two. But his actual treatment scarcely carries out this plan, and we have chapters, interesting enough in their way, on the racial and individual characters of the recipients of prestige, the means and utility of prestige, and the opposition of prestige and demagogy. From this latter chapter one would conjecture that Mr. Leopold is one of the Neo-Aristocrats who have been influenced by the thought of Nietzsche.

But the most interesting portion of this interesting book is the third section, in which he deals successively with prestige—in love, in economic life, in religion, in politics, and finally with the prestige of intellect and the relations of prestige and abnormality, where he deals with cases of pseudo-prestige self-induced by megalomania.

Sufficient has been said to indicate the interest of Mr. Leopold's topic and of the manner in which he has treated it. The book is suggestive, in many ways, or, as the author would say, "thought-compelling." There is a certain Carlylesque ruggedness about the thought and treatment which stimulates, though at times it may irritate. Such qualities are sufficiently rare nowadays to give this book of Mr. Leopold's distinction, and, if we may so phrase it, prestige. JOSEPH JACOBS.

FOR PRINCE CHARLIE

SHALLOWS. By Frederick Watson. E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.35.

Prince Charlie, grown older and less handsome but little the wiser in the seven years following the fiasco of 1745, reappears in the interesting episode that forms the basis of Mr. Watson's novel. The many American readers of his father's "Beside the Bonnie Briar Bush" will be interested to know how the younger man has treated the historical personality that has allured so many novelists. They will find a tale full of incident, alive with the intense loyalty of Prince Charlie's followers, and hurrying on through reckless adventures and patriotic fervors to a sombre and tragic disillusionment. But it is not written after the romantic method dear to the hearts of most writers and readers of historical novels. Mr. Watson's temper is judicial, his feeling aloof, and his method realistic. His grim tale is softened by no rose-colored lights. But there is not a little charm in the telling of it, while in literary feeling and artistic insight it is not to be compared with the ordinary gilded and perfumed historical romance.

The story opens in Paris, where Prince Charlie is in hiding in the Convent of St. Joseph. Here are some skillfully drawn pictures of scenes and of people—among the latter Condillac, "le philosophe," and the love to which he wakes too late. But the scene soon shifts to Scotland and the desperate efforts and final undoing of the Prince's followers.

Paul Bourget

A very good story of Paul Bourget's life and an admirable critical survey of his literary achievements are to be found in a monograph by Ernest Dimnet, which is published as one of Constable's Modern Biographies. Dimnet does not class Bourget with the truly great writers of the world, but holds that he towers above most of the novelists of his time, an exceptionally robust author with a lot of well-balanced, well-constructed, and logical literature to his credit. "DANDIES"

Some Famous Instances Among Men of Letters

NO doubt there have been such odd combinations from time to time as Dandies and Men of Letters, although the persistent sentimentalist seems to fail to see that they are to be classed with the "rare bird." There are authors whom it seems to flatter to bruit it abroad that their clan has its own aristocracy, forgetful of the fact that history reveals a connection between letters and fashion almost as deplorable as that between Church and State. With Beckford, Brummell, D'Orsay, Byron, Rogers, Moore, and other lesser lights, Mr. Leon Vincent sets up a dandiacal portrait gallery for any modern best-seller who asks himself: "What's the use of being famous if you can't be 'smart?'"

The reader who delights in an informal, airy touch upon the surface of literary and court life will be grateful to Mr. Vincent for this agreeable galaxy and perhaps resent as captious the criticism that asks why so great a dandy and author is absent as Henry Beyle, Stendhal, the only man who shaved every morning during Napoleon's retreat from Moscow, or the exquisite Alfred de Musset, or the courtly Washington and splendid Nathaniel P. Willis? They would certainly be more at ease among the bucks and beaux than Mr. Vincent's Charles Kirkpatrick Sharpe and Henry Crabb Robinson.

If Moore dearly loved a Lord, Thackeray dearly loved a dandy, and in early youth strove to become one himself, and later was a friend of D'Orsay's. Many another hard-working author whose trousers will persist in bulging at the knees must look with interest on a Brummell in "a dove-colored coat and white satin inexpressibles," whose main contribution to letters and life was summed up in his motto: "No perfumes, but very fine linen, plenty of it, and country washing." But there are few who will fail to sympathize with the rich brewer whom he addressed at the card table as "Mash-tub"; from whom he won three hundred pounds and on rising said: "In future I shall drink no porter but yours." The brewer's name does not figure among those of the greatest wits, but he sent a famous parting shot: "I wish every other blackguard in London would say the same."

When the King had ceased "to conduct himself with propriety" toward him, Brummell retired to France while bailiffs and other art collectors ravaged his lodgings. At Caen he took up his abode with "a most cleanly, devout old lady," finding her "rooms, garden, Angora cats, and parrot were perfectly to his taste."

After such an immaculate specimen of bloodless selfishness, D'Orsay and Lady Blessington seem almost shoddy; they ended up in making books—too many of them—and thus turned an honest, if unfashionable, penny to pay their debts. Perhaps the word "gorgeous" did not originally possess its present offensiveness when it was "wished upon" her Ladyship. Impudence and cruelty, however, seemed to have been more easily passed off as wit in those old days of Bath and Tunbridge; the practical jokes then laughed at would to-day result in more damage suits than plaudits.

It is good to find Mr. Vincent puncturing that hoary old French and German legend of Byron, driven from England by Mrs. Grundy; public separations of husband and wife happened to be rather infrequent in England's highest society, and Byron's ways were generally not ingratiating. "Byron," he says, "was never insulted on the streets, nor hissed as he went to the House of Lords." The excellent instinct for advertising that characterized this poet was displayed in his parting speech to England, comparing himself to "the stag at bay who betakes himself to the waters."

Rogers, too, is a fit subject for any gallery of worthies, as a poet who lived to the age of 92, had the pleasure of burying all his rivals, and going blithely to three dinner parties the very week his own bank was robbed of three thousand dollars worth of notes. His temper was quite as bad as Landor's, who lived almost to the same advanced age, as the friends of placidity may be concerned to hear, although the lifeless hue of Rogers's face caused Sidney Smith to exclaim of seeing a painting of the Dead Sea, "Quite perfect—it only wants one thing: Rogers to be seen bathing."

Washington Irving wrote Moore that Rogers in his table talk served up his friends as he served up his fish, "with a squeeze of lemon over each"—yet it must be remembered that he was one of the most benevolent characters of his day. "They tell me I say ill-natured things," he observed in his slow, quiet, deliberate way; "I have a very weak voice, and if I did not say ill-natured things no one would hear what I say."

Sentiment has changed its dress and consigned the ringletted nymphs and hirsute harpers to the storage warehouses of literature, so it is pleasant to find so discerning a crit as Mr. Vincent pointing out that Moore's "Twopenny Post Bag" and "The Fudge Family in Paris" are satirea fresh and undimmed as when the little Irishman wrote them. For dash and cut it would be hard to match such lines as these in which he institutes comparisons between Lord Sidmouth and Tiberius:

'Tis true the Tyrant lent an ear to
All sorts of spies—so doth the Peer too;
'Tis true my Lord Elect tells fibs
And deals in perjury—ditto Tibs;
'Tis true the Tyrant screen. I and hid
His rogues from justice—ditto Sid;
'Tis true the Peer is grave and glib
At moral speeches—ditto Tib;
'Tis true the feats the Tyrant did
Were in his dotage—ditto Sid.

A vast fortune in Jamaica slaves and mahogany, careful education, and exquisite tastes combined to produce that strangest of Englishmen, Beckford, who preached "that we have no right to murder animals for sport," and at the age of 22 produced that peerless gem of English prose, "with its caliphs, harems, eunuchs, and other horrid subjects," "The History of the Caliph Vathek." It was written as the fine gentlemen of literature always wrote—"at one sitting"—and as he confessed, "in French. It cost me three days and two nights of hard labor. I never took my clothes off the whole time. This severe application made me very ill." A stripling of 20 who declares that his own estimable father's establishment "gave him the idea for the Hall of Eblis, and that the female characters in the story were portraits of the domestics," may well cause concern in literary pantries and kitchens. Mr. Vincent sees in him "a compound of English reserve and American hustle." He certainly had a passion for seeing things done promptly, as was witnessed in his directing the laborers of Fonthill Abbey to work day and night causing the royal works at Windsor to be suspended for lack of hands. It was only proper for his spectacular tower to collapse as it did during a storm some few years later; he regrets that he was not present to witness the scene, "for after a Somersault very nearly performed in the higher Regions of the Air, down came Boards, Beams, and Scaffold poles, but so compactly and genteelly as not to have shaken a single Stone of the main Edifice." "Vathek," however, is a monument more enduring than bronze.

One would gladly follow Mr. Vincent, or reconnoitre about him in this manner, through many pages of his saunterings with his "Dandies and Men of Letters"; they themselves would have been pleased in life with his company, for he makes a good listener and has no desire to eclipse their mots and good things with any of his own.

HOW TO DRAW

Mr. E. G. Lutz thinks that his new method, which he sets forth in "What to Draw and How to Draw It," is "the ideal method" for teaching drawing to children. It is analytical in its basic principles and it aims to lead the pupil by steps from the simplest outlines of what might be called "the pattern" of the figure to be drawn to the complete representation. The book has no formal teaching. Its pages are filled, instead, with examples of figures to be drawn, each separated into its several steps, from the first simple lines to the complete picture. (E. TAGORE

The Winner of the Nobel Prize Compared With Walt Whitman

EAST is East, of course, and West is West, and never the twain shall meet, and the rest of it. But spite of Kipling and his gods, there is more of the East in the West and the West in the East than either is often given credit for. The strength of the fascination which the philosophies of Asia have for Europe can be no better shown than by the frequency with which it is traded upon, and the number of cults whose adherents dream that by some short cut they can reach the psychic plane of the Indian mystic. The prevalence of this foolish superstition has brought Orientalism in general into disrepute with certain hardheaded individuals, who would be greatly surprised if they realized how much of the simon-pure article lies in the cealed in their own souls. It is to these, as well as to the initiate, that the poems of Rabindranath Tagore will appeal. As William Butler Yeats says of them, "the work of a supreme culture, they yet appear as much the growth of the common soil as the grass and the rushes."

Since the recent award of the Nobel prize to the Indian poet, the details of his life have become so well known that it is not necessary to refer to them here. He is said to be so popular in his own land that people flock to see him pass, and wherever Bengali is spoken his songs are sung by high and low—for like the old minstrels of the West, he sets his words to music of his own composition. The root of this adoration, for it is little less, is to be found in the words of one of his own countrymen quoted by Mr. Yeats: "All the aspirations of mankind are in his hymns. He is the first among our saints who has not refused to live, but has spoken out of Life itself."

The work of Rabindranath falls naturally into three divisions; the first, that of early youth, deals largely with nature; the second, to which "The Gardener" belongs, includes love songs and the "intimations of immortality" that accompany, or ought to accompany, happy love; the third is the period of the poet's full maturity, after he has experienced human bliss and sorrow, and has turned to the deep things of the spirit for consolation and reward. This phase is expressed in "Gitanjali," whose songs were written since those in "The Gardener," though published before the latter.

The present translation, in a balanced, half-rhythmical prose, is made by the author from the rhymed version of the original. It is naturally impossible for most of us to judge what the lyrics may be like in the Bengali, and we have to take on faith the assertion that they are full of wonderful and unforgettable music and color. It is not difficult to believe it, for Rabindranath Tagore's prose is of singular beauty, strong and delicate, and carved to the minute perfection of an ivory relief. Many of our own poets have sung the passion and the pain of finite yearning after the distant and infinite, but none more simply yet imaginatively than the Indian:

I am restless. I am athirst for faraway things.
My soul goes out in a longing to touch the skirt of the dim distance.
O Great Beyond, O the keen call of thy flute!
I forget, I ever forget that I have no wings to fly, that I am bound in this spot evermore.
I am listless, I am a wanderer in my heart.
In the sunny haze of the languid hours, what vast vision of thine takes shape in the blue of the sky!
O Farthest End, O the keen call of thy flute!
I forget, I ever forget, that the gates are shut everywhere in the house where I dwell alone!

And if any other poet of the East or the West has sung more poignantly the bitterness of the "seas of misunderstanding" that separate even the closest lovers, we do not recall him:

I long to speak the deepest words I have to say to you; but I dare not, for fear you should laugh.
That is why I laugh at myself and snatter my secret in jest.
I make light of my pain, afraid you should do so.
I long to tell you the truest words I have to say to you; but I dare hot, being afraid that you would not believe them.
That is why I disguise them in untruth, saying the contrary of what I mean.
I make my pain appear absurd, afraid that you should do so.
I long to sit silent by you; but I dare not lest my heart come out at my lips.
That is why I prattle and chatter lightly and hide my heart behind words.
I rudely handle my pain, for fear that you should do so.

The more one reads of Rabindranath Tagore the more a curious parallel rises in the mind between him and a poet who might at first glance be thought furthest removed from him—Walt Whitman. Not in form, for Whitman's technique—what he had of it—is really the instinctive artistic sense of the man emerging in spite of efforts to keep it down; while the technique of the Indian is the last word of a long and intensive cultivation. It is in the spirit that the representatives of the oldest and the youngest civilizations on earth meet each other. The precept of Rabindranath,

To the guests that must go bid godspeed and brush away all traces of their steps.

Take to your bosom with a smile what is easy and simple and near, runs equally through Whitman's work. And now and then, allowing for differences in racial metaphors, there is a parallelism almost startling. Whitman's famous

Come, lovely and soothing Death—
Dark Mother, always gliding near, with soft feet,
Have none chanted for thee a chant of fullest welcome?

finds an imperious echo in Rabindranath's

Why do you whisper so faintly in my ears, O Death, my Death?
Is this how you must woo and win me with the opiate drowsy murmur and cold kisses, O Death, my Death?

Will there be no proud ceremony for our wedding?
Will you not tie up with a wreath your tawney coiled locks?
Is there none to carry your banner before you, and will not the night be on fire with your red torchlights, O Death, my Death?

Come with your conch shells sounding, come in the sleepless night.
Dress me with a crimson mantle, grasp my hand and take me.
Let your chariot be ready at my door, with your horses neighing impatiently.
Raise my veil and look at my face proudly, O Death, my Death!

Rabindranath Tagore's verse is poetry stripped of the superficialities of race and personality down to the naked soul of man; a poetry that has gained through much discarding. And when the naked soul of man stands revealed, it is neither an Eastern nor a Western soul; which is the greatest message that any poetry can convey.

Character Making

Volume XI., just published, of Lippincott's Educational Series, contains a thoughtful and intelligent treatise, entitled "Principles of Character Making," the work of Dr. Arthur Holmes, Dean of Faculties at Pennsylvania State College. The author describes his work as "a textbook on applied psychology, with psychology in its modernized form applied to the most vital function of the home, school, individual, and nation." The book is offered as a guide to those who are engaged in the training of children. (J. B. Lippincott Company.)

QUERIES AND ANSWERS IN ALL BRANCHES OF LITERATURE

COMMUNICATIONS for these columns should be addressed to the Editor of Queries and Answers, New York Times Review of Books. They should be written on only one side of the paper and must contain the name and address of the writer. If the inquirer prefers, initials only will be printed with the communication.

ANSWERS BY THE EDITOR

F. L. M.—Will you kindly tell me what you can about "Mother Shipton" and her so-called prophecies which attracted a good deal of attention many years ago?

"Mother Shipton" seems to be a mythical person. The earliest extant reference to her is in an anonymous tract, published in London in 1641, and entitled "The Prophecie of Mother Shipton in the Reigne of King Henry VIII., Foretelling the Death of Cardinal Wolsey, the Lord Percy, and Others, as Also What Should Happen in Insuing Times." This pamphlet bears on the title page an alleged portrait of the prophetess, and had a large circulation. The original edition is rare. Imitations of the work have been numerous. Meteorological predictions of Mother Shipton also appeared. William Lilly, astrologer, in "A Collection of Ancient and Modern Prophecies" (1645) quoted eighteen prophecies which had already been identified with her name, and shows that sixteen had been duly fulfilled. In 1667 Richard Head published what purported to be a full account of her "Life and Death," representing her as a daughter of the devil, and of hideous aspect. In the "Strange and Wonderful History of Mother Shipton," (London, 1686,) it is stated that she was born near Knaresborough, July, 1488, was baptized as Ursula Southiel, at 24 married Toby Shipton, a carpenter of Skipton, and died at Clifton in 1561. Innumerable cheap books, chiefly published in the North of England, have since repeated Mother Shipton's prophecies in various forms, and, even in this day, "Mother Shipton's Fortune Telling Book" seeks to the credulous. In 1862 Charles Hindley reprinted, in a garbled version, the 1687 edition of Head's life of "Mother Shipton," and introduced verses foretelling the invention of the steam engine and the electrical telegraph, and the end of the world in 1881. These verses attracted wide attention, but in 1873 Hindley admitted that he had forged them. So-called portraits and memorials of her are spurious.

The "prophecies" written by Hindley and attributed to "Mother Shipton" are as follows:

Carriages without horses shall go,
And accidents fill the world with woe.
Around the world thoughts shall fly
In the winkling of an eye.
Waters shall yet more wonders do,
Nor strange, yet shall be true.
The world upside down shall be,
And gold be found at root of tree.
Through hills man shall ride,
And no horses nor ass be at his side.
Under water man shall walk,
Shall ride, shall sleep, shall talk.
In the air men shall be seen
In white, in black, in green.
Iron in the water shall float
As easy as a wooden boat.
Fire and water shall wonders do.
England at last shall admit a Jew
The world to an end shall come
In eighteen hundred and eighty-one.

THOMAS RUSSELL.—I have in my possession a book, entitled "A Description of the Western Islands of Scotland, containing a full account of their situation, Extent, Soils, Product, Harbors, Bays, Tides, Anchoring Places and Fisheries," by M. Martin, Gent. Published in London in 1716, and dedicated "To His Royal Highness, Prince George of Denmark, Lord High Admiral of England and Ireland, and of all Her Majesty's Plantations, and Generalissimo of all Her Majesty's Forces, etc." Kindly inform me what value this has.

A copy of Martin Martin's "Description of the Western Islands of Scotland," published in London in 1703, brought $8.25 at the Ashburnham sale in 1897. We do not find a sale of the 1716 edition, and presume that it is not of special value. Martin, who died in 1719, was a native of the Island of Skye. His "Description of the Western Islands" was given to Dr. Samuel Johnson by his father to read, and roused the doctor's interest in Scotland which afterward resulted in his famous tour. Although Johnson was interested in the work, and took it with him to the highlands, he had a poor opinion of its literary merits. "No man," he said, "now writes so ill as Martin's account of the Hebrides is written." Martin was also the author of a "Voyage to St. Kilda," describing that island and its inhabitants. This book is entered in Luther S. Livingston's "Auction Prices of Books" "The Voyage to St. Kildare."

L. H.—Has "The True Nature and Imposture Fully Displayed in the Life of Mahomet, with a discourse annexed, for the vindicating of Christianity from this charge, offered to the consideration of the Deists of the present age, by Humphrey Prideaux, D. D., London. Printed for William Rogers, at the Sun against St. Dunstan's Church, in Fleet Street, MDCXCVII.," any value?

It apparently is a first edition of this work by the Orientalist, Humphrey Prideaux. Two editions, however, were printed the same year. We do not find any record of its sale, but if the first edition it probably has special value. The work has often been reprinted. Prideaux's literary reputation rests on his "Life of Mahomet" and "The Old and New Testament Connected." Of each of these the story has been told that the bookseller to whom he offered the manuscript said he "could wish there was a little more humor in it." No sign of humor, it is said, was ever shown by Prideaux except in his proposal, Nov. 26, 1725, for a hospital in each university, to be called "Drone Hall," for useless fellows and students. His "Life of Mahomet" was printed as a polemical tract against the deists. As a biography it is valueless from the point of view of modern knowledge.

ANSWERS FROM READERS

GROVER A. BROWER.—"M. E. M." asks for the name of the author of the following lines:

Fair wheel of Heaven silvered with many a star,
Whose sickly arrows strike us from afar,
Never a purpose to my soul was dear
But Heaven crashed down my little dream to mar.

Never a bird within my sad heart sinks
But Heaven a flaming stone of thunder flings—
O valiant wheel! O most courageous Heaven!
And leaves me lonely with the broken wings.

They are quatrains 162 and 163, page 71, from the Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam; a Paraphrase from Several Literal Translations, by Richard Le Gallienne; New York, John Lane.

R. L. CATHOLIN.—The poem for which "R. M. P." asks in THE REVIEW of Nov. 23 is "Sunrise on the Hills," by Henry W. Longfellow, written before he was 19, and is contained in the Household Edition of his poems under the heading "Earlier Poems."

This appeal was also answered by Adela F. Smith, Brooklyn; M. H. Sayre, New York; "M. D. F.," New York; K. C. Ketcham, Brooklyn; "L. D.," Kingston, N. Y.; J. T. Wagner, Chatham, N. J.; "E. P. S.," East Orange, N. J.; Amelia D. Alden, West New Brighton, N. Y.; Iona M. Logie, Fordham, N. Y.; Mrs. Union Noble Bethell, Upper Montclair, N. J.; "M. B.," Greenwich, Conn.; Jay L. Haynes, New York, and Elise M. Waechter, New York.

ADELAIDE M. PRIME.—The request of "L. M. G.," Oct. 19, stirred a long-forgotten memory of over a score of years ago teaching some small nephews the child's poem, "Three Little Chestnuts," which the wee lads used to ling with many sympathetic bodily and facial contortions:

"Three little chestnuts in from the country,
Bobbed up ever so bold:
And one said, "Ooo!" and one said "Boo!"
And one said, "Whew! ain't it cold?"

Three little chestnuts rolled on the roaster,
Over the big iron pot:
And one said, "Ooo!" and one said "Boo!"
And one said, "Ouch! ain't it hot?"

Three little chestnuts sold for a penny,
One little newsboy out for a lark:
And one said, "Ooo!" and one said "Boo!"
And one said, "My! ain't it dark?"

This appeal was also answered by Gertrude T. Cooper, Brooklyn, who writes that the verses have been set to music by N. Clifford Page and that the song is published by the Temple Music Company, 110 West Fortieth Street, New York, but the author's name is not given. Mrs. Pluma Fowler Russell of Springfield, Mass., writes that the verses may be found in Werner's Readings and Recitations No. 34, published by E. S. Werner & Co., New York.

PAUL R. BIRGE.—I notice a reference to "Le Lai de l'Oiselet" in the Queries and Answers column of the issue of Nov. 2. A translation of this will be found in the volume "Aucassin and Nicolette and Other Mediæval Romances" in Everyman's Library, and a verse version in Note 33 of the Bohn edition of the "Gesta Romanorum."

E. R. LAMSCHA.—In reply to Arthur B. Retallick in your issue of Nov. 9 would say that the words of the old song, "We'll Have to Mortgage the Farm," were written by C. Ernst Fahnestock and the music by C. T. Lockwood. It was published by the S. Brainard's Sons Company, New York and Chicago. My copy was obtained from Hitchcock in New York.

JOSEPH HAUER. Perhaps "F. L. P." who asks for the "Two Lives" in your issue of Oct. 5, 1913, had in mind the "Rosebud and Rose," a poem by Harry Collins, which was published in the July (1891) Lippincott's.

If "Destiny," by T. B. Aldrich, be the poem really inquired about, as was suggested in Answers from Readers on Oct. 26, 1913, the value of F. L. P.'s collection will surely not be diminished by the following addition:

ROSEBUD AND ROSE.

'Mid a garden of roses that tremblingly shook
Their fragrance on the air;
That raised to each corner a fond shy look,
I walked with two women fair.

And one was a beautiful rose full-blown,
A queenly woman she;
The other a slender maid scarce grown,
A dream of a rose to be.

To the glorious queenly woman I gave
A full-blown exquisite rose,
But for the maiden sweetly grave
A shy rosebud I chose.

She smiled, but on the rose rare
She turned a longing eye.
The woman set the rose in her hair,
But she took'd on the bud with a sigh.

JOSEPH HOVER.—In your issue of Oct. 5, "J. B. J." inquires for a poem beginning "I mused upon the Pilgrim flock," &c. The poem referred to is by A. C. Spooner and can be found in "One Hundred Choice Selections," (No. 4,) published by the Penn Publishing Company of Philadelphia. The lines quoted comprise the second verse, the first being:

'Twas in my easy chair at home
About a week ago.
I sat and puffed my light cigar,
As usual, you must know.

It is entitled "Old Times and New" and is too long to print.

C. W. S.—You might add for the further information of "F. B." that "The Singing of the Magnificat," by E. Nesbit, was reprinted in The Saturday Evening Post of Dec. 24, 1898.

Mrs. T. R. JOLLY.—In answer to "C. F. G.," whose appeal was printed in your issue of Nov. 2, the following is sent:

THE BOOKS OF THE BIBLE.

The Great Jehovah speaks to us
In Genesis and Exodus;
Leviticus and Numbers see,
Followed by Deuteronomy;
Joshua and Judges rule the land;
Ruth gleans the sheaf with trembling hand;
Samuel and numerous Kings appear,
Whose Chronicles we wondering hear.
Ezra and Nehemiah now
Esther the beauteous mourner show.
Job speaks in sighs; David in Psalms;
The Proverbs teach to scatter alms
Ecclesiastes next comes on,
And the sweet Song of Solomon
Isaiah, Jeremiah then
With Lamentations takes his pen.
Ezekiel; Daniel; Hosea's lyre
Swells; Joel, Amos, Obadiah,
Next Jonah, Micah, Nahum come,
And softly Habakkuk finds room
Next Zephaniah, to Haggai call's;
Rapt Zechariah builds the walls;
And Malachi, with garments rent,
Concludes the Ancient Testament.

This appeal was also anewered by Mrs. M. G. Whitall, Plainfield, N. J.; Mrs. Edwin Brockway, Haverstraw, N. Y.; "E. D. S.," New York; Mrs. Emily A. Merriman, New Britain, Conn.; "T. F. C.," Providence, R. I.; "E. L. C.," Orange, N. J., Miss Anne Cary Bradley, Fryeburg, Me.; James Dewart, Brooklyn, and McCready Sykes, Boise, Idaho.

APPEALS TO READERS

DON MARQUIS.—Perhaps some of your readers will be able to tell me where I can get hold of the song, or poem, which contains these lines:

The beau sabreur of the Grand Armee
Was the Captain Tarjanterre

I would also like to know where I can find the poem a part of which goes

I was a ruffler of Flanders
And fought for a florin's hire,
And you were my Captain's lady
And queen of my heart's desire.

H. B. GREEN.—I have tried hard to find a poem from the German which told how a farmer and his son, riding in the early morning before the dawn, passed a gibbet on which a boy was swinging. As they rode by they heard a groan. They found that the man on the gibbet was not dead, took him down and home, and fed and cared for him. Then they left him alone to go to their work. On their return they found their visitor missing, with all of value in the house. They pursued and captured him and hanged him again (securely and finally this time) on the same gibbet. Can any reader tell me what this poem is?

M. O. FOLGER.—At the time of the World's Fair in Chicago a very amusing article, written by Susan Coolidge, appeared, enclosed in a book of stories and very amusingly illustrated. It depicted the experience of an Oriental and his wife and son, who were attending the fair. The boy imbibed the spirit of young America to such a degree that he indulged in numberless freaks, to the horror and consternation of his father. I should be greatly obliged if some of your numerous readers would let me know, or could tell me where I could find it.

A. A.—Can some reader kindly favor me with the short religious poem "Peauty," by the Rev. Dudley Chase Abbott?

W. S. A.—Can any reader tell me the source of the quotation, "Man's greatest wealth is a contented mind"?

E. A. H.—Can any reader tell me the author of "Man Without Friends"?

MARY E. LLOYD.—Can any of your readers tell me where I might find the poem of which the following lines are a part:

I heard the old, old, old men say,
All that is beautiful passes away.

The poem goes on then to say something about "their twisted knees" and to emphasize the age of the old men who were speaking.

E. R. PHOEBUS.—Will some reader kindly publish a poem, the opening lines of which are:

There's no place like the old place
Where you and I were born.

I do not know the author's name.

G. R. H.—I will be most grateful if some one of your readers will give me the author's name of the followin lines; also the complete poem:

It is not that my lot is low
That bids the silent tears to flow
It is not that sad grief is mine,
But it is that I am all alone.

A. S.—Can some reader find a poem entitled "Life's Quest," by Constance Strong? I imagine it may be found in some magazine of not long ago, because it is very short and starts something like this: "The charm that men see in woman's eyes."

Gnomes of the Saline Mountains
By Anna Goldmark Gross
A fantastic story, half fairy tale, is told by Mrs. Gross, who seems to be thoroughly familiar with the folk lores of Germany and Italy. As a result, these stories of love, desertion, and revenge are given a perfect setting.—Los Angeles Express.
The author's familiarity with life in the great cities of the old world has enabled her to paint an interesting and attractive background to these romantic stories.—Baltimore American.
Real life is pictured, notwithstanding the introduction of the Gnomes, and there is a great deal of human sympathy expressed in the stories.—Dallas News.
Laden with romance.—Portland Oregonian.
"The Gnomes of the Saline Mountains" is an excellent Christmas story and very suitable for a holiday gift book.—Times, Jacksonville, Fla.

AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY

IN SEARCH OF A HUSBAND. By Corra Harris. Illustrated. Doubleday, Page & Co. $1.35.

This is the autobiography of Miss Mary Joy Marr, beauty and belle of Milledge, who, even before her début, had decided that she would marry none other than a rich man. With this resolve in her mind, she went to the coming-out ball an old friend gave her, and there encountered a certain David Brock, whom she thus describes: "Never had I seen a fiercer face, one so expressive of mad tenderness. * * * His brow was rugged as if his Sinai showed through at that place. And yet the whole Song of Solomon could have been written upon that fine, sensuous mouth." In a very short time, "The wings of my heart were beating against the stranger."

But the remarkable David was not rich enough to suit Joy, and she sought the elusive wealthy husband during several years, thus kindly giving the author time to air her views on the subject of women in general, with much talk about Mother Eve, gardening, and a full description of her heroine's wardrobe.

PATRIOTISM

Its History Marked by Careers of English Statesmen

By WILLIAM LOYD BEVAN
(Professor of History, University of the South.)

ONE of the foremost historical scholars of the nineteenth century, Lord Acton, planned a history of liberty, but the history of any abstract term is more difficult of approach and presents more thorny problems of method and treatment than works which cover longer periods and more general subjects. Lord Acton collected a library of 60,000 volumes, but his history of liberty is only a fragment that now occupies a place in a collection of his essays. Yet Ranke, after he had written works on various special subjects, set out after he was past 80 to write a universal history, and he succeeded in finishing a very considerable portion of his task before his death. But it is to be doubted whether even Ranke alone, or in collaboration, could have written a satisfactory history of liberty. There has been a history of crime, a history of the political platform, and in this last case the difficulties seem to have been no greater than in writing a history of the stage. But all the various adventures in the history of special fields do not prove that abstract characteristics can be treated successfully by the historical method.

Such a subject as patriotism, even in its national form, is so elusive, so elastic, that even the broadest kind of historical treatment is almost certain to be unsatisfactory. Any great historical work, Herodotus, Gibbon or Macaulay, is in a sense a history of patriotism, and, although there is a plain consensus as to patriotic characters and patriotic conduct, it is not easy to differentiate patriotic history from other kinds of historical narrative. The special complications are more apparent if one introduces the biographical test. Would it be possible to prepare a purely patriotic biography of Washington, or Wellington, or Garibaldi? And if this were done, what parts of an ordinary biography would have to be omitted?

Some of the difficulties of writing a history of patriotism are fully acknowledged by Mr. Wingfield Stratford in the introduction to his two handsome volumes on English patriotism. But such is the inspiration of his subject that he passes lightly over them and plunges into the midst of his programme without much hesitation, and it may be said truthfully that something of his own enthusiasm takes possession of the reader. The doubts and difficulties that were uppermost and that remain even after the two volumes have been read are put aside for the time being. There is something in the impetuosity and audacity of the work that paralyzes the critical spirit, and it is best in describing the narrative to allow full credit for what has been accomplished.

In the first place, a large portion of Mr. Stratford's theme deals, as might naturally be supposed, with purely political history, and there is much sound judgment and often times not a little of brilliant exposition in this portion of his narrative. The interest of the reader is well consulted by the formal division of the book, for the second volume begins with the latter part of George III.'s reign and covers the history of a little more than 100 years.

The younger Pitt, Lord Castlereagh, and Disraeli are the heroes of this modern period. It is assumed all through the Napoleonic epoch that the English Government was beneficently engaged in rescuing Continental nations from the tyranny of a military upstart. Little attention is given to the social benefits introduced by the extension of French rule in Germany and Italy, and it is forgotten that many of those who opposed Napoleon were simply championing the cause of class privilege. Lord Castlereagh, who, because of the bitter attacks against him by the coterie of literary radicals in his day, has always been regarded as a traditional narrow-minded and short-visioned aristocratic leader, is shown to have been a man who, in certain respects, was not forgetful of the better traditions of English statesmanship. His foreign policy was much more liberal than one might expect from one who at home was satisfied with the inefficient government imposed upon England by its land-holding oligarchy.

There is much sentimentalizing over the achievements of Disraeli as a writer and as a statesman, but even such an ardent defender as Mr. Stratford hardly succeeds in proving that he was more than a brilliant opportunist and a clever manufacturer of catchy political phrases. His exaltation into a constructive thinker in constitutional theory is little short of absurd.

Naturally, the antitypes who serve to point the moral negatively of this valuation of patriotism, such men as Sir Robert Peele and Mr. Gladstone, fare very badly at Mr. Stratford's hands. Not infrequently so strong are his partisan prejudices that the work sinks to the level of a Primrose League pamphlet.

Many pages in both volumes cover the literary side of English patriotism. Shakespeare, of course, furnishes good material, but the analysis that is offered is restricted strongly to the historical dramas. Of course, to treat literature by the rule and measure of patriotic expression is bound to lead to curious results. Certain authors who have little claim for consideration must be mentioned because they indulge in long-winded eulogy on nationalism, and the works of greater men have to be artificially divided in accordance with this standard. How difficult of application and what strain the process introduces is visible throughout the whole treatment of the great galaxy of poets who flourished in England in the beginning of the nineteenth century.

Macaulay and Mill are both severely chastised, but even less sympathy is shown to Herbert Spencer than to the literary lights of the English Liberalism. Indeed, the chapter called "The Science of Society" contains some hard-hitting and effective polemical writing. We are told that Spencer's mind was "like an engine without brakes—start it off on any line of theory and it must go on, while fire and fuel last-ed, no matter whither the line might lead." Mr. Stratford has little opinion, too, of the economic theories which emanated from radical cosmopolitanism. He tells us:

> In the days of the Mills, economic science was at worst a definite and formidable collection of fallacies; now it has silently vanished and left behind nothing but a staff of professors and a number of big words and long curves to impress the uninitiated.

The reason for Mr. Stratford's antipathy to economics and also to sociology, which he describes as a clumsy term that means nothing in particular, is because of the association of both these studies with materialism. In opposition to this popular modern current of thought the general tendency of the two volumes represents something of the attitude of Mr. Gilbert Chesterton, who is labeled, by the way, as a rowdy champion of Christianity. But none of the opponents of the new Tory democracy in England are sufficient to rob the author of his optimism. This sanguine attitude is not founded on the presence of Kipling, who is strangely omitted from eulogistic treatment, but the great ray of hope comes from the Boer war, a struggle where a mighty empire had to gather itself together to oppose a small handful of sturdy farmers. The reduction of present-day patriotism to this level demonstrates to what small channels of achievement partisanship must lead.

SOCIETY PLANS CHARITY FETES

Costume Balls, Bazaars, Dancing, and Bridge Tournaments Arranged for Benefits During December—Town Filled with Social Notables for Army and Navy Football Game.

THERE are few society weddings scheduled for December, the late Autumn season for brides having closed auspiciously last week. Society will now be attracted by the numerous entertainments which are being arranged for charity. The spirit of Christmas is already in the air, and it will not be long now until the young people are home for the holidays.

Many opened their country houses last week and filled them over Thanksgiving with guests. Tuesday was a red-letter day in nuptials, and it seemed that many of the brides selected the day favored by the daughter of the first lady in the land. Visitors fairly flocked to town for the week-end, the Army and Navy football game attracting hundreds of prominent society people from neighboring cities.

Several interesting engagements were announced during the week, and there were a series of brilliant nights at the opera. It is safe to say that everybody is in town now, and the season will progress with a syncopated whirl from now until Lent draws the drab curtains of renunciation.

Incidents in Society.

Mr. and Mrs. Stuyvesant Fish are to leave Garrison, N. Y., to-morrow, and will open their town house, 25 East Seventy-eighth Street, for the Winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Gerald Livingston Hoyt plan to return to town from Staatsburg, N. Y., this week.

The Baroness de Graffenried will give a dance on Tuesday evening for her daughters, the Misses Gertrude and Violet Hamilton.

A Christmas sale of Italian laces and embroideries, sent by the Countess Elizabeth Phelps Reese from Italy, will be held on Tuesday and Wednesday afternoons at the home of Mrs. Richard Irvin, 1 West Thirty-ninth Street, for the benefit of the Virginia Day Nursery.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry W. Taft of 36 West Forty-eighth Street are giving a dinner at their home on Thursday evening.

The first of the dances known as the Three Sherry Dances will be given on Friday night. Mrs. B. Ogden Chisolm, Mrs. J. Herbert Johnston, Mrs. Edward S. Knapp, and Mrs. Archibald Rogers form the Managing Committee.

The St. Christopher League will give its first dance of the season at the Plaza on Friday evening.

The first of the Saturday evening dances are to take place at the St. Regis this week. Mrs. Henry Fleming, Mrs. Wilber Bloodgood, Mrs. Henry L. Burnett, Mrs. Joseph Bourne, and Mrs. Clermont L. Best are among the patronesses.

Mrs. Cornelius C. Cuyler's first entertainment will be a dinner and dance at Sherry's on Dec. 10.

Mrs. Stuart Duncan has been giving a series of small dinners at her house, 3 East Seventy-fifth Street. She will give a dinner on Dec. 11, and on Dec. 17 the dinner is to be followed by dancing.

Mr. and Mrs. Walter S. Gurnee, who recently bought Foxhall Keene's place at Westbury, L. I., will remain there until the middle of December, when they will open their house, 38 East Thirty-ninth Street.

Mrs. Henry Clinton Backus is to give a dance at Sherry's on Dec. 24 for her son, Clinton D. Backus. Among those who are to assist Mrs. Backus will be the Misses Margaret Overton, Barbara Shedd, Flora McAlpin, Dorothy Bigelow, Lois Goodnow, Katherine Gunn, Cordelia Hepburn, Dorothy McCord, Katherine McCullough, and Dorothy Clarkson.

Mrs. H. O. Havemeyer and her son and daughter-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Horace Havemeyer, who are at Stamford, Conn., expect to come to town for the Winter this week.

Mr. and Mrs. Goodhue Livingston have returned from Southampton, L. I., for the Winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Sherwood Aldrich have leased the house of Paulding Fosdick, 52 East Sixty-seventh Street, for the Winter.

Mrs. Herbert Shipman, who has been in the South, has returned to her home, 439 Madison Avenue.

Mrs. G. Vail Converse has taken an apartment at 535 Park Avenue with her son, James V. Converse, where she will remain until she sails for Europe.

Mrs. Francis C. Lawrence, sister of Mrs. John Astor, has left for her home in England.

Miss Philbin Engaged.

Of interest to society last week was the announcement of the engagement of Miss Eugenie Philbin, daughter of Justice Eugene A. Philbin and Mrs. Philbin of 63 East Fifty-second Street, to Arthur R. Jones, son of Mr. and Mrs. W. Strother Jones of 39 East Thirty-ninth Street. Miss Philbin made her début last season. She is very popular in the younger set, and was identified this Summer with the social life at Southampton, L. I., where she spent a good deal of her time. Mr. Jones was graduated from Harvard, class of '09, and is a member of the Tuxedo Club.

McCall—Lees.

Mr. and Mrs. George C. Lees of Shelton, Conn., last week announced the engagement of their daughter, Miss Marjorie Lees, to Archer McCall, a son of Mr. and Mrs. Walter A. McCall of 267 West Seventy-second Street.

Broken Engagement.

Mr. and Mrs. E. Howard Martin of 160 West Fifty-ninth Street have announced that the engagement between their niece, Miss Bessie Martin, and Dr. H. C. de V. Cornwell of this city has been broken. It is said the engagement was broken by mutual consent. Dr. Cornwell is a son of the late Capt. Charles C. Cornwell of the United States Navy, and is a graduate of Harvard, class of '07.

Martin—White.

Miss Amy White of Boston has announced the engagement of her niece, Miss Sarah Harriet White, daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. William Howard White, to Varick Dey Martin of this city. Mr. Martin is a son of Mrs. John Laurie Martin of 115 East Thirty-first Street. No date has been set for the wedding.

Lathrop—Penfield.

Mr. and Mrs. M. Clinton Penfield of Bridgeport, Conn., have announced the engagement of their daughter, Miss Cornelia S. Penfield, to Henry Monroe Lathrop. Miss Penfield is a member of the National Arts Club and the Equal Franchise Society of this city. Mr. Lathrop was graduated from Yale, class of '12.

Miss Von Bergen Engaged.

Dr. and Mrs. Carl von Bergen of 48 West Fifty-ninth Street last week announced the engagement of their daughter, Miss Elsie von Bergen, to Gerard Livingston Jackson, son of Mr. and Mrs. George J. Jackson of 162 West Seventy-eighth Street. Mr. Jackson is a member of the senior class at Yale University, and the wedding will probably take place next June after his graduation.

Russian Costume Ball.

Mrs. Oliver Iselin, Mrs. George Draper, and Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., are very much pleased over the sale of tickets for the Russian costume ball which they, with other society women, have arranged to take place on Dec. 18 at the Ritz-Carlton. Society amateurs are to take part in the vaudeville entertainment, and it promises to be a most brilliant affair. Mrs. Draper, who resides at 162 East Sixty-third Street, is in charge of the sale of tickets, which are $5 each.

Mr. Bagby's Musical Mornings.

Mr. Bagby's musical mornings will be resumed to-morrow for the season at the Waldorf-Astoria as heretofore. Dec. 8, 15, and 22 are the other mornings for December. Miss Emmy Destinn, Dinh Gilly, and Fritz Kreisler will be the artists to-morrow.

For Winifred Wheeler Day Nursery.

A tea dance, bridge tournament and Christmas sale will be given at the Plaza on Thursday afternoon, Dec. 11, for the benefit of this nursery. Mrs. Rufus L. Patterson, 32 West Fifty-second Street; Mrs. Donn Barber, 125 East Seventy-fourth Street; Mrs. Phillips B. Thompson, 830 Park Avenue, and Mrs. William Ross Proctor, 32 East Thirty-ninth Street, are looking after the sale of tickets for the different attractions. The committee in charge includes many prominent society women.

Dance at Ritz-Carlton on Tuesday for Charity.

A ball is to be given at the Ritz-Carlton on Tuesday evening for the benefit of the Downtown Day Nursery, 120 Cedar Street of which Mrs. William Bristow is President.

The patronesses include Mrs. Herbert Harriman, Mrs. J. F. Kernochan, Mrs. Percy Pyne, Jr., Mrs. Eugene Hale, Mrs. Francis C. Bishop and Miss Susan Bliss.

Tickets at $7, including supper, may be had from Mrs. Bristow, 149 West Fifty-seventh Street.

On the Amsterdam Roof.

While there is keen interest in the new French Theatre, which is still being talked about, the Cercle Dramatique de l'Alliance Française de New York is prepared to give nine performances under fashionable patronage this season, in the theatre on the roof of the New Amsterdam Theatre Building. The first play, "Papa," will be given on Thursday night. Ambassador Jusserand of France, Consul General Etienne Lanel, Le Comte de Jean, Mr. and Mrs. Chauncey M. Depew, Mrs. J. W. Roosevelt, Mr. and Mrs. W. Bourke Cockran, Otto H. Kahn, Mr. and Mrs. Stanwood Menken, and many other prominent people are among the supporters of the movement.

At Mrs. Mali's.

Mrs. Pierre Mali will loan her house, 8 Fifth Avenue, for a concert for the benefit of the New York Cooking School, which is to be held there on Dec. 8. Miss Susan W. Street of 43 Park Avenue is in charge of the tickets.

Chansons en Crinoline.

The morning series of entertainments organized by Mrs. Hawkesworth at the Plaza will begin on Thursday morning at 11 o'clock. Songs of the East will be given by Miss Sophie Breslau and Radaelo Diaz, and Miss Ruth St. Denis will interpret the Oriental dances. Among the boxholders are Mrs. Edwin Gould, Mrs. Charles W. Harkness, Mrs. Arthur Curtiss James, Mrs G. G. Mason, Mrs. Moses Taylor Pyne, Mrs. Richard P. Worrall, and Mrs. J. Herbert Johnston.

At the Gotham.

The second annual Children's National Bazaar, under the auspices of the Women's National League of the Daily Vacation Bible School Association, will be held in the ballroom of the Hotel Gotham Tuesday, Dec. 2, from 2 to 10. Barnard, Holyoke, Smith, Swarthmore, Vassar, and Wellesley Colleges will be represented.

Motor Car Touring Society.

This society will give a small dance at Sherry's on Jan. 20. Albert Eugene Gallatin is President, Percy R. Pyne, 2d, Vice President, and Orme Wilson, Jr., Secretary. With Francis L. V. Hoppin and William B. Osgood Field they form the Governing Committee. Other members include Vincent Astor, Robert Goelet, William W. Hoffman, Oliver Iselin, Marshall R. Kernochan, Malcolm D. Sloane, Harold S. Vanderbilt, and R. Thornton Wilson.

The society's activities during the past year included a run to the Piping Rock Club in April, and a run to Lenox in October. The annual dinner was held last month at the Union Club.

For Stony Wold Sanatorium.

On Wednesday, at the Hotel Manhattan, will be held the annual Christmas shop for Stony Wold Sanatorium, from 10 A. M. to 6 P. M. There will be specialties in Scotch woolens, toys, dolls, and fancy and useful articles. Luncheon and tea will be served.

The Committee on Arrangements for the shop include Mrs. George E. Brewer, Chairman; Mrs. William A. Simonson, Mrs. William B. Potts, Miss Ellen Louise Adee, Mrs. Frederick L. Bradley, Mrs. James B. Curtis, Mrs. Alfred L. White, Miss Ina Macnee, Miss Ella Louise Henderson, Mrs. Joseph W. Sidenberg, Mrs. John D. Walton, Mrs. J. Aspinwall Hodge, Mrs. Benjamin Stern, Mrs. Thomas R. French, Miss Cora Weir, Mrs. Walter E. Woodford, Mrs. Pierre Mali, Miss Schiffer, Mrs. G. S. Franklin, Mrs. James C. Greenway, Mrs. Philip B. Jennings, Mrs. John Wendt, and Mrs. Sylvan Bier.

THE season for the débutantes is now in full swing, and there is a wonderful galaxy of buds this Winter in society's garden. The coming-out receptions and teas commenced early this month, and will continue up until after the first of the new year.

The entertainments for the débutantes, planned by their relatives and friends, will really monopolize the first of the season, and then the older people take their place in the shifting social scene with larger and more formal entertainments. Luncheons for débutantes have become a fad this season, and the buds of last year are even entertaining the girls of this season at luncheon at the smart restaurants.

While the débutantes are enjoying the merry whirl of their first season, they are working out the details of the entertainment which is given annually by the Junior League, and which is to be given this year at the Waldorf-Astoria, on the evening of Jan. 16 and the afternoon and evening of Jan. 17. The league is a charitable organization composed of young women prominent in society, the active work of which is carried on by the season's débutantes who have been elected to membership.

The costly array of flowers which grace the coming out of the New York débutante are always sent to the hospitals and the sick in the tenements. There are many kinds of girls in this year's list of buds, and some very beautiful girls, whose beauty and charm have already shone in the Court of St. James's in London. They all possess the refreshing charm which is so necessary to keep up the wholesomeness of society, where time is relentless, and they all find time to give much of their aid and talents in the cause of sweet charity.

The Junior Cotillions, which have been a feature of New York society for eighteen years, will cease this Winter to exist as such, but will be reorganized under the name of the Junior Assemblies. Mrs. Arthur Murray Dodge, who has so successfully managed them in the past, will be one of the committee of three on reorganization for the season of 1914-15. The other committee members will be Mrs. Arthur B. Emmons and Mrs. Charles Steele. There are long lists for three years ahead. Next year's list is unusually large, fifty already having made application. There have never in the past been more than twenty-five vacancies during a season. The patronesses will be allowed to subscribe to the assemblies for two seasons only. Mrs. Dodge, who is to serve on the reorganization committee, will not take any active part after this year.

The committee of management this season consists, besides Mrs. Dodge, Mrs. Steele, and Mrs. Emmons, of Mrs. Pierre Mali and Mrs. Archibald Rogers. The last two named and Mrs. Dodge will receive Tuesday evening at Sherry's, when the first of the Winter's cotillions will take place.

Revillon Frères Furs
ESTABLISHED 1723
FROM THE ARCTIC CIRCLE TO PARIS

Revillon Trading post, near the Arctic Circle

Main establishment of Revillon Freres, Rue de Rivoli, Paris

EACH of these two widely separated Revillon establishments has its influence on Revillon furs sold in New York.

Large shipments of raw furs direct from our Posts give our manufacturing departments the abundance of choice materials essential to quality and economy.

Constant communication with the Paris house keeps our designing department in touch with the most advanced tendencies of fashion enabling them to forecast correctly the modes that will be accepted.

A fur garment with the Revillon label means that materials and workmanship alike are the finest to be procured.

IMPORTED MODELS GREATLY REDUCED

All of our remaining French models, late importations from the best houses, have been marked at greatly lowered prices. These include fur sets and coats in original designs, also a noteworthy group of handsome evening wraps in Velour and Brocade, offered at less than the cost of importation We also offer reproductions of these wraps in specially imported materials at very tempting prices.

CITY SOCIAL NOTES

THURSDAY, Dec. 11, is the date for the Charity Ball to be given by the Young Women's Hospital Guild. Mrs. Wendall C. Phillips has charge of the arrangements.

On Friday the American Criterion Society will install its new President, Mrs. L. L. Hill, at a luncheon in the Plaza. These are the Chairmen appointed for the coming year: Mrs. George Hanna, Reception; Mrs. Frank Hadley, Music; Mrs. Emanuel Elzas, Drama and Press; Mrs. Rose, Arrangements; Mrs. W. E. Bailey, Dancing; Mrs. Austin Finnegan, Printing; Mrs. Lillian McCandless, Authorship; Mrs. James Batterton, Membership.

Members and friends of the Woman's Health Protective Association are invited to the annual meeting and election of officers to be held on Tuesday at 2:30 at the Waldorf.

Clio held a meeting in the College Room of the Astor on Monday. The subject was "Women in Literature," and Mrs. B. R. Jacobs was Chairman of the day. Clio celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary a few days ago with a large reception, at which eight of its ten former Presidents were present. On that day Mrs. Charles Duane Baker, first President of the club, was made Honorary President, and Miss M. L. Gibbs, the only member who has been with the club through the twenty-five years, was given a club pin.

A card party was given on Friday in the Sisterhood Assembly Rooms of the Amelia Relief Society, with Mrs. Selig Housah as hostess.

The Old Fourteen Alumnae will give a dinner on Tuesday evening in the Hotel Martha Washington.

A charity ball for the benefit of the needy of New Rochelle will be held on Friday evening, Dec. 19, in Germania Hall under the auspices of the Charity Ball Committee.

There will be another in the series of salons given by the Society of French Women on Thursday in the home of the President, Mme. Polifeme, 321 West Ninety-second Street.

LOCAL ART NOTES OF INTEREST

What a difference the setting makes with our jewels of Chippendale, Staffordshire, pewter, and brass. There is a growing disinclination on the part of American collectors to go grubbing about in Bloomsbury shops for crystal bowls, or down on their knees under the counters of the Rue Hoche for undiscovered "chinoiseries." Perhaps they are afraid of cracks in the crystal and porcelain, perhaps they hate increasingly the dirt. At all events, they are ready to respond fervently to such an assemblage of clean, well-preserved antiquities as they may see in the American Art Galleries up to the dates of their sale this week on Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday afternoons. The collection comprises the stock of Messrs. Cooper & Griffith, who are dissolving partnership, and whose firm name has long stood for conscience and judgment and a thoroughly drilled taste.

The Wedgwood, of which there are many fine and rare pieces, comes directly from Mr. Frederick Rathbone, who is the English authority on Staffordshire, and the old English furniture of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries is not only authenticated, but beautiful in design and ornament. The chests in particular are fine enough for museums and magnificent for homes that have a manor house scope. A small room has been fitted up with the group of pewter, and its moonlight color, the color of pewter that has been cleaned and not polished, lends a peculiarly delicate charm to this ample display of work-a-day metal. There is an abundance of English pottery, and also a considerable section devoted to American wares, with Pennsylvania Dutch pie plates that might well feel surprise at finding themselves in company with Wedgwood jasper and basalts. Certain plates of this Pennsylvania ware are marked in sprawling letters of yellow slip "Mary's Dish," "Sallie," &c., showing a neater tendency than we boast in our own hygienic age.

In other rooms are rugs from the stock of John T. Keresey & Co., Herat and Samakhand, Kurdistan and Khorassan, Heriz and Sirak Kandahar and Khiva, each an individual masterpiece, in which the colors under the muffled tone make the richest and most delicate harmonies, the kind of products of the loom beside which all but the noblest works of art seem thin and inexpressive.

At the Ehrich Galleries is an exhibition of paintings by J. Campbell Phillips, chiefly portraits. A recent portrait of the late Mayor Gaynor is in the collection, and is a good though rather formal likeness. The portraits of Henry Mosler and of Mrs. Louise Dorff of Stockholm are among those most animated in style and handling.

MANY NEW YORKERS AT WINTER RESORTS FOR THANKSGIVING

Short Week-End Trips Over the Holiday Are Gaining in Favor Each Year—Dances, Receptions, Dinners and Luncheons Which Are to Come.

Mrs. Fairfield Mortimore (PHOTO BY YOUNG)

IN New England, Thanksgiving is a day observed in the home. This is the day when the family gathers from the corners of the earth—the one family holiday—but here in New York the day has become more or less of a going away and resting-up time. Week-end trips to Winter resorts are becoming more and more popular each year. Dr. and Mrs. Porter have gone to Lisle for a week. Dr. and Mrs. Edmund E. Minner of 140 West Ninety-second Street left town on Wednesday for Atlantic City. Miss Marjorie Minner and Miss Marion Moore of 440 Riverside Drive are in Springfield, Mass., as guests of Miss Helen Wyckoff, who is giving a house party for the week-end. Miss Minner will join her parents to-morrow at Atlantic City. The series of dances which Miss Minner and Douglas Snow organized last Winter will open on Thursday, Dec. 18, at the Marseille.

Mrs. Ethelbert Nevin of 65 Central Park West is in Washington, as are Mr. and Mrs. A. Parker Nevin of 21 West Ninth Street. They went down to attend the wedding of the President's daughter and Mr. Sayre on Tuesday.

Philip Metz of Yale and his sister, Miss Gertrude Metz, a student in Miss Sumner's School, Washington, D. C., are stopping at the Astor for the Thanksgiving recess, with their parents, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Metz of Omaha, Neb., who came on to see their children.

Dr. and Mrs. Manuel Mencia, who have been traveling in Europe for five months, have returned to this country and are in town for a brief stay before leaving for Havana, Cuba. Mrs. Mencia is a daughter of ex-President Gomez.

Mrs. Wright Prescott Edgerton of 302 Central Park West entertained with a luncheon yesterday for about thirty army friends. The affair took place in the Rose Room of the Astor, and afterward the hostess took her guests to the Army and Navy game at the Polo Grounds. Among the guests were Col. and Mrs. C. B. Eckles, Lieut. and Mrs. James Cheney of West Point, Col. and Mrs. Heiner, Col. and Mrs. Stephen Mills, Col. and Mrs. W. A. Simpson, Thomas Barry of Governors Island, Gen. Meany, and Dr. and Mrs. William Tod Helmuth.

Mrs. H. H. Sevier has returned from a several days' trip through the Berkshires and is stopping at the Plaza. Her resignation to the Dixie Club as President has been declined, and a committee of women was appointed at the last meeting to call upon her and ask her to reconsider.

On Sunday a week from to-day the Emanuel Sisterhood of Personal Service will celebrate its twenty-fifth anniversary with a reception in the vestry rooms of the Temple at 8:15. The guides will meet at the home, 318 East Eighty-second Street, on Saturday. Miss Esther Seide, soprano, daughter of the chief rabbi of Naples, Miss Renee Schreiber soprano, and Albert Jampolski, baritone, will sing for the entertainment of the guests.

Miss M. Elizabeth Lester gave a reception yesterday in her home, 453 West 143d Street, for the Washington Chapter, D. A. R. Those who received with the hostess were Mrs. Samuel J. Kramer, Mrs. George D. Bangs, Mrs. J. H. Storer, Mrs. H. C. Tuttle, Mrs. G. C. Stoddard, Mrs. Walter H. Tappan, Mrs. Fairfield Mortimore, Mrs. Silas B. Bostwick, Mrs. Stanley L. Otis, Mrs. H. O. Cronk, Mrs. T. P. Smith, Mrs. O. M. Bostwick, and Miss Patterson.

At the meeting of the Society for Political Study, held on Tuesday at the Astor, Ada Patterson spoke on the urgent need of the club women of the city interesting themselves in safeguarding the lives of children in the congested streets. There was a discussion afterward about ways of keeping the children off the streets and out of the way of trucks and automobiles, and it was suggested that roof playgrounds, more parks, and school houses with ever-open doors were practical for this purpose. Therefore a motion was made and carried to the effect that a committee be appointed in this club to wait on the other clubs of the city and get the women interested in the idea. As this was Federation Day there were reports from the various federations to be read. Mrs. George Howes read one on the General Federation Convention, Mrs. Frank Kitton and Mrs. H. McClellan Wade on the State Convention, and Dr. Frances Monell on the City Federation Convention. The parliamentary drill was on "Order of Business for Regular and Annual Meetings." The next meeting will be held on Tuesday, Dec. 9.

The annual dance in aid of the fund for sick nurses of the Post Graduate Hospital under the auspices of the hospital alumnae will be held on Wednesday evening, Dec. 3, at the Hotel Marseille.

A German dinner was given on Sunday evening by the Gamut Club.

Dr. and Mrs. M. Murray Waxman of 143 West Seventy-first Street gave a reception on Sunday afternoon a week ago for Miss Marguerite H. Marx, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Sidney J. Marx, who has recently announced her engagement to Fernando Perez del Pulgar, Vice Consul from Spain to New York. Mrs. Waxman received in a gown of light blue crêpe de chine and chiffon. Miss Marx's frock was of pale pink charmeuse. They were assisted by Miss Katherine Selon and Mr. and Mrs. Jaffe.

A fair for the Temple Israel, its sisterhood charities, schools for the poor, and allied philanthropies will be held in the Belvidere of the Astor from Tuesday until Saturday of this week. Among the active workers are Mrs. Martin King, Mrs. Stella Rubenstein, Mrs. L. R. N. Carvallo, Mrs. J. Mayer, Mrs. Martin Zinn, Mrs. Rutsky, Miss Pauline Levy, Mrs. Ida Kempner, Mrs. Leopold Weil, Mrs. Popper, Miss Stella Stein, Mrs. A. J. Moses, Mrs. Marcus Nathan, Mrs. N. C. Nathan, Montrose Ernst, S. E. Breslauer, Daniel B. Hays, and Mrs. W. C. Solomon. Informal dancing will be conducted in the tearoom all the afternoon and evening sessions excepting Friday evening and Saturday afternoon. Mrs. Martin King has charge of this section with a committee of fifty young women. Miss Joan Sawyer has volunteered her services. On Wednesday afternoon the attractions will be for children, and Miss Florence B. Meyer will give a series of folk dances.

Mr. and Mrs. W. R. Hearst will give a Mexican costume dance on Saturday in their home, 137 Riverside Drive.

Miss Ballard, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William Marten Ballard of 331 West Eighty-third Street, entertained friends with an informal tea a few days ago.

Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Costman of 231 Fox Street, the Bronx, announce the marriage of their daughter, Miss Goldie Costman, to Joseph M. Cooper, on Sunday evening, Nov. 23. The Rev. Dr. Eiseman performed the ceremony.

Miss Emilie and Miss Anna Mattes of 124 West 122d Street entertained the Five Hundred Club on Tuesday evening in their home.

Mr. and Mrs. Frederick William Waller gave a dance for Miss Willets, Miss June Love, and Miss Natalie Willets on Friday evening in their home, 6 West Eighty-fourth Street. There were about seventy guests.

Membership in the Delmonico Dances is limited to 150, but there was a long list of guests at the first one given on Friday. The patronesses for the series are Mrs. Ernest H. Amy, Mrs. John P. Kelly, Mrs. A. Johnson McEntyre, Mrs. Joseph F. Todd, Mrs. Henry H. Brown, Mrs. Frederick Mulgrew, Mrs. Andres J. Connick, and Mrs. Daniel J. O'Conor.

Mr. and Mrs. Theodore E. Tack of 112 West Eighty-second Street celebrated their forty-fifth wedding anniversary on Tuesday.

Mrs. J. V. A. Cattus of 508 West End Avenue gave a dinner on Tuesday in her home for Miss Gilford.

Mrs. Louis Ralston will open her home, 206 West Seventy-ninth Street, on Tuesday, Dec. 9, for the third annual card party which she has given for the East Side Clinic for Children. Tea will follow the game. The committee includes Mrs. Ralston, Chairman; Mrs. Noble McConnell, President of the clinic; Mrs. F. McDonald Sinclair, Mrs. Frederick Cushing Stevens, Mrs. Thomas Burchell, Mrs. Eberhard Faber, Mrs. Charles Cushman, Mrs. Josephine Smith, Mrs. Albert Cornell, Mrs. Alfred Wattenberg, Mrs. William Schuette, Mrs. A. J. Wells, Mrs. A. Johnson Held, and Mrs. J. S. Van Sicien.

Minerva met on Monday at the Waldorf with Mrs. Jeremiah Pangburn, Chairman of the day. The reception, banquet, and ball to be given on Monday evening, Dec. 8, at the Waldorf for the President, Mrs. MacNutt, is in charge of Mrs. Frank E. Hadley.

A lecture on Mme. de Lafayette will be given in the Century Opera House by Lida Rose McCabe on Dec. 5, at 8:30, under the direction of the Pen and Brush Club. Miss Janet Lewis of 571 Park Avenue has charge of the arrangements.

At the next meeting of the Daily Food Alliance, Mrs. Vanderhoff of San Antonio, Texas, and Mrs. Caroline March will speak. The session will be held at the Astor at 10:30. Mrs. Charles D. Hirst is President.

A dinner and theatre party followed the annual inspection of the James Monroe Woman's Relief Corps 118 on Wednesday. The guests of honor were Mrs. Robert McBride, National President; Mrs. Kent Cooper, Mrs. W. G. Demarest, Mrs. W. B. Moynika, Mrs. Robert Halliday, Mrs. M. A. Goodell, Miss Beatrice Tyson, Mrs. W. B. Baxter, Mrs. C. H. Boynton, Miss Florence Sutton, Mrs. E. D. Bacon, Mrs. M. B. Tirrell, Mrs. Brink, Mrs. Alexander Roboker, Mrs. M. E. Seeley, Mrs. A. G. Mohr, Mrs. Henry Westcott, Mrs. J. W. Pentreath, and Mrs. Ralph Carey.

At the Christmas bazaar to be given on Dec. 2 and 3 at the Waldorf for the Free Industrial School for Crippled Children there will be a vaudeville performance at each session. The committee in charge of this particular attraction includes Miss Guernsey, Chairman; Mrs. A. G. Bage, Mrs. Elmer Black, Mrs. W. E. Burns, Mrs. Charles Griffin, Mrs. L. M. Stotesbury, Mrs. R. B. Rucker, Mrs. Charles Rabell, Mrs. Friend Gilpin, Mrs. John Parker, Mrs. Albert Weston, Mrs. Frederick Lee, Mrs. Abeel Canda, Mrs. George McIntosh, and Mrs. Wilbur Molyneux. The ballroom of the Waldorf will be decorated with poinsettia made by the children for the affair.

A good programme was presented on Friday at the social meeting of the Iowa New Yorkers held at the Astor. Mrs. George Botsford was Chairman of the day, and the President, Mrs. James Clarkson, presided.

Mrs. Edward James Gavegan, wife of Supreme Court Justice Gavegan, is giving a series of small luncheons in honor of Miss Boswell, President of the Woman's Forum, and the special guests of the club at its various meetings. These parties are held in the Waldorf.

Rainy Day will have a meeting on Wednesday at the Astor with several good speakers and musicians on the programme.

A regular meeting of the Bel-Canto Club was held a few days ago at the Astor. Yesterday Mrs. Euroline Putney gave a tea for the club in her apartments in the Blenheim, from 2 until 5 o'clock. On Friday of this week Mrs. Herman Ekman of West Ninety-first Street will open her home to the club and guests. The same evening there will be a dance under the managment of Mrs. L. T. Schmidt. After this the regular monthly meetings of the club will be held on the fourth Saturday at the Waldorf.

"Militarism and Social Reform" will be the subject of the address by Miss Marion Tilden Burritt at the next meeting of the Legislative League, to be held at the Waldorf on Thursday at 3 o'clock. There will be other papers and two convention reports, one on the State convention at Buffalo, given by Mrs. Charles Goldzier, the second on the Budapest convention, read by Mrs. Rebecca Friedlander.

On Saturday of this week the New York Mozart Society will give its second musicale of the season at the Astor. The usual good programme has been prepared and will be followed by a collation. The second of Mr. and Mrs. McConnell's private dances will be held at Bretton Hall on Wednesday.

Daughters of the Revolution, State of New York, celebrated Evacuation Day with a reception and luncheon at the Savoy on Tuesday. Special guests on that day were Mrs. Clarence L. MIXING THE MEDIUMS Peculiar Condition in Playwriting Due in Large Measure to Cynical Attitude of Audiences.

By ADOLPH KLAUBER.

IN years past—but not so very long ago at that—the task of the melodramatist must have been less difficult than it is at present, when every trick in the pack appears to be discounted by the previous knowledge of the playgoer.

If the author has an ace up his sleeve the auditor seems to be aware of it before he produces the card. And, unless the method of putting it down is exceptional, or unless there is some unusual quality of force behind the action, it is called.

This peculiar sophistication of the playgoer has resulted in a form of melodrama comparatively new, a mongrel type of thing indeed, unlike any other previously known. Men like Mr. Gillette have occasionally found it useful to blend a bit of seriousness with farce, and even in an extreme farce like "Too Much Johnson" the most delightful moment resulted from the unexpected intrusion of a sentimental note.

In the older plays, however, the departure was momentary. But it happens, and not infrequently, that the author with a melodramatic story to tell sets out with the avowed purpose of anticipating the objections of his more sophisticated auditors. To do this he avoids complete seriousness; in fact, conveys an impression that he is laughing at his own invention.

This sophistication is largely responsible for the abandonment of the old-time romantic type of play. And while it is undoubtedly true that if as good a romance as "Zenda" or "If I Were King" happened along the audiences would be as much thrilled and delighted as of old, these exceptions merely go to prove the rule.

Nowadays, the average producer feels that to offer romantic melodrama seriously is to court failure at the outset. Wherefore such a play as Mr. Bernard Fagan's "Hawthorne of the U. S. A.," produced in London as straight melodramatic romance, was doctored for our stage so that the leading actor himself, rather than the audience, anticipated the objections of incredulous persons in the orchestra chairs. As a result that play, which, in its original form, would probably have gone down quickly, enjoyed some lease of life.

Another case in point, involving George M. Cohan, whose astuteness was probably responsible for the sea change in Mr. Fagan's play, is provided in his own piece, "Seven Keys to Baldpate," only in this case it is the hero, apparently, who isn't in on the secret of the violent happenings on that dark and snowy night. The various people who come into the hotel and are brought into conflict have no real existence. They are born out of the imagination of the young man engaged in writing a best seller. In former times the melodramatic story would have been developed as real, and there is no doubt that audiences would have so accepted them and come under the spell of the illusion. Here the effect is all the more remarkable because at the very outset the author lays down a premise of unreality. And the paradoxical part of it lies in the fact that whereas we are generally under the belief that modern audiences are less susceptible to the tricks of the theatre, the result here seems to prove that, if anything, they are more so.

Imagine an old-time audience at Rosedale being asked to believe in it, if at the very outset of the play the unreality of the proceedings had been driven home. And yet, in spite of the fact that there is a laugh under practically every melodramatic situation in "Baldpate," the audiences are just as much keyed up as were the devourers of the flamboyant melodramas of an earlier period.

A similar mixing of mediums is disclosed in "The Misleading Lady," which begins with a seemingly serious premise, and in its second act passes into the wildest extravagance. But the very fact that the happenings seem to transcend every possibility suggested by common sense gives them interest. The audience is held in wonderment as to what will happen next; it is curious much as a child who cuts open a drum to see what makes the noise.

Of course, in one case in a hundred, to cite "Within the Law" for an example, the tricks are so cleverly contrived and the suspense is so legitimately maintained that the situations are holding on their own account. But here again the exception merely proves the rule.

The main question at issue is whether, in this striving for success through means not strictly legitimate, the producer, the playwright, and the actor are not really going to make things a lot harder for themselves in the future.

Certainly no one of them would argue that conditions are not hard enough as matters stand at present.

THE GIRL WHO SUCCEEDS

WHAT is the propelling force that advances a girl from the chorus to a leading part?" asked the curious one.

"Hard work," the manager answered without a moment's hesitation. "Hard work, a regular life, and concentration.

"Barring exceptional cases, where inside pull comes to the rescue, the girl who succeeds must work with every ounce of energy she possesses to develop some personality and individuality. In other words, she must aim to be the 'big pea in the pod.'

"You may wonder what chance a girl of, say, one of fifty in a chorus has to make her personality felt, either before or behind the footlights. I am prepared to say positively that her chances are many. First, she must absolutely lose track of her unimportance; she must feel that she is of the utmost value to the performance—that upon her efforts as well as upon the efforts of those with important rôles, depends the success of the performance.

"Managers and producers keep their eyes pretty wide open," he continued, "and you can rest assured that what the audience notices does not pass unseen behind the footlights. The audience is pretty sure to spot that girl, and before long she will have a chance to try a better part."

When I say individuality I do not mean that it is necessary for the actress to arrange here hair differently from the others, or that she must vary in the least from her set part. I don't say that if the others kick once she must kick twice, or that she should wave her arms wildly when the others wave them slowly. If she tried any such tricks she would be canvassing the booking offices the next day. The secret of the whole thing is simply this:

"I read a few days ago of a girl who has been engaged for the leading part in a road company of one big New York success. When she first took up acting as a profession she was in the chorus. I managed the company and from the first that girl impressed me. She was earnest in all that she did. No matter how unimportant her part she studied it with infinite care and perseverance. The mere fact that her weekly envelope contained but fifteen dollars did not seem to bother her in the least. She never grumbled. When she had nothing to do she watched carefully every move of the leading actors. After the performance was over she went quietly to her room and to bed, instead of wasting her energy and ruining her health with night suppers. She realized that to be successful it was necessary to pay attention to business and to give the best that she had to her employer.

"In place of going to cheap theatrical boarding houses while on the road, she engaged a room at the Young Women's Christian Association whenever possible, much to the amusement of other members of the cast. She paid no attention to their gibes, but went about her business quietly and unassumingly.

"What was the consequence?

"When I needed some one for another and more important part I naturally chose her. Success was an added impetus, and she worked and studied all the harder. She climbed step by step until she reached her present position.

"Ask any one of the girls who was with her in the chorus how she happened to forge ahead of them and I will wager the answer will be: 'Oh, she stood in with the manager.'

"That's the way they fool themselves."

PLAYS THAT HOLD.

Cohan's Theatre, "Adele" at the Long Acre, "The Lure" at Maxine Elliott's, "Within the Law," with Jane Cowl, at the Eltinge; David Warfield in "The Auctioneer" at the Belasco, "Oh, I Say" at the Casino, "The Marriage Game" at the Comedy, Ethel Barrymore in "Tante" at the Empire, "Prunella" at the Little Theatre, and "The Pleasure Seekers" at the Winter Garden.

Pompeii Pictures Continue.

George Kleine's production of the Ambrosio photo drama, "The Last Days of Pompeii," continues in its popularity at the Bijou Theatre, and begins its seventh week with the regular Sunday matinee this afternoon.

THE WEEK'S OFFERINGS.

"CHILDREN OF TO-DAY," a play in four acts by Clara Lipman and Samuel Shipman, with Louis Mann. At the Harris Theatre Monday night.

"RACHEL," a play in four acts by Carina Jordan, with Bertha Kalich. At the Knickerbocker Theatre Monday night.

"DER DUNKLE PUNKT," a farce in German in three acts by Gustav Kadelburg. At the Irving Place Theatre Wednesday night.

ONE new play, another new to New York, and a farce in German will be the offerings at the theatres this week at the Knickerbocker Theatre to-morrow night Bertha Kalich will be seen in "Rachel," and in portraying the French tragedienne Mme. Kalich will be seen as a comedienne for the first time in her career on the English-speaking stage, for the four-act drama by Carina Jordan is said to be a romantic comedy drama.

"Rachel" deals with the life of the great French actress, and is episodic in construction, for it takes the girl when she was a poor street singer in Lyons, where she attracts the attention of the Duchess of Orleans, who brings her to Paris and places her in the Conservatory of Music for instruction.

The second act shows Rachel four years later, when she has caused the Parisians to proclaim her excellence while she is playing in the Gymnase.

In the third act Rachel is acknowledged by the civilized world as the greatest tragedienne it has ever seen. The bloodless revolution of 1848 breaks out, and Rachel's patroness, the Duchess and her lover, Maurice, have fled to her home seeking safety from the mob.

From her balcony Rachel harangues the mob, and in a melodramatic scene waves the tri-color and chanting the French nat onal anthem sways the infuriated mob to her way of thinking and saves the lives of the Duchess and her lover.

The last act shows the Green Room of the Théâtre Française, with Chopin fired by the occasion, playing for the first time his famous waltz for the dance before the wedding of Rachel and Maurice.

To-morrow night also will bring Louis Mann to the Harris Theatre in "Children of To-day," a new four-act play by Clara Lipman and Samuel Shipman. The scenes of the play are laid in New York City and the story deals with the perversion of parental authority.

A widowed mother has two children, 17 and 18 respectively, possessed of ultra modern ideas to the extent of assumption of all authority in the home. The mother, who has the usual maternal weakness excessively developed, permits her children to ride rough shod over her. In their false sensed notion of ethics, they are led by an extremist painter and a French cocotte. When matters assume a very grave aspect in this extraordinary household, the protagonist of the play, an old sweetheart of the widowed mother, enters upon the scene, boards the domestic craft, and steers it from the rocks toward which it and the children are tending.

The suporting company includes Emily Ann Wellman, Adoni Fovieri, Lorin Raker, Maude Turner Gordon, Robert Strange, Charles Balsar, and Margaret Templeton.

On Wednesday night a new farce by Gustav Kadelburg, "Der Dunkle Punkt," will be given at the German Irving Place Theatre. The farce is a satire on some of the prejudices of blue-blooded German society. Heinrich Marlow will play the part of a self-satisfied German Count of the old school. Otto Stoecke is cast for the part of the unwelcome son-in-law. Others in the cast are Heinrich Matthaes, Anne Simson, Marie Klerschner, Rudolf Aicher, Willy Wahl, Ernst Holznagel. "Der Dunkle Punkt" will be repeated Thursday and Friday. Tuesday and Saturday nights "Kasernenluft" will be given.

FOOTBALL AT HIPPODROME.

With football enthusiasm at its height, the Hippodrome management is featuring the realistic football game played on its stage every afternoon and night in the production of "America." Save for duration the contest has the spirit, life, action, color, and atmosphere of the real thing, and the boys who participate in it derive quite as much fun out of it as the audience.

FORBES-ROBERTSON BILL.

Forbes-Robertson's programme for this week at the Shubert Theatre opens to-morrow night with "Passing of the Third Floor Back," followed by "The Sacrament of Judas," with Forbes-Robertson and Gertrude Elliott in both plays. This double bill will be repeated on Saturday night. "Mice and Men" will be played on Tuesday night. There will be a special school matinee of "The Merchant of Venice" at reduced prices on Wednesday at 2:30 o'clock. This matinee will also be open to the general public. "The Light that Failed" will be given on Wednesday night, and "Hamlet" will be played on Thursday night and at the matinee on Saturday at 2 o'clock. "The Merchant of Venice" will be presented again on Friday evening.

George Bernard Shaw's "Caesar and Cleopatra" will be revived for a few performances next week. "Othello" will be produced on Monday night, Dec. 15. The presentation of "Othello" will mark Forbes Robertson's first appearance in America in this drama, and will be the last of the new revivals to be given.

AT OTHER THEATRES.

KEITH'S HARLEM OPERA HOUSE—"A Romance of the Underworld," Paul Armstrong's play, will be the offering at Keith's Harlem Opera House. Florence Malone, who was the leading woman of the stock players here last season, will return to the cast this week. Ramsey Wallace will be seen in the principal male role.

ROYAL THEATRE.—"The Passing Show of 1912" will be shown at the Royal Theatre this week, with all of the scenic effects, including the runway on which the actors make their entrance to the stage over the heads of the audience. The cast includes Trixie Friganza, Howard Brothers, Ernest Hare, Charles Prince, Louise Brunnelle, and Gertrude Taylor.

PROSPECT THEATRE.—The New England pastoral play, "Maud Muller," will be presented at the Prospect Theatre this week.

BRONX OPERA HOUSE.—At the Bronx Opera House this week "The Conspiracy" will have its first presentation in New York since the termination of its month's run at the Garrick Theatre last season. The cast is still headed by John Emerson and includes May Buckley, Helena Rapport, Julia Blanc, Meredith Esmonde, Francis Byrne, Georgio Majeroni, Warren Cook, Conrad Cantzen, William J. Kane, Langdon Gillett, Boyd Agin, and P. E. McCoy.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—At the Academy of Music throughout the week, beginning with a matinee to-morrow, Paul Armstrong's four-act dramatization of Bret Harte's story of Western life, "Salomy Jane," will be revived by the regular stock company. Theodore Friebue and Priscilla Knowles will have the two leading roles.

CECIL SPOONER'S THEATRE.—Charles E. Blaney will present the Western military play this week at the Cecil Spooner Theatre, "A Child of the Regiment."

WEST END THEATRE.—Henrietta Crosman, in "The Tongues of Man," will be the attraction at the West End Theatre for the week beginning to-morrow night. There will be the usual matinee on Wednesday.

GRAND OPERA HOUSE.—"The Five Frankforters" is the attraction at the Grand Opera House this week. The cast includes Mme. Mathilde Cottrelly, Edward Emory, Frank Losee, Edward Mackay, Pedro de Cordoba, Lynn Pratt, Stapleton Kent, Alma Belwin, and others.

MINER'S PEOPLES' THEATRE.—This will be "home week" at Miner's Peoples' Theatre, the Bowery, where preparations are being made to welcome The Miners' own show, "Miner's Big Frolic," which opens the week's engagement with the usual matinee to-morrow. Sam Rice is at the head of the company, and is supported by Blanche Curtiss, Lulu Beeson, Margaret King, Harry Lorraine, Chester Nelson, Felix Rush, Harry Heeler, and Frankie Grace.

MINER'S BRONX THEATRE.—Among the principals appearing with Dave Marion and his own company, which comes to Miner's in the Bronx this week is Agnes Behler, the prima donna. In addition to Miss Behler and Dave Marion, the company includes Phil White, Inez de Vedler, William Lawrence, Mark Thompson, Max Gordon, James Matthews, Frank Clayton, Edward Shobel, and Ralph Watson.

COLUMBIA THEATRE.—The New Star and Garter Show will begin a week's engagement at the Columbia Theatre to-morrow afternoon. The burlesque, which is called "The Jewel of Java," is in two acts and twelve scenes. The company is made up of Jack Conway, Billy C. Weip, Beulah Benton, Irene Cassini, Mildred Rose, and the Electric City Four.

MURRAY HILL THEATRE.—"Beauty, Youth, and Folly" is the title of the burlesque organization that will be seen at the Murray Hill Theatre this week. "The Blue Rose" is the title of the two-act travesty that will be presented. James E. Cooper and Tom McRea head the casts, which include also Joe Madden, Eddie Foley, George S. Samson, Lucia Cooper, Dolly Webb, Jennie Rose, Lottie Blackford, and Mabel Webb.

VAUDEVILLE.

Liane Carrera, Anna Held's daughter, is to make her stage debut at Hammerstein's tomorrow afternoon, and others on the bill will be Jack Norworth; "Dope," a serious playlet, with Herman Lieb; James and Bonnie Thornton; William Macart and Ethelynne Bradford, in "The Second Generation"; Raymond and Caverly; Ben Dooley and company; Imhoff, Conn, and Coreene; Mae West; the Three Keatons; Kitty Flynn; the Ollo Trio; Rob Russak's harmonist; Wichman and Kit Carson.

Topping the bill at Proctor's Twenty-third Street Theatre will be Harry First and company in "The Marriage Broker." Others are Mme. Busse and her toy terriers, Sultzer Water, Von Shillsghs, Bijou Russell, Handy Andy Trio, Conrad and Rice, and black and white photo plays.

Mme. Mary and her three-ring circus, a real indoor sawdust entertainment, will be the headliner for the first half of the week at Proctor's Fifty-eighth Street. Others are J. J. Morrison and company in "The Call of Justice," Bartel and Hanley, Lambert and Terry, Three Boys, instrumentalists; Ruth Barnes, comedienne, and black and white photo plays.

Mme. Oberita and her globe-girdling girls in a dancing spectacle will be the chief feature of a twelve-act bill at Proctor's 125th Street. Others programmed are Frank Finley, Great Harrah and company, Chester and Dross, William Bittner and company, the Clipper Four, Rigoletto, violinist; Wright and Davis, Mr. and Mrs. Denver, Cecil Dunham, Johnnie Mangels, and black and white photo plays.

At the Forty-fourth Street Music Hall this week the feature will be the one-act play "Any Night," which ran last season at the Princess Theatre. Others will be Roszinka Dolly, the dancer; Felix Adler, Arthur Aldridge, Mike Bernard and Willie Weston, Mack and Walker, the Three Ernests, and Walter Kelly.

At the Colonial Theatre this week will be Paul Armstrong's new comedy sketch, "Woman Proposes;" Jack Wilson, assisted by Ada Lane and Jack Boyle, in "An Impromptu Revue;" Bert Clark and Mabel Hamilton in "A Wayward Conceit;" Adelaide and J. J. Hughes's Creations, Joe Kene and Rose Green in "Hands Across the Street," Florence Tempest, Chris Richards, Maria Lo's Dresden China Statues, Bert Errol, Donna Adair Trio, Hanlon and Clifton in "The Unexpected," and The Alpine Troupe of wire artists. Performances will begin each day at 1:45 and 7:45 P. M. The usual concerts will be given to-day.

At the Alhambra Theatre will be Mme. Olga Petrova in "Comedy and Tragedy;" "The Purple Lady," with Ralph Lynn and a company of ten; Barry and Wolford, Bernard Granville, Prof. Ote Gygi, Kajiyama, Ray Conlin; McDevitt, Kelly and Lucey in "The Piano Movers and the Actress;" Dagwell Sisters, Ben Beyer and brother, Azard brothers, and Rayao's dogs. Performances will begin each day at 1:45 and 7:45 P. M. To-day two concerts will take place, as usual.

At Keith's Bronx Theatre for the coming week the bill is made up of Ray Cox, Joseph Jefferson and Company in "Poor Old Jim," "The Green Beetle," Delro, Paul Morton and Naomi Glass in "My Lady of the Bungalow," the Castillians, Mae West, Chadwick Trio, playing "Wiggin's Training Camp;" Franker Wood and Bunee Wyde in "Good Night," Ernie and Ernie, and Lo-ve and Wilbur. Performances will begin each day at 1:45 and 7:45 P. M. Sunday concerts will be given as usual.

At Keith's Union Square Theatre will be John and Emma Rsy in "On the Rio Grande," by Junie McCree; Belle Blanche, Arthur Deagon, Vera Mersereau, a dancer, who tells the story of a spectacular Egyptian dance called "A Romance of Old Egypt"; "Me and Dave," presented by Charles and Ada Latham; Dora Pelletier, Burkhart and White, the Longworths, Hal and Francis, Wilbur Sweatman, and Alfredo Marshall.

At Proctor's Fifth Avenue Theatre the bill will be headed by David Bispham, and other acts will be "The Millionaire's Wife," "Cherie," Rackett, Hoover and Markey, Josie Heather, dainty English singing comedienne; Eunice Burnham and Charles Irwin, Hess Sisters, Henry Lewis, Hugh Lloyd, Miller and Lyles, Sam Barton, and Norman.

Nina Barbour is to make her debut as a singer at the Palace Theatre to-morrow afternoon, and others on the bill will be Zelda Sears and company in "The Wardrobe Woman;" Frank Sheridan, in a dramatic playlet by Richard Harding Davis, "Blackmail"; Ethel Green, Fred Dupree, Bird Millman, Nat Nazzaro and company, John and Mae Burke in "A Ragtime Soldier"; Leipzig, Al. English and Stella Johnson, and new Pathe Weekly pictures.

Dunninger, the magician and illusionist, will enter upon his sixth week at the Eden Musee in an entirely new programme Monday. The extra attractions at the Eden Musee include the cinematograph de luxe, with an entire change of subjects, the World in Wax and the band concerts afternoon and evening.

ELMENDORF LECTURES.

At Carnegie Hall to-night, Dwight Elmendorf will present his lecture, "Yellowstone Park." In preparation for this travel talk, although he had previously made seven trips to the great National Park, Mr. Elmendorf returned to it again this Autumn and added to his collection some photographic reproductions of the geysers, hot springs, Great Falls, and Grand Canyon. He also succeeded in getting many motion pictures of the bears and other wild animals that roam unmolested about the park under Government protection.

HAD A NEW SCENE.

Author Willing to Lengthen Play in Prize Contest.

The $10,000 prize play contest of Winthrop Ames's having closed some time ago, letters are pouring in asking about plays, whether they have been accepted, and suggestions are also made for their improvement. Mr. Ames received the following letter, among others, in his mail the other morning:

"I beg your pardon if I am a nuisance, but something tells me my play, ——, is not quite long enough to satisfy your wants. It seemed so awfel long to me while writing it that I left out one scene, between the forest park scene and the sick room. The scene left out is, Mamie washing, an Monday day after the scene in park. An insurance agent comes to collect for policy on baby, and asks her to quit washing to be come his affinity. Mamie is very indignant and tells him what she thinks of him. this is only a brief outline of the scene. If it is nessecary to add this scene to make my drama long enough, I will be glad to send it to you.

"P.S. I will write it to night and have it typewritten Monday and mail you.

"Rsp. ——."

A VAUDEVILLE PHILOSOPHER

SOMETIMES an actor quits the stage and takes up a business career," said the vaudeville philosopher. "Actors are pursued by preachments which liken them to the grasshopper, whereas it would be wiser to emulate the ant.

"You remember the stuff? How the provident little ant during the plenteous Summer season stores supplies against the barren Winter. With what energy and purpose the little ant labors! All this time the grasshopper wastes his Summer opportunity in idle merrymaking, with no thought of the coming Winter's inclement frost.

"From this thrilling premise the actor is supposed to infer that the ant is wise and will survive to propagate its kind, while the grasshopper is foolish and his race will perish from the earth forever.

"So, falling for the story, the actor retires from the stage to emulate the ant and renounce the grasshopper.

"But every Summer there are grasshoppers lurking gayly in every field, while the ants toil madly. In the same way there are prosperous actors on every season, while the industrious generally are adding a little bit more to what they have in the savings bank.

"And this brings me around to Jerry, my present dancing partner. When I first met Jerry he was the best Tom actor in the business. People not in the profession may be edified to learn that a 'Tom actor' is one who plays a part in 'Uncle Tom's Cabin.' This means that he can double in brass, which is to say that he can play a musical instrument in the street parades which advertise the show. Any actor who can do that can do anything in the show business.

"I hooked up with Jerry and we did a unique clog in refined vaudeville until one day he heard a lecture on the ant and grasshopper. He said good-bye to me—that he was going to quit the irresponsible life of the stage and settle down. Just when we had the public trained to like us.

"I didn't see Jerry again for three long years. One morning I was pasting a bill of myself on the side of a stone barn in a distant New England village when who should run out of the house and stop me red-handed but Jerry himself. He owned stable, house, and grounds.

"'Stick up the bill,' said he. 'I really didn't know you.'

"'You have changed some yourself,' I suggested. 'What will you take for your clothes? I am thinking of putting on a rube clown.'

"'Cut that,' he growled. 'Come inside and I will introduce you to my wife's folks. But I don't want you to kid their looks, because they have a right to be respected in their own home.'

"I met them all, and it was a real treat. It does an actor good to meet real people now and then and frolic about on the ant hill. I got a lot of new stuff from them, too, and they never suspected.

"After dinner we all went into the front room, and Jerry sat me down to the piano. I ripped off a few old-time things we used to dance to, and Jerry cut loose. He jumped into the middle of the floor, and how he did dance!

"It was a riot. His wife's folks raved over it. Her father said excitedly:

"'I pay a dollar to see worse. Why don't you go on the stage?'

"When his wife chimed in that settled it. Because you can't make an ant out of a grasshopper, anyhow. We dug up the old act and it is going big. If it keeps up we will retire.

MATTERS OF GENERAL INTEREST TO PLAYGOERS

PLAYWRITING UNDER PRESSURE

Authors Tell How "The Misleading Lady" Was Turned Out in Seventeen Days—Motor Car Composition.

THE play market is so dependent upon fickle and inconstant laws of supply and demand that dramatists are often subjected to greater pressure than any other class of writers.

Yet the record for quickly written plays, at least for this season, appears to go to Charles Goddard and Paul Dickey, authors of "The Misleading Lady."

They say it was completed in seventeen days. It seems that one day last August Mr. Dickey and Mr. Goddard dropped into Mr. Harris's office in the Hudson Theatre to say good-bye just before leaving on an automobile trip for Mr. Dickey's camp near Burlington, Wisconsin. Mr. Harris happened to mention that he had arranged with Lewis Stone to appear under his management.

"What is he going to appear in?" asked Dickey.

"I don't know," answered Harris. "That's what is bothering me. I haven't been able to find a good play for him, yet."

"How soon must you have one?" asked Dickey.

"By the end of the month."

The end of the month was just seventeen days away.

"I guess we can have it," said Goddard, quietly.

Dickey looked at Goddard. "He writing of their first play, "The Ghost Breaker," produced last season at the Lyceum Theatre, had occupied nearly a year. To be sure that play had been delayed by a pleasant little romance in which Goddard married Dickey's sister. This Dickey recalled.

But, anyhow, he reminded Goddard "that piece took up a deuce of a lot of time."

Then he turned to Harris.

"Don't accept anything until the 3d of September. That will give us time to finish a play for Stone and get it back to you. We will go out to my camp in Wisconsin and write it there."

The two hurried down to their touring car and set out for Burlington. Burlington is some eighty miles northwest of Chicago, and Dickey's camp is situated on Bohner's Lake. It took them five and one-half days to make the trip.

In relating their experiences the other evening at the Fulton Theatre between the acts of "The Misleading Lady" Goddard explained that the entire plot, characters and details of the piece were completely mapped out during the automobile trip.

"I would recommend that anybody who wants to conjure a swiftly-moving plot think it out in an automobile," said Goddard, a slender, blue-eyed young man. "The way you rush past the objects on the side of the road seems to impel you to put fast-following incidents and situations into your piece. Then, too; in going over a long stretch of territory with a great deal of varying scenery you incidentally receive a large number of suggestions.

"To begin with, we had in our minds, at the start, a play built around an entirely different theme from that of 'The Misleading Lady.' While we were waiting at the ferry a young woman stepped out of another automobile, dressed in very extreme negligée style. The man who was with her, certainly not her husband, was an unusually fine-looking chap, and apparently a very red-blooded one. He seemed to be sizing her up, in a half cynical way. We all noticed it, and Mrs. Goddard, who was with us, remarked: 'You know, a woman is doing a very risky thing to dress this way.'

"Dickey clapped me over the back.

"'That is a great idea for a play,' he exclaimed.

"There on the ferryboat crossing over to Hoboken we evolved the main theme of 'The Misleading Lady,' and took for the germ of our plot the manner in which modern woman tempts and taunts man with her extreme styles, and the effect that they are likely to have on a real man. We agreed that if such a man actually fell in love with such a woman, yet remained sufficiently master of himself, he might, under certain conditions, revert to cave-man methods, kidnap her, and try to tame her in his own way.

"The idea of his running away with her to his camp in the Adirondacks, of course, was suggested by our own destination, Dickey's camp in Wisconsin.

"Then, too, our character of the man who thinks he is Napoleon came about in an odd way. As we passed through a town in Ohio we observed a 'nut' tying and untying a rope which he was trying to stretch from a fence to a tree. The incident struck us as being so funny that we determined to substitute him for the fugitive from justice character that we had first conceived. Instead of having a serious, hackneyed character to come along in the complications of our plot we were able to use one which was much funnier and by far more unconventional.

"The critics have been kind enough to say that a great deal of the charm of The Misleading Lady' is due to the constantly unexpected happenings, and I am inclined to believe that the automobile should take part credit for this.

"For instance, one bit of business that appears to please—namely, the manner in which Craigen outwits Tracey armed with a loaded revolver, when he himself has only a bag of cigarette tobacco as his weapon—sprang directly from one of the incidents in the trip. We had come to the point in the plot where Tracey enters the room and gives Craigen just long enough to count fifty in which to answer certain questions.

"'How in the devil are we going to get Craigen out of the hole?' asked Dickey. It was a dilemma. We shot along twenty or thirty miles, without a plausible idea. I started to roll a cigarette to help along matters. Suddenly our automobile lurched and a bit of wind carried several specks of tobacco into Dickey's eye.

"'Gad, how this smarts,' said Dickey.

"Then his face lightened.

"'Say, we've got it,' he said. 'We'll have Craigen pull a bag of tobacco from his pocket and when Tracey leans over to find what he has in his hand, let Craigen blow it into his eyes.'

"Thus a sudden jerk of the automobile hitting an Illinois cobble-stone was responsible really for one of the most effective and novel climaxes in our piece.

"It was the 20th of the month when we finally arrived at Bohner's Lake. We unpacked our typewriter, which we had purchased in Chicago, and sat down to work out the play.

"Dickey's best hours in work are from 9 in the evening till 3 in the morning. My best hours are from 7 in the morning until 3 in the afternoon; so we worked in relays, getting together for our conferences whenever the other thought it essential. The result was that I was up half the night and Dickey half the day. We slept just eighteen hours during the last three days. But promptly on the first, as we had promised, we had our manuscript virtually complete and on its way to New York.

"The rest of the experiences of 'The Misleading Lady' you know."

EXPELLED FROM THEATRE.

Manager Put Out of His Own House by Charles Frohman.

"There are only three things in life that I cannot dispense with," Charles Frohman was saying the other night between acts at the rehearsal of "The Land of Promise," Miss Billie Burke's new play.

"One of them," he continued, "is sleep; the second is food, and the third is an empty theatre when rehearsing."

It was at this moment that Mr. Maugham, the author of "The Land of Promise," said, "I did not know that Mr. Tharp, one of the actors in the company, was to wear a tall hat."

"Neither did I," answered Mr. Frohman. "You go over and tell him that neither the author of the play nor its producer expected to-night to see him hide his light under a tall hat."

Both men were talking in the dimly lighted auditorium of the practically deserted theatre, and while they were talking a carefully dressed individual entered and quietly took a seat, at the same time removing a highly polished top hat.

It was to this person that Mr. Maugham said, "We did not expect to find you wearing that kind of a hat to-night, Mr. Tharp."

"My name is not Tharp; I am the manager of the theatre; I represent the estate," said the owner of the top hat.

Whereupon Mr. Frohman, who by then had moved over from another part of the theatre, remarked "Well, in that case I will have to remind you that I particularly rented the theatre for to-night without fixtures; that is the way the contract read. All I asked for and still wish is an empty theatre." And at that the owner of the top hat took his top hat and went out into a very black, very silent night.

BROOKLYN AMUSEMENTS.

MAJESTIC THEATRE.—"The Whip," the spectacular Drury Lane melodrama which has been drawing big audiences to the Majestic Theatre during the past week, remains at that playhouse for one week more.

MONTAUK THEATRE.—At the Montauk Theatre Charles Frohman will present the new musical comedy, "The Marriage Market," in which Donald Brian is the star, heading the original Knickerbocker cast, which comes to the Montauk intact. Among the players in support of Mr. Brian are Carol McComas, Venita Fitzhugh, Cissy Sewall, George T. Meech, Guy Nichols, Arthur Dauche, and Percival Knight.

DE KALB THEATRE.—"Excuse Me," described by its author, Rupert Hughes, as "A Pullman Carnival in Three Sections," otherwise a farce that exploits humors possible in railway travel, will be presented at the De Kalb Theatre this week.

ORPHEUM THEATRE.—The thirtieth anniversary of the founding of vaudeville by B. F. Keith will be celebrated this week at the Orpheum Theatre with a bill of feature acts and headliners. The theatre will be decorated in keeping with the occasion, and because of the long list of acts on the programme performances will begin each day at 1:45 and 7:45 P. M. Among the performers will be Adele Ritchie, Robert T. Haines in William J. Hurlbut's "The Man in the Dark"; Louis A. Simon and Kathryn Osterman in "A Persian Garden"; Jim Diamond and Sybil Brennan; Foster Ball and Ford West in "Since the Days of '61"; Edwin George, juggler; Frederika Siemons and company in "Liz"; Harry Linton and Anita Lawrence; Volant and his flying piano; Jack Gardner; Tierney and Sabbott and Roser's Aerial Dogs. The usual concerts will be given to-day.

BUSHWICK THEATRE.—The bill at Keith's Bushwick Theatre will include Cecil Lean and Cleo Mayfield; Gertrude Vanderbilt and George Moore; Frederick V. Bowers; Harry Tate and company in "Motoring"; "The Porch Party"; "The Girl from Milwaukee"; Francis McGinn, in "The Cop"; Julius Tannen; The Harvey Family; Spencer and Williams; Sprague and McNeece, and the Juggling Mowatts. Concerts will take place to-day as usual.

EVERYBODY BEING HELPED.

R. G. Doggett, the publicity agent of the Darktown Follies, all colored performers, now appearing in "My Friend from Kentucky," is authority for the statement that "What Bunty did for the Scotch and Gen. John Regan for the Irish, the Darktown Follies does for the negro—and just as skillfully."

ONE PLAY A YEAR.

A writer in The Telegraph comments on the statement that six weeks, according to Paul Armstrong, George Scarborough, and others, is ample time in which to grind out a play. How different, adds the writer, is their opinion from that of Steele Mackaye, who wrote sixteen plays between 1872 and 1888, averaging a year to each play. Mr. Mackaye pointed out the following requisites as indispensable to the dramatist:

"Mechanical instinct, poetic fancy, sensitive sympathies, passionate fervor and vivid imagination, thoroughness in preparation, industry in elaboration, conscience in revision, courage in excision, and, dominating all this, that breadth of mind which breeds humility, and that depth of heart whose understanding love goes out in charity to all mankind."

Helma Anderson in "America"—Hippodrome.

THE STAGE ABROAD

Robert Loraine is acting in London in a new play, "A Place in the Sun," by Cyril Harcourt. According to The London Telegraph, the piece is likely to succeed, though it hovers quaintly between the old and the new. There is Dick Blair, a novelist, who tries to force a marriage between his sister, Rose, and her seducer, Stuart Capel. He is old; he dates from before Man and Superman and Hindle Wakes—and the novelists usually like to think themselves ahead of their age! There is the "waster." Stuart Capel, who knows he is a waster, and knows why he is a waster, and makes no pretensions to be anything else than a waster, and can talk beautifully about it all. He is new; he dates at the earliest from the Hankin era. His victim, Rose, is old. She was born long before the days of John Tanner or Janet de Mullin, for the coming of a fatherless child is to her a prospect of horror, to be cut short in the river were not courage to seek. The waster's father, old Sir John Capel, the representative of the "idle rich" system, which has made the waster what he is, is as old as the drama or the hills. He is the aristocratic parent who forbids his son's marriage with a farmer's daughter (however polished and eminent her brother may have become as a novelist) on pain of cutting off the entail and the rest of it. But the waster's sister, Marjorie, is very new—so soon, that is, as the savage quarrel between Blair and her menfolk over Rose has made her anything at all. Having been secretly in love with Blair for seven years (as he with her), she attempts to right the wrong by smirching her own reputation and seeing what her father will say then. So, quite coolly and new-womanishly, she comes by night to Blair's rooms, demanding to be compromised. And the end of it is that they are all very comfortably paired off. The waster determines to be a waster no more, but to marry and work to support his bride. The father relents and blesses the proposed marriage between his daughter and the novelist.

The reviewer adds that the result of the jumble of old and new is that neither side and none of the characters seem quite possible. It is not a case of square opposition between two schools of thought on conduct and convention; it is rather an uncertainty in the author's point of view. For all that, Mr. Harcourt has made out of these people a play that is cleverly contrived, kept going by plenty of "strong" scenes, and here and there quite amusingly worded.

About M. Henri Bataille's new play "La Phalène," (The Moth,) produced to-night at the Vaudeville, perhaps the less said the better, writes the Paris correspondent of a London daily. The Paris press, which is certainly not squeamish, itself protests against it. When an author of M. Bataille's talent and reputation chooses a theme of such morbid depravity that if his play were the transcription of an episode of real life its interest would be essentially clinical, he conveys to the public the impression that he has lost confidence in his art, and that he is willing to depend upon the illegitimate attractions—for a certain class of mind—of subjects which can only legitimately concern the physician. Young women in the "third stage" of tuberculosis are not nowadays paraded either on the stage of the theatre or on that of society. And even if they have artistic ambitions and are at the same time possessed by an insane desire to drain the cup of life to the dregs, the long-drawn-out exhibition of a tragedy of that kind is not necessarily art; it may be, and is in this case, little better than a cinematographic exhibition of horrors. That Thyra should suddenly have cast all she cherished, including her virtue, to the winds and have afterward become the mistress of the Italian Prince to whom she had been betrothed; that she should have done this solely because a Paris specialist in tuberculosis had given her only five more years of life in which to perfect her art as a sculptor, involves the assumption that she was a vierge folle as well as a consumptive.

According to the reviewer of The London Times, "The Shadow," produced by Miss Horniman's company, is a typical piece of Mr. Eden Phillpotts's work. His plays have all the characteristics of his novels, except the massive descriptions which some of us regard as the best thing his novels offer. "The Shadow" is a tale of passion and crime on or near Dartmoor. The characters are humble folk, full of homely wisdom or folly, and wonderfully eloquent in expressing it. Philip Blanchard, the passionate butcher of this play, and the real murderer of crafty and cruel old Jacob Waycott, is only a plain man, but he holds views on life (which he has learned to spell, so to speak, with a capital L,) the completeness and force of which would not discredit many a young Londoner who has dipped into Nietzsche and Shaw; and he expresses them with more force and fluency than can many more refined philosophers. But you forgive the man because he is, indeed, a tremendous lover of life and of his wife, Hester, a woman cast, physically and mentally, in the big mold which Mr. Phillpotts likes to describe. And when the murdered man's nephew, gentle, timid Elias Waycott, has been arrested for the murder, and condemned, this great lover of life resolves to confess and blow his brains out before he can be arrested. But Elias Waycott, knowing the truth about the murder, had determined to die that Hester, whom he, too, loved, might not be robbed of her happiness and husband; and he committed suicide, after making a confession, in prison. And so it fell to Hester to draw her husband back from a death he did not fear to the more difficult and painful duty of accepting life at another man's hands.

The weakness of the play, adds the reviewer, setting aside the suspicious self-comprehension and eloquence of the chief characters, lies in the conduct of the fable, which is filled out to the needful length by episodic discourses by the members of the "comic relief"—the doleful butcher, Willes Gay; the garrulous mother, Sarah Dunnybrig, and the oracular postmaster, Thomas Turtle.

There have been complaints against the despotism of the producer of the new stage-art, writes the reviewer of the Standard. But the tyranny of all the Craigs and Barkers in the world is as naught compared with the power of the coming exhibitor of musical comedies. Authors, players, and the pliant composer are more out of it than ever. Leoncavallo and Albert P. de Courville are but names on the bill of "Are You There?" the "farcical musical play" which made its appearance at the Prince of Wales's Theatre on Saturday night. The real power behind the footlights is the fourth name under the title, Ned Wayburn. Lower down on the programme, printed small, we read: "All the 'effects,' 'color schemes,' 'stage lighting,' 'properties,' 'groupings,' 'evolutions,' 'dances,' etc., invented by Ned Wayburn." What the "etc." could mean after all the other claims is difficult to imagine. Music, story and people, fun, interest and action are stifled, hustled and crushed by this restless craze for effects. The effects and "evolutions" are startling, often beautiful, and quite original. Nothing quite so new, in fact, has been seen in London as the opening scene in the Telephone Exchange, with its rows of girls at color-blinking switchboards. "Complaints" is over one board, "Public Aggravator" is marked on a call-box, while "Smoking" and "No Silence," are headlines over the doors, the strict adherence to the latter order being shown by the deafening chatter of the girls at the least provocation. A specially "Engaged" buzzer is handy for use when a girl is disturbed by a call in the midst of a gossip or a novel. Complaints are reckoned as compliments on the inefficiency of the service.

Mr. Graham Moffat has given Scotland in "Bunty Pulls the Strings," and Mr. "Birmingham" has given Ireland in "Gen. John Regan." The turn of Wales has been undertaken by Mr. Laurence Cowen in "The Joneses," produced at the Strand. His experience differs widely from the traditional English view of the character of Taffy, writes Mr. Walkley in The Times. So far from being crafty enough to steal a leg of mutton-beef, these Welsh—all except one, and he a lawyer—are so guileless that a picturesquely obvious humbug like Mr. Plantagenet Jones can take them all in. Mr. Plantagenet Jones, who seemed to us rather compounded out of several characters in Dickens than directly observed from life, was an Englishman who, some time in the eighteen-fifties, chose the little town of Llynwllanwllyn (the author plays with the word as W. Bernard Shaw once played a Ponsh name) for the object of his attentions, much as Get-Rich-Quick Wallingford chose Battlesbury. And the Arcadian simplicity of Farmer Eleazer Lewis Jones and Publican John Thomas Jones and others was completely taken in by his affectation of enthusiasm for religion, poetry, teetotalism, and other Welsh preoccupations.

His downfall came through a man of the world, Capt. Owen Thomas, the vicar's son, who ran a little cargo boat up and down the Welsh coast; and even that man of the world would never have guessed him for a rogue without an artlessly contrived opportunity of hearing his plot with Lawyer David Morgan Jones for the capture of Myfanwy Jones, daughter of Eleazer Thomas Jones, and her dowry. Even so, what stirred the Captain's wrath more than the possible loss of his sweetheart was the Englishman's plan for robbing sailormen of their rights by making an unalcoholic whiskey that should spoil the market of the wicked Scots and Irish. So he substituted honest rum for the new-fangled brew; the whole party, including two chapel deacons, got very drunk, and the Englishman found it best to leave, tricking the guileless Welsh out of more money as he departed.

Well, Mr. Cowen has Peacock's authority for his view of the Welsh character, and there is something pleasantly Peacockian about Eleazer Thomas Jones's farmhouse, though its merriment and hospitality do not include strong ale. The play has a nice homely flavor, which is frequently marred by a thin admixture of verbal smartness.

LAURETTE TAYLOR
IN THE BIGGEST COMEDY HIT OF THE DECADE
394th to 401st TIMES IN NEW YORK OF THE TRIPLE TRIUMPH.
Peg o' My Heart
by J. HARTLEY MANNERS.
"CAPACITY AUDIENCES ALWAYS IS ITS CLINCHING ARGUMENT IN FAVOR OF CLEAN PLAYS."

HELPING THE DOWN-AND-OUT

Tales of Distress Puzzle the Man Inclined to Aid.

"Living in New York as many years as I have has made me rather indisposed to listen to tales of distress that are proffered one on every hand just now," said a man yesterday, "but once in a while I do stop, look, and listen, and my sympathy gets the better of me, and I afterward find I have listened to the wrong person.

"I have had two instances lately that have made me feel that my judgment was wrong. There are some people that you just cannot direct to the city woodyard. One afternoon on upper Broadway I was accosted by a well-dressed, pleasant-spoken young man, who seemed embarrassed, but who managed to tell me he hadn't had anything to eat since noon of the day before, that he had come on from Michigan to get a job here, that his money had run out, but his rent at his rooming place was paid for a week in advance, and that a job had been promised him for the next morning by one of the big electrical companies.

"As ten cents or even a quarter will not carry anybody any distance in New York these days, I pulled out a dollar and handed it to him, at the same time giving my address. He was profuse in his promises to return the money the following week. That was at least a month ago, and nothing has come from him. I didn't take his name.

"It was only a few days later that I was coming down Fifth Avenue when I heard a voice at my elbow.

"'Could you spare just a moment to listen to me, Sir?' it said, with a foreign accent.

"I was on the point of quickening my steps, but remembering an early experience of my own in New York, when I was a little short of food, I stopped. The speaker was a pale young man, poorly but neatly dressed. He said he had slept the last two nights on a Park bench and he was tired and sick. A cough accompanied the words. It was near lunch time and I took him to a restaurant near by and filled him with plain, substantial food. Then I asked him to tell me his story.

"He said he was the son of a banker in Prague. That a year ago, with a sum of money provided by his father, he had come to New York to make his fortune. He thought it would be easy to get a clerkship in some Wall Street house. At the start he spoke no English, and that was against him. After several months he had acquired a fluent command of the language, but now he could not get a job because he could not give references, nobody knowing him here.

"Then his money gave out. He had been writing home letters telling that he was doing well here, he said, but finally it came to a point of his having to get any work he could. He got odd jobs assisting men working on moving vans. Then he tried dish washing in restaurants. Owing to an injury he claimed to have received in a game of football he could not do heavy work. He had now been without work for three weeks, he said, and only that morning he had pawned a necktie and paid for the washing of two collars, so that he could present a neat appearance when asking for a job.

"I took his name and he took mine, and I gave him a dollar. He said he had spent all his money a week before in cabling home for money, and that it was sure to arrive by Saturday's steamer. He, too, was profuse in his thanks, and when he got his remittance the first thing he would do would be to return the dollar.

"Of course, I have never heard from him since. I don't know whether he was playing me for a sucker or whether his story was the truth. I don't believe it is a safe rule to ignore all requests for help that persons who stop you on the streets these days make, but it is a rule many persons follow.

GENERAL NEWS AND NOTES OF THE MUSIC WORLD

Concerts and Recitals in Large Number for Early December--At Opera Houses--New Work on Chamber Music.

THERE is a large field, hitherto not much nor skillfully cultivated, for a treatise on chamber music; and into this field has entered Thomas Dunhill with a volume of some three hundred pages, entitled "Chamber Music, a Treatise for Students," published by the Macmillan Company. It is a volume in the series entitled "The Musician's Library." Mr. Dunhill is himself a composer and speaks with knowledge. In many respects his book is valuable, but perhaps not in the sense in which he expects it to have most value—as an instruction book for students. That it will be a help and stimulus to such students is very likely; as well as to those amateurs and others who take the art of music seriously enough to study it.

Mr. Dunhill's method is to quote very freely from the works of classical and modern chamber music writers, for the purpose of analysis and discussion of the various effects, mostly those that are successful, but also, sometimes, those that are to be avoided as failures. Mr. Dunhill goes at length into the characteristics and methods of the great composers, points which are amply enforced by examples. A third of the book is properly devoted to the string quartet, as the most important and most significant form of chamber music; and, indeed, the proportion might safely and properly have been made larger. He then takes up the string quintet, sextet, and double quartet, gives chapters on the various combinations of strings with pianoforte, and another chapter on wind instruments. In all this Mr. Dunhill's comments are hardly so strictly technical as the ambitious student would doubtless wish they were; there is much analysis of the aesthetic kind, that would adorn "programme notes" at a concert, and that would be of much interest and value to those looking for this sort of thing. That Mr. Dunhill is not afraid to leave the classics and listen to the latest word is shown by his quotations from such composers as James Friskin, John Ireland, Adrien Barthe, Fritz Kauffman, and others whose names are not yet household words, even among the most alert and up-to-date. But the quotation of no fewer than 276 illustrations and passages from chamber works great and small, and the comments upon them, generally discriminating and intelligent, will of themselves give the book a peculiar value, and will rescue it from the reproach of appealing too much to a dilettante indolence.

Mr. Vance Thompson's "Life of Ethelbert Nevin," his lifelong friend, (The Boston Music Company,) has some of the qualities of the best biographical writing. He tells the story of his friend's life and achievement; but much more than this is it that he makes him a living person, a real character, and he compels his readers' sympathies and interest from the beginning to the end. Whoever the subject is, and if he is a musician, whatever music he has written, such a biography is a work of art not lightly to be passed over. It may be that Nevin's music, even "Narcissus" and "The Rosary," will not live long or exert a perceptible influence on American art; but there was the soul of the artist in him, the impulse toward the creation of something delicate, charming, individual, and sincere; and he had acquired the mastery of a fine craftsmanship competent to express precisely what he wished to express, and in his own way. It is right that such an artist should not be forgotten or undervalued.

Mr. Thompson shows these things in his book, as he traces the young man's studies, his enlarging experiences at home and in Europe, his growing success. He lets Nevin speak much through his own letters—lets him, as he says, "relate the daily incidents of his life, the trend of his studies, his way of living, the means whereby he attained his eminence and won his fame in the world; and to tell, withal, what he thought of his own compositions." It is true, as the biographer declares, that he had shown here a "strange, sweet personality"; a child, living in a magical world of eternal youth. There is much that is wholesome in him. We rejoice when he writes to his wife about "that nasty little Narcissus," "that mean little Narcissus," whether we agree with him or not; and when he writes his frank ideas about his successes or his failures, as frank in one case as in the other.

The book is handsomely made with numerous portraits well reproduced, fac similes of Nevin's manuscript, explanatory notes, a catalogue of his compositions, and several short pieces of his unpublished music.

An interesting piece of literary investigation is contained in "Milton's Knowledge of Music; Its Sources and Its Significance in His Works," by Sigmund Gottfried Spaeth. (Princeton: The University Library.) It is a dissertation for a doctor's degree at Princeton University. It has finer and better literary quality than some doctors' dissertations have been known to have, and it shows a knowledge and appreciation of music that are generally foreign to literary criticism. There is a chapter summarizing the state of music in England at and before the time of Milton, and it is seen to be in no way surprising that he should have been familiar with music as Shakespeare was, and, like him, betray his familiarity in many passages of his works. Milton's father is known to have been one of the most distinguished musicians of his time, and composed much, though he was a scrivener by trade. It is evident that the future poet must have been set early to work at musical studies. He had proficiency when he entered St. Paul's School; one of his first college exercises was on the "music of the spheres." Music was prominently to the fore in his visit to Italy; he educated his nephews in music and emphasized the importance of music in his "Tractats of Education."

The author undertakes an exhaustive examination of Milton's works that shows how far-reaching was his knowledge of the art, and how ever-present it was to his mind as a subject for poetry or in allusions, metaphors, illustrations. It was something more to him, it was a mystic symbol of God's harmony of the universe.

In an appendix Mr. Spaeth collects the most important passages in Milton's works illustrating his kowledge of music. In others are quoted and expounded the allusions to his friendship with Henry Lawes, and his Latin verses to Leonora Baroni, the Italian singer. Another collates the most important sources of Milton's knowledge of music, especially the classical writers' explanations of the mystical "music of the spheres." And there are a glossary, a bibliography, and an index.

In "Chopin the Composer" (G. Schirmer), Edgar Stillman Kelley undertakes, not to treat of the import of the master's compositions and their interpretation, but rather to discuss "that which admits of little or no dispute," their musical structure, and its influence on contemporaneous art. He makes a very detailed examination of Chopin's compositions with copious musical quotations. After discussing the national elements that enter into Chopin's music and the improved piano technique that it implies, he examines some of the characteristic features of his figuration, of his use of lyric forms, the rondo and the sonata, with his amplification of the sonata principle; his harmony, his elaboration of the embellishment in writing for the pianoforte. He attempts to make out a case in favor of Chopin's orchestration, his weakest point. There is much that is interesting and suggestive in what Mr. Kelley writes; and his familiarity with his subject is shown by the ease with which he ranges throughout the length and breadth of Chopin's complete works. One feature of his book is a little surprising, the defensive tone that runs through it, as though he were championing a much contemned and misunderstood composer against his detractors. It will seem to most people, on the other hand, that Chopin was never more appreciated or less unfavorably criticised than now; and that these detractors are men of straw, whose demolition might have been foregone.

The H. W. Gray Company of New York is doing its share in encouraging American composers by publishing their works, and thus affording them a greater opportunity of getting them performed. From its press comes a magnificent full score of F. S. Converse's latest orchestral composition, "Ormazd," a symphonic poem. The composition is based on a poetic legend of the ancient Persians, a version of which in English, by Percy Mackaye, is prefixed to the score. It is one of Mr. Converse's most elaborate and ambitious works, and several performances of it by American orchestras are to be given in the course of the present season.

Also published by the H. W. Gray Company is a beautifully printed score of Henry F. Gilbert's "Humoresque on Negro Minstrel Tunes," the latest of several works in which Mr. Gilbert has utilized as thematic material tunes of this character. Of negro minstrelsy Mr. Gilbert says in his preface to the score:

As it originally pictured the lighter side of the life of the negro slave, its ultimate disappearance followed quite naturally upon the disappearance of slavery itself. Despite the fact that the larger part of the songs composed for the minstrel show were poor in quality and have descended to a deserved oblivion, there still remain in the minds of the people many melodies from that period the vigor and heart-touching qualities of which cannot be gainsaid. Such are "Old Folks at Home," "Dixie," "Zip Coon," &c. As for "Old Folks at Home" it is perhaps the most widely known and well-loved song in the country; "Dixie" has become a true national song, and no patriotic gathering is complete without it, while one hears "Zip Coon" sung on the streets of New York as well as fiddled in the backcountry towns. * * * It is from this popular song, redolent of "minstrel" memories, that my "Humoresque" has grown, and in it I have tried to reflect the spirit of comedy, pathos, and rollicking mirth which found expression in the minstrel show of the olden days.

The latest additions to Schirmer's Library are two volumes of a "Classic Sonatina Album," edited by Sigmund Herzog. They are marked, respectively, "easy" and "intermediate." Each contains ten sonatinas and fourteen miscellaneous pieces. Composers such as Beethoven, Clementi, Diabelli, Steibelt, Kühlan, Hiller, Loeschhorn, and Reinecke are represented in the sonatinas, and a larger range in the miscellaneous pieces. The compositions chosen are skillfully arranged in an order of increasing difficulty, and afford variety and contrast in musical character. Much attention has been paid to the fingering; and the collection will be useful in cultivating the taste as well as the technical proficiency of elementary pupils.

The Oliver Ditson Company publishes a cycle of four songs by Granville Bantock called "Songs of the Seraglio." The lyrics are by Helen F. Bantock. Mr. Bantock's predilection for Oriental music is well known to those who have followed his activities among the advanced composers of the present-day English school. These songs are, of course, an imitation of the Oriental character and feeling as expressed in music, and are interesting in their ingenuity.

Significant of the attention that American composers are receiving from the publishers, when they have proved their deserts, is the appearance of David Stanley Smith's string quartet in E minor, Op. 19, published in parts by G. Schirmer. It was played recently by the Kneisel Quartet, and is dedicated to Dr. Franz Kneisel. It is not very long since the publication of an American string quartet would have been deemed almost a sign of the publisher's mental derangement.

Charming in its Autumnal form, which fittingly corresponds to the character of its contents, is a collection of "Bergerettes," French romances, and songs of the eighteenth century made by the late J. B. Wekerlin, one of his many such collections, and published by the Oliver Ditson Company. There is an introduction by Frederick H. Martens, and he has translated the text into English. There are twenty songs in the collection.

AT THE METROPOLITAN.

Two operas already sung will be repeated this week at the Metropolitan Opera House, "Lohengrin" on Monday evening and "Un Ballo in Maschera" on Wednesday evening. The casts will be the same as before, that of "Lohengrin" including Mmes. Fremstad and Ober, and Messrs. Urlus, Weil, Braun, and Schlegel, Mr. Hertz conducting, and that of "Un Ballo in Maschera," Mmes. Destinn, Hempel, and Matzenauer, and Messrs. Caruso, Amato, Rothier, and De Segurola, with Mr. Toscanini conducting.

"Siegfried" will have its first hearing this season on Thursday night, with Mmes. Fremstad, Ober, and Alten, and Messrs. Urlus, Griswold, Reiss, Goritz, and Ruysdael, Mr. Hertz conducting.

The double bill, "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci," will be Friday night's attraction, with Mmes. Destinn, Duchene, and Maubourg, and Messrs. Cristalli and Gilly in the former, and Miss Bori and Messrs. Caruso, Amato, Reschiglian, and Bada in the latter. Mr. Polacco will conduct both operas.

"Les Contes d'Hoffmann" is announced for Saturday's matinée with Mmes. Hempel, Aida, (as Giulietta, her first appearance in the rôle,) Bori, Maubourg, and Duchene, and Messrs. Jorn, Gilly, Rothier, Didur, De Segurola, Reiss, Bada, Reschiglian, Rossi, Begue, and Ruysdael. Mr. Polacco will conduct.

Saturday night "Tosca" will be given for the benefit of the Italian Benevolent Institute and Hospital with a cast including Miss Farrar, Mme. Braslau, and Messrs. Martinelli, Scotti, Rossi, Bada, Pini-Corsi, Begue, and Ananian. Mr. Toscanini will conduct.

Josef Hofmann will play at to-night's concert Rubinstein's D minor concerto with orchestra and a group of compositions by Debussy, Rachmaninoff, and Chopin. Miss Louise Cox will sing Micaela's air from "Carmen" and two English songs. Pasquale Amato will sing "Largo al Factotum," from "The Barber of Seville," and several songs. The orchestra, under Richard Hagemann's direction, will play the "Tannhäuser" overture, the ballet music from "Faust," and one of the Schubert-Liszt marches.

COMING RECITALS.

Elena de Olloqui will give a recital at the MacDowell Club, 108 West Fifty-fifth Street, on Monday afternoon, Dec. 8.

MANY EVENTS OF INTEREST PLANNED FOR THE WEEK IN MUSIC

THE Wagner programme which was played by the Philharmonic Orchestra in Brooklyn last Sunday is being reproduced in its entirety this afternoon in Carnegie Hall at the second of the regular New York series of Sunday afternoon concerts. Conductor Stransky has arranged the numbers in chronological sequence, including excerpts from practically all the operas and music dramas. The complete list of numbers reads:

Overture to "Rienzi."
Overture to "Flying Dutchman."
Tannhauser's Pilgrimage, from "Tannhauser."
Prelude to Act III., "Lohengrin."
Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan und Isolde."
Prelude, "Die Meistersinger."
"Ride of the Valkyries," from "Die Walkure."
"Waldweben," from "Siegfried."
Siegfried's Rhine Journey, from "Gotterdammerung."
Good Friday Spell, from "Parsifal."
Kaiser March.

The programme of the Symphony Society of New York under Walter Damrosch is made up for this afternoon of the great C major symphony of Schubert, the manuscript of which Schumann discovered in Vienna in a heap of "old music" Schubert had left behind him at his death; a concerto for violin, piano, and string orchestra by Chausson, which has not been played before in New York, and two short pieces for orchestra by Lalo. Mr. and Mrs. David Mannes are the soloists.

The programme on Friday and Sunday afternoons, Dec. 5 and 7, is to be made up of works of Bach and Debussy, furnishing an interesting contrast. Two of the Brandenburg concertos and a new symphonic suite, "Le Printemps," are among the numbers. Harold Bauer will be soloist.

The second of Nahan Franko's popular concerts will be given in the Hippodrome this evening. The principal soloist will be Wilhelm Bachaus, who is to play Liszt's Concerto in E flat for piano and orchestra. He will also give Liszt's "Liebestraume" and the Schubert-Tausig "Marche Militaire." Cordelia Lee, violinist, will play Vieuxtemps's Concerto in D major and Wieniawski's "Souvenir de Moscow." The third soloist will be Alfredo Ilma, an Arabian baritone, who will sing Wolfram's Address, from "Tannhäuser," and Schumann's "The Two Grenadiers." Nahan Franko and his orchestra are scheduled for four numbers, including works of Bach, Auber, Rossini, and Wagner.

Samuel Baldwin's programme for his free organ recital at City College this afternoon at 4 o'clock includes: Prelude in E flat, Bach; Largo, Handel; Chaconne, Bonnet; Meditation and Melodie, MacDowell; Messe de Mariage, Dubois; Am Meer, Schubert, and Theme and Finale in A flat, Thiele.

On Wednesday afternoon he will play: Fugue in G major, à la Gigue, Bach; air from suite in D, Bach; Sonata No. 2 in C minor, Wermann; Andantino from Fourth Symphony, Tschaikowsky; Ronde Francaise, Boellmann; Berceuse, Shelley, and overture, "Der Freischütz," Weber.

The Educational Chamber Music Society will give its second concert this evening in the Straus Auditorium of the Educational Alliance. Its programme comprises Mozart's Quartet No. 21 in D major, Haydn's Trio No. 30 for piano, violin, and 'cello, and Dvorak's "American Quartet."

The Flonzaley Quartet will give its first subscription concert of the season in Aeolian Hall to-morrow evening. The concert will bring forth a new Suite for violin and 'cello by Emmanuel Moor. The organization will also play Schubert's Quartet in D major, (posthumous,) which contains the variations on the "Death and the Maiden" theme. The closing number is Haydn's Quartet in D major, Op. 64, No. 5.

The second of the People's Symphony Club's chamber music concerts will be given to-morrow evening at Cooper Union Hall. The Kaufman Quartet will play. The first number will be Dvorak's "American Quartet" in F major, Op. 96. Charles Schuetze, harpist, will play in illustration of a lecture on his instrument, Hasselman's "In the Cloister" and Cheshire's "Valse Caprice." The concluding number will be Schumann's piano quintet in E flat, Op. 44, in which Miss Laeta Hartley will play the piano part.

Kathleen Parlow, violinist, will give a recital Tuesday afternoon in Aeolian Hall, assisted by Charlton Keith at the piano. Her programme will include Haydn's Vivace in the arrangement by Leopold Auer, dedicated by him to Miss Parlow, his pupil. The complete programme is as follows:

Concerto D minor	Vieuxtemps
La Folia Variations	Corelli
Nocturne	Chopin-Auer
Vogel als Prophet	Schumann-Auer
Walzer Paraphrase	Hubay
Aria	Goldmark
Vivace	Haydn-Auer
Carneval Russe	Wieniawski

Ada Sassoli, harpist, and Francie Rogers, baritone, will give a joint recital at The Little Theatre Tuesday afternoon, assisted by Isidor Luckstone at the piano. Each of the artists will have two groups of solos, and they will perform a concluding group together. The complete programme contains twenty-one numbers.

Katherine Goodson, the English pianist, makes her first New York appearance this season in recital at Aeolian Hall Wednesday afternoon. Her programme opens with Schumann's "Scenes of Childhood," and Brahm's sonata in F minor, Op. 5, is the second number. A group of five Chopin numbers follows, and the recital concludes with Schumann's romance in F sharp minor, Gernsheim's "Aeolus," and Tschaikowsky's "Valse des Fleurs," (Casse Noisette,) in the arrangement by Grainger.

Nevada von der Veer and Reed Miller will give a joint song recital at Aeolian Hall Wednesday evening. The programme begins and ends with duet numbers, the first being Bach's "Wohl mir, Jesus ist gefunden," and the last "A Book of Verses," (Omar Khayyam,) by Bantock. Each of the artists has two groups of solos, among them Mme. van der Veer singing for the first time here Ulmer's "Waldseligkeit" and "Glaube Nur."

The second pair of Boston symphony concerts will be given this week in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist at both concerts. The programme for Thursday evening has but two numbers, Mahler's Symphony in C sharp minor, No. 5, and Tschaikowsky's Concerto for Violin in D major. The Mahler symphony was last played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York in February, 1906, when Mr. Gericke was conductor. Dr. Muck revived it in Boston last Spring, and it has just been played again in that city. The symphony comes first on the programme.

The programme for Saturday afternoon will not be the one announced a week ago, as Dr. Muck has made a considerable change in it. A large number of the Saturday afternoon subscribers have written both to Dr. Muck and to Mr. Kreisler asking that the Beethoven Concerto be played instead of the Mozart and Viotti concertos. Both of them have consented to make the change and the programme for Saturday afternoon now comprises Haydn's Symphony in G Major, No. 6; Handel's Concerto for Two Wind Choirs, Mozart's Overture to "The Magic Flute," and Beethoven's Concerto for Violin in D Major.

Franz Egénieff, the German baritone, makes his first appearance in New York at a recital in Aeolian Hall Thursday afternoon, assisted at the piano by Jeno Kerntler, a Hungarian composer-pianist. The baritone will open his programme with a group of four songs by Hugo Wolf. Other composers on his programme are: Loewe, Schumann, Hubert Pataky, Hans Hermann, Tschaikowsky, Debussy, and Augusta Holmés. He also sings a song, "Farewell," by Kerntler, his accompanist.

The Longy New York Modern Chamber Music Society will give its second concert Saturday evening at Aeolian Hall. The programme opens with Emmanuel Moor's Suite, Op. 103, for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon, two violins, viola, 'cello, and bass. The second number is Henry Woollett's Sonata in C sharp minor for 'cello and piano, and the last is Jean Huré's Pastorale for three flutes, oboe, English horn, two clarinets, horn, two bassoons, and piano.

The Oratorio Society of New York (Louis Koemennich, conductor) will give its first concert of the season Friday evening at Carnegie Hall, performing for the first time in New York Georg Schumann's oratorio, "Ruth." The soloists are Florence Hinkle, Mildred Potter, Putnam Griswold and T. Foster Why. The orchestra will be the New York Symphony.

As rapidly as possible to meet the increasing demand the Board of Education is opening more of its public high school buildings for free Sunday afternoon organ recitals. This Sunday the Girl's High School, Nostram Avenue and Halsey Street, Brooklyn, will be opened and the recital will be given by Jules S. Joannes. Gottfried H. Federlein will give another recital at Ethical Culture School, Sixty-fourth Street and Central Park West, Manhattan, and Paul Martin, Jr., will give one at Morris High School, Boston Road and 165th Street, the Bronx.

During the week there will be a number of special lecture recitals upon national songs. Following is the entire week's programme:

Sunday Evening—"Die Walküre," illustrated with selections, by Mrs. Mary Hill Brown at Public School 101, 111th Street west of Lexington Avenue.

Monday—"Composers and Music of America," Clarence De Vaux Royer, Public School 46, 126th Street and Briggs Avenue.

Thursday—"Russian Folk and Peasant Songs," illustrated by songs, by Edward Bromberg, Public School 100, 138th Street and Fifth Avenue.

Friday—"Welsh Music," Mrs. Mary E. Cheney, illustrated by songs, Public School 66, Eighty-eighth Street east of First Avenue.

Egon Pütz, pianist, will give a recital in Aeolian Hall Thursday evening, at which the programme will be entirely from Chopin. He will have three groups of the Polish composer's compositions, beginning with the Ballade in G minor and ending with the Polonaise in A flat.

CENTURY OPERA HOUSE.

Gounod's "Faust" will be sung by the Century Opera Company, under the direction of the Messrs. Aborn, at the Century Opera House for the week beginning with Tuesday night's performance.

The artists who will sing the opening performance of "Faust" will be Beatrice La Palme as Marguerite, Herbert Waterous as Mephistopheles, Kathleen Howard as Martha, and Walter Wheatley as Faust. Mr. Chalmers will sing the rôle of Valentine, and the Wagner will be Hugo Schussler. The alternating artists will be the Misses Ewell, Scott, and Jordan, and the Messrs. Bergman, Kaufman, and Kreidler.

The usual popular Sunday night concert will take place this evening with the Misses Carson, Ewell, La Palme, and Coughlan, and Messrs. Hawksley, Kingston, Kreidler, and Wheatley singing arias from the standard operas.

BROOKLYN MUSICAL EVENTS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second appearance in Brooklyn Friday evening in the Academy of Music. The soloist will be Fritz Kreisler, who will play the Tschaikowsky Concerto.

The orchestral feature of the evening will be a novelty, "La Tragedie de Salome," by Florent Schmitt. Schmitt is an Alsatian by birth, but French by inclination and training, and he belongs to the newer school of composers. His "Salome" was inspired by the poem of Robert d'Humières. The work is in two parts, the first being in two sections and the second three. The first section is a prelude and a "Dance des Sept Voiles"; the sections of the second part are respectively, entitled "Les encheantements sur la Mer," "Dance des Guerriers," and "Dance de l'Effrol." The work was written in 1907, and is dedicated to the Russian composor, Igor Stravinski. Dvorak's "Husitska" overture is the concluding number of the programme.

Kathleen Parlow, violinist, and Wilhelm Bachaus, pianist, will give a joint recital this afternoon in the Opera House of the Academy of Music. They will play together for the opening number Grieg's violin sonata in C minor. Each artist has in addition two groups of compositions, one of Mr. Bachaus's consisting entirely of Chopin pieces. Charlton Keith will be at the piano for Miss Parlow.

The New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch conductor, will give a concert in the Academy of Music Saturday afternoon. Harold Bauer, pianist, will be the assisting artist.

The Flonzaley Quartet will give three chamber music concerts in the Music Hall of the Academy of Music on Sunday afternoons at 3:30 o'clock. The dates are Dec. 7, Feb. 1, and March 8.

Under the auspices of the People's Institute of Brooklyn concerts will be given this afternoon by the Tollefsen Trio at Manual Training High School, and this evening by the Philharmonic Trio at Commercial High School.

WITH THE CONCERT-GIVERS.

The two New York subscription concerts of the Barrere Ensemble are scheduled for the afternoons of Dec. 15 and Feb. 2. The first of these will enlist the ensemble co-operation of Carolyn Beebe, pianist. At its second concert the organization announces for its assisting artist Mme. Gerville-Reache, contralto.

Fritz Kreisler will give his second recital in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, Dec. 13, at 2:30. The programme will be announced later.

The programme to be sung at the Christmas concert of the Musical Art Society on Tuesday evening, Dec. 16, will offer new music of interest. Several numbers present the same melody used for the folk song and for the companion chorale, offering a comparison.

The Max Jacobs Quartet will give the first of its subscription concerts at Carnegie Lyceum next Sunday afternoon. The composers represented are Mozart, Jan Brandts Buys, Vitali, and Glazounow.

Samuel Mensch, pianist, will give a recital at Aeolian Hall on Wednesday evening, Dec. 10. His programme will include several modern compositions along with the classical.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Holden Huss will give a joint song and piano recital at Aeolian Hall on Wednesday afternoon, Dec. 10.

Mme. Nina Dimitrieff, soprano, and Vladimir Dubinsky, 'cellist, will give a joint recital at Aeolian Hall next Sunday evening. Mme. Dimitrieff will sing several new songs and Mr. Dubinsky will play a Serenade Espagnol by Glazounow for the first time.

FASHIONS OF THE DAY OFFER A GOWN FOR EVERY TYPE

TWO EVENING GOWNS WHICH SHOW MANY FEATURES OF THE NEW FASHIONS

THE illustration shows two evening gowns that embody many of the new fashions—the skirt that is full through the hips and narrow at the ankles, the transparent bodice, the ruffled tunics, the square and pointed neck and the wide girdle. The gown on the seated figure is made of purple satin. The bodice is made of yellow tulle, with pearl embroidery, and a girdle and tunic of velvet-stamped chiffon in purple and yellow. The gown on the standing figure is all white—a combination of satin, lace and tulle. The girdle, draped up at the front, is made of cherry red messaline.

CLOTHES are more interesting when women begin to wear them than when they are shown by the dressmakers, or heralded in the newspapers. It is the old difference between theory and practice. The abstract value of clothes is more interesting to the man who has his money in them than to the woman who is going to put her money in them.

To see the new fashions on women as they walk and visit, and dance and dine, is like seeing an experiment applied to a useful purpose. Not until this is done can you say whether the idea in the beginning was right or wrong.

It is a pity that one cannot wait until now to buy clothes, for one could avoid so many mistakes. The trouble is that one is usually compelled to buy earlier in the season and take the chance of being wrong. There is not time to rectify mistakes now, unless one has had the good luck to be able to wear clothes of last Spring until the first snow flies. There are few women who can practice this economy in these days of changing fashions, when the coat of six months ago is bound to be somewhat old-fashioned, and the sleeve and the skirt needs alteration at every point.

There are women who have the opportunity and the foresightedness to buy clothes that are in advance of a popular fashion, and therefore are abreast of it later in the season.

Danger in Early Choosing.

The defect in this system is in the liability to choose a fashion that will become over popular and therefore is not desired. Altogether taking it by and large, the question of expending much money on many clothes is a serious one. There were days when a bride could buy a trousseau that would last for two years, and in such days the problem of buying clothes was not so difficult and irritating.

Yet, it is we, ourselves, who have brought about the change in this condition. We would not, if we could, go back to that phase in dress. We do not want to have the fashion in large or small things remain quiescent. We want to be entertained with gossip of clothes, with the temptation to buy, and with the actual purchasing of new things.

Life would seem monstrous dull to the average American woman if the shops did not call to her for two years at a time. She is not absorbed as in other days by the details of housekeeping. She does not make preserves and study the cook book. Half the time she lives in an apartment house, or if her city is not large enough for this mode of life, she has made sufficient use of the manifold labor saving devices that relieve her from the pressure of drudgery. She therefore has much time upon her hands for something beside providing for food and sleep.

The contemplation of clothes either for herself, or in the shops or on other women, takes up quite a good bit of this leisure, no matter how much the world reformers may scold.

The inventions of man and the industry of man have eliminated two-thirds of the kind of work women used to do, and the efficiency method of having various people do things well for you has left women little to do themselves; so there must be leisure. Now, what to do with it!

Some women must work, either as a means of living or as a means of using up their vitality. All women are not inclined to mental study and recreation. They do not wish to read all the time. So what will you? Granted that they do everything that is required of them, there is, under the modern manipulation of things, still more time for either clothes or society.

Usually, both of these factors enter into every life, but there are some who do not have the opportunity for social enjoyment, and clothes takes its place.

The Clothes Women Wear.

All of which—meaning the discussion above—has nothing to do with the hang of a skirt and the cut of a coat. The vital question concerns the way women look. Do they wear the new clothes well? Are their figures changed very much from what they were last Winter? How do these minaret tunics and transparent bodices and narrow skirts, long coats, brilliant waistcoats, small hats, palm tree trimming, colored shoes, and fancy hosiery look, all jumbled together in a pot-pourri of the epochs?

One would think that a woman would look like a Mardi Gras in a mixture of styles; but she doesn't. Woman is a versatile creature and can do much with herself, yet manage to stop just short of absurdity. And yet, after all, some women do look absurd even with the best intentions to do otherwise. There are women with old-fashioned types of faces and figures which are altogether charming, but which should be emphasized and reflected, as it were, in their clothes.

You may say that it is not possible for a woman to wear unfashionable gowns to-day and not make of herself a target for unpleasant criticism. But there you are wrong, in part, if not in whole. The fashions themselves offer a gown for every temperament as well as for every physical type.

Flowered Silks Attractive.

There is nothing more attractive to-day than the flowered silks with looped-up panniers, with a short bodice, a fichu of tulle, a satin rose and long sleeves or tulle ones to the elbow. Add to this white silk stockings and black velvet slippers; part the hair and roll it flatly against your head, then swing a small single piece of jewelry around the neck by a silken cord, and you have a costume that would reflect the most demure type of woman, and at the same time be in the very forefront of fashion.

The consensus of opinion is that if a woman studies the relation of clothes to her own temperament ever so little and tries to reflect her character and attitude of mind in her apparel, she will be successfully dressed. And this is the new cult in clothes, and this is why—if you wish to get at the secret of things—this is why there are so many fashions abroad in the land.

Mingling the New Fashions.

On second thought, it may be better to save any philosophic comments on dress to such time as fashions wane. It was a dull period from Christmas day until the first of February, and if we do not have news in those weeks, at least we have much to say on the kind of clothes women should wear instead of those they do wear.

Each hour now brings out a new bit of gossip anent clothes, and each week sees the verification of a rumor, or the startling assurance that we are soon to have something quite different from what has gone before. So let us look at the subject quickly, as one who is dealing in facts and not theories.

I will give you snapshots of all the new things that are being seen in the theatres and in the shops and in the restaurants, and, although they may appear kaleidoscopic, still you may be able to see them as they really appear, simply because they have few characteristics of broken bits of colored glass in mass.

Few Curves in Figure.

To begin with, there is the figure. It is all that it promised to be in the beginning of the Summer. There are as few curves as possible, and yet there is not enough solidity or pressure upon the figure for a sharply drawn outline. You slouch and bag and pouch and slop over and act as though you didn't care, and as though you had never heard of physical culture. And yet, against all the evidences of the corsetless figure which is obtained by rubber and elastic corsets, there is an undercurrent running strong for a corset that more definitely outlines the figure.

But we speak of the present, not of the future. The minaret tunic, or the lamp shade tunic, as Americans call it, is accepted in many forms except the original one. Sometimes there are two or three, each standing further out from the figure than the other one.

Sashes and girdles of every kind are used lavishly. There are few coats or skirts and blouses that do not have a belt, and on evening gowns the girdle is an important feature. The noticeable feature is the tendency toward lengthening the waist with these adjuncts. When a two-inch belt is placed on a jacket it is arranged in some way to give the appearance that the waist line is half way toward the hips.

On the new kind of blouses which are cut like waistcoats there is a narrow belt across the back which is placed half an inch below the normal and is held in enough to let the fullness of the blouse sag over it.

The deep-waisted girdle is used to hold down the fullness of a minaret tunic, and sometimes the depth is sufficient to form a yoke. Skirts used with walking suits which are slightly gathered across the front of the belt have their fullness held down by a one-inch belt of cloth or velvet. The belt is dropped below the waist line and runs on a bias line to a point in front, where it is finished with a small buckle.

Variety in Sleeves.

You are allowed a wear a sleeve to the knuckles in your ball gown, if you so desire. This is one of the dress features that strikes the observer at every turn. And if your arm is good, you can do like the ancient Greeks, and, fastening the upper points of your bodice over the shoulder with a small jewel, leave the arm guiltless of covering.

There are sleeves put into regulation armholes, there are pear-shaped sleeves that begin at the neck at a point, and there are wing sleeves of tulle that are held down by jeweled tassels. One of the good-looking sleeves is of chiffon from armhole to elbow, say in dark blue, and in velvet from elbow to wrist, say in deep red. Both parts of this sleeve are wrinkled.

There is another arm covering that resembles the huge sleeve worn by the Russian priests, and it is possible that the idea was suggested by the priests' garments. The wing sleeves on evening gowns are a year old, and this is against them in the minds of those women who search for something new every month, and who do not believe that they are well dressed unless they represent a phase of the fleeting fashion.

Neck a la Japanese.

When the Japanese collar made its appearance it was quickly adopted because the variety of women who wanted their gowns cut high in the back was astonishingly large. And it represented something that had not been done before, or rather in the near past. At the present moment it is in fashion as much as ever, and its rivals are the high rolling collar that runs to a deep point in front and the ultra Japanese collar that stands away from the neck about half way between it and the arm.

This is exceedingly new and so far it has few followers. Doucet uses it in an exaggerated manner because he outlines it with a reed which holds it up and out like a little hoop skirt waving to and fro over the shoulders.

Ruches have not gone out of fashion. They are worn in many forms and serve to soften many hard lines. It is probable that they will be desired as long as the open neck is worn at every hour in preference to the high one. The fichu effect of folded net or lace or tulle is one of the best neck arrangements in existence. It covers many structural defects and is an aid to any gown.

Neck Arrangement of Gowns.

The neck arrangement of evening gowns is less puzzling than any other because it is either square or V-shaped and, beyond folds or tulle, there is little to guess about. Probably the neck arrangement for the morning hours in the street is more puzzling than ever, for the open neck is universally fashionable, and yet many women, for many reasons, will not wear it on the street in connection with a rough cost suit. And they are right.

All the modern shirt waists have wide turnover collars that expose most of the neck, and a woman must either adopt these with a net guimpe or pull them outside the coat collar, leaving the neck and chest exposed.

Not all coat suits look well in conjunction with a white net guimpe. For this reason it is the best form of dressing to wear a high collar of muslin attached to the shirt waist or a black satin stock with a white muslin turnover at the top. There has come about a strong inclination for a mannish variety of heavy white silk shirt waist with a stitched yoke, long sleeves with turnover cuffs, and collar to match, under which is run a colored cravat. It is the form of shirt waist worn for sports in the open, and as many women have an athletic appearance they are glad to find an arrangement for the neck that is not only becoming but suitable for a coat suit severely made.

Gay Linings Employed.

Even the Futurist school of dressing quickly died down. It left behind it a desire on the part of many dressmakers to employ colored linings in order to give brilliancy to dark gowns. Therefore one sees to-day deep purple frocks lined with orange satin, and marine blue frocks with purple linings, and white satin house gowns with Japanese red linings.

The fashion is an attractive one under the present rule of turning up the hems of skirts and coats, rolling back the sleeves, and slashing the skirt, and making it shorter in the front than in the back. This is especially helpful to the woman who does not look well in a monotonous procession of sombre colors.

Every woman is not familiar with this clever handling of hems which gives a broken line to a straight surface. It was brought out first on walking skirts, then it reached over to evening gowns, and now Poiret has introduced it on coats. If one does not wish to expose a brilliant lining in this upturned hem, one can substitute a lining of dull stripes; and, by the way, these Revolution silks are gaining power every day. They are not only used for linings, but for tunics, for the neck and wrist, and for girdles.

Premet has brought out a one-piece frock of extra thin serge with an apron tunic of dullest red and dark blue striped silk. Another way in which this new fabric is used is in a cache-nez, which someone invented to wear this Summer in cool resorts, and which was speedily copied by the tailors. It is nothing more or less than a wide muffler of knitted silk to match the silk sweater to which it is attached.

At Deauville, at Vichy, at Dinard these mufflers were worn around the neck and chin with one end thrown over the shoulder, and later they were adopted in Paris for cloth suits. They are made of fur now, but more especially of gay colored cloth or velvet or silk. A coat of deep smoky purple will have a cache-nez, which is the French name for it, made of light blue or dull orange.

The Peg-Top Skirt.

There seems no inclination to abandon the so called peg-top skirt, which had its origin in the Turkish skirts made in France last June and received a fresh impetus from the Zouave skirt introduced by Callot in August. It is made in many ways, but the silhouette is always the same; large at the waist and hips and running to narrow dimensions at the foot line.

This silhouette can be accomplished with many materials. Satin, with lace or tulle ruffles, can be used for evening and afternoon gowns, and wide plaits with seams that are cut in and not out, below the knees, serve for the day hours.

FASHION NOTES

FUR is used in many of the small accessories of the early Winter clothes. It is used to edge little lace jackets, of the bolero type, on chiffon and net waists, and it is used to edge the sleeves and necks of other waists of lace, chiffon, crepe de chine and net. It is used as hat trimming in many ways.

A certain green velvet bonnet, with a shirred band about the face, shows a band of black fur over the hat and under the chin, after the fashion of the velvet bridles that are worn on velvet hats.

Evening gowns of diaphanous materials are trimmed with bands and knots and loops of fur, which appear most unexpectedly under folds of lace and net. And many of the heavy street suits show fur collars and cuffs and bands on the skirts.

Embroidered chiffon edging is sold in many of the shops. Some of it is embroidered in white, and some in colors, and it is equally attractive when used as trimming on a chiffon petticoat or when used as trimming about the neck and sleeves of a dainty chiffon blouse.

A space-saving combination is the guimpe and camisole or under bodice in one. The upper part of this garment is a net or lace guimpe, with either high or low neck. The lower part is made of shadow lace, and extends to the waist, to form an under bodice for the house with which the guimpe is worn.

WHAT EVERY WOMAN WANTS TO KNOW

EVENING COATS WHICH CAN BE MADE BY THE HOME DRESSMAKER

THE thing that appeals most to the eye in the new evening coats is the richness and beauty of their color and softness and beauty of the materials of which they are made. The thing that appeals to the economical woman's good sense is that they are so designed that they can successfully be made by the home dressmaker. In the illustration there are some well designed coats that can easily be copied. Gay linings and fur trimmings are an important part of most of the new coats, and both these features are shown in the sketch. The coat on the figure on the left is made of velvet matelasse, in yellow and white, and it is lined with yellow satin. The collar and cuffs are made of white fur, and white porcelain buttons and yellow satin bound buttonholes close the front snugly. There is a deep yoke, back and front, with which the sleeves are cut in one piece. The yoke is put on with a cording of yellow satin. The coat is loosely drawn into a blouse about the hips. The charming cap worn with this coat is made of gold tissue, edged with a band of gilt braid embroidered with blue and gray and yellow. A string of blue beads holds it under the chin. The next coat is made of rose duvetyn, a lovely material, by the way, for evening coats. It is pliable and yet warm, and so answers the needs, both of beauty and serviceableness, of the evening coat. There is a yoke made of a piece of Chinese embroidered silk, in rose color and gold and blue, and black fur outlines the neck and sleeves. Deep blue velvet is the material in which the dark coat is developed. It is lined with salmon pink silk, and it is edged at the neck and arms with soft white fur. This coat is cut like a cape, wrinkled over the arms to form sleeves, the ends of which are outlined with fur. The coat crosses in front and fastens under the right arm. On the extreme right a coat of tan cloth is pictured. It is lined with a gayly flowered silk in cream, brown and rose. The neck and sleeves are edged with brown fur.

Some Approved Methods of Cooking Partridge—Birds Now Raised in Captivity.

THE bird which we call Bob White or partridge answers to the European quail, and forms a dish literally fit for a king. As yet this bird is expensive, but as it is now raised in captivity it soon may be properly classed with poultry birds, and then may finds it way more frequently to our tables.

Here are a few methods of cooking partridges, if you are fortunate enough to be able to obtain any of these delicious little birds.

Smothered Partridge.

Smothered partridges are easily prepared, and as delicious as easy to prepare. Clean the birds and draw them. With a sharp, strong knife open them on the back. Soak them in water enough to cover, to which a teaspoonful of salt for every quart of water has been added. At the end of four hours remove them from the salt water. Dry them and dredge them with flour.

Put a spoonful of butter and a little pepper on each, and moisten them with enough water to keep them from burning. Bake them for three-quarters of an hour, and baste them frequently, so that they will be juicy when cooked. Serve them piping hot, with gooseberry jelly.

Roast Partridge on Toast.

Pick, singe, and remove the heads and legs from plump partridges. Draw them and wash and dry them. On the breast of each put a slice of fat bacon or pork, and sprinkle them generously with salt. Put them in a dripping pan and cook them briskly for fifteen minutes in a hot oven. Have ready a thin slice of well-browned buttered toast for each partridge on a hot platter. When the birds are done slip them quickly on the toast and garnish the dish with crisp watercress.

Fried Partridges.

Dress the partridges and remove the legs and wings. Flatten the breasts as much as possible with the fingers or a little mallet. Roll each bird in flour and fry brown in a tablespoonful each of butter and bacon fat. Then remove the partridges and add two tablespoonfuls of flour to the hot fat.

Next add the liquid from a can of mushrooms and enough veal or chicken stock to make a cupful and a half. Season the sauce well with pepper and salt, and add the mushrooms, cut in small pieces. Put the partridges on a hot platter and pour the hot sauce over them.

RULE CODE FOR OFFICE WOMEN

What the Girl in Business Should and Should Not Do to Make a Success.

SOME few offices suggest the antercoms to a mediaeval dungeon; more resemble a drawing room in which a pink tea is perennially and constantly going on. Most of them, fortunately, strike a happy medium between these two extremes and are, as they should be, moderately quiet and orderly places whose occupants can pursue their given duties without much trouble.

There are certain dos and don'ts that ought to be posted in the mind of every woman who works in an office, for often one woman can change an office, either of the pink-tea type or the dungeon-anteroom type, to the sort of office it should be. One woman, too, can change the orderly, comfortable office into an unorderly or uncomfortable one with astonishing rapidity.

The ideal office, of course, is the one that runs methodically enough so that each worker can go about his or her own work without interruption. It is the one where there is only so much restraint as is needed, to keep the different members of any organization from interfering with each other.

It need not be a gloomy, ugly place, where only monosyllables are uttered and only unattractive clothes are worn. Neither need it be a noisy, ornate place, where chattering interferes with the click of the typewriters and frou-frous get tangled up in the filing cabinets.

Here is some advice for women who work in offices:

To begin with, a woman need not leave her femininity behind her when she takes her place at her desk. She may be as womanly and girlish as she pleases. There is no reason why she need be an ounce less refined or less dainty than the girl or woman at home.

As to her clothes, they too may be feminine. There is no reason why a woman should wear stiff, starched shirtwaists, with stiff, mannish collars and black cravats and ugly, heavy boots, just because she must or will make her own way in the world in an office. Obviously, a satin skirt with a slash and a lampshade tunic, and a blouse of net and lace, are out of place in an office. Gaudy colors, too, are out of place.

But any woman may wear dainty and becoming clothes without running the risk of criticism or misunderstanding, if she wears them in the right way. If she obviously dresses to attract attention, she obviously will get all she wants of it and perhaps a little more.

Society and Business Apart.

Granting that a woman may be her own feminine self in an office, be it said that she must remember that her social life and her business life are two different things. Of course, a woman who has worked for years, who makes her work her life, has privileges that the younger woman has not. The older, more experienced business woman may receive her mail at her place of business, and may receive personal calls there without inconveniencing any one or arousing comment.

But the younger business woman never should receive personal callers in her office. She should have her personal mail sent to her home address, and she should be careful about the number of telephone calls she receives or makes. Some offices, perhaps wisely, have a "No telephoning" rule. Where there is no such rule the office telephone should be used only in case of emergency.

There are several reasons why these no-calls, no-telephoning, no-letters rules are wise.

To begin with, a young woman's employers and associates have much more respect for her if they know she has the good taste to wish to keep her own personal affairs more or less to herself.

For another thing, the employe is obviously paid for her time. The time she gives to telephoning and receiving callers and opening her personal mail is time wasted, from her employer's point of view. The time the telephone operator and office boy give to taking care of her mail, her telephone messages, and her callers is also time wasted, from the business point of view.

In a certain office where by far the greatest number of employes were women, a feeling of freedom from restraint naturally grew up. And in the end this very freedom from restraint led to much wasting of time.

There was one young woman who used to have her shoes shined every morning, after office hours had begun, by the bootblack who made the rounds of the building. The task was done quickly, and she wasted an inappreciable amount of time over it. But others copied her example, and before long there was every morning a long row of dusty shoes waiting for the bootblack.

Then one of the women got in the habit of having Bootblack Joe put her shoe buttons on for her, and replenish her shoelaces. Sometimes, when he would put the buttons on in a way that did not suit her, he would have to do the work over again, and one morning he sat for half an hour in the middle of the floor working over her shoes, while she sat, her attention only half on her work, and the other women in the room hopped around him at their various tasks. In the aggregate fully an hour's time was wasted, as far as the employer was concerned.

Loyalty and Courtesy.

Loyalty to the employer is a first rule of business—or ought to be—with both men and women. If you feel that you cannot be loyal to the firm that employes you, resign your position.

And this feeling of loyalty ought to be called on by the fastidious woman every day to help her over what at first often seem real difficulties.

It is said that the entrance of women into business life has had an elevating influence on offices. The men in offices are almost always courteous and considerate. In the old days perhaps they often swore over their work, but they don't often do so to-day. And if a woman occasionally hears a gentle ejaculation from a man at a neighboring desk, she will find it far better, usually, to call on her sense of loyalty to the people she is working with and for, and close her ears, than to look shocked.

There are not many men like the one who, one day, harassed beyond endurance, said "Darn" over the telephone, and then went about in an embarrassed way and apologized to every woman within hearing. But most men are courteous and thoughtful, and if occasionally they forget the presence of women they are doubtless sorry for it the next minute.

Courtesy ought to play a large part in women's business careers, too. It is really a woman's most potent means of getting ahead. Sometimes it is better than brains, for there seem to be many positions for women in business that demand tact, womanliness, and courteousness.

HINTS ON WEARING OF JEWELS

THE Empress Josephine was noted as a well-dressed woman. It is said that she had the same allowance that Napoleon's second wife, Marie Louise, later had, and that both of these royal ladies patronized the same dressmaker. But Josephine always looked better dressed than Marie Louise.

One of the secrets of Josephine's dressing was simplicity. She always dressed in white muslin and when a great state assembly of men and women in velvet and silk and gold and jewels was gathered together, Josephine would enter the room, dressed in white muslin, and wearing a single jewel. And a hush of admiration would fall on all the gaily clad courtiers present.

Josephine never wore but one jewel at a time, although she loved them and had so many that they would not all get in the large jewel cabinet which had belonged to Marie Antoinette. But Josephine understood the value of wearing only one, so that that one would shine out in all its glory.

Modern women might well take the taste of Josephine as a guide for their own taste in the matter of jewels.

The hand that is laden with rings containing a dozen diffrent stones is not half so attractive as the hand that is decked out with stones of only two kinds. And when jewels of one sort are worn in the hair, another sort about the neck, and still others on the arms and fingers, the effect loses force.

Certain stones can be effectively combined. Diamonds look well with almost any other stone. Pearls can be safely worn with most other stones. And occasionally stones of two strongly contrasting colors can be worn together.

But remember that a single jewel, carefully chosen, is more effective than half a dozen picked out at random.

DOINGS AND SAYINGS IN THE REALTY WORLD

LATEST DEALINGS IN THE REALTY FIELD

Bing & Bing Buy Upper Park Ave. Corner—West 57th St. Dwelling Changes Hands.

MANY SUBURBAN DEALS

Bronx Parkway Commission Takes Title to Twenty Acres at Hartsdale for About $100,000.

Park Avenue furnished the realty market with a good sale yesterday in the purchase by the operators, Bing & Bing, of the three old three-story dwellings on the southeast corner of Eighty-fourth Street, being 993, 995, and 997 Park Avenue. The plot is 50 by 56 feet. The property was acquired from the Glen Realty Company, and the new owners intend to alter the houses, with stores on the Park Avenue frontage.

In part payment Bing & Bing gave two parcels, one being the four-story dwelling at 61 West Eighty-second Street, 19 by 102.2 feet, adjoining the northeast corner of Columbus Avenue, and the other a plot on the southeast corner of Bradhurst Avenue and 153d Street, 40 by 100 feet.

Carl Levis was the broker in the transaction.

Fifty-seventh Street Sale.

The old four-story dwelling at 32 West Fifty-seventh Street was reported yesterday as having been sold by Herman C. Von Post. The plot is 25 by 100.5 feet, about midway in the block between Fifth and Sixth Avenues. It has been owned by the Von Post family for about forty years and was held at $250,000.

$14,000 for East Side Dwelling.

Frank J. Tyler, executor of the estate of Benjamin Hawker, has sold to William P. McCormick, 141 East Fifty-second Street, a three-story dwelling, on a lot 17 by 100.5 feet, located 100 feet east of Lexington Avenue. The consideration was $14,000.

$100,000 Deal at Hartsdale.

One of the largest transfers of real estate in Westchester County for several months was the transfer yesterday of a parcel of over twenty acres by the Scarsdale Estates to the Bronx Parkway Commission. The strip conveyed included the Italian garden at Greenacres, opposite the Hartsdale station, and a strip of varying width from the Hartsdale station to the White Plains village line. The consideration is reported to be over $100,000.

That the Bronx Parkway will be a wonderful asset to the people of Scarsdale especially is evidenced by the completed plans of the parkway through this section. Wherever the title has been acquired along the line of the Bronx River, the river bank has been cleaned, the dead trees removed, and the land put in presentable condition.

It is the policy of the Parkway Commission to acquire all the lands in the parkway reservation that can be purchased at a reasonable price, and already a large portion of the reserved property has been offered to them, and the titles are being closed ae rapidly as money is available.

Investor Buys Harlem Flat.

The six-story apartment house at 55 to 59 West 116th Street, near Lenox Avenue, has been sold by Samuel Cowen for G. Bogard to an investor. The plot is 50 by 100.11 feet.

Deal in Dyckman Tract.

Thomas L. Reynolds has sold for the Mamaroneck Mortgage and Security Company a vacant lot on 211th Street, east of Columbus Avenue. The purchaser will erect a three-family house.

Bronx Borough.

The three-family brick house at 2,025 Morris Avenue, on a lot 21 by 100 feet, has been sold by Samuel Cowen to Louis Lubitz.

Kurz & Uren, Inc., have sold for Thomas H. Roff, 1,449 and 1,451 Minford Place, two four-story double flats, to an investor.

Heirs Buy Staten Island Estate.

D. T. Cornell has sold for S. Rawson, as referee, the Aylwerd estate on Vanderbilt Avenue, Irving Place and Laurel Avenue, Stapleton, to Katherine M. Aylwerd and William Aylwerd.

Long Island.

A plot of 28½ acres at East Moriches, L. I., near the Great South Bay, has been sold by Harvey B. Newins, President of the Windsor Realty Company, to an investor who is preparing plans to develop the property by the erection at once of several attractive dwellings at moderate cost.

Recent Buyers.

Bertha Gardner is the purchaser of the dwelling at 163 West Ninety-second Street, reported sold recently by the estate of Robert Morrison. The buyer will occupy.

James J. Martin is the purchaser of the five-story flat at 629 West 138th Street, the sale of which by the Edward Waters Construction Company was reported Friday.

Commercial Leases.

Barnett & Co. have leased for Daniel Birdsall the store at 29 East 125th Street to the Tokio Tea Company and the store at 33 East 125th Street to a novelty company.

Realty Notes.

The Turner Construction Company has received the contract for erecting the new Austin, Nichols & Co. wholesale grocery warehouse, which will be built by Havemeyer & Elder at North Third Street and Kent Avenue, Brooklyn. The building will be 440 by 179 feet and six stories high. It will be constructed entirely of reinforced concrete, with heavy floor loads.

The December number of The Real Estate Bulletin, issued by the Real Estate Board of New York, on Dec. 2 will contain an analysis of the New York City budget and the speech of Walter Lindner outlining the effect of the income tax on real estate.

The Real Estate Owners' Protective Association will meet to-morrow night nn the Riverside Theatre building, Broadway and Ninety-sixth Street.

LARGE ESTATES AND HOME SITES ON LONG ISLAND IN GOOD DEMAND WITHIN FEW MILES OF MANHATTAN

Acreage Property for Fine Residences Growing Scarcer in the Brookville, Westbury and Woodbury Sections—Otto H. DWELLING BUILT BY JOHN R. CORBIN AT GREAT NECK ESTATES

Two facts stand out prominently in the history of the Long Island real estate market of the past season. These are, first, that there has been no diminution in the demand for large acreage estates within comfortable motoring distance of New York, and, second, that, owing to the steady improvement in transit facilities building operations are steadily growing in most of the home communities within sixty minutes' ride from Manhattan. The increase in these building operations means that people are buying land for the purpose of immediate improvement.

Throughout the north shore section, including the Westbury, Woodbury, and Brookville districts, the best property is held in large plots and will evidently continue in that state for some time. Every year sees additions to the magnificent country homes in this choice part of the island. In the Brookville district, especially, the growth has been very noticeable. The Piping Rock Club with its new building has played an important part in the high-class development of this picturesque locality.

Among recent purchasers there was Otto H. Kahn, who acquired 350 acres in the Woodbury section, being just south of the Cold Spring Harbor station on the Long Island Railroad, and with a large frontage on the Jericho Turnpike. His property is near the fine estates of Ogden L. Mills, Mrs. H. Rogers Winthrop, and J. Watson Webb, and while no definite announcement has been made, it is generally believed that Mr. Kahn will erect a fine residence on his new farm estate.

It was reported that Mr. Kahn paid close to $1,000 an acre. The increasing demand for choice acreage in the locality has not only taken many fine old farms out of the market, but has materially enhanced the value of the remaining salable farms, and, according to their situation, little is to be obtained anywhere west of Oyster Bay at less than $500 an acre, and property with water frontage is quoted all the way from $1,000 to $5,000 an acre.

For homes that do not seek large acreage, the north shore section of Great Neck, Roslyn, Plandome, Manhasset, and west to Douglaston and Flushing, has witnessed decided progress during the year, and is in line for greater growth. The recent electrification of the North Shore Division of the Long Island Railroad to Port Washington has added to the transit conveniences and the benefits will doubtless be more appreciated next Spring and Summer.

In speaking of present conditions and the outlook in this north shore district, E. T. Reichert, Jr., of the Frind Corporation said:

"We are not surprised at the fact that a number of home seekers and investors at this season of the year are taking advantage of the low-priced offerings in country homes and home sites available in this locality.

"During the last four years there have never been such opportunities as are available to-day in the Great Neck and Port Washington sections. As an illustration, we recently leased a $15,000 house, which has been rented at $1,200 a year, for $60 a month. This and other low prices are due to the fact that many owners have been transferred to other cities through business changes, and others suffered heavy losses in the present financial depression.

"Great Neck has the advantage of being the first town on the north shore, and in land attractions it offers fertile rolling country, fine trees, water views, boating and swimming in Little Neck Bay, artesian water, an eighteen-hole golf course, and, best of all, it is only 26 minutes from the city by electric trains. There are no new houses available to-day at $7,000 to $8,000, the demand for this class of building being constant and large."

One of the latest improvements which shows the effect of increasing population is the erection of a row of three-story brick buildings near the railroad station by Mrs. William R. Grace. There are seven stores in these buildings, and four have just been rented.

Many new homes have gone up this year at Plandome and Manhasset and in both places several choice plots have lately been purchased for improvement with residences costing from $10,000 to $30,000, to be ready for occupancy next season. Further to the east is Huntington, which is beginning to show evidences of active suburban development in the vicinity of the bay and harbor. A new Lie-derkranz clubhouse is now under construction near the station. It will cost $10,000 and will be a prominent addition to the town.

In the more central section of the island, at Jamaica, Kew Gardens, and Forest Hills, the development, if not as rapid as the enthusiasts looked for, has, on the whole, been very satisfactory, and the continued building operations show that the home demand is well sustained. Building has been active throughout the season in the Sage Foundation development at Forest Hills Gardens.

A little to the east, in the development at Kew Gardens, several artistic houses have been completed and occupied. In this tract practically nothing remains unsold, and in some cases the houses have been purchased before completion. Kew is but fifteen minutes from the Pennsylvania station, and is in an attractive section of the Borough of Queens. Kew Gardens surround the station, the tract having a frontage of over a mile on Forest Park and over 1,000 feet on Queens Boulevard, the main thoroughfare for automobiles, which runs directly from the Queensboro Bridge to Kew Gardens.

The increase in building operations in Queens is based primarily on the demand for municipal expansion made necessary by the influx to New York of a quarter of a million of new residents every year; and it is also impelled by a demand for one and two-family houses within the city boundaries. There are thousands of newcomers who must find homes in either houses or apartments whose cost or rent is comportable with their incomes. The result is that parts of Queens, which gave promise five years ago of becoming a large suburban borough, are building up with tenement houses.

The new trolley road between Third Avenue, Manhattan, by way of Queensboro Bridge and Queens (Hoffman) Boulevard, and the city line at Rosedale, will change the territory it penetrates from a suburban to an urban character. This condition is further accentuated by the operation of the Myrtle Avenue elevated line from Park Row through Brooklyn to and beyond Ridgewood in Queens. Ridgewood and Evergreen are being improved with apartment houses. The running time from Park Row by way of the Myrtle Avenue elevated line is thirty minutes, less than the running time between the Battery and Bronx Park.

Corona, Elmhurst, and Woodside have virtually surrendered to one and two family brick houses in rows, while all of the territory immediately adjacent to Long Island City is being improved with tenement houses to meet the demand from the steadily growing industrial population.

The reclamation of the meadow land surrounding Flushing Bay for factory and industrial purposes precludes any but typical city conditions in that vicinity. Much of these meadows is reclaimed, and the remainder is owned by a corporation which sees in the property a logical manufacturing zone of the borough.

The northern half of Jamaica is a home community centre which has been necessitated by the high ridge of land. The best economy for such land is detached house colonies, but even such houses are comparatively costly, as the character of improvement there attests.

Municipal conditions in the greater City of New York are forcing families of moderate means and others who desire suburban home life into Nassau County, just east of the Queens line. The southern half of Nassau is building up rapidly because of the numerous electric lines of the Long Island Railroad operated through it. Floral Park, Hempstead, Rockville Centre, Oceanside, East Rockaway, and Valley Stream afford examples of the extension of the suburban home life of New York City into Nassau County.

At Howard Estates, on Jamaica Bay, several bungalows have been erected by Joseph P. Day, sales agent for the estates. They are equipped with hot and cold water, furnace or steam heat, bath and laundry, and gas and electric light. Some are substantial frame structures with verandas and concrete columns, and others are constructed of concrete and hollow tile.

ARCHITECTS TO MEET.

Annual Convention of American Institute to be Held This Week.

The American Institute of Architects will hold its forty-seventh annual convention in New Orleans on Dec. 2, 3 and 4. An address of welcome to the State will be made by Gov. Luther E. Hall, and an address of welcome to the city by Martin Behrman, Mayor of New Orleans. This will be followed by the address of the President of the Institute, Walter Cook.

Election of officers will take place on Wednesday, Dec. 3. In the evening there will be two addresses on the question of Government fine arts by Henry P. Davis and John M. Parker.

The public is invited by card. On Thursday, Dec. 4, the principal topic of discussion will be the status of the movement for a law to control Government fine arts. The annual dinner will be held on Thursday evening. Among the speakers will be R. B. Mayfield and George H. Terriberry.

Delegates from the New York Chapter appointed to attend the convention are: Robert D. Kohn, Egerton Swartwout, Charles Butler, Lansing C. Holden, William A. Boring, J. H. Freedlander, William Emerson, A. B. Trowbridge, Chester Holmes Aldrich, Kenneth M. Murchison, Louis Ayres, C. B. J. Snyder, Evarts Tracy, Electus D. Litchfield, James Otis Post, A. D. F. Hamlin, Lionel Moses, Charles I. Berg, Julian C. Levi. Alternates—John V. Van Pelt, Wainwright Parish, F. L. Ackerman, William O. Ludlow.

SKYLINE REPORT FINISHED.

Will Probably Be Presented to the Board of Estimate Tuesday.

The report of the Heights of Buildings Commission, appointed by Borough President McAneny to act as an advisory body to the committee of the Board of Estimate, appointed last February, is now ready and will probably be submitted to President McAneny's committee next Tuesday.

Edward M. Bassett, who is Chairman of the commission, announced that there would be a meeting of the members of the latter body to-morrow, at which their report would be carefully gone over. Unless there are to be radical changes in it, which are not expected, the report will be ready for the Board of Estimate the day following.

Mr. Bassett's committee has prepared an exhaustive report. Among the nineteen members of the committee are many prominent architects, real estate men, builders, tax experts, and others who have brought trained faculties to bear on the work. In addition a staff of twenty-five experts has been almost constantly in their employ compiling figures and the necessary data on which they based their report.

It is the general impression that the committee will recommend a "zone" system of building height restrictions, as now employed in many cities abroad.

New West Harlem Library.

A branch of the Public Library will be erected in Manhattan Street, running through to 126th, from plans of Carrere & Hastings, who received the commission last week.

BUILDING CODE HEARING.

Public to Voice Its Opinion at City Hall Next Wednesday.

Final opportunity will be given the public to voice its opinion of the proposed new Building Code at a hearing before the Aldermanic Committee on Buildings in the City Hall next Wednesday morning.

The hearing was announced by the Chairman of the committee, Alderman Herbst. Copies of the report can be procured by applying to P. J. Scully, City Clerk, City Hall, and at the office of the Building Committee, 51 Chambers Street.

Kansas City Tax Values.

The valuation of Kansas City, Mo., this year for taxation, as returned to the City Assessor, is $183,689,401, a gain of $9,445,428 over 1912.

Since the real property is assessed at 50 per cent. of its value, the value of Kansas City is approximately $366,000,000.

Those figures will be subject to changes made by the City Board of Equalization, but the final sum recorded will not vary much from those figures.

Brooklyn's Water Supply.

Brooklyn has now a water supply of 160,000,000 gallons daily. Until strenuous measures were taken recently to reduce the waste consumption, it reached nearly this point. Care and vigilance, however, have reduced the amount used to 110,000,000 gallons daily.

THE WEEK'S REALTY RECORD

Market Shows Slight Improvement Despite the Holiday.

The total number of sales in Manhattan last week was 24, against 22 for the previous week and 28 a year ago.

The number of sales south of Fifty-ninth Street was 15, against 5 the previous week and 6 a year ago.

The sales north of Fifty-ninth Street aggregated 9, compared with 17 the previous week and 22 a year ago.

From the Bronx 15 sales at private contract were reported, against 11 the previous week and 20 a year ago.

The amount involved in the Manhattan and Bronx auction sales last week was $985,466, compared with $636,650 the previous week, making a total since Jan. 1 of $46,575,886. The figure for the corresponding week last year was $594,576, making the total since Jan. 1, 1912, of $42,979,934.

New Taxpayers' Organization.

The Woodstock Taxpayers' Association was organized on Friday evening at a meeting held at the home of Senator Anthony J. Griffin, 851 Cauldwell Avenue. The association's object is to serve the interests of taxpayers and rentpayers of that part of the Bronx centred about the old Woodstock Village, the section being bounded approximately by Westchester Avenue, 166th Street, Prospect Avenue, and Third Avenue.

Dr. Thomas D. Brown was elected Chairman and Arthur Rosenberg Secretary of the temporary organization, which will meet next Friday evening at 3,208 Third Avenue.

SUGGEST CHANGE IN MORTGAGE MARKET

Standard Rules Needed, Says M. Morgenthau, Jr., for Benefit of Realty Owners.

WANT BROAD CO-OPERATION

Committee of Real Estate Board of New York Outlines Plan to Ease Conditions.

The changeable character of mortgage rates and the unfortunate situation in which such a condition places the real estate market have been seriously discussed in many phases recently by the Mortgage Loans Committee of the Real Estate Board of New York, of which M. Morgenthau, Jr., is chairman.

"Instead of having a steady supply of cheap money," said Mr. Morgenthau, yesterday, "such as prevails in European countries, New York real estate is forced to pay rates which fluctuate with every turn of the money market. Instead of having a broad market for securities based on real estate mortgages, the borrower is forced to deal with a restricted number of lenders who are in a position to exact large fees every few years, in addition to a high rate of interest. In my judgment, this condition, more than any one other factor is responsible for the present depression in the New York real estate market."

The committee of the Real Estate Board is now working, explained Mr. Morgenthau, toward formulating a plan whereby the business of the mortgage broker may be placed on a higher plane and establishing a definite code of ethics for mortgage brokers.

With this end in view, it has enlisted the co-operation of those interested in the mortgage business, including the title companies, the mortgage companies, the life insurance companies, the builders and operators who are large borrowers, attorneys and executors of large estates and brokers.

"With the co-operation of the leading men in these various lines who are each interested in the matter from a slightly different angle, it is hoped that definite and lasting reforms will be accomplished," added Mr. Morganthau.

The committee has received several suggestions, said Mr. Morganthau. Some of the things the committee hopes to accomplish are as follows:

First—Increase the supply of money for investment in first-class real estate mortgages. To this end it has been suggested that it should be possible to demonstrate with facts and figures the superiority of these investments, both in safety of principal and in the matter of return. This should be brought to the attention of those controlling large funds for investment in a proper way, to the end that a definite campaign for securing funds for such investments may be immediately undertaken. It is felt that such a campaign can be made especially effective with some large companies which derive a good share of their income from New York real estate interests, such as out-of-town life and fire insurance companies.

Second—Undertake to increase the attractiveness of mortgage loan investments. The best legal talent in the city should be brought to bear on this subject and every conceivable device should be incorporated in our mortgages and lending system to increase the safety of the mortgage to the lender and reduce the expense of the transaction to the borrower. In order to accomplish this the most effective measures thus far suggested are the instituting of quarterly interest payments and the introducing of long-term mortgages. This will eliminate frequent renewal fees, and it is suggested that by arranging these long-term mortgages with annual serial payments, all possible depreciation will be covered, and we will make it absolutely certain that the mortgage can be readjusted without difficulty at maturity.

Third—Introduce here in New York a system of first mortgage serial real estate bonds. Such a system has been in vogue in Chicago for many years. These Chicago mortgage bonds are now being sold in New York. In other words, we have not only failed to tap out-of-town sources of funds for our market, but are allowing a large portion of our limited supply to be diverted to the West. The only real estate bonds which we offer in competition with these Western bonds are not first mortgage bonds at all, but merely bonds secured by equities in real estate, and, therefore, dependent for safety on the management of the corporation issuing them and apt to be of a highly speculative character.

It has been further suggested, added Mr. Morgenthau, that a ready market for these bonds should be made, and this can now be properly arranged with the Real Estate Board of New York.

Besides Mr. Morgenthau, Jr., the other members of the Mortgage Loans Committee are Robert Baker, William S. Baker, William M. Benjamin, Remsen Darling, Herman Leroy Edgar, E. P. Gaillard, William H. Malcolm, Edward D. MacMannus, and Elisha Sniffin.

Want Money for New Schools.

At a special election on Dec. 23 the School Board of White Plains, Westchester County, will offer for approval by the voters propositions calling for an expenditure of about $138,000, including new school buildings at Silver Lake, Chatterton Hill, and near Mott Street. Twelve thousand five hundred dollars additional will be asked for appropriation made some time ago for the new South Side schoolhouse, for which property has been purchased.

Bungalows for Coney Island.

Fred F. Harris of Tuxedo, N. Y.; Frank Corneby and Arthur D. Harris of Athens, Penn., have leased for ten years from Albert C. Herzberg the half block on Mermaid Avenue, between West Thirty-second Street and West Thirty-third Street, Coney Island, which they intend to improve with twenty-one frame bungalows.

STATE BANKING METHOD CRITICISED

Shareholders of Defunct Real Estate Concern Say Liquidation Is Slow and Costly.

34,000 SHARES OUTSTANDING

Shareholders May Receive 40 Cents on the Dollar in Final Settlement of Industrial Savings and Loan Co.

Application was made to the Supreme Court last week by the State Superintendent of Banks for permission to pay in full the general creditors of the defunct Industrial Savings and Loan Company and a 15 per cent. dividend upon the claims of the shareholders.

Judge Cohalan deferred action on the application until the Deputy in charge of the affairs of the company filed with the court an itemized statement of expenditures.

This company which was closely allied with the Columbia Real Estate Company was on June 29, 1912 taken charge of by George C. Van Tuyl, Jr., State Superintendent of Banks for liquidation, pursuant to authority given him under Section 19 of the Banking law of the State of New York.

The process of liquidation has now continued for nearly a year and a half, and claims to the extent of $2,390,850.65 have been filed against the company by creditors and shareholders of which amount the claims of general creditors represent $4,294.23.

There are about 34,000 shares of stock in existence divided among between 3,000 and 4,000 shareholders, and from the present outlook it is expected that they will receive between 40 and 50 cents on the dollar when the final settlement is made.

A Shareholders' Protective Committee represented by Robert W. Thompson has been watching the affairs of the defunct company very closely and claim that there is no liquidation going on, only $5,000 worth of real estate having been disposed of in eighteen months, while the expenses have run up to $127,506.54. Mr Thompson, discussing the matter yesterday, said: "In connection with the application to the court a report was filed by the deputy in charge showing the disbursements made. These disbursements include sums paid for salaries and expenses of the Special Deputy Superintendent of Banks, his assistants and clerks, for rent, taxes, and legal expenses.

One item appears on this account for expenses incurred in obtaining title to certain lots in New Jersey, $34,375.27, and another for real estate expenses of $22,821.16. No further details are given concerning these items, and there is not even an affidavit to show that such disbursements are reasonable or were properly made.

It was hoped that the provisions of the banking law might afford a more economical method of liquidating insolvent companies than the familiar form of receivership, but it is in this instance being again demonstrated that practice departs from theory and that public officials cannot be depended upon to act as economically and efficiently as prudent men do in the management of their own affairs or as is necessary to secure the same results as under the administration of a court officer whose acts and proceedings are subject to objection and review by all interested parties.

Under the mode of procedure adopted not only are expensive delays likely to occur, but in the matter of compromises and settlements there is little or no opportunity to interfere with the discretion given to the State officers, and there apears to be no satisfactory way of compelling them to account to shareholders.

It is true that in all of these particulars the approval of the court is required, but the hearings thus far have all been ex parte, and no one seems inclined to offer protests, or to even keep track of the various proceedings.

Hearings thus far held in the course of the liquidation of assets have been entirely one-sided, and the action of the court formal, as no papers have been presented that were not prepared by the Banking Department or its representatives.

In many instances no one has received notice except the attorney for the company itself, and there being no opposition, in nearly every case the motion has been granted by default. This is what occurs unless the moving papers are incomplete upon their face, or accounts showing unusual disbursements are not itemized.

Thus it may happen that assets can be sacrificed and heavy losses sustained simply because the interested parties cannot fight their battles single-handed or do not feel justified in attempting it.

It appears from the report of the Deputy in charge, B. D. Haight, that there is available for the payment of dividends and claims the sum of $374,302.44 on hand Oct. 1, 1913, while the amount necessary to pay general creditors in full and allow a dividend of 15 per cent. upon the claims of shareholders is $362,179.15.

In June, 1913, property was disposed of at public sale in Bergen County upon which the mortgages aggregated over $800,000. Most of this property was bid in by the Banking Department, the nominal price being some $319,000. An analysis of the reports shows that the real estate holdings of the company have increased from $417,679.59, the figure given in the inventory of June 29, 1912, to $1,264,628.73, which is the figure given as of Oct. 1, 1913.

It also appears that since the Banking Department has assumed control the receipts have been as follows:

Bonds and mortgages	$246,843.24
Real estate	5,554.10
Real estate, miscellaneous	12,038.58
Furniture and fixtures	235.00
Interest	47,385.99
Rent	30,793.00

From which it will be seen that the cash derived from real estate is really a very small item, and that the expense to which the company has been put in acquiring title to its property far exceeds the amount realized from sales.

THE FIRE HAZARD.

Extra Insurance Premiums Paid for Excessive Height.

The great fire hazard of high buildings annually costs the owners of high buildings in New York millions of dollars in the way of extra insurance premiums for excessive height alone. The schedule of the New York Fire Insurance Exchange, according to a study made by the Heights of Building Commission, indicates that these extra premiums amount to thousands of dollars in the case of certain buildings. For the Woolworth Building they total more than $10,000 a year.

In the insurance of fireproof mercantile buildings, the height element is ignored until the ninth story is reached. The extra charge for height on a nine-story building is 1 cent per $100. The charge increases rapidly from that story upward. For a ten-story building it is 2 cents; for a fifteen-story building, 22 cents, and for a twenty-story building, 72 cents.

A surtax is imposed in addition to these charges in the case of those buildings where merchandise is stored on or above the seventh floor. Only sample stocks exempt a building from this charge; the less hazardous stocks subject it to a half rate surtax. In case of the lower buildings this surtax is many times larger than the height charge proper. In a nineteen-story building the two charges are about the same. This stock surtax on the building is 10 cents for a seven-story building, 19 cents for a ten-story building, 44 cents for a fifteen-story building, and 69 cents for a twenty-story building. The onus of this tax no doubt operates in some degree to keep the storing of merchandise below the seventh story in the case of high buildings.

Fireproof office buildings of eight stories and under are free from any height charge. Above that height they are subject to one-fourth the height charges of fireproof mercantile buildings.

Prosperous Realty Year.

The Realty Associates of Brooklyn report for the year ended Oct. 30 shows total income of $1,329,179, an increase of $397,438; net earnings, $741,571, an increase of $40,240, and surplus, $241,017, an increase of $100,083.

PROTECTING THE SMALL INVESTOR

New Laws Advocated at Annual Convention of State Realty Association.

DEFINITION OF REAL ESTATE

Personal Inspection and Investigation the Greatest Safeguard—Laws Extant in Other States.

"Protection Against Fraudulent Advertising of Real Estate" was the subject of an interesting address delivered by Charles C. Grein of Buffalo before the annual convention of the Real Estate Association of the State of New York. Mr. Grein said in part: "This subject is of great importance to the real estate man as well as to the investor. The dictionary defines real estate as follows: 'Real estate, the noun—Land for which real money is asked, and on which taxes are required to be paid. Real estate, the verb—To investigate, consider, and explore land, with a view to purchasing, but without necessarily having the purchase price.'

"We, as operators in real estate, must recognize that many of the people who consume our time do read the dictionary, and do read the second definition, rather than the first, and that they lay particular emphasis on the clause 'without necessarily having the purchase price.'

"In the automobile driven districts it is particularly the fad to go real estate shopping, taking up the real estate man's time without any notion of purchasing. This is a phase of fraud which should be included in the topic, and it is a phase which it might pay us to consider.

"The first exponent of paid-for publicity was Barnum. He said: 'The American people love to be humbugged.' It is a fact that the practice of that able showman did not conform to his precept. His continued success was due to the excellence of his productions. Not a few ambitious emulators of this pioneer have mistaken the cause of his success and endeavor to achieve similar benefits without regard to accuracy.

"The successful merchant of to-day has as his creed, 'Honesty is policy,' but do not let us forget that paper does not refuse ink, that newspapers and magazines are not carried on by charitable organizations and societies, but are carried on by business men for the purpose of printing what the public will read and what the advertiser will pay for. We, therefore, as advertisers, cannot expect all the reforms or housecleanings of the publisher's office to emanate from the publisher.

"The fraudulent swindling schemes that pay the promoter 1,000 or more per cent., and which are practically all profit after deducting the advertising and help accounts, are frequently published alongside of a legitimate real estate man's proposition, which offering when sold will pay him a commission ordinarily of 2½ per cent. This illustrates how the fraudulent advertiser has the handicap over the legitimate.

"The patent medicine advertisement is usually a fake, when it guarantees to cure. The cereal food advertisement is a fake when they claim to be able to make financiers of all who will but partake of it. The real estate advertisement which is a fake can be investigated. There is, therefore, no real occasion for any loss to prospective real estate investors if they will but take time to investigate the proposition.

"To ask a higher price for a property than the banker believes it to be worth is not dishonest. To advertise a piece of property for more than you have paid for it is not dishonest. The owner of real estate has a perfect right to make the price, and the making of the price higher than that of the land in the surrounding territory does not constitute a fraud. The selling of unimproved land with the promise of improvements, which promises are not intended to be kept, is fraudulent. The describing of real estate as adjoining a certain live community, when as a matter of fact the property lies miles away, is fraudulent.

"Most of the frauds practiced by swindlers are not advertised in the newspapers or magazines, but are handled through the mails. The Post Office Department estimates that approximately one hundred millions of dollars are lost annually through fake investment enterprises of various kinds.

"In most instances the concerns show no dividends. The department has been successful in securing many indictments, but by the time the law takes its course it is usually impossible to find any assets. The bird has flown.

"Kansas has a law requiring every agent who sells stock to secure a permit from the State Bank Commissioners before being permitted to do business. Massachusetts and Illinois are considering the passage of a similar bill. California has a law relative to fraudulent advertising.

"Massachusetts passed a law in 1912 covering the proposition, and our own State has passed a law using practically the same form as the Massachusetts law.

"No State or Federal vigilance can fully protect against the mail-order swindler.

"In one of Robert L. Stevenson's essays he half humorously laments the fact that humanity is not all of one consistent piece. If bad men were wholly bad, and good men exceptionally good, how simple would existence be.

"The millennium has not arrived. Many publishers still retain the old-fashioned view that the public is expected to discriminate. When reading these publications it taxes one's ability to derive from the printed word some estimate of the honesty of the advertiser and of the goods advertised.

"Let the members of this association resolve to become a vigilance committee. Let us use such publications as express a willingness to print only such advertisements as will bear scrutiny."

New Club House at Huntington.

The Liederkranz Hall Association of Huntington, L. I., is building a new clubhouse, two blocks from Huntington Station. The building will be of stucco, and will cost $10,000. Among its features will be a theatre seating 800 persons, a ballroom, billiard rooms, &c. The club has a membership of 850. The House and Home Company, which is developing a tract at Huntington adjoining the station, has given contracts for several new houses to be completed within a short time.

QUEENS BUILDING RECORD.

Many New Structures Planned for Summer of 1914.

The Rockaway section of Queens will be provided with a number of improvements at the beginning of the Summer season as a result of action by the local board of Queens last week. Authorization was given for the laying of sidewalks on every street in that section that is not now provided with them.

The building activity recently started in this section continues. Mrs. Anna Bahan will erect ten frame bungalows on Hollywood Avenue north of the Boulevard at Rockaway Beach. Anna Tweedy will erect four two-story frame bungalows and six one-story bungalows on Thetic Avenue, south of the Boulevard, Rockaway Beach. D. Kanossky will erect eight one-story frame bungalows on Neptune Avenue south of the Boulevard, Rockaway Park. H. L. Wilson will erect a number of two-story frame cottages on Hollywood Place, north of Carleton Avenue, Far Rockaway, at a cost of $4,000 each.

The Richmond Hill Development Company will start a development in the Kew Garden section by the erection of two and a half story frame dwellings of pretentious design to cost $6,000 each on Abingdon Road, east of Willow Street, and in the same district John H. Turton will erect similar dwellings on Metropolitan Avenue east of Lefferts Avenue at a cost of $6,000 each.

The Liberty Avenue Building Corporation will erect two and a half-story frame dwellings on Woodhaven Avenue, south of Dalrymple Avenue, Woodhaven, at a cost of $2,500 each. Thomas Daly will continue his extensive Corona development by the erection of two-story dwellings on Benjamin Street, north of the Shell Road, at a cost of $3,800 each.

The Ring-Gibson Company will erect several four-story brick stores and tenements on the Fresh Pond Road at Woodbine Street, Ridgewood, at a cost of $14,000 each, and the G. X. Matthews Company will erect three-story tenements on Madison Street west of Woodward Avenue, Ridgewood, at a cost of $9,000 each. J. & G. Burkhard, who are among the largest operators in the Ridgewood section, will erect six two-story brick dwellings on Charlotte Place, south of Millwood Avenue, Evergreen, at a cost of $24,000.

The Sage Foundation Company has planned one of its most important developments for Greenway, North, near Slocum Crescent, Forest Hills, where will be erected four dwellings of a new style of architecture of brick and tile to cost $21,000 each.

FAVOR CO-OPERATION.

United Real Estate Owners' Associations to Work with City Officials.

Co-operation with public officials was the keynote of the speeches at the installation of officers of the United Real Estate Owners' Associations held at the Grand Union Hotel.

The New President, Henry Bloch, in his outlining of the programme of the associations for the ensuing year said: "We must be progressives, never reactionaries. Do not let us oppose expenditures by the city solely because they mean higher taxes. If the expenditure is for a necessity and is timely, let us encourage the official urging it.

We should assist and co-operate with public officials whenever possible. Let our work be of a constructive nature. The attention of all citizens should be directed to the need of obtaining new sources of city revenue and to the extravagant policy of the city in issuing corporate stock in payment of temporary improvements and salaries.

The united associations include the oldest as well as the largest of the local taxpayers' associations in the country. The Tenth Eleventh, and Seventeenth Ward Taxpayers' Association was organized over forty years ago by conservative Germans, and the Twelfth and Nineteen Ward Association, which has also celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary, has an active membership of over 500 owners of property.

The members elected to the Board of Counsel are Adolph Bloch, Frank E. Carstarphen, Michael J. Horan, Alphonse G. Koelble, Charles F. Leining, Harold M. Phillips, and Hyman Pouker.

The new Board of Directors is composed of the following delegates:

Twelfth and Nineteenth Ward Association—Henry Bloch, Charles W. Eldt, Charles H. Schnelle, Arthur G. Muheker.

Tenth, Eleventh, and Seventeenth Ward Association — John Becker, Thomas Krekeler, Charles R. Sommers.

Harlem Property Owners' Association—Harry Gierhoff, Isaac Hyman, Dr. Abraham Korn.

Real Estate Owners' Protective Association—Joseph B. Schwab, L. Victor Weil.

Eighteenth and Twenty-first Ward Association—Charles J. F. Bohlan, John Miller.

Greater New York Taxpayers' Association—Meyer Goldberg, Charles S. Meyerson.

South Bronx Property Owners' Association—Henry Eggert, Sigmund Feust, Henry F. A. Wolf.

Murray Hill Taxpayers' Association—Pierre M. Clear, Michael J. McCauley.

W. Forbes Murray is recorder of the association.

Sale of Pennsylvania Zone Plot.

The plot, 102.11 by 98.9, located at 223 to 231 West Thirty-eighth Street, between Seventh and Eighth Avenues, and occupied by five four-story tenements, is scheduled to be sold at public auction at Supreme Court partition sale on Wednesday, Dec. 3, next. The sale will be held in accordance with instructions from Harry N. Wessel, Esq., referee, at the stand of Joseph P. Day, at noon, at the Vesey Street salesroom. On the same day at the Bronx Exchange salesroom, 3,208 Third Avenue, Mr. Day will offer at Supreme Court sale the subway corner plot located at the northeast corner of Jerome Avenue and Southern Boulevard, (200th Street.) Cambridge Livingston is the referee in the action.

Cleveland to Build Model City.

A "model city" is to be built by Cleveland, Ohio, which city, as announced, will go into the real estate business on a huge scale, using a 93-acre tract just on the outskirts. It is hoped by those in charge that a perfectly mapped out city in embryo will be the result, because arrangements and naming of streets, parkage, sanitation, and every detail will be planned by the best experts.

Homes that would be sold by a private real estate corporation for at least $3,000 will be erected on the plots. They will be sold to 500 Cleveland workingmen for $2,000, and the terms of payment will be within the reach of any steady, industrious worker.

NEW YORK HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS

How They Will Effect the Development of the City's Waterfront Property.

TO COST ABOUT $15,000,000

Wharfage and Warehouse Facilities Have Not Kept Pace with Commerce of Port of New York.

The beneficial effect the proposed $15,000,000 New York Harbor improvements will have upon the city and State was described by former Congressman William S. Bennet at a meeting of the North Side Board of Trade last Wednesday evening.

The speaker said: "An orderly presentation of the case requires, first, a concise statement of what the new project for New York Harbor development is, and the state which it has reached. The project recommended comprises a through channel thirty-five feet deep through the entire East River, including Hell Gate, and into Long Island Sound; a thirty-foot access to East River wharves on both sides of the river as far north as Queensboro Bridge, excepting for the area covered by Shell Reef, which is to be removed to a depth of twenty-five feet; a twenty-foot access to wharves east of Blackwell's Island, the removal of the Corlears Reef, of the Rhinelander Reef, and the Port Morris Shoal, and the completion of the channel between North and South Brother Islands, and the channel south of South Brother Island.

"The total estimated cost of the improvements is $15,000,000. So far there is simply a favorable recommendation from the Secretary of War, but this is a very important step, as Congress never acts on a project of this size without first receiving a favorable recommendation from the War Department."

"No doubt the next step will be to obtain from Congress the approval of the project and the authorization of appropriations for it, and, after that, it will be in order to obtain the annual appropriations as they are needed, which, if the authorisation is once obtained, will not be especially difficult.

"The conditions which the adoption of this project will remedy are those conditions in the East River such as shoals, submerged rocks, dangerous reefs, &c., which have rendered the foreshore of the East River inaccessible to modern vessels. The conditions in the East River have been such that the dangers and uncertainties of navigation, even in the main channels, especially at Hell Gate, have combined to minimize the usefulness of one of the main entrances to the port, and its foreshore. Naturally, this disproportionately enhances the attractiveness and value of the west side of Manhattan.

"If the wharves on the Hudson River were sufficient for the commerce, the condition of the East River, though regrettable, would be of interest chiefly to the owners of property adjacent to the piers, but the fact is that since 1898 commerce into the Port of New York has increased 130 per cent., while during the same period the wharfage facilities have increased less than 30 per cent.

"The Hudson shore of Manhattan is now fully utilized, and the improvement of the East River becomes a pressing necessity, unless we are to consent that the traffic into New York shall be limited not by the demands of commerce, but by the wharfage facilities which we can offer, and therefore to further consent, while we sit idly by, to see our commerce driven by the necessity of the case to Norfolk, Baltimore, and Philadelphia on the south and to Boston on the north.

"The request for this $15,000,000 appropriation is not at all disproportionate to the traffic of the port or to what has been expended by the general Government in our harbor development. Much more than one-third—more nearly one-half of the total water-borne commerce of the United States—is conducted in the Port of New York. Almost one-half of the entire foreign commerce of the whole country passes into and out of the Port of New York. Sixty-two per cent. of the customs revenues are collected at that port. About one-eighth of the manufacturing of the whole United States is within the metropolitan district of New York. It is the one great national gateway for the commerce of the nation, on which account every approach to its harbor should be so improved as to afford the maximum depth and safety for vessels of every known type.

"Each month the population of the metropolitan district, including Newark and Jersey City, has increased about 17,000. Let us assume that this increase should stop. When it stops, business expansion stops, for business expansion cannot occur without additional people. When business expansion stops, business stagnation begins, and then the enterprising and the foresighted commence to seek other fields of activity, and with that comes a decrease instead of an increase.

"New York City must either continue to expand or commence to contract. It cannot continue to expand unless occupation is promised for those who are to come, and occupation is almost absolutely dependent upon transportation. This question of transportation is divided into questions of land and water transportation, and the question of water transportation is again divided into those of transatlantic and inland."

Homeseekers at Belle Harbor.

Walter Schulze, President of the Belle Harbor-Edgemere Realty Company, reports the recent sale of building plots to Kathryn B. Shaules, Peter Kuntz, Anna M. Stines, Theresa A. O'Brien, Lydia A. Magrath, Wilson G. Cornell, Mathilda and Louisa Bantle, Emma Wiedemann, Mary E. Hutchings, and Hans J. and Anna E. Fallesen. Two large auction sales were held during the Summer, both of which were very successful. These sales have given impetus to the building operations at Belle Harbor.

A Remarkable Record.

Talk about inland navigation—a waterway comparatively unknown outside of the limits of New York is Newtown Creek, and yet Newtown Creek had a commerce in 1910—the last records available—of $139,000,000.

TWO BIG FAILURES.

Security Co. and Harry Schiff's Co. In Receiver's Hands.

Depressed market conditions caused two of the largest failures of the year last week. The New York Real Estate Security Company, with sixty-six realty holdings in Manhattan and the Bronx valued at about $25,000,000 was put into bankruptcy through an action for non-payment of a loan, and a receiver was appointed for Harry Schiff, the west end builder, owing to his inability to borrow money to carry to completion his extensive operations.

The New York Real Estate Security Company owns the twenty-story office building at 42 Broadway, running through to New Street. The bulk of its holdings were elevator apartment houses on the upper west side and in the Bronx. The company's 6 per cent. bonds are in the hands of investors all over the country.

The company was formed in 1908, with a capital of $3,950,000. Its officers are Thomas B. Hidden, President; W. E. G. Gaillard, Vice President; Legare Walker, Treasurer; Charles R. McCarthy, Secretary. The directorate is made up of the officers and C. E. Bateson, C. F. Lens, O. B. Hill, H. P. Rice, and N. J. Mitchell. James N. Rosenberg was appointed receiver by the court.

Mr. Schiff's affairs, as represented by the West Eighty-second Street Realty Company, were placed in the hands of J. Clarence Davies as receiver. The alleged insolvent company owns, besides the Cleburne, a new apartment building, uncompleted, at the northwest corner of Broadway and Ninety-fourth Street, mortgaged for $185,000; the former Bloomingdale Reformed Church building on West End Avenue, between 106th and 107th Streets, valued at $210,000; the building at the corner of Ninety-sixth Street and West End Avenue, valued at $285,000, and 570 lots at Roselle Park, valued at $150,000, and mortgaged for $75,000.

NON-SLIPPERY ASPHALT.

California Man Heats Pavement's Surface, Then Applies Sand.

The Superintendent of Street Repairs of San Francisco, Cal., has hit upon a method of removing the chief objection to asphalt pavement. Commenting on this new discovery, Engineering News says:

"The method of rendering the pavement less slippery is by heating the surface of the asphalt and then applying a layer of coarse sand, which is rolled into the pavement. This sand affords a sufficiently rough surface to enable horses to keep their footings and automobiles to pursue a straight course in wet weather. Experiments with this paving on Fell Street, between Baker and Scott, and on Scott Street, between Fell and Waller, have proved so satisfactory that the city officials have decided to extend its use to other parts of the city."

Contract for Big Warehouse.

Contracts to construct a warehouse of reinforced concrete construction for the wholesale grocery firm of Austin, Nichols & Co., in Williamsburg, which will be one of the largest structures of its kind in the East, has been given to the Turner Construction Company.

The building, plans for which were made by Cass Gilbert, will be five stories, 170x450 feet in base area, and is to be built in the old Brooklyn Eastern District Terminal property, on Kent Avenue and North Third Street, for the grocers by the Havemeyers, who own the realty and leased it with the proposed building for a long period to Austin, Nichols & Co.

Tenements at Auction.

Bryant L. Kennelly will sell in the Vesey Street Salesroom next Wednesday for the estate of Rudolphine Rust, 318 Second Avenue, 75 feet north of Eighteenth Street, four-story brick tenement on lot 21.8 by 100. On Wednesday, Dec. 10, he will sell 114 West 122d Street, 171 feet west of Lenox Avenue, a three-story brick dwelling; also 130 and 132 Alexander Avenue, 41 feet south of East 134th Street, Bronx, two four-story brick tenements; the same day D. Phoenix Ingraham will sell 516 East Eighty-sixth Street, a five-story brick double tenement on lot 25 by 102.2.

Brooklyn Awards Excessive.

The awards made for waterfront property in Bay Ridge, between Fifty-seventh and Sixty-first Streets, are regarded as excessive by the Corporation Counsel, and he will oppose the confirmation of the awards in the Supreme Court, provided the whole proceeding to condemn the property be not abandoned, as Dock Commissioner R. A. C. Smith has officially recommended to the Board of Estimate.

Fordham Manor Sale on Calendar.

The Title Guarantee and Trust Company, which has made a policy for several years of issuing an artistic calendar with a historical illustration of early New York days, has continued this plan for 1914, and the calendar for the forthcoming year maintains the reputation of its predecessors. The large colored illustration depicts the posting of the notice of sale of the Manor of Fordham on the door of Parish Church, giving notice of the intended application to the Council and General Assembly for permission to dispose of 5,332 acres to support its minister.

HOW TO HANDLE MATERIAL.

Founding Industries Near Source of Supplies the Best Policy.

In a business sense the shortest distance between two points is the lowest cost of production or transportation entailed in passing from one to another.

Before a factory or mill is located in any city the advantages and disadvantages resulting from close proximity to the supply of raw material or to the market are carefully considered. A tax-free site ceases to be an ultimate advantage if it does not possess at least one of the foregoing requirements, preferably the former. writes Naval Constructor C. A. Harrington in The American Machinist. The founding of an industry close to the supply of raw material is without doubt the best policy to be pursued on account of the saving in transporting and handling material, since the transporting and handling of the finished product cost no more as a general proposition than the similar handling of raw material. This principle is shown by a consideration of the manufacture of steel, steel products, and of cotton cloth.

The State of Pennsylvania, and especially the Pittsburgh district, is preeminent in the manufacture of steel, because it is the centre of gravity, so to speak, of the raw material entering into the manufacture of iron and steel, thus involving a minimum amount of handling of this raw material prior to the actual manufacture. Nature has given it vast supplies of coal, oil and natural gas, and while the ore required comes from a distance, the preponderance of the other raw materials is such as to make the Pittsburgh district virtually the origin of the supply, so that we may consider that the finished product is sent out in all directions which have not been previously traversed in any one opposite direction by the raw material. More particularly is this true of the various steel and iron products which are made in the vicinity of Pittsburgh, the raw material in such cases, namely, the steel and iron, being obtained directly at hand.

STOCKS REVIVE WITH SPEED AFTER INERTIA

Records Show Rapid Recoveries on Heels of Unusually Poor Business.

'TWAS SO IN THE YEAR 1888

Brokers Often Blue, but They Have Seen Market Grow Vigorous When It Looked at Its Worst.

Stock exchange members did some sober thinking one day last week when it was learned at the close of business that the turnover of stocks in the market session was the smallest for a five-hour day in twenty-five years. A total of 57,600 shares looked discouragingly slight as compared with a steady run of a half-million share markets in periods not so long ago, when speculation was active and the people were not averse to putting their money into stocks. Comparison with the previous low record of the year, 64,000 shares on July 11, showed conclusively enough that the market had fallen further from public favor since that day, but to be forced to go back a full quarter of a century to discover a session as poor as last Monday's was a startling matter.

Twenty-five years ago the Stock Exchange was as large as it is now in point of membership, but in other intimate factors it was much different. It is hardly fair to draw comparisons between the two periods, because of the vast changes that have occurred in the interval to make the Exchange an exceedingly important cog in the country's financial and business machinery, but to set in contrast some facts of that time and the present will add point to this discussion.

There were 1,100 members in 1888, and seats sold as high that year as $24,000 and as low as $17,000. If the mean price be taken as the average cost of memberships, the aggregate capital invested in seats on the board was about $22,400,000. Seats are selling now in the neighborhood of $50,000 each, making the combined capital placed in this end of the business $55,000,000. As a substantial number of members paid much more than this figure for their seats, the high record of $95,000 having been set seven years ago, a conservative estimate of the total amount represented by memberships would probably approach $75,000,000 more closely than $55,000,000.

Simplicity Ruled in 1888.

In 1888 the elaborate suites of brokerage offices of the present day were practically unknown. The Mills Building was then the pride of the financial district, and along Broad, the greater part of Wall, and up Nassau Street there stood two and three story structures. The Trinity Church spire projected further into the heavens than the top of any building on Manhattan Island. Brokers conducted their affairs with overhead charges in the way of rent, upkeep of offices, and telegraph charges, at a level at least two-thirds less than they are now.

At the time the low record of stock transactions was set in 1888, there were 192 issues of stocks actively dealt in. On a representative day this year the total recorded on the official sheet of the Stock Exchange was 455 issues.

A review of these few facts led to cogitation of a serious sort on the part of brokers who have seen fat years and lean years, but none so lean as 1913. The question was asked in many quarters of the Street last week, "Can the Stock Exchange come back?" On numerous occasions in the past this query has been made, and always answered by the market itself through an expansion of business which frequently surpassed the best records of the periods which preceded stagnant trading. The appearance of such adverse conditions as had not been seen in a quarter of a century, however, introduced an element of doubt into reasoning for the future, which was disheartening to those brokers who are not naturally of a philosophical and cheerful make-up.

Figures From the Past.

By way of showing exactly what the market has done in other years of indifferent trading it is worth while to give some figures. Going back to 1888, the record of day-to-day trading on the board shows that on July 5, the first business day after the low level of the year was established, the turnover was 60,300 shares. This was a gain of only 23,600 shares, but next day the market leaped forward to 201,400 shares, a figure that was excellent for the late 80s, and on the 10th, 245,000 shares changed hands, with 270,000 next day, and nearly 300,000 on July 13. From an average of about 94,000 shares daily in the week containing the dullest day, the average rose in the succeeding week to more than 200,000 shares a day.

Stepping ahead to 1894 we find the smallest day's transactions totalled 65,000 shares on Oct. 24. The reports for the next four trading days showed these totals: 91,270 shares, 84,800 shares, 73,534 shares, and 282,700 shares. In 1900, the smallest trading was represented in a total of 55,300 shares on Aug. 22. The next day's trading brought 99,800 shares, the next 116,767 shares, and the third 200,000 shares. In the next year the Steel Corporation was formed and subsequently came the boom days of the Stock Exchange. The smallest day of 1904 showed transactions in 73,633 shares on March 10. This was a Thursday. On Friday 160,300 shares changed hands, and Saturday's aggregate for the short session was 171,000 shares. On Monday a swing forward to 510,000 shares occurred, and on Wednesday nearly 600,000 shares were sold.

Last year the low day was Dec. 26, with 99,900 shares, in rounds numbers. Business steadily increased during the holiday week until 188,700 shares were dealt in on the last day of the year, and Jan. 2 saw 317,000 shares change hands.

Last week's market failed to show as vigorous recuperative powers as these mentioned, but there occurred, nevertheless, a fairly good recovery on the day following the low record, when nearly 200,000 shares changed hands, nearly four times as large a business as in the preceding session. The Mexican situation might be put forward as a possible excuse for the market not following the precedent of former years. Uncertainty over possible developments south of the border had not been considered more tense in the Street than last week at any other period of Mexico's difficulties.

Records Not Exceptional.

These records were not chosen from those of the past twenty-five years because they showed more clearly than others that the market picked up rapidly after becoming extremely dull. They were taken at random, and others would bear the same evidence in as convincing a manner. An objection may possibly be put forward by those who wish to be especially bearish on the stock trading business that so many difficulties did not beset speculation in other years as in 1913. They may say that the authorities of the Exchange have set their faces so strongly against any sort of manipulation of prices that it would not be possible for a big speculative movement to get under way. A member of the Exchange who has devoted some study to the cycles of activity and depression in the market was asked about this yesterday.

"Manipulation of prices never has been responsible for either bull or bear markets," said he. "The operations of a few speculators, no matter how active and powerful they were, have been only a breath to the candle of real speculation as carried on when the public really get into the market. The public has frequently let stocks severely alone for months at a time, but it has always come back again, and it always will. The fact that manipulation has been cast out of the market will not make a particle of difference. The public is not influenced to any degree by a temporary and artificial rise or fall of prices if it is not in a position to participate, but when conditions get right there will be as great markets as we have ever had."

Stock Exchange men have developed a high degree of patience in the past two years, and a number of them have become philosophers with a tolerably good brand of philosophy. They have seen, in that period, some exceedingly meagre days for business and profits, and have watched numerous indications of an incipient bull movement, only to have them shrivel away to the humdrum level of featureless markets before gaining noteworthy dimensions. In spite of full knowledge that office expenses were running far ahead of commissions, few members of the board have dropped out, and a vast majority of those who are trailing along are doing so with all confidence that the stock market will "come back" after a while.

Christmas Number of The New York Times
Next Sunday, December 7, 1913

THE GIRL OF TO-DAY

Twenty-nine pictures of typical American girls, selected by seven noted artists from hundreds of photographs submitted by Times readers, will fill an eight-page section. They will be reproduced by a new process known as rotogravure, which gives extraordinary results hitherto unknown in newspaper printing. The Girl of To-day Section will be the first eight-page American newspaper supplement produced by rotogravure, which will soon be used for all The Times's regular pictorial sections. The second rotogravure section, containing the artists' remaining 61 selections of typical American girls, will appear on Dec. 14.

THE PROPHETS IN COLORS

These famous paintings by John S. Sargent are in the Boston Public Library. The frieze will be reproduced from a Copley Print copyright by Curtis & Cameron of Boston, in the original colors, on heavy paper suitable for framing, by the same process used when The Times issued Abbey's "Holy Grail" and the Morgan pictures. It will be equal to any colored art print ever offered by Christmas publications costing fifty cents and a dollar. "The Prophets" and The Girl of To-day Section, which will be given to Times readers in addition to the regular pictorial supplement, will make the Christmas edition a unique publication. There has been no newspaper issue like it.

Christmas Number of The New York Times
Next Sunday, December 7, 1913

WARNING When issuing previous special editions The New York Times urged its readers to place their orders in advance, but thousands disregarded the warnings, and were unable to get the editions. The Christmas Number of next Sunday will be sold out far ahead of time. Unless you order it at once, you will not be able to get a copy. WARNING

STEEL OUTLOOK FOR THE WEEK

Plants' Output Fixed at 60 and 70 Per Cent. Maximum Capacity.

PRICES NEAR LOW LEVELS

Strong Sentiment Developed Against Any Interference with Wage Levels.

Special to The New York Times.

PITTSBURGH, Penn., Nov. 29.—The larger producers of crude and finished steel in this district are preparing to continue operations the coming week at 70 per cent. of maximum capacity or slightly better. Smaller mills, however, are operating at 60 per cent. of normal, and in some cases half time. Wage questions necessitated an informal meeting of a number of finished product manufacturers this week, and there developed a strong sentiment against any interference with wage levels. Even in the case of day labor, which advanced to abnormal limits last Spring and has since remained at $2.25 and higher, the sentiment was against announcing any change at present. Rather than reduce wages, with the coming of lower prices, the manufacturers in this district say they will run part time or close sections of their plants.

With 1.25c., Pittsburgh, the ruling price on plates, bars, and, occasionally, shapes, and the 2c. base shaded on sheets, prices already are scraping the low level reached in 1909. Recent reductions in price have not brought out any volume of new business, and shipments into consumption continue to fall off. The fear of dull times in the holiday season is not viewed with favor by the steel industry, because December generally finds the mills getting near the peak of the load, so that the comparison of operating conditions next month will be made with the boom seasons rather than with the dull months of other years.

Additional closing of blast furnaces in the Valleys and Eastern Ohio has not prevented the piling of some iron. The furnace interests are doing everything possible to prevent the accumulation of stocks of pig iron. Two furnaces closed during the last week in Valleys territory, and there will be more curtailment immediately after the opening of the month. Meantime, the announcement of the official averages on Valley iron on Monday is expected to show actual selling of basic at less than $13 Valley furnace. At the opening of the week this price was supposed to represent the minimum on basic iron, but since that time one sale of 6,000 tons running into first quarter and another of 1,200 tons for December shipment have been closed, on both of which it is said the $13 price was shaded. Small sales of Bessemer iron showed a price of $15.25 Valley furnace, but an inquiry for any considerable tonnage would bring out a price of $15 or better.

The minimum figures of $20.50 for billets and $21.50 for sheet and tin bars seem to be the bottom of the present movement in crude steel, these figures having represented the market for the past fortnight. Specifying for shipment during September, however, is reported by crude steel manufacturers to be at considerably less than 50 per cent. of maximum capacity, and the open hearth plants are expected to drop well below the present rate of operations soon after the first of the month.

Connellsville is not yet able to close on next year's furnace coke contracts. Prices for prompt furnace coke remain at $1.90, Connellsville oven, or a shade less. Operators who have been asking $2 to $2.10 on first quarter contracts are finding no offers higher than $1.75 at oven, and some consumers do not care to commit themselves. Merchant furnaces using coke out of the open market are uncertain as to what operating conditions may be next year. Foundry coke, for prompt shipment or contract, remains about $2.50, oven.

ELEVATOR TRANSIENTS.

Tenants Complain That Some Buildings Are Schools Merely for Operators.

Tenants of some of the buildings in the wholesale district of this city complain that the buildings in which they have their offices are virtually schools for elevator men. The fact that the employes of one of these buildings regarded it merely as a step to better places was brought home to the tenant of the building in this way: One of the operators became so discourteous that the tenant spoke to another operator.

"If Jim isn't careful he will be discharged," he said. "Oh, Jim?" replied the other operator. "He doesn't care. He is here simply to get experience. He has been promised a better place in a building downtown."

In some buildings it is said the landlord pays such low salaries that the men stay a short time only. In the big office buildings an elevator operator is not engaged unless he has had experience. When a young man wants such experience he applies to one of the buildings where service is furnished "under agreement." The applicant knows that there will soon be a vacancy. He knows also that while the salary is not high he can learn how to run an elevator.

THE FINANCIAL SITUATION AND STOCK MARKETS

FINANCIAL MARKETS

Prices Lower—Banks Lose Cash Heavily—The Money Market Outlook.

The movement of prices on the Stock Exchange yesterday was swayed chiefly by the expectation of an unfavorable bank statement and by reports that the long talked of suit by the Government against the American Can Company was about to be filed. The latter influence was directed mainly against the shares of the company directly concerned, but it had some collateral general effect, inasmuch as it again brought forward for discussion the Government's policy toward industrial combinations. The trading during the two-hour session was fairly active measured by the standard recently set. So far as the course of prices was concerned, except in the cases of issues influenced by special developments, it indicated the same sort of resistance to the reiteration of adverse factors as has been displayed for some time past.

The expectation of an unfavorable bank showing was borne out in the statement published after the close of the market. The cash loss in the actual statement exceeded even the larger of the estimates made on Friday, and was sufficient, despite a considerable reduction in loans and deposits, to wipe out the surplus of the previous week and to establish in its place a deficit of close to $1,000,000. The trust companies showed an excess of reserve, the deficit being due to the unusually large demands which had to be met by the Clearing House banks. Recovery from the smaller deficit reported a month ago was very rapid, and it is fair to assume on this occasion also that with the passing of the special needs of Dec. 1 the banks will be enabled quickly to restore their reserve to full requirement, but the gold which has been lost to Canada cannot be speedily recovered, and, barring gold imports from Europe, this market must depend for an increase in its actual cash holdings upon the return of money temporarily withdrawn for the first of the month requirements, and upon the continued inflow of cash from the interior.

Should the Government at this time further increase its deposits with the national banks it seems most likely that this return flow to New York will be stimulated. If that were to happen it would show pretty conclusively that, whatever the needs of the present situation, they would not be met by a mere addition to the cash at the disposal of the national banks. Were that the principal or even an urgent need, it seems most probable that the national banks throughout the country would have availed themselves to a larger extent of the cash offered to them by the Treasury. As it is, they have taken only about $35,000,000 of the $50,000,000 which was placed at their disposal at the beginning of the crop moving season. It is not improbable that one of the chief effects of postponing the return of these special deposits from Dec. 1 to Jan. 15 would be to lessen the strain upon the New York banks during the preparations for the January disbursements.

The position of foreign exchange at the close of the week did not indicate a likelihood of our bidding for gold in London on Tuesday, but whether or not we are to take gold during the next few weeks will no doubt depend upon our ability to repair our reserve position through the normal flow of cash to this market after the completion of the Dec. 1 payments. If the special Government deposits are to be returned in part on Dec. 15, as provided in the original Treasury instructions, there will be more likelihood than otherwise of our having to call on Europe for gold. No doubt it will be preferable to postpone any such demand on our part until after the turn of the year, and to this end a postponement of the Treasury's initial recall of these special deposits until Jan. 15 would contribute in substantial degree.

The average statement yesterday, as had been expected, showed an increase in loans. The actual statement, on the other hand, showed a contraction in the loan account. Apparently the trust companies drew down their bank deposits to lend money directly in the high call money market at the close of the week. The showing made by the banks yesterday, which, to a large extent, was due to the heavy Canadian gold demand, has introduced a new element into the money market situation which necessarily affects the outlook in respect to interest rates for the balance of the year. It will not be surprising if a certain degree of firmness is shown for some time, perhaps throughout December, but that depends as much upon the extent of the release of cash through the lessening of trade requirements as upon other and more determinable factors.

MONEY AND EXCHANGE.

Time money rates were 5@5¼ per cent. for sixty and ninety days, and 4¾@5 per cent. for four, five, and six months. Commercial paper was quoted at 5@5¾ per cent. for the best names.

TOPICS IN WALL STREET.

Leading Bonds Down.

The bond market has had a heavy tone for some time, but this condition was emphasized yesterday by a decline to new low records for the year in three leading issues. The general mortgage 4s, series A, of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul sold down to a new figure at 89¾, the Pennsylvania first 4s of 1948 went to 98, while the debenture 4s of 1934 of the New York Central declined to 87. In the case of the St. Paul and the Pennsylvania, the talk of new refunding mortgages has probably been a factor in causing a small recession in price.

Traders Like Steel's Action.

So far as there was any evidence of bearish pressure in the market yesterday, its focal point was on Steel. Only about 16,000 shares of the stock changed hands, but this total was nearly 4,000 shares greater than Steel's closest competitor for honors in activity. The fact that Steel failed to give any ground under sales was comforting to those traders who have taken a position on the constructive side for the time being, and they pointed to the stability of the shares when weakness was appearing in other quarters as proof sufficient that the attack made on the corporation by a Boston speculator had dislodged very little stock. Steel was able not only to close the session without losing the smallest fraction, but its tone throughout the two hours was more nearly firm than merely steady.

Can Rumors Justified.

The American Can shares reflected the influence in the Street of rumors late in the session that a Federal suit would soon be brought against the company to dissolve it. Dispatches from Baltimore saying that action had been begun under the Sherman law were not received, however, until after the market had closed. It was a subject for speculation in commission houses after definite news came as to whether or not the stocks would have been weaker than they were if traders had been certain in market hours that litigation was practically under way. In recent months the Can issues have been subjected to extensive selling several times by talk of a forthcoming suit, but on each subsequent occasion the bears took less interest in it. As Can common, next to Steel, was the busiest stock on the trading list some sellers believed the latest rumors would come true. The issue could not be classed with the really weak stocks by any means, and there appeared to be a good demand for it up to the close of business.

Thin Market for Specialties.

A casual glance at quotation boards in commission houses at the close of the market gave the impression that considerable weakness had developed. Such was not the case. With the exception of American Smelting & Refining, none of the real market-making stocks lost more than a fraction at the most, while trifling declines were the rule. It was, nevertheless, a poor market to sell specialties in. B. F. Goodrich preferred and common descended to new low records and there were recessions extending from 1 to more than 3 points in these shares: Rumely, American Woolen, American Linseed preferred, Lorillard & Myers, PetitObone-Mulliken first preferred, and others.

Narrow Price Shifting.

Not only were the price changes made by leading issues on the Stock Exchange in the last month extremely narrow, but they were largely a repetition of movements over ground already covered. The average price of the leading rail shares made its highest and lowest point within five days, and the entire movement in that time, from the highest on Nov. 5 to the lowest on Nov. 10, covered but 2.35 points. The industrials covered their range between Nov. 1 and Nov. 10, moving 2.27 points in that time. The combined averages moved but 2.30 points, and that all in the first third of the month. From Nov. 10 on prices moved back and forth within the narrow bounds already set up.

BOURSES OF EUROPE.

Irregularity in London and Paris—Firmness in Berlin.

LONDON, Nov. 29.—Money was in better supply to-day. Discount rates were steady in anticipation of foreign competition for the South African gold to be placed in the open market next Tuesday.

The stock market was quietly irregular. Strength in home rails was due to the better labor outlook, and Grand Trunk shares advanced on favorable earnings for October. Copper stocks reacted under realizing, and gold mines and diamonds were easy on Paris offerings.

American securities opened steady and a fraction higher, but later eased off under realizing and closed quiet with prices ranging from ⅛ above to ½ below parity.

PARIS, Nov. 29.—Prices moved irregularly on the Bourse to-day.

Three per cent. rentes, 86 francs and 20 centimes for the account.

BERLIN, Nov. 29.—Prices on the Boerse were firm and generally higher to-day.

CONSOLIDATED EXCHANGE.

Transactions in many stocks long before trading in them was recorded, and of others in which there were no other sales elsewhere in Wall Street were features of the day on the Consolidated Stock Exchange. The trading on the 9:30 o'clock opening call, while mainly in odd-lot accounts, was on quite a broad scale, twenty-two different stocks changing hands before 10 o'clock. Prices reflected a heavy tone from the opening of business, and after the call lost some additional ground. Currency bill and Mexican uncertainties continued to exert an adverse influence upon market sentiment. Transactions totaled 10,090 shares.

OUTSIDE SECURITIES

Trading Very Light on the Curb and Prices Move Within Narrow Limits.

The outside security market was very dull except for occasional trade in some of the oil issues. The latter retained their firm tone, but elsewhere there was little movement in prices. Standard Oil of New Jersey sold at 385. United Cigar Stores advanced from 90¼ to 90½, but fell back to 90 at the close.

NEWS OF THE CORPORATIONS AND THE BANKS

BANK STATEMENT

Heavy Cash Loss Wipes Out Surplus—Banks Reduce Loans.

In the actual statement of the Clearing House institutions there was shown yesterday a loss of no less than $22,000,000 in cash holdings, which was brought about by the large exports of gold to Canada, by the transfer of over $4,000,000 to San Francisco, and by the other special demands of last week. The effect of this large cash loss upon the reserve position was offset to some extent by a $37,000,000 reduction in deposits, but nevertheless the previous week's surplus of over $12,000,000 was wiped out and in its place a deficit of $905,000 was shown. In the average statement the loss in cash was much smaller and there was shown there a surplus of more than $5,800,000.

The bank statement figures compare as follows with the returns of earlier weeks and of corresponding dates in other years:

THE BUSINESS WORLD FROM MANY ANGLES

SAY CUSTOMS MEN ACT TOO HASTILY

Importers Complain of Arrests on Fraud Charges Without Sufficient Evidence.

Recent arrests of importers on charges of defrauding the Government by means of alleged undervaluations of imported merchandise or other practices have caused considerable criticism on the part of merchants, who, while in no degree presuming to pass upon the guilt or innocence of the accused men or firms, deprecate the frequent and indiscriminate prosecutions begun by the Government and, in most cases, never brought to trial.

While no official statistics on the subject have been compiled, it is a matter of common knowledge that in the last fifteen years a very large number of actions have been instituted by the United States District Attorney's office against importers for alleged violations of the administrative features of the tariff laws. In practically all of these cases importers were charged with undervaluing merchandise in one form or another. The usual procedure followed by the District Attorneys in question has been to file a summons and complaint against the importer. Most of the cases appear never to have gone beyond this stage. In other cases indictments were returned by Federal Grand Juries, with the result that the accused importers were placed under arrest and, after a hearing before a United States Commissioner, generally admitted to bail. Only a small number of these cases has ever been brought to trial, while convictions, with the exception of, perhaps, half a dozen flagrant cases have been few in the past decade.

An importer of many years' standing in this city voiced the sentiment of the trade yesterday when he condemned the filing of actions against importers on flimsy testimony or on upon the merest suspicion. Said he:

"There can, of course, be but one sentiment in the importing trade regarding the desirability of rooting out undervaluations of imported merchandise. It usually happens that, in instances where actual undervaluations are being made, competitors are the first to make the discovery and invariably call the attention of the customs authorities to suspicious cases. This desire on the part of honest importers to co-operate with the Government has shown some years ago in the notable silk fraud cases, when a large Chicago firm called the attention of the Treasury Department to the fact that a New York competitor was actually offering for sale Japanese silks at lower prices than the great Chicago house could purchase them in Yokohama. The Government's vigorous prosecution in this case resulted in the convictions of two members of the accused firm, together with a customs examiner, who was said to be in collusion with the importers.

"On the other hand, there has been in recent years a tendency on the part of the Treasury's special agents to work up cases against importers on what later appeared to be little better than hearsay. Such cases often resulted in the issuance of summons and complaints by the District Attorney's office which were never followed up. The harm done to importers in such cases is hard to estimate. The advertising attending actions of this kind has taken years to live down. Sales have been curtailed, and banks not infrequently have peremptorily called loans and refused credit in financing importations.

"This was the experience of a large ribbon house in this city. After serving the complaint in this action a Treasury commission visited Germany and France in search of evidence on which to base a trial, but without success. This case is typical of many others that might be mentioned in which financial embarrassment came to firms as a direct result of making unsubstantiated charges against importers. It would be interesting to know how many similar cases are lying in the archives of the District Attorney's office."

Importers feel that the District Attorney's office should investigate carefully all charges of undervaluation or other violations of the revenue laws before taking action calculated to injure the standing of importers or to impair their credit. That such care has not prevailed in the majority of cases in the past is held responsible by merchants for the Government's failure to prosecute after making damaging charges.

WANT BETTER RATES.

Merchants Complain of Freight Charges from Italian Ports.

The Italian Chamber of Commerce of this city has begun a campaign against excessive freight charges by steamship companies engaged in the Mediterranean trade and to correct abuses incident to the importation of merchandise from Italy. A statement of the Chamber's grievances was sent recently to the Mediterranean Conference in this city, which includes all the steamship lines doing business between New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and Italian ports.

One of the reforms asked by the Chamber is the adjustment of freight rates so as to relieve certain articles from charges claimed to be oppressive, when compared with rates for other articles more or less of the same character. A system of flat rates is also urged, without primage or rebates of any kind, thereby doing away with the present system of charging receivers of merchandise 10 per cent. primage, which, in most instances, returned to shippers or forwarders on the other side who do not pay freight. The Chamber requests that agents of the steamship lines in this country be authorized to close freight contracts with the importers here, who pay the freight, instead of compelling importers in New York to let such contracts to shippers and steamship agents in Europe.

The Chamber also asks more consideration and prompt attention to claims from consignees of merchandise, and that a method be devised so that the so-called B/L clauses may be amended for the protection of merchants without impairing the rights of the steamship lines. Sidney E. Morse, Secretary of the Mediterranean Conference, has advised the Chamber that the grievances of the association have been laid before the conference, but that as the matters complained of are not in the power of the conference to settle, they have been referred to the home offices of the various lines in Europe with a view to meeting, so far as practicable, the requests of the merchants.

GOVERNMENT WILL EXHIBIT.

Several Federal Departments to Take Part in Safety Show.

The United States Government will send an exhibit to the first Exposition of Safety and Sanitation, which is to be held at the Grand Central Palace from Dec. 11 to 20, under the auspices of the American Museum of Safety. The display will consist of a series of demonstrations showing how the Government cares for its soldiers and sailors in times of war and peace.

The Army and Navy Service will equip a field hospital, including mess, operating and ward rooms, with a detail of men who will produce actual conditions of camp life. The disposal of waste, filtration of water, preventive measures against typhoid, yellow fever, and other infectious diseases will be explained by processes. The navy will install and equip an operating room of a battleship, where may be seen the latest and most scientific appliances for taking care of the wounded.

Dr. Alsberg, Chief of the United States Bureau of Chemistry, will exhibit models of food for infantile feeding, charts, and diagrams of food values. The Bureau of Mines will send lantern slides and moving pictures describing the care which this department is throwing around the men under ground.

MAKE BETTER GOODS NOW.

Dull Business Has Stimulated Embroidery Trade in This Line.

The restricted condition of the embroidery business, accounted for by the present fashions, has caused a number of the domestic manufacturers to bend their efforts toward producing more original merchandise, and with it a broader outlet for their goods. Both quality and designs are given much attention by these manufacturers.

Resulting directly from these efforts are the lines of one large domestic house that contain attractive items of novelty embroidery on crêpe, ratine, and voiles. Cubist and Oriental effects are shown on flounding, ranging around the forty-five-inch widths. It is held among important members of the trade that should a larger business in Spring embroideries develop than is now expected, the domestic makers will be well able to take care of the demand, because a good number of them are now able to turn out goods more quickly than formerly.

COMMODITIES MARKETS

Wheat declined from ⅜ to ⅝c yesterday, and corn lost ⅛ to ⅜c after scoring early gains. Oats also lost ground to the extent of ⅛c in some options. Cotton was quiet and steady, closing with gains extending from 2 to 5 points. Provisions were firm, and cotton oil irregular.

WHEAT.

Trading in the wheat market was of small volume, but the tendency of values was down, and final quotations were ⅜ to ⅝c net lower. The Buenos Aires market was unchanged, but a Broomhall cable reported a decline of 2⅞c in the Rosario market. Prices in Europe were lower, and it was said that offerings were on a more liberal basis, while the Continental demand was less active. Receipts at Northwestern points were again ahead of expectations, and the cash and export demand was poor.

At 1 o'clock the New York market was quoted at 96⅝c bid for December and 98¼c asked for May. In the local cash market No. 2 red Winter wheat was quoted at 98⅛c c. i. f. New York export basis and 91 f. o. b., No. 1 Northern Duluth, 96⅛c f. o. b.

CORN.

Further unsettled weather with extensive rains over the corn belt caused an early advance of ⅛ to ¼c in the corn market, but during the day selling increased and prices developed weakness, closing at net losses of ⅜ to ⅝c. The December position showed the greatest decline which was thought to reflect less fears of congestion.

The local cash market was steady, with old No 2 yellow quoted at 85c, elevator, domestic.

OATS.

The oats market was only moderately active, but while price changes were narrow the undertone was easy and final quotations were ⅛c. to ¼c. net lower. The local cash market was dull; standard white quoted at 46 to 47c.; No. 2, 47 to 47½c.; No. 3, 45½ to 46c.; No. 4, 44½ to 45c.; ordinary clipped white, 44½ to 46½c.; fancy clipped white, 47 to 48c., all elevator.

PROVISIONS.

The provision market was steady at the start, owing to a slight upturn in the hog market, but prices reacted in absence of more than a moderate demand, and under selling thought to be by packers, although at the close there was a slight upturn on covering. Receipts of hogs at Chicago were 15,000, estimated for Monday 45,000, and for next week 150,000; Kansas City received 1,000 and Omaha 5,000.

COTTON.

The cotton market was quiet but generally steady on Saturday with the close firm at an advance of 2 to 3 points. Denials of Friday's late rumors that preliminary returns to one of the Southern statistical bureaus indicated a ginning to Dec. 1 of 12,100,000 bales seemed to be responsible for considerable scattered covering, while there was a little buying, encouraged by talk of a bullish crop estimate from a prominent New Orleans authority on Monday morning, and reports of an increase in the amount of cotton on shipboard awaiting clearance.

The opening here was steady at a decline of 1 to 3 points, in sympathy with lower English cables, but the market almost immediately rallied with active months selling 5 to 6 points net higher during the middle of the morning. December closed 3 or 4 points off from the best under realizing, but other months were within a point of the high level. Private cables attributed the decline in Liverpool to some hedge selling and scattering liquidation, which may have been influenced by Friday's late break in the American markets.

The Census Report on ginning to Dec. 1 is scheduled for publication on Dec. 8, and the Government's estimate of the crop will be published on Dec. 12.

The local market for spot cotton was quiet and unchanged at 13.40 for middling upland; sales, 4,900 bales.

MERCHANTS OFFER ANTI-PIRACY BILL

Report of the Industrial Property Committee Embodies Many Good Suggestions.

Not all of the manufacturers and importers who attended the recent convention of the National Registration League in this city were satisfied afterward with the outlook for a law in this country that would end the evil of design stealing. To these the announcement that the Merchants' Association had a similar campaign under way came as welcome news.

The association, through its Committee on the Protection of Industrial Property, is considered by many vitally interested in the matter to be especially well equipped to bring the campaign to a successful termination. Several members of the trade press agree with this belief. One of them, The Corset and Underwear Review, will make the suggestion in its December issue that the various trade associations, instead of drawing their own bills and submitting them to Congress, should crystallize their views regarding the scope and character of the desired legislation, and then submit their recommendations to the Merchants' Association to assist it in its campaign. In this way, it is said, the association will best be enabled to meet the requirements of the various trades.

Already the Committee on the Protection of Industrial Property has made a number of recommendations for the proposed bill, most of which follow:

The design must be new and original; in other words, it must not have been previously known or used by others, or patented or described in a printed publication, and it must constitute a writing or discovery of an author or inventor within the meaning of the Constitution. It may be a product of authorship or of inventorship, or of both combined, and two or more persons may be joint authors or inventors or authors and inventors.

For the purposes of this act it should be immaterial whether or not the design has an aesthetic or ornamental value or possesses functional value; in other words, in considering the validity of the design registration and infringement thereunder, any contention arising from the application of a new and original design to an article of manufacture should not be taken into consideration; and registration should not be invalidated because the article of manufacture to which the design is applied has been patented or is capable of being patented or because the design is one which has or might have been registered under the Copyright Act.

The design, for valid registration, must not have been in public use or on sale by any one for more than, say, two to six months before application. The public should be protected by forcing the author or inventor, or his assignee, to register promptly.

Registrations of designs should be had in a suitable bureau, preferably the Patent Office, and suitable rules should be made by the head of the office regarding the form of application, which should include a drawing, photograph, or other representation of the design, a statement setting forth the article of manufacture to which it is applied and a description, if desired or required, and an accompanying declaration by the author or inventor, under oath, of the novelty and originality of the design. There should be no examination except as to the formal requisites of the application.

There should be a registration fee of $1 for two or at most three years' protection, with provision for suitable renewals, subject to the payment of a suitable fee, for a term not too long, at most fifteen years altogether or from date of registration.

Provision should be made for giving notice of registration by suitably marking the goods to which the registered design has been applied.

Registration should be prima facie valid, and suitable provisions should be made for the protection of the registered design by injunction, and for the recovery of profits and damages. Suitable warning should be required to be given to an innocent infringer and no damages should be recovered against an innocent infringer unless he continues his infringement after being warned and given an opportunity to investigate the record of the registration. The burden of proof as to the innocence of the infringer should be upon the defendant. But in case a court or jury should find that the defendant had actually copied his design from a registered design or had continued to use it after suitable notice of the registration and of his infringement, a minimum sum should be fixed as liquidated damages and the infringer should be liable, in addition, for the profits made on the article of manufacture to which he had applied the design, as in the Design Patent act of Feb. 4, 1887.

Suitable provision should also be made to prevent the harassing of others in case the registered design has once been declared invalid by a court.

Provision should also be made for the four months' delay and priority permitted by the International Convention.

Sections 4,929 to 4,933 of the Revised Statutes, the Design act of Feb. 4, 1887, and other conflicting provisions should be repealed.

While there is some difference of opinion among the members of the committee regarding the proper scope of the proposed bill, the committee is agreed that such legislation is necessary. The members of the industries most affected by the piracy evil are hopeful for a tentative draft of the desired law in the near future.

MANY ORDER BOOKS NEEDED

Scheme Is Outlined to Save Salesmen's Time in Copying Sales.

The following time-saving suggestion is made to salesmen who are obliged to rewrite orders for their firms, many of whom require that specifications for goods from different departments be placed on separate order blanks. This suggestion was made to a salesman who was traveling for a local dry goods house, and who was carrying eight different trunks:

Have a separate order book in each trunk, in which to write at once the orders for goods from the department the line of which is carried in each trunk. In taking the order, write it immediately in the particular book contained in the trunk. This would mean a little more time and a trifling cost at first for more order books for each salesman, but no more books would be used up in the end, and the salesman would be saved many hours of extra work at night."

Domestic Goods Held Higher Than Foreign Only in Few Cases.

A number of the leading lines of cheaper grade domestic overcoatings and suitings for Fall, 1914, are now on the market. Samples of English cotton carded cassimeres are also being shown, and prices named on them are said to be lower than the domestic mills can meet. In several of the other lines, however, the foreigners' prices are substantially above those quoted by the domestic mills. About the only all-wool fabrics now shown for next Fall are mackinaws. While there will doubtless be a large increase in imports of certain kinds of men's wear fabrics under the revised tariff, the local trade holds that it will take some time to find where that competition will be felt most. One clothing manufacturer said yesterday that it would be confined to staples. He thought that high-grade fancies would be practically unaffected, because the foreign producers were too far away to keep in touch with our constantly changing fabric styles.

Detroit License Scheme Good.

Merchants in Detroit are expressing much satisfaction over the way the bill providing for the licensing and regulation of transient merchants has been enforced in Michigan. This bill provides for a license fee of $20 a day for five days, or fraction thereof, from all non-resident merchants who desire to conduct short sales. The license includes all details which characterize the sale to be held, and any false statement of any fact in the application for the license makes the applicant guilty of perjury. The law provides for a penalty of from two to five years in the penitentiary for such offenses. The enforcement of this bill, it is said, has eliminated many street merchants who hitherto did a fairly large business, and it has also hit the peddling trade.

For the second time in two weeks the declines shown in Dun's list of wholesale commodity prices nearly tripled the advances last week. There was a total of fifty-five changes of which forty were downward, compared with forty-eight changes in the previous week when thirty-five declines were shown. From these figures it may be seen that there were seven more changes last week than in the week before, and that, with the division of this difference favoring the declines by five to two, the tone of last week's list was slightly easier than that of the week ended Nov. 22.

The declines were spread over ten markets last week, while only four markets showed one upturn or more. Forty-four of the fifty-five changes were confined to three principal markets—foodstuffs, metals, and drugs, chemicals, and oils. It was evident from this fact that the unsteadiness was not general, and, aside from the great weakness of the metals markets, there was little real indication of the business depression that had been disputed more or less in the course of the week.

Despite the sharp downward trend of the general list, the foodstuffs markets were quite firm as to price. Last week's business resulted in nine declines in this part of the list, but they were largely offset by the eight advances that were shown. Vegetables and fruits showed a stronger tone, while coffee, sugar, and spices were slightly easier. Dairy products, save for eggs, were firm at recent levels. Near-by fancy eggs declined at wholesale, while the rush that high prices on this variety turned toward Western eggs forced up the price of the latter. Flour was generally steady and unchanged at levels which prevailed at the close of the previous week. The major provisions presented a divided front at Chicago; live beef, live hogs, and prime-steamed lard were lower, while mess pork, live sheep, and short ribs advanced.

The weakest part of the whole list was the metals markets, in which thirteen declines and only one advance—wire nails at Pittsburgh—were shown. Further concessions were made in many varieties of iron and steel, while tin, spelter, lead, and antimony dropped seemingly in sympathy. A sharp reduction was made in the price of copper. Drugs, chemicals, and oils together showed four advances and nine declines. In the grain markets wheat and rye advanced, while corn and malt receded

The price of cotton fell off somewhat under the weakening influence of more favorable crop reports. Wool was firm and showed a tendency to advance, despite the fact that the free wool provision of the new tariff becomes effective to-morrow. Minor declines were shown in hemp, burlap raw silk, turpentine, and crude rubber. The best grade of Para rubber, up-river fine, is now 33 cents a pound lower than it was a year ago at this time. The effect of low prices on the crude material is now beginning to be seen in reduced prices on some of the manufactured rubber articles.

FIXED PRICES HURT KNIT GOODS TRADE

Underwear Makers Are Especially Hard Hit—With Hosiery It Is Not So Bad.

The so-called retailer's "fixed price," with its limitations on the knit goods mills and jobbers, that has been accepted by both of these sellers for many years has been a subject of much adverse criticism this season and has, to some extent, curtailed the sale of this merchandise. Especially on the cheaper grades is its effect noticeable. How long the manufacturers can stand the pressure of the fixed-price evil, with both raw materials and labor at higher figures than in previous seasons is a much mooted question here.

A prominent selling agent, referring to the subject of fixed prices on underwear, said yesterday:

"Most of the underwear mills have named prices for Fall, 1914, on a fixed-price basis, as they did not see their way clear to avoid doing so. There are several instances where mills have priced one particular line at a figure netting them no profit at all in order to keep that line on the market. The mills referred to will sell none of their lines separately. An order must include nine numbers from the entire list. In this way they expect to make up what they lose, or, rather, what they do not make, on the line which gives no profit.

"Fixed prices," he continued, "now present a serious problem. Working hours have been reduced, wages have been increased considerably, and the costs of raw materials have about doubled in the last ten years. Notwithstanding the higher production cost, few of the manufacturers have reduced the quality of their products. Such a step would be disastrous in the face of the present competition."

According to a prominent hosiery selling agent the fixed price is not so damaging a feature to the hosiery trade as to the underwear and sweater trades. This merchant said to a TIMES reporter:

"If a jobber refuses to pay an increase over the price he gave for a certain number in the previous season, we offer him a cheaper line at his old figure. We cannot trade prices; if we do we will go out of business. We appreciate that the jobbers and retailers figure to get a certain profit, but we cannot run our mills if we make our prices to suit our customers, and they know it. The difference between the production costs of hosiery and the prices we are asking for our goods is sufficient to net us a fairly satisfactory profit. Consequently, we worry little about fixed prices."

A selling agent handling sweaters said yesterday that his principals were quoting advances on a number of their lines for next Fall. Some lines of cotton and wool goods have been withdrawn from the market, and mills have advanced certain other lines about 50 cents a dozen. Both the mills and jobbers' profits on low-grade goods will be hard hit, he says.

Large Amount of Wool In Bond.

The amount of carpet wools now held in bonded warehouses in this city, Philadelphia, and Boston is estimated at about 31,000,000 pounds. Practically two-thirds of the entire amount are said to be owned by carpet manufacturers. Notwithstanding the fact that so large a quantity of wool is now in the United States, a leading carpet corporation is reported recently to have bought 4,000,000 pounds of grease wools in South America.

LOCAL RETAILERS NEED DETAIL STUDY

Los Angeles Merchant Says They Should Prepare for Possible Investigation.

"A visit to the New York market is a great stimulant," said Lee Jacoby of Jacoby Brothers, Los Angeles, Cal., when here recently. "We have our own resident buyer here, and some of the heads of our departments spend as much as six months of the year here. Yet I always get new ideas and energy from a visit to this city.

"Business is excellent in Los Angeles, despite the fact that there is probably no city in the country where competition is keener. This is particularly true of our ready-to-wear garment departments and millinery. Fancy goods have not been so good. Women are not wearing so much imitation jewelry or so many belts and combs and bags as they did.

"I do not believe there is any other town in this country where the retailers co-operate to such an extent as we do. We are united on every question not only for the betterment of the trade, but, despite this, competition is keen. Considering the size of the city, rents are quite as high as they are here. Newspaper advertising rates may be somewhat lower, but we use bigger space. For example, a comparatively small Los Angeles firm has less than it is offered here in the Sunday papers, and frequently double that because of the competition there.

"The women in our town are keen shoppers. They are of moderate means and also immensely wealthy. They have nothing much to do but shop and enjoy the climate. Many of them know values as well as the department buyers. Merchandise bought in the New York market is generally sold at retail in Los Angeles for less than it is offered here to the consumer. Competition is again the answer.

"The minimum wage question is one which should engage the attention and study of the New York retailer It is bound to be put up to us sooner or later. The Illinois investigation brought out the fact that Chicago retailers did not know conditions in their own establishments. A single reading of the report shows this. It shows that when a Chicago retailer was a witness he answered at random and often displayed a woeful lack of knowledge of the true state of affairs.

"Sooner or later there will be a similar investigation in New York State, so it behooves the New York retailer quickly to become conversant with actual conditions in his store, so that the true condition may be spread broadcast over the country. He should know exactly what wages he is being defrauded in his establishment, as well as the lowest wage his women employes receive. Generally the head of a large establishment knows little of these things, except in a general way. He relegates to the heads of departments or special employes all such details of his business.

"Under existing conditions, however, it behooves him to become an expert in details. He should read and study the report of the Chicago Vice Committee. He should not allow any stigma to attach to his name. A false idea of Chicago conditions was spread over the country because the Chicago merchants professed ignorance of the real conditions.

"The leading New York merchants are doing a great deal for the benefit of their employes, both male and female. Many of these are only apprentices, who are being well paid while learning their business, and who are promoted as soon as they show ability, but if the head of the firm is not thoroughly conversant with the facts when he is called to go on the witness stand all his good work will go for naught."

BIG GROCERY FIRM TO LEAVE NEW YORK

Austin, Nichols & Co. to Move to Brooklyn in 1914—Will Consolidate Plants There.

The wholesale grocery house of Austin, Nichols & Co., Incorporated, signed a long-term lease last week for a combined warehouse, factory, and office building to be erected on the Brooklyn waterfront by the Brooklyn Eastern District Terminal Company, of which H. O. Havemeyer is President. Austin, Nichols & Co., with headquarters at 61 Hudson Street, occupy nine buildings in Manhattan, mostly on the lower west side. When the new Brooklyn headquarters is finished next September the firm's various departments, of which there are about fifty, including manufacturing plants, will be assembled under one roof, leaving only the main sales force, with its necessary sample rooms, in this borough. It is understood that the new building, exclusive of the site, will represent an investment of about $1,000,000.

The structure will be equipped with every modern device for the rapid loading and unloading of ships and trains, including spiral chutes, overhead conveyors, and pneumatic tubes, besides elevators and lowerators. A quadruple trackage, accommodating sixty cars, will enable great quantities of goods to be handled with notable savings of time and labor.

The main cause of the removal to a waterfront location in Brooklyn is the great and constantly growing expense of cartage through the congested streets of downtown Manhattan. The cost of cartage to a firm like Austin, Nichols & Co., which does a business averaging upward of $100,000 a day, exceeds $250,000 a year. Under the new arrangement cartage will be eliminated, except for local deliveries

Because of the removal of this house it is thought here that other wholesale grocery firms are likely to follow, the cost of cartage in lower Manhattan being a tax on business which all are anxious to evade.

Austin, Nichols & Co. are the largest wholesale grocers in the city, and, according to The Record and Guide, the largest in the world. The fact that by changing its location the company will be able to do business more economically, and, therefore, to reduce its prices, must have important consequences in the wholesale grocery district in Manhattan. Other leading firms are said to be considering the question of abandoning this borough.

Concerning the removal to Brooklyn one of the officers of the firm, in part, said:

"The welfare and comfort of employes is in no line of business considered more important than in the distribution of food products. This work calls for skill, strict attention to detail, and close application during working hours. To obtain for its several thousand workers every benefit of ample light, with an abundance of fresh air, is one of the motives back of the big step which this house is taking. A high-class dining room, with a cuisine in charge of a competent chef, will be among the show parts of the building. In connection with this will be rest rooms and other comfortable adjuncts."

Decisions Returned on Hemp Girdles and Extra Threads in Fabrics

The Board of United States General Appraisers has decided that girdles composed of manila hemp used in trimming women's hats are properly dutiable under the Tariff act of 1909 at 35 per cent. ad valorem under Paragraph 363. The goods were assessed by the Collector at Chicago as vegetable fibre trimmings at the rate of 60 per cent. ad valorem under Paragraph 349. Gage Brothers & Co., the importers, demanded lower rates. The board held that the Collector erred in his assessment, but as the importers failed to make the correct demands, the protests were overruled.

Kaskel & Kaskel failed in an appeal against an additional duty of 2 cents a square yard for extra threads in fabrics other than the ordinary warp and filling threads. The board held that the extra threads were used to make figures, and could be withdrawn without a substantial impairment of the goods. Under these circumstances it was decided the goods were properly assessed.

Judge Cooper sustained in part the contention of Marshall Field & Co in regard to the classification of merchandise invoiced as union glass checks. The Collector at Chicago assessed the fabrics at 45 per cent ad valorem, under Paragraph 332, Act of 1909, as in chief value of cotton. The importers asserted that flax was the material of principal value, and that the goods were dutiable at 35 per cent., under Paragraph 357. An analysis disclosed that a part of the goods were of flax in chief value. The lower duty was accorded on these fabrics, while the balance was held dutiable as assessed.

AMERICAN TOOLS BEST.

Merchant Tells Why Demand for Foreign Hardware Has Waned.

The question of importation is largely a matter of taste and sentiment rather than of price, according to a prominent hardware merchant of the Middle West. As an instance, he said, German cutlery, particularly pocket knives, was once the most popular in this market, but with the growth of American makes the German article has practically dropped out of the running. It is still cheap, comparatively, but it lacks the style and finish, in many cases, of the home-made article. Again, foreign-made builders' hardware could not be sold in this country at any price, as it is not in accordance with our ideas, either in description or construction.

The American edge tool has the call all over the world, he said, principally because of the possession of that indefinite thing called style. The merit of the foreign edge tool, so far as quality is concerned, is not in question. It simply does not appeal to our sense of general fitness.

PRINTCLOTH TRADE QUIET.

Week's Business at Fall River Affected by Drop in Cotton.

Special to The New York Times.

FALL RIVER, Mass., Nov. 29.—The cloth markets were quiet this week, and very little in the way of new business was offered. Concessions were made on several lines, but even these failed to arouse interest among buyers. Cotton went off, and cloth prices were irregular. These factors contributed to the week's dullness.

Cotton yarns may be obtained at reasonable prices, and sellers are showing a willingness to trade. The week closed with the demand very light and the outlook uncertain.

The following are comparative prices:

HARD COAL TRADE STRONG.

Prices Now Are Well Maintained—Soft Coal Steady.

Anthracite is strong all along the line, with prices generally well maintained and some premiums in effect. Stove coal is the feature of the hard coal market; it is in short supply all over the East, and commands a good price at all points.

OF CURRENT INTEREST IN THE AUTOMOBILE WORLD

STREAM LINES WILL MARK MOTOR SHOWS

Automobile Bodies This Season Tend to be Boatlike in Design.

"HULLS" HAVE "SKINS."

Tapestry and Chintz to be Used in Interior Decoration of Some Imported Cars.

The motoring world has heard more about stream lines applied to motor cars, and also about smooth interiors, this year than ever before, and yet to a great many these terms are unfamiliar. A few years ago the general public knew nothing about stream lines. Only a few scientists and an occasional boatman understood the meaning of the term. At the national automobile shows to be held in New York and Chicago next January the public will be given an opportunity of seeing many examples of stream-line bodies, which will in some degree exhibit the influence of the knowledge of all resistance on a rapidly moving body. The automobile, like the boat, saves much power by being built with the matter of air resistance fully considered. In this, as in everything else, that which is right looks right, so the refinement added in this direction has resulted in a material increase of beauty.

Beginning at the front, radiators offer the first opportunity for improvement, and the V-shaped or rounded radiator is becoming more common. Even where the radiating portion still is flat the tanks and corners are of pressed forms which give an advantageous result as well as a smoother and more finished appearance. Hoods taper from the front to a larger dash and cowl, or even form one piece with the cowl and offer no joints for wind resistance or weather exposure. It is readily seen that an unbroken surface presents less opportunity for water to enter on a rainy day and that the more nearly boatlike the body the better it protects the mechanism from the elements.

The once simple dash, consisting of a partition, has been nearly lost, and today the front of the body behind the engine is housed completely and extends to the operator and front passengers. In a number of cases the doors that join this front to the seat sides are placed well back, so as to make entrance to the seat more easy while permitting the cowl protection to be carried even closer to the riders.

Not only do the sides of the body swell outward in easy lines, but they have been rendered free from obstacles, such as hinges and knobs, so that there is nothing to catch the air or tear one's clothes. The tops of the doors and the bodies form one nearly continuous sweep from front to rear, and the windshields, formerly vertical, are now often inclined so that air is permitted to pass over the riders' heads. The fenders and running boards have been well cleaned of the boxes, tanks, and obstacles that formerly obstructed them, and even the rear ends are often rounded, and thus rendered more nearly free from the swirl of dusty air that tends to follow a large body carried rapidly through the air. Even underneath the bottoms have been closed up, so that here also the air can flow in easy lines with the minimum of resistance.

At the recent Paris Automobile Salon and the London Olympia Exhibition there were introduced several new and striking body designs, which attracted much attention. Some of these will also be shown at the forthcoming Importers' Automobile Salon in New York, thus affording Americans an opportunity to see the latest creations of the European carrosseries.

One of these new designs is virtually a drawing room on wheels. Instead of ordinary seats, revolving chairs are distributed over the spacious floor of the interior, with that absence of stiffness which is characteristic of a salon. All sorts of toilet requisites are attached to the walls, which are often draped with brilliant chintz, while the hangings consist of rare tapestries. In these cars, some of which seat six comfortably, one compartment includes costly miniatures set in jeweled frames, gold flower vases, and exquisite mirrors.

In the various types of boat bodies the resemblance to floating conveyances does not stop with the appearance. It is carried deeply into the construction. Such bodies for the most part are built up of a number of "skins" of woodwork to resemble exactly existing types of fast marine runabouts. The theory of such construction is to reduce weight while the lines conduce to a reduction of wind resistance. In at least one such body, the seats are removable and the "hull" is fitted with a cockpit coaming in regulation marine style.

DRIVES WITHOUT HANDS

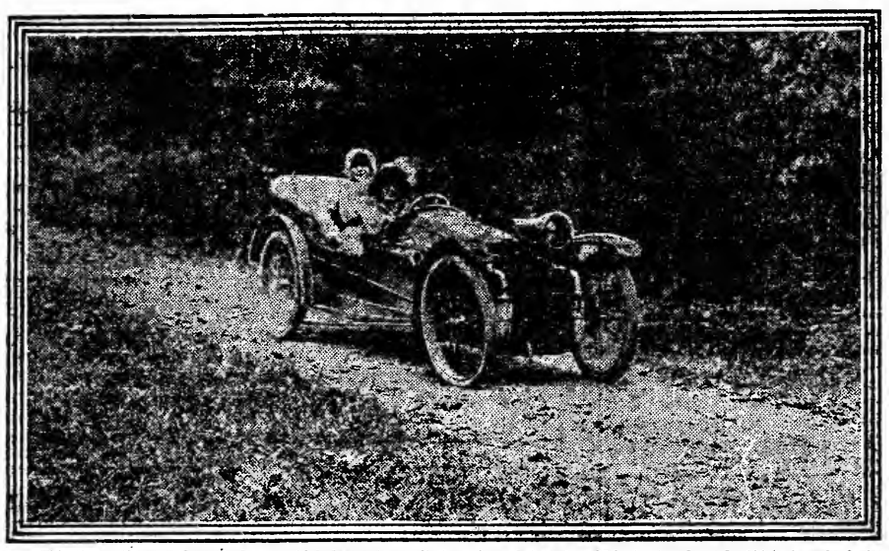
LIGHT AND EASY TO DRIVE



This shows the new Imp Cyclecar, which has a two-cylinder, air-cooled motor, 36-inch tread and 100-inch wheel base. The E. J. Willis Company has the agency here for this, one of the first American machines of the type to be put on the market.

MODEL GARAGE THAT SAVES TIME

Home of the Omnibuses Has Rainbow Piping and Many Other Improvements.

Time saving and efficiency are vital factors in garage management on a large scale. It was with the realization of this fundamental that the Fifth Avenue Coach Company planned its new garage on East 102d Street, where there is accommodation for about 150 big motor omnibuses, sufficient to take care of the present lines on the eastern side of the city and allow for growth.

Some of the devices installed to make the handling of cumbrous buses less difficult are ingenious and have a direct application in the motor truck field. On the main floor, where the buses roll in, there is an abundance of natural light, and the floor has been so pitched that the drainage is to a central grid, and the machines may be washed wherever they stand. A row of tile-lined repair pits runs along the north wall. These are, of course, fitted with electric light and with pneumatic supply for power tools, &c. At several points on the walls are gasoline outlets connected with the huge fuel tank sunk in the floor, which is equipped with a settling tank, in addition to the separator required by law. When a bus comes in its fuel supply is measured with a dipping stick, and the new fuel put in is also measured by a meter.

One of the odd things that strikes the visitor on this and the other floors of the building is the brilliant painting of the exposed pipe system. This is known as "rainbow painting," and makes for simplicity. The red pipes are the sprinkler connections; the aluminum, steam; green, gasoline; yellow, electric wire carriers, and gray, compressed air. By this method it is possible to identify any desired pipe at once by its color when there is a leak or other trouble. The practical value of this identification can be realized if one will glance at the maze of pipes that all look alike when they are exposed by a little excavating in the street.

Opposite the main entrance of the model garage is the largest elevator for vehicles in the city. It can handle the biggest bus with ease and deliver it to any desired floor. There is also a passenger elevator near by, and an electric dumbwaiter for sending up small parts or materials for which the big freight elevator is not needed. On the upper floors are the body shops for repairing, the room where the chasses are assembled as they come from France and the forge shops. Overhead craneways make the transportation of parts or even of whole chasses about the floors an easy matter. On the north side of the building on one of the upper floors is the supply department where, in steel bins, tier upon tier, are the spare parts for a dozen different models of buses. The bins run into the thousands. In another part of the building, handy to the machine shops, is a washing room where the larger engine parts, such as the clutches and the differentials are cleansed of road dirt and grease in a huge bath of kerosene.

Watchfulness has been found to be a paying habit in this modern plant so that now every bus receives an overhauling at the pits on the ground floor after each 1,400 miles of travel. Then, if necessary, it is taken down and sent upstairs for more radical repairs. But by constant tuning up this is rendered comparatively infrequent. Every bus, however, is taken down and completely overhauled once each year.

Warns Against Chemicals in Winter

C. T. Silver, one of the local motor car dealers, has issued a warning against the use of chemicals like calcium chloride, sodium chloride, or glycerine in indicators. The chlorides attack the metal of the system, he says, while glycerine acts as a solvent of rubber. If the water should freeze through neglect of precaution, it should not be thawed out by starting the motor. The car must be put in a warm place. Too thick an oil is not advisable during the cold weather, he adds, as it has a tendency to congeal still more. And when starting the motor, it should be run slowly for a while till things get warmed up.

FAVORS AIR FOR ALL CAR CONTROL

Engineer Predicts Coming of Air Brakes, Clutch, Cranking, and Tire Filling.

C. S. Cole, chief engineer of a storage battery company, has written THE TIMES concerning the use of compressed air for many car functions. He says, in part:

"We are hearing much discourse nowadays about the 'ultimate car' and the 'automatic car,' all of which is an outcome of starting the engine and developments in push-button gear-shifting. We cannot stop with eating half the pie, however, for we can obtain controls for both clutch and brakes. Pneumatic clutch control and air brakes are now being tested by various manufacturers, but the public will not hear about this generally until the disposition of the gear shift. The point of value, however, is the education of public opinion at an initial stage, so that it can choose the logical solution of all these questions intelligently, and conclude an opinion that cannot be influenced by artificial conditions. The agent which will be eventual for all this work about a car will be that one adapting itself with the greatest simplicity and reliability of actuation. For instance, we could use gasoline explosions to shift gears, but it is a ridiculously roundabout way of doing a thing, and we could come nearer to a practicable solution with hydraulic power, although this is still wide of the mark.

After arguing that air is preferable to electricity for starting the motor, Mr. Cole says:

"Passing to the use of a service brake without manual effort of foot application, together with absolutely balanced application of braking power to both wheels, we do not think it necessary to go further than the railroad air brake. Here was a device worked out for absolutely the best solution, regardless of all other considerations, because, for train service, many lives were dependent on perfect action without a possibility of failure. This resulted in present air brake equipment, which will be inherited by the automobile without other than appropriate detail change Passing to control of the clutch, we find that this item can also be handled with compressed air in a manner vastly superior to foot control when measured by flexibility of operation and deteriorating strain on the clutch mechanism by the average driver.

"Not only can a softer action be realized with much simpler clutch design, but the air control will not under any circumstances allow slipping of the wheels, or jerky engagement with its resultant strain on the entire driving line from transmission to tire tread. Further, no restriction is placed on positive engagement when in a tight place on a steep grade where rapid work is necessary to personal safety. The public should let these facts sink deeply into mind before entering the scurry for the automatically-controlled car, which is daily becoming more far-reaching and insistent. Consider the trouble which is going to result if one thing be used to start the engine, another to shift the gears, another to brake, and another to control the clutch. Against this balance the simplicity of a single agent performing all this work, especially when compressed air has been proven so superior in other mechanical industries, where the dictates of correct engineering are followed much more closely than in the motor car, where fashion divides with scientific deduction.

Lastly, we should bear in mind the question of tire inflation, which is another incidental advantage of pneumatic systems, without a single additional complication, whereas if other means are used for the above operations it is necessary to drive some form of pump from the engine if hand pumping is to be eliminated. In fact, many cars are to-day mounting tire pumps, solely for tire use, and the demand for this item seems to indicate that it is a fixture of permanency in the equipment of the car."

A. A. A. MEETING TO-MORROW

Twelfth Annual Gathering to be in Richmond—Some Plans.

An invitation has been extended to Representative William C. Adamson of Georgia, Chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to address the annual meeting of the American Automobile Association to be held in Richmond, Va., beginning tomorrow. Mr. Adamson is the father of the measure which, if adopted by Congress, would make it possible for an automobilist, after having complied with the laws of his own State in reference to registration and driving, to travel anywhere in the United States. When Congress meets in regular session the A. A. A. clubs throughout the country are expected to get behind the measure, which would largely solve the present complexities of interstate roads travel.

Arrangements have been perfected by the A. A. A. for taking to the United States Supreme Court the so-called New Jersey test case, wherein the issue involved relates to the double taxation of automobiles and the inability to go freely from State to State. Recently the Supreme Court of Mississippi decided that an automobile owner should not be compelled to pay both a registration tax of sufficient amount to come under the head of revenue, and at the same time be assessed for his car on the ground of personal property. The Common Pleas Court of Ohio has lately given a similar decision, and the A. A. A. State body stands ready to contest the matter in the Supreme Court of the State if it is carried up by the Commonwealth.

Another subject which will call for attention at the Richmond meeting is the adoption of uniform traffic regulations throughout the country, which will be set forth in a report by the committee which has had the matter in charge for several months.

JERSEY ROADS FOR WEEK-END TRIPS

One Fine Run Is Down the Coast, Returning by Way of Lakewood and Morristown.

GOOD GOING IS ASSURED

Another 200-Mile Trip Suggested by the A. C. A. Describes an Attractive Figure Eight.

Extensive investigation of road conditions carried on within the vicinity of New York City by the Automobile Club of America with its road car service has prompted the Bureau of Tours to recommend two exceptionally fine good roads tours for the week-end. One trip suggested comprises a run of about 230 miles over unusually good roads. This follows the popular Staten Island route to Tottenville, thence over slightly bumpy roads, by way of South Amboy to Red Bank. From Red Bank, the Rumson Road, lined on one side with magnificent homes, leads to Seabright. This popular Summer resort is the beginning of a run down the coast over roads good most of the way.

Passing seashore residences, continue south through Galilee, Monmouth Beach, Long Branch, West End, Elberon, Deal Beach, and Allenhurst, all well-known residential sections, Asbury Park, the scene of much activity, thence through Ocean Grove, Bradley Beach, Avon, Belmar, Spring Lake, Sea Girt, the home of President Wilson during the strenuous days of his campaign, through Manasquan, and Brielle, to Point Pleasant, thence by way of West Point Pleasant, and Burrsville, the route leads to Lakewood. From Lakewood it is possible to use the New Egypt road to Pemberton; thence by way of Mount Holly, Columbus, and Bordentown to Trenton in preference to the Lakehurst-Brown Mills route.

From Trenton some of the finest roads in New Jersey, or, in fact, in the East, will be encountered on the return to New York. This goes by way of Ringoes and Flemington to White House, thence through Somerville and Bernardsville into Mount Kemble Avenue to Morristown. Continuing north, the route runs through Morris Plains to Parsippany, where a direct turn to the east is run over mostly good roads through Pine Brook, Caldwell, Verona, Montclair, thence via Newark and the Plank Road to the Hudson County Boulevard for the Weehawken Ferry.

Average conditions on this trip will be found superior to most others of this distance. Accommodations which can safely be recommended are obtainable. The variety of scenery rolling along the coast, thence over a mild, hilly section, and on into the more rugged New Jersey mountain district supplies all the variety one could well wish. For a two-day jaunt no trip would be more attractive for the leisurely motorist.

Another delightful journey of 200 miles through New Jersey will give scenes of varied types. Running over the Hudson County Boulevard by way of the Forty-second Street Ferry, Weehawken, and Third Street, run south across Newark Avenue to the West Side Park, where turn right and follow the parkway to Communipaw Avenue and straight on the Newark Plank Road. From Newark run out Clinton Avenue and either by way of Frelinghuysen Avenue or Elizabeth Avenue go south through Elizabeth and Rahway to New Brunswick. Continue on through Franklin Park, Kingston, Princeton, and Lawrenceville to Trenton.

For the run down to Lakewood go by way of White Horse, Bordentown, Chesterfield, Jacobstown, New Egypt, Cassville, and Vanhiseville, all over good roads. From this resort in the pine belt section go north through Adelphia to Freehold and Englishtown. Here a new road will be found, running by way of Spotswood and Old Bridge, to New Brunswick. This hustling city, over the itinerary outlined, is approximately 135 miles from New York. Good accommodations can be found here, but should one wish to continue, cross the Raritan River and run to Bound Brook, then over a slightly bumpy road to Somerville. From this point the road leads northward and many beautiful sights will be encountered through this section, continuing through Pluckemin, Bedminster, Far Hills and Bernardsville to Morristown. These are beautiful roads and the country is most attractive.

Morristown is the gateway for the return to New York. Go east on South Street and then good roads will be found by way of Madison Avenue through Madison, and straight on along Main Street through Chatham. The road then becomes the Morristown Turnpike which runs past the Brantwood Club to Springfield. Here a turn left into the Seven Bridges Road leads into Springfield Avenue which is followed to Irvington. Then bear right into Clinton Avenue and run straight on into Broad Street, returning to the Hudson County Boulevard by way of the Plank Road. Following this route a figure eight will have been described on the map.

WHEN TIRES ARE IDLE.

Preparation for Winter Storage of Casings and Tubes Described.

"There is no doubt that the automobile has proved its usefulness as an all-the-year-around vehicle," said R. C. Rockhill, manager of the automobile tire department of one of the big rubber companies, last week. "But there are many difficulties to be overcome in operating the car during the cold months. A large percentage of car users store their machines during that period. The question naturally arises how best to take care of the machine and its different accessories during the period of storage.

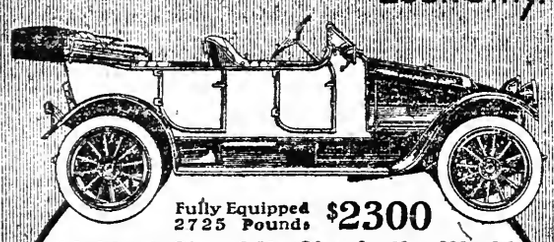
"Tires are more likely to suffer from improper storage than almost any other part. When the automobile is stored, it is best to remove the tires from the rims. Pile them one upon the other; don't stand them upright. The room in which they are stored should be moderately cool, because excessive heat or excessive cold will tend to deteriorate rubber. A dark room is preferable, as rubber is affected by the light. If, however, dark quarters are not obtainable, the tires should be covered with a large canvas.

"Tubes should be inflated slightly—enough to cause them to stand round. They should be piled in the same manner as the casings, with a covering to prevent their exposure to light. Tubes may be safely allowed to remain in the casings if care is taken to see that the casings are well dusted with French talcum or soapstone before the tubes are inserted."

Truck Made a Rapid Move.

An example of quick moving was recently given by a one-ton motor truck in Boston. A hurry call to move a load of household goods from Arlington, Mass., to a Summer home at Plymouth, Mass., forty-eight miles away, was received. The truck left Cambridge at 1 P. M., went to Arlington, three miles away, and loaded. This load was delivered in Plymouth the same afternoon and the truck returned to Cambridge at 10:45 P. M. The total distance covered was ninety-three miles, and the time was 9 hours and 45 minutes, including time spent in loading and unloading. Nine gallons of gasoline and one quart of oil were used.

FRANKLIN SIX-THIRTY Eclipses All Records in UPKEEP Economy.



Fully Equipped 2725 Pounds $2300

Lightest Six of Its Size in the World

The Franklin SAVES TIRES, uses LESS GASOLINE, travels smoother, steers easier, LASTS LONGER than any car of equal weight, size and power. Let us PROVE this—prove why the same tire lasts THREE TIMES longer on a light resilient Franklin than on any other car.

Also bear in mind the Franklin DIRECT-COOLED MOTOR eliminates all cooling troubles. No winter preparations are necessary—for there is no radiator and water cooling system to freeze.

But, above all, the car is UNEQUALLED IN ABILITY. Fifty miles an hour seems no more than twenty-five, the motor is so QUIET and SMOOTH, the riding so EASY and VIBRATIONLESS.

Left hand drive, centre control, Entz electric starting and lighting system, fully equipped, $2,300.

Haynes "Six" $2700 equipped with Vulcan Electric Gear Shift

You get the "best" out of Haynes Cars because Elwood Haynes puts his "best" into them.

Elwood Haynes built America's First Car; he is still building it. The car that he has given his life time to perfect has never been in second place—

Today it is again "First"—with the Vulcan Electric Gear Shift—a device so simple that it enables you to master the Haynes within 30 minutes after you first see it.

HAYNES

America's Firs Car

You cannot intelligently choose any motor car until you ride in the Electrically controlled Haynes. And we want to urge upon you the necessity of "knowing" all cars before you buy.

"Knowing a car" means making sure that each individual part is built strongly enough to stand the strains of continuous driving without causing you an excessive upkeep cost later—

The presence of a gear shift, a starter, a generator, or any other specification on a Haynes car means that particular part has passed the most rigid tests to determine its worth.

It further means that Elwood Haynes has placed his "O.K." on its performance and has declared it worthy of his car.—

Arrange to ride in the Electrically Controlled Haynes—

We are anxious to have you ride in any and every car built because we know that if you will let your own judgment be your guide you will own a Haynes.

NEW ANALYSIS OF FRENCH CRIME

By Dr. Jacques Bertillon.

Bertillon Blames the Industrial Development and complex Life of Modern Days for Increase in Wrongdoing

IN view of the atrocious crimes which for some time have followed each other so rapidly in France, one naturally asks what are the causes of this increase in criminality. Are these causes temporary and transitory, or, on the contrary, are they permanent? Has some poisonous breeze passed over the country, or is it true to say that "there is something rotten in the State" of France?

Here is the number of crimes and offenses in France for eighty years:

AVERAGE NUMBER PER ANNUM.

1831-40	90,173
1841-50	112,556
1851-60	163,823
1861-70	146,981
1871-80	170,462
1881-90	198,752
1891-00	208,120

example, are the figures for Germany:

	Average Number of Crimes and Offenses.	Per 100,000 Inhabitants Above 12 Yrs. of Age.
1882-1891	636,788	1,631
1892-1901	443,250	1,206
1902-1909	515,790	1,215

The more industry develops, the more complex life becomes, the more numerous are those who go wrong. The preceding figures, however, are far too swollen, because they mix up the most atrocious crimes with simple delinquencies. If we count the number of real crimes alone we obtain figures less startling than one might at first believe:

Average annual number of people accused of crime:

	Below 16 Yrs.	From 16 to 20.	Above 20 Yrs.
1831-1840	100	1,220	6,315
1841-1850	75	1,149	6,043
1851-1860	65	902	6,276
1861-1870	40	641	3,728
1871-1880	47	803	3,872
1881-1890	31	684	3,690
1891-1900	28	602	3,080
1901-1909	20	525	2,298

One must not think, however, that crime is diminishing. The figures decrease so quickly only because misdeeds which were formerly classified as "crimes," by the Judges are nowadays considered as simple misdemeanors. The law has not changed, but its application is modified by the passing of time. For instance, what was formerly considered as "attempted murder" and punished by death is only regarded now as "violence with wounds"; theft, which formerly would have been entitled felony, and would have brought its author to the convict prison, is now considered only as petty larceny or cheating.

These changes are made very slowly, without one being able to point to any legal text or to any written document. They are not to be fixed by any precise definition. Why have judicial customs changed in this way? It is undoubtedly owing to the softening of public opinion. We revolt nowadays from applying to guilty people such severe penalties as formerly. Indeed, we have gone much too far in this direction.

But it is not always because of indulgence that offenses formerly classified as "crimes" are now put into the category of "misdemeanors." In France crimes are decided by the jury, and the French jury allows itself to be profoundly influenced by the eloquence of advocates. Misdemeanors, on the contrary, come before the judgment of Magistrates of austere character, who, though they condemn the guilty to light punishments, never acquit them, however moving may be the pleading of the counsel. The result is that accused persons often defend themselves by a paradoxical argument:

"I am not," they say, "a simple offender worthy of a short imprisonment, but a frightful criminal who claims penal servitude. Let me be sent before a jury." They speak like that not because they prefer the convict prison to the common jail, but because they rely upon the ability of their advocate. They hope the jury will acquit them, while they know that the Magistrate will be inexorable.

Let us consider the total number of those found guilty of misdemeanors or crimes. We obtain the following figures:

	Below 16 Years.	16 to 20.	Above 20.
1831-40	3,139	9,228	67,809
1841-50	4,570	14,250	93,719
1851-60	6,643	19,035	133,260
1861-70	6,361	19,938	121,695
1871-80	7,649	22,646	141,108
1881-90	6,444	28,683	163,625
1891-1900	6,367	31,404	167,749
1901-09	4,988	39,686	153,419

One may see that the figures for every age show an increase except during the last ten years. The increase is remarkable above all among young people from 16 to 20 years of age. As for the children less than 16 years of age, their actual criminality is greater than the figures show. Magistrates, as a matter of fact, very often do nothing more than address them severely. They only prosecute them with the law when the reports upon their character are very bad.

This increase in juvenile criminality is not peculiar to France. It is to be noted in other countries, as, for example, Germany:

Number of persons prosecuted per annum in Germany:

	Of all Ages.	Below 18 Yrs.
1882-85	320,800	30,673
1886-90	342,195	34,869
1891-95	410,540	44,494
1896-1900	453,730	46,748
1901-05	497,708	50,401
1906-09	530,395	53,440

The German population increases so quickly that it is impossible to appreciate the value of these figures without comparing them with the number of inhabitants.

Number of accused persons, per annum, per 100,000 inhabitants:

	Of all Ages.	Below 18 Yrs.
1882-1885	1,003	651
1886-1890	1,021	596
1891-1895	1,155	701
1896-1900	1,197	728
1901-1905	1,220	731
1906-1909	1,184	719

The age in which crime is greatest is from 18 to 21 years in Germany. As for crime among women it is in Germany, as elsewhere, incomparably less than among men. Women are often the direct or indirect cause of misdeeds committed by men, but they themselves are rarely guilty.

Germany, 1901. Number of persons prosecuted for crimes and misdemeanors per 100,000:

From	Men.	Women.
12 to 15	770	145
15 to 17	1,734	346
18 to 20		497

Here are the numbers of these very young people are guilty:

France, 1900. Number of persons prosecuted per 100,000 inhabitants of all ages.

	Below 16 years of age.	From 16 to 20.	Above 20 years of age.
Crime	0.4	16.4	10.5
Homicide		3.0	2.2
Vagabondage	6.3	67.6	40.6
Begging	1.8	16.2	20.9
Vio. and wound'g.	10.3	165.7	116.4
Off. agst. morals.	3.0	14.9	17.3
False pretenses	1.7	17.3	20.0
Fraud	0.5	9.3	11.0
Common theft	72.2	234.2	115.6

The great factor in juvenile crime is not, as one might have expected, vagabondage, but robbery, and especially the common theft by which these precocious criminals begin their miserable careers. Very often also the ferocious characters of these young "apaches" is shown by the number of cases of violence and wounding.

What is to be done with these young blackguards? A doleful problem which no one knows how to solve. Here are the methods adopted in 1909, the figures for preceding years being very similar:

Juveniles, from 16 to 18 years of age:

Convicted, as having acted with discernment	5,214
Sent to reformatory schools	813
Sent back to their parents, or to third parties	1,493
Acquitted	649

I have been able to follow the careers of some of those who have been sent to "third parties," that is to philanthropic societies. Alas, the efforts of worthy people who have undertaken the heavy task of leading back these young miscreants to good ways have been seldom rewarded. They are bad from birth. "Look after the eggs," said Pasteur in speaking of silkworms. From a bad egg no good may come.

Charity, however, insists upon society doing its best to give these young brutes good ideas, but without being the dupe of this generous sentiment. One must be very indulgent for a first offense, but so much more severe to those who come back. Such is the principle of the law of March 26, 1891, called the Berenger law. The Judge has now the right of deciding that the penalty to which the guilty young person has been condemned shall not be applied if for five years he does not relapse into crime, but that it shall be increased in the contrary case. The tribunals make use of this law more and more their punishment on condition that they do not continue their fault. The "respite" is granted, actually, much more frequently for acts classed as misdemeanors.

Number of those given a "respite" per 100 persons condemned for the first time:

1892-95	14
1896-1900	22
1901-05	31
1906-09	31

It may be found that to reprieve a third of those condemned from the punishment of their misdeeds is to be over-indulgent. Nevertheless the results of this extreme kindness have not been bad. Here, for example, are the results yielded in the period 1904-9.

In the year 1904 the number of misdemeanants sentenced for the

QUERIES AND ANSWERS

Readers of The Times are particularly requested to read the following before sending queries to the Query Department:

This department does not pretend to be infallible. It will endeavor to answer questions sent to it by THE TIMES readers to the best of its ability.

No answers can be given regarding legal or medical matters, card problems, propriety in dress, correctness of English sentences, and values of stamps and coins, nor to questions of a trivial character or of concern only to the questioner.

To receive attention every question must bear the name and address of the person sending it. This does not necessarily mean that the name will be published when the question is answered; only the initials will be used if the questioner so desires. No attention will be paid to queries to which the name and address of the sender are not appended.

Hundreds of letters are received by this department, so that it is obviously impossible to answer all of them immediately. In many cases there must be a certain amount of unavoidable delay.

Barnum's Museum.

ROBERT BARBOUR.—In connection with the question in a recent issue of THE TIMES about the burning of Barnum's second museum, permit me to say that one of his museums, probably the one mentioned, was burned March 2, 1868.

Indians in New York.

F. W. SAWARD.—Can you tell me, through the inquiry column or by reference to publications, something relative to Indian affairs in the immediate vicinity of New York following the Dutch occupation? History tells of trouble with the Indians in this immediate vicinity during the terms of the four Dutch Governors, but subsequently, I believe, there was no trouble.

You will find a detailed account of the Indians who lived near New York City in Schoolcraft's "History of the Indian." This is a standard work, to be found in most public libraries.

Further information may be obtained from Ruttenberger's "Indian Tribes on the Hudson." Perhaps the fullest account is that in the book called "Indians of Greater New York and the Lower Hudson." This forms Volume III. of the series of "Anthropological Papers" published by the American Museum of Natural History. It may be consulted in the library of the Museum. Its price is $3.50.

Ford's Theatre Programme.

SHERWOOD PHILLIPS.—Can you give me an idea as to the value of a copy of the programme of Ford's Theatre, in perfect state of preservation, of the night of April 14, 1865? That was the night President Lincoln was shot.

It is worth about $50, if it is one of the originals. There are in existence, however, certain copies of the original bill, printed as souvenirs on the day following the assassination, and these are worth only 50 cents or $1. They may be identified by the added sentence, "The President will attend tonight's performance," or words to that effect.

First Mortgage.

A. F.—In buying property, a house for example, on the installment plan, what would be a reasonable first mortgage? Would 50 per cent. be too high?

Fifty per cent. is not unusually high. Sometimes 75 per cent. is asked.

Negroes in Greater New York.

V. E. GRAVES.—In order to decide a dispute will you be so kind as to state the negro population in Greater New York City?

In 1910 there were 91,709 negroes in Greater New York City. The number to-day is estimated at 100,000.

Washington and Lafayette.

Miss A., New York.—I have an engraving of Washington with Lafayette, at Mount Vernon. It has been in my family for seventy or more years, but it is in perfect condition. It is said to be a "proof before letters" and is unsigned. Can you give me any information as to its present value? If not, can you name some one to whom I could apply?

If it is a genuine proof before letters, in good condition, it is worth about $20. An ordinary copy of this engraving is worth about $5.

The Private Coffee of the Greatest Coffee Merchants

For years, the greatest coffee merchants in the world reserved a special coffee for their personal and gift use.

At Christmas, with all the coffees of the world from which to choose, this was the one sent out as a gift to business associates and friends.

It produces the choicest, most delicious cup of coffee which can be secured, regardless of cost.

It was so enjoyed for its flavor and fragrance, that wherever it was sent everybody wanted it regularly—asked to be allowed to purchase it.

Instances of this kind became so frequent, that this coffee will no longer be confined to private distribution, but is
